About the same time, there hapned at Rome two most fearful accidents; the one of them continued long, but was not altogether so vehement and terrible: for there was an earthquake endured eight and thirty daies. All which time, the lawfeed or vacation from all courts of law and civil causes, continued in great fear and pensiveness: in regard whereof, a supplication was holden for three daies. As for the other, it was not a vain fear, but a very loss indeed that touched many men: for there began a scarce in the beast Market, and continued a day and a night, burning many bodies standing on the Tyber side; and all the shops and ware-houses, with merchandise of great price, were consumed. Now was the year well drawing to an end, and daily more and more the bruit and rumor of the war with Antiochus increased; and likewise the care that the LL. of the Senat had thereof. And therefore they began to treat as concerning the Provinces of the Magistrates elect, to the end, that all of them might be more circumspect and intentive to their charges. So a decree passed, that the Consuls should have the government of Italy, by name, and also to go whithersoever the Senat should please to dispose of them: and all men knew well enough, that the war against Antiochus was upon the point. Also ordained it was, that he whole lot it was to manage that war, should have the conduct of four thousand footmen of Roman Citizens, and three hundred horsemen; besides six thousand allies of the Latine nation, and four hundred horsemen. L. Quintus the Consul was appointed to take musters for those souldiers, that there should be no stay, but that the new Consul might immediately put himself in his journey, to what expedition soever the Senat thought good. Item, It was decreed as concerning the Provinces of the Pretors, in this manner: namely, That the first lot should assign the double jurisdiction, civil and foreigne, as well among Citizens as strangers: the second should concern the Brutians: the third, the navy, and the same to sail whithersoever the Senat would appoint: the fourth for Sicily; the fifth for Sardinia: the sixth for the nether Spain. Over and besides L. Quintus the Consul was commanded to enroll two new legions of Roman Citizens, besides twenty thousand foot and eight hundred horsemen of allies of the Latine nation; and this army they set out for the Pretor, who was to govern the Brutii. Two chappels that year were dedicated to Jupiter Capitolinus: the one to othem L. Furius, Purpureo vowed in the Gauls war, as Pretor; the other when he was Consul and Q. Martius Ralla the Daumvir, dedicated them. This year there passed many sharp and grievous sentences and judgements upon usurers: against whom (being private men) M. Tuccius and P. Junius Bruttus the two Ædiles of the chair, commenced action. Of that silver wherein they were fined, was made a chariot with four wheels, gilded, and set up it was in the Capitoll in the cabinet of Jupiter above the top of his shrine: likewise twelve buckles gilded. The same Ædiles also, caused the porch or gallery to be made without the gate Tergemina, among the carpenters.

As the Romans were wholly amused upon preparation for this new war, so Antiochus for his part sat not still: three Cities there were which kept him back and checked his progress, to wit, Samprna, Alexandria in Troas, and Lampfacus; the which they never could to that day force by assault, or draw into amity with any condition whatsoever; and to leave them behind in thole terms, when the should in proper person pass over into Europe, he was not willing. Somewhat also he was impeached by a consultation as touching Amibal. For as first he was laid and hindered by occasion of the open ships which he intended to send with him into Africk. And afterward buzzed it was into his head by Thous the Ætolian especially, and question moved, whether it was good simply to fend him thither at all, or no? This Theas, when Greece was all in an hurry and full of troubles, bare them in hand, that Demetrius would be in their power and at their devotion. And like as with his leavings touching the King, in multiplying and magnifying his forces, he had brought many of the Greeks into a fools paradise, even so also after the same manner he ceased not to feed the King with lies, and fill him with hopes, making him believe as all men wished for him with all their hearts, and would run by heaps to the sea strand, to meet him to soon as they could ken his fleet under sail. This false same man was so bold also as to alter the Kings mind as touching Amibal, which seemed before relolved and settled. For he perswaded him that the Kings navy was not to be dismembred, and part therefore to be sent away; and if he were to make out any of the ships from the rest, yet Amibal of all other was not to have the conduct thereof, a banished person and a Cathaginian; who was like enough to be of many minds, & to change a thousand times in a day, such was his present condition and fortune, & such was his nature and disposition. And as for that glorious name for martiall prowesse (which is the cause that Amibal is so much let by, and which recommended him as a speciall and singular gift to the world) it is too much, and far unfitting for any one captain under a King: and moremeet it were that the King himself should be regarded and seen above all other, that the King, I say, and none but the King should be the leader, conductor and commander of all. Again, if Amibal chanced to military with a fleet, or to have his forces defeated, the losse would be accounted no more then if any other meaner captain had done it: but if the affairs should prosper and speed well, Amibal should go away with the honour, and not Antiochus. Moreover, say that fortune were so kind as to give Antiochus the upper hand of the Romans, and the entire victory over them for ever, what hope or likelihood is there that Amibal would be content to live under the King and subject to him alone, who hardly could brook and endure the command and sovereignty of the whole state wherein he was born? He hath not carried himself so, ever since his youth, bearing amind to compass the dominion of the whole world, as that now in his old age he can not abide to have a lord and a superior over him. To conclude: the King (quoth he) hath no such need of Amibal in this war, as to make him a commander: wel maye he use him for a counsellor, and so forth have him in his train and company: for some mean fruit and use of such a nature, cannot be cumbersome, hurtfull, and dangerous: but if high and great matters be reached at, soon they may bear down and overcharge both the giver, and also the receiver. And so spirits are so ready to envy and malice others, as they whole birth and parentage, whole degree, and estate is not answerable to their haury minds: and such commonly, as they hate the virtue, so they deprell the good of another. Hereupon their course of sending Amibal into Asiatic, was forthwith laid aside and clean cast behind, which was so well devised in the beginning of the war.

Antiochus bearing himself aloft now, principally for that Demetrius was revolted from the Romans unto the Ætoliens, determined no longer to delay the matter, but presently to take a voiage into Greece. But before that he embarked and took the sea, he went up to Stum from the castle for to sacrifice to Minerva; and when he was returned to his fleet, he made sail with twelve covered and hatched ships, and so uncovered and undecked, and after those followed two vessels of burden, charged and fraught with victuals, munition, and warlike furniture of all sorts. And first he fell with the land Ambrus: and from thence he cut over to Sejambos, where after he had rallied his ships which had been scattered one from another in the wide and deep sea, he arrived at Piselmus, the silt town of the main and continent. Where Eurylochus the Magnestarches, Lybia foresign of Magnesia and the principal citizens of the State, who were come from Demetrius, met him and joynd with him; who rejoicing exceedingly to see so goodly a company of them in his train, the next day put into the haven of the City of Demetrius: and not far from thence landed all his forces, which amounted in the whole to ten thousand foot, five hundred horse, and six Elephants: a small power (God wot) and unfficient to leize upon Greece, all naked and alone, far shorter then to hold and maintain war with the Romans. After it was reported that Antiochus was come to Demetrius, the Ætoliens proclaimed a councill, wherein they made a decree to lend for Antiochus. For now the King knowing that they would passe into an Act, was departed from Demetrius, and had withdrawn himself to Phalera within the gulph of Maleus And after he had received once the patent of that decree, he went from thence to Lamia, where he was received with exceeding favour of the common people, with clapping of hands, shouts, exclamations, and others sign, whereby the multitude used to shew & testify their great joy. When they were assembled together and set in Council, Phonax the Pretor and other chief citizens brought him homely in: where Oxyrrhodus, thus the King began his speech, first exclaiming himself, in that he was come with a far smaller power then all men hoped or looked for. "And even this (quoth he) may serve in stead of the greatest argument that may be of my exceeding love and affection toward you, in that being to unprovided and unfortified of all things, and at a time so unseasonable for to sail, as too early to take the sea, I have not thought much but am willingly come at the call of their Embass. ders: being thus assuredly perswaded, that the Ætoliens seeing me once, will suppose that in me alone consisted all their hope and defence whatsoever. And yet I would accomplish I assure you, and satisfie to the full even your contentment also, whose expectation for the present may seem to have been disappointed: for soon as the

A "time of the year will serve, and the spring is once come, that the seas are navigable, I will overperspall all Greece with men, horse, and munition; I will take up all the sea coasts with fleets, I will spare for no cost, no pain, no perill, until I have taken from their necks the heavy yoke of the Roman empire, let Greece free indeped, and the made the Ætoliens the chief commanders therein. Nay, with mine armies besides shall come all kind of provision and furniture out of Asia. But for the present (saith he) the Ætoliens must see & take order, that my people may be loved with corn and other victuals at a reasonable rate. To this effect when the King had spoken with the great assist of all men, he departed. After the Kings departure, there rose some contention between two great men of the Ætoliens, to wit, Phonax and Theas. Phonax was of opinion, that it was better policy to use Antiochus for a mediator and reconciler of peace, or to be an umpire or arbitrator to decide the controversies betwix them & the Romans, rather then to be the General of the war. For his very coming and majesty would be more effectual then all his forces, to strike some reverence in the Romans, and cause them to be respective unto him. For men oftentimes yield and remit many things of themselves willingly, to avoid war, which they cannot be forced unto by war and by arms. When they are once entred into action, Theas inferred again and said, that Phonax spake not this for any desire & love to peace, but his meaning was to scatter and disperse this furniture and preparation of war for this intent. That by this tedious lingering, the Kings courage might abate, and the Romans gain time to make themselves ready. For, that there was no reason possibly to be gotten at the Romans hand, they had tried sufficiently by good experience, in sending to many embassages to Rome, and in debating the matter to often with Quintus; neither would they ever have brought unto Antiochus and craved his aid, if all their hope otherwise had not been cut off and clean failed. And now since his helping hand is presented unto them sooner then all men thought or looked for, they were not now to begin to faint and give over, but rather to request and intreat the King, that since he was come himself in person (which was the greatest matter of all) to set free and maintain Greece, he would fend for forces both at sea and land. For the King in arms, might peradventure obtain something: but disarmed if he were, little or no reckning would the Romans make of him in the quarrell and question of the Ætoliens, no, nor in his own affairs whensoever he should reason and deb t thereof. And here went the bare away. They all opened straightwaies to stile the King with the name of Imperator [Emperour] and they chose thirty of the chief personages to assist him in council for all things requirit. Thus the Diet was dissolved, and every man flit away and retired to his own City.

D The next day the King sat in a consultation with their Apocletes, in what place they should begin the war. And it was thought best, first to assail the City of Chalcis, which lately the Ætoliens had assailed in vain. And for to effect this service, there was more expedition and speed required then any other great forces and preparations. Hereupon the King set forward with 1000 footmen which followed him from Demetrius, and made by the way of Phocis: The Captains of the also of the Ætoliens, having levied some few companies of their youth took another way and met with him at Charonae, and followed with ten covered ships. The King encamped near Salganea, and himself in person with the chief of the Ætoliens crossed the Eurippus: and when he was landed and not far gone from the haven, the Magistrats and chief men of Chalcis came forth without their gates, and some few of both sides met together for to parle. The Ætoliens were earnest to perswade with them, "That so far forth as they might without impeaching the Roman amity they would assume the King to be their ally and friend for as much as he was passed into Europe not to make war, but to deliver Greece, and let it free in deed, and not in word only and false semblance, as the Romans had done. And nothing was there more for the good and benefit of the Cities in Greece, then to entertain the society and fellowship of them both. For under the defence and safeguard of the one, they might be sure to guard themselves from the violence and outrage of the other. But if they accepted not of the King, they were belit to take heed and see what danger they presently incurred: considering the succours of the Romans to relieve them were so far off, and the forces of Antiochus their enemy to annoy them, no need even at their gates, whom of themselves with their own power they were not able to withstand. To this, Milias one of their chief men made this answer: I marvel much (quoth he) who they be, that Antiochus for to deliver and set free, hath taken the pains to leave his own Kingdom, and to pass over into Europe. For mine own part, I know no King in Greece, that either hath Roman garrison, or payeth any tribute unto them, or is bound to unjust and unreasonable covenant, or endureth any hard laws and conditions against their wils: and therefore the Chalcidians have need of no person to restore them to freedom, since they be free already: nor yet of a garrison for their defence, considering that by the grace and favour of the same people of Rome, they enjoy peace and liberty already. As for the King, we refuse not his amity, nor yet reject we the friendship of the Ætoliens. And we will take it for a speciall point of friendship that they shall do us, if they gently will depart out of our land and be gone: For as for us, we are resolved in this, not to receive them within our walls, no, nor to contract with them any society, without the advice, and consent of the Romans. When these matters were related to the King, who stayed behind with the ships, he determined presently to return to Demetrius, for that he was not come with such a power as to attempt any thing by force where, seeing his first enterprise came to nothing, he conferred with the Ætoliens, what was to be done next: & concluded it was, to found the Achians, & Aminander the King of the Athamans. They supposed that the nation of the Boeotians was clean estranged and badly affected to the Romans ever since the death of Barisila and those troubles that ensued thereupon. They were persuaded also that Philip was a great potentate, and principal leader of the Achæans; was both malicious and odious unto Quintus for emulation and jealousy of Honour in the Lacedæmon war, Aminander had espoused and taken to wife Aymene the daughter of one Alexander a Megapolitan, who vanted himself to be defended from Alexander the Great, named his two sons Philip and Alexander, and his daughter Aymene; whom being thus advanced by marriage with a King, her elder brother Philip accompanied into Athamania. This Philip a vain-headed young man, the Etolians and Amecians had induced into a foolish hope (considering that for certain he was of the royal blood and the Kingdom of Macedony, if haply he could bring about to join Aminander and the Athamians to Aminander. And these vain conceits of great benefit wrought mightily not with Philip only, but also with Aminander.

Now in Achaia there was a council holden at Egium, and audience given there to the Embassadors of Antiochus and the Etolians, before T. Quintus. Where the King his Embassador spake first, and feeling, (as all those commonly are, that have intermixture and maintenance of Kings) full of foolish bubble, & making sea and land resound again with his vain prating and senseless words; set tale an end, and told them, what an infinite number on horsemen were passing over by Hellepoint into Europe: whereof some of them were in complete harness, armed all pieces, whom they call Cataphracts; others were archers, and shot of horseback, against whom there was nothing close, nothing sure enough, who when their backs are turned, and their bodies run away, shoot so much the more surely, and even point-blank. And albeit these forces of horse by his report, were sufficient of themselves to defeat all the armies of Europe if they were put together, yet he added besides a mighty number, I wot not how many of footmen: and terrified them with namely a sort of strange nations, that scarcely had been heard of before, to wit, the Dakes, the Medians, the Elymeans and Cadusians. But for his forces at sea, there was no bay, harbours, nor havens in all Greece able to receive them, The Sydonians and Tyrrians (say they) "hold the right side, the Aradians, and the Sidons out of Pamphylia keep the left; nations for skill and valour at sea incomparable. As for money and other provision and furniture for the war, "it were needlesse to discourse of, since they themselves knew well enough, that the realm of Asia have alwayes shewed with gold, as their proper wealth. So as the Romans now were to deal with Philip not with Aminander, the one a chief person among many others of a City, and the other limited within the confines only of the Kingdom of Macedony; but with the great Monarch of all Asia, yes, and of some part of Europe. And yet he, as mighty a potentate as he is (notwithstanding he is come to the utmost coasts and bounds of the Levant sea; to deliver and enfranchise Greece) demandeth nothing of the Achæans prejudicial to their fealty and allegiance to the Romans their first allies and associates: for he required not them to take arms with him against them, but only not to intermeddle and take part: his seeking is, that (as becometh good friends and mediators between both parties) they would all well and peace amongst them, and not interpose themselves in a quarrel of war. Archidamus likewise the Embassador for the Etolians, requested in manner the same, that they would hold themselves quiet and in repose (a thing most easy and safe for them) and being but lookers on the war, wait and attend the issue of others men's fortunes, without the hazard of their own; yet he staid not in, but proceeded to M as far and overthrew himself so much in words, that he brake forth at length in ill language, one while railing against the Romans in general, another while against Quintus in particular: calling them ungrateful and unthankful persons, reproaching, upbraiding, and hitting them in the teeth, how not only they had got the victory of Philip, but also saved themselves by the virtue and valour of the Etolians: and as for Quintus, he was to thank them and their means, as much as his own life came to & the preservation of his army. For wherein at any time (qd he) performed he the duty and devoir of General in the field? Seen him indeed I have in the time of battell and in the camp, take the sight of birds, kill sacrifices, and make vows very devoutly, like some holy parish-priest or divining Prophet, whilst I my self was fain in his defence to expose and present my body to lances and darts of the enemies. To these challenges Quintus made answer N in this wise, saying that Archidamus had more regard in whose presence he spake, than to whom he directed all his speech: for the Achæans know very well, that all the valour of the Etolians, standeth in bragging words and not in martiall deeds, as men that love to be heard in Diet and assemblies rather then seen in the field and battell; and therefore no marvel if he made so small reckning to speak unto the Achæans, considering that he knew, how well acquainted they were with the manners and fashions of the Etolians. But he hath besides wanted and made great brag before the King Embassadors, and in their person, before the King himself in absence. And if a man had not known before, what it was and had to look and waited Antiochus and the Etolians together, he might perceive it evidently by the speeches of the Embassadors: for by exchanging lies reciprocally, and by bragging of their forces which they have not, they have inflated and puffed up one another with vain hopes, whilst they kill and would make them believe, that Philip by them was vanquished; That the Romans by their valour were protected; and other gay matters, which ere while ye heard; bidding castles in the air, to the end, that you & other states and nations would side with them and take their parts: the King again (by his Embassadors) overpreadeth all with clouds of horsemen and footmen, and covereth whole seas with fleets

A "and armados. Now in faith this is mine host of Chalcis up and down, a friendly man I assure you, and a good fellow in his house, and one that knoweth how to entertain his guests and bid them welcome. And verily I can liken this manner of dealing to nothing better then to a supper of his: We went upon a time to make merry with him, and I remember well it was not midsummer (when the daies are longell and the sun at the hottest) where he made us passing good cheer, And as we wondered how at such a season of the year he met with that plenty of venison and such variety withall; the man (nothing to vainglorious as these fellows here) smiled pleasantly upon us and said, we were welcome to a feast of a tame (wine and no better: but well as a good cook my masters (qd he) who by his cunning hand, what with seasoning it, and what with serving it up with divers sauces, hath in de all this fair show of wild flesh, and the fame of sundry foists. This may fitly be applied to the King his armies and forces: of which even B now so great host was made. For these divers kinds of arms, these many names of nations never heard of before, to wit, the Dakes or Dahæans (I wot not what to call them) the Medes, the Cadusians, the Elymeans, they are but Syrians when all is done; who for their bale minds by nature, are much better to make a sort of slaves then a company of good soldiers. And would to God (you my masters of Achaia) I could represent unto your eyes the port and train of this great King, when he ran from Demetrias, one while to Lamia to the council of the Etolians; & another while to Chalcis: you should see in the Kings camp hardly two pretty legions; & those but lame ones neither and not well accomplished: you should see the King some time as poodas begging grain of the Etolians, to measure out among his hungry soldiers: otherwhiles making shift to take up monies at interest to make out their pay: now standing at the gates of Chalcis, C and anon shot out from thence and excluded clean: and when he had done nothing else but seen Antiochus and Eurippus, returning fair into Asolia. Antiochus (you see) hath yielded but small belief to the Etolians, and the Etolians have as little trusted & relied upon the vanity of the King, And therefore the lesse should you be deceived by them, but rather repel your selves assuredly in the fidelity of the Romans so often tried, so often known and approved. For whereas they say D "It is your best course not to be embarked and interred in this war, I assure you, there is nothing more vain then this, nay, nothing so hurtfull unto your estate. For you shal be a prize and prey to the victor, without thank of either part, without any worth and reputation. Quintus was thought by the Achæans to have spoken not imperintently, but to have answered them both fully; and an easie matter it was to approve his speech unto those, that were well enough inclined to have given him gentle hearing: for that it was no question nor doubt at all, but that every man would judge them to be friends or enemies to the Achæan nation, whom the Romans held for theirs: yes, and would conclude in the end of an act, to denounce war both against Antiochus & the Etolians. Moreover, according as Quintus thought good, they lent presently an aid of 500 soldiers to Chalcis, and of as many to Pyrræum. For at Athen there had likt to have been a sedition and mutiny, whilst some drew the multitude (which commonly is bought and sold for money) to take part with Antiochus upon hope of large rewards and great bounties, untill such time as Quintus was sent for by them that took part with the Romans: in so much as Apollodorus (who gave counsell and periwaded to revolt) was accused by one Leon, and being condemned, was banished. Thus verily the embassage returned from the Achæans to the King with present answer. E The Boeotians delivered no certainty: this only was their answer, That when Antiochus himself was come in Boetia, then they would consider and consult what they were best to do. Antiochus being advertised, that both the Achæans and King Eumenes also he had sent men for the defence of Chalcis, thought good to make hast, that his forces might not only prevent them, but also it were possible receive them and cut them short as they came. And for this intent, he sent Mempippus with three thousand soldiers or thereabout, and Polyxenides with his whole fleet. Himself a few daies after marched with six thousand of his own soldiers; and of that levy, which on a suddain might be gathered at Lamia, no great number of Etolians. Those five hundred Achæans store laid, and the small aid that King Eumenes lent under the conduct of Xenochides the F Chalcidian, having safely passed Eurippus before that the waies and passages were beset, arrived at Chalcis. The Romans also who were upon five hundred, at what time as Mempippus came on before Salganea, came to Hermium, where the passage out of Boetia into the Island of Eubœa. In their company was Milition sent as Embassador from Chalcis to Quintus, for to crave some succour: who perceiving that the waies were laid and the freights kept by the enemies, leaving his intended journey by the way of Antiochus, turned to Delium, minding from thence to cut over into Eubœa. This Delium is a temple of Apollo situate upon the sea strand, and five miles distant from Tanagra, from whence there is a short cut (little more then a league) over an arm of the sea unto the next parts of Eubœa. In this temple and sacred grove about it, so religious, so privileged and secured (as are those franchised houses and sanctuaries which the Greeks call Asyla) and G at that time, when neither war was proclaimed, or at leastwise not so far proceeded, as that in the hearing and knowledge of any man there had been frowd drawn, or blood shed in any place. In this place, and at this time, I say, whilst the soldiers wandered at their leisure and pleasure, some gone to see the temple above said and the grove, others walking upon the strand warmed, and a great sort also of them scattered over the fields (such as were gone for forrage, and few well) all on a suddain Mempippus finding them loose and disbanded, charged upon them and slew them, and to the number of fifty he took alive: very few escaped, among whom was Mitlio, who got into a small vessel of merchandise. This occurred, as it troubled and disquieted Quintus and the Romans, for the loss of their soldiers, so it seemed much to increase the right of their just quarrel to make war upon Antiochus, Antiochus having advanced his army, and approached Asius, after he had once again addressed Orators, partly of his own subjects, and partly Ætolians to Chalcis, for to follow those equies which of late he had commenced, but in more amatory terms, now prevailed easily, notwithstanding Antiochus and Xenocides laboured to the contrary, that the gates should be let open unto him. All those that were for the Romans, abandoned the City shortly before the Kings coming. The soldiers of Achaia and King Eumenes, kept Salpene The Rom. soldiers also (who were but few) fortified and made a fence upon the water of Enripus, to be a defence for the passage. Maupius began to assail Salpene, and the King himself to let upon the fort of Enripus afore said. The Achæans and soldiers of Eumenes first grew to composition, and having capitulated to depart without any harm, quit their place of garrison. The Romans held out longer, and stoutly defended the hold of Enripus: but even they also being so strongly invested both by land & water, and seeing now the ordinance and engines of battery, brought and ready to be planted against them, would no longer endure the siege. When as now the King had possessed himself of the City of Eubœa, all the other Cities of that Island, refused not to submit and come under his subjection. And he thought he had made a good beginning and entrance in this war, in that to great an Island, and so many Cities commodiously feared, and of such importance, were reduced under his obedience.

The six and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the six and thirtieth Book.

Marcus Acilius Glabrio the Consul, with the aid of King Philip, vanquished King Antiochus, Master to Thermopylae, and drove him out of Greece. He also subdued the Ætolians. P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, the Consul (reputed and judged by the Senate the best man in the City) dedicated the temple of the mother of the gods, whom himself had brought into the Palatium. He also when he had overcome the Boians, took them upon surrender to his protection, and triumphed over them. Over and besides, here are set down the preparations & vessels fought at sea, against the admirals and captains of King Antiochus.

The six and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

Soon as P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Emmæ, and M. Acilius Glabrio, the two Consuls were entered into their magistracy the L.L. of the Senat enjoined them (before any speech or question moved as touching the provinces) to sacrifice greater beasts in all those temples, wherein the custom was for the more part of the year to celebrate the solemnity of Festivals, and to make their prayers. In this manner, That whereas the Senat intended a new war, the gods would vouchsafe to bless and happily conduct the same to the good and publick weal of the Senat and people of Rome. All those sacrifices proved good and as they ought to be: even the very first beasts that were slain, prognosticated fortuit success, and shewed apparent signs that the gods were pacified and well pleased. And thus the footholders and bowel-priests, out of their learning, answered, it was evident, that by this war the bounds and limits of the Roman empire should be extended, and that both victory and triumph was fore signified. These answers being reported, and mens minds settled, and their consciences resolved of all scruples as concerning the gods, then the L.L. of the Senat granted out an order, that a bill (should be preferred solemnly unto the people in this form) Please it you, and is it your will, that war should be entered upon against Antiochus, and all that take his part? And if this bill passe and be granted, are ye pleased, that the Consuls, if they think so good, refer the whole matter unto the Senat to take order for the managing thereof accordingly? P. Cornelius propounded this bill, and the people accepted thereof. Whereupon the Senatier down a decree that the Consuls should call lots for the government of Italy and Greece: and that the whole hap it was to govern Greece, should (over and above that number of soldiers, which L. Quintus by authority and commission from the Senat had for that province either enrolled or levied) receive that army also which M. Emmæ the Pretor caused to passe over the year before into Macedonia, by virtue of an order from the Senat, in that behalf enacted. And licent he had, if need to required, to take up aid-soldiers from among the allies without Italy, so as he exceeded not the number of five thousand. Also agreed it was, that L. Quintus the Consul of the year before, should be deputed lord General for that war. As for the other Consul, unto whom had been allotted the charge of Italy, he was commanded to levy war against the Boians

A Boians and to their choice, whether army he had rather have of those two which the former Consuls conducted: and when he had received ones, to lend the other to Rome, that those legions of Citizens should be in readiness for to be sent whither it pleased the Senat. This order being taken in the Senat, astouching the appointment and assignation of those provinces, then it was thought good that the new Consuls should cast lots for their governments. To Asinius befel Greece, and Italy to Cornelius. After this by a speciall roll there passed an Act of the Senat, That whereas the people of Rome had ordered to wage war at that time against King Antiochus, and those that were under his dominion, the Consuls should cause a procession to be solemnized. Alloth that the Consul M. Acilius should conceive and make a vow to Jupiter, for to celebrate the great Games in his honour, and to bring offerings to every altar. This vow was by him pronounced in this form of words, according as P. Licinius the Arch-Priest ended and prompted unto him, If that war which the people hath determined to be entered against King Antiochus, shall be performed according to the mind and contentment of the Senat and people of Rome, then shall the people of Rome celebrate unto thy honour, O Jupiter, the great Games for the space of ten daies together, and oblations shall be brought to every Altar, of this price, and amounting to that sum which the Senat hath ordain and set down. And what Magistrates sever shall exhibit those Games, or in what place, year, and at what time forever they shall represent, the same Games shall be held for good, and reputed as well done, yea, and the offerings accepted as rightly presented. After this, there was published and proclaimed by both Consuls, a supplication for the space of 3 daies. When the Consuls had cast lots for the parting of their governments, the Pretors likewise went presently about the same for their provinces. To M. Junius Bruttus fell both the jurisdictions, as well of Citizens as aliens. A Cornel. Mammula had the charge of the Bruti, M. Æmilius Lepidus of Sicily, and L. Oppius Salmator of Sardinia, C. Livius Salmator was L. Admiral of the navy, and L. Æmilius Paulus governor of the nether Spain. And in this manner following, were the armies and forces distributed and appointed. Unto A. Cornelius were assigned the new soldiers which the former year L. Quintus the Consul, by vertue of an Act of the Senat, had enrolled. And his commission was to defend and keep in order all that tract and coast about Tarentum and Brundisium. As for L. Æmilius Paulus, who was to take a voiage into the farther Spain, he was allowed (besides the army which he was to receive of M. Valerius the Pro-Pretor) to have the conduct of three thousand new soldiers footmen, and three hundred horse: so that of them, two third parts should consist of allies of the Latin nation, and one third of Roman Citizens. The supply was lent unto C. Flamininus into the higher Spain, whose commission was renewed for to have the command thereof. M. Æmilius Lepidus had commandment to receive the government of the province, and withall, the conduct of the army, at the hands of L. Valerius, whom he was to succeed, and if he thought it good, to keep with him in the Province L. Valerius, in quality and place of a Vice-Pretor: and so to divide the province, that the one part should reach from Argentinus to Pachinus; the other half from Pachinus to Tydarinus also; that L. Valerius should defend the sea-coasts and the river with a fleet of twenty Gallies. The same Pretor afore said was to levy and gather a double tenth of corn, and to take order for the convey thereof to the sea, and so to be embarked and transported into Greece. The like commission had L. Oppius, to exact and take another tenth in Sardinia: but that grain was to be brought to Rome, and not to be carried over into Greece. C. Livius the Pretor and Admiral of the navy, was appointed with 300 sail ready rigged and trimmed, to sail into Greece with all speed, and to receive the ships that Asinius had: likewise to repair, rigge and furnish the old vessels that lay in the harbors, or lay at one side up in docks. M. Junius the Pretor his charge was, to levy mariners and rowers from among the libertines, for to serve that Armado. And there were sent Embassadors into Affrick to Carthage, and into Namidia, three into either part, for to seek and purvey corn to be sent into Greece, for which the people of Rome would make present payment. And so wholly employed was the City to prepare and take order for this war, that P. Cornelius the Consul published an Edict, that no Senators, or any that had authority to give their opinion in the Senat, neither any inferior Magistrates, should take any journey out of the City, farther then they might have return again the same day: Item, that there should not be five Senators absent at once from Rome.

C. Livius the Pretor, whilst he used all diligence and care to prepare and provide his fleet, was empached and hindered a time, by occasion of a debate and contention that arose between him and the Coloners of the sea-side. For when they should be gathered and sent to sea, they appealed to the Tribunes of the Com. from whom they were put over and referred to the Senat: and the Senat with one voice and accord pronounced and determined, that these Coloners were not exempted from sea-service. The Colonies that contended with the Pretor about their immunity were these, Hestia, Fregene, Castellum novum, Pyrgi, Antium, Tarracina, Minturna and Stuaga.

C. This done, the Consul Acilius by order from the Senat, consulted with the college of the Fe-ciales or Herald's at arms, and demanded their advice, Whether the war should be proclaimed and defiance given to Antiochus himself in person: or it were sufficient, to intinate and denounce the same to some one of his garrisons? Also whether they would advise to proclaim war against the Ætolians apart by themselves: or whether it were not meet and convenient first to disclaim and renounce their society and friendship, and then to proclaim and denounce hostility? The Fe-cials answered, that heretofore they had determined and cleared this point, at what time as their opinion was touching Philip, to wit, That it was all one, and made no matter, whether the defence were given him to his face, or only intimated to some garriſons of his. And as for the Aetolians, this was their mind, that they had quit already their amity, and abandoned all ſociety, in that when our Embaſſadors ſo oftentimes had redemanded ſmends for wrongs done, they never thought good to make reſtitution or ſatisfaction. Moreover, the Aetolians had themſelves ſent defence firſt and proclaimed war againſt the Romans, when as by force they ſeized Demetria a City of our allies, and advanced before Chalcis, to ſail it both by land and ſea; and laſtly, in that they had ſollicited King Antiochus and brought him into Europe, for to levy war againſt the Romans. All things now being ſufficiently provided, M. Acilius the Conſul publiſhed an edict and proclaimed, That all thoſe ſouldiers whom L. Quintus had enrolled, likewise all thoſe whom he had levied of the allies of the Litiene nation, who were to go with him into his province, likewise all the Colonels and Marſhals of the ſecond and third legion, ſhould render themſelves, and be ready altogether at Brundisium upon the * 1^{ſt} day of May following. Himſelf upon the * 5th day before the Nones of the ſame month departed forth of the City clad in his rich coat of arms. And at the ſame time the Pretors alſo took their journeys into their ſeveral provinces.

Much about that time there arrived at Rome Embaſſadors from two Kings, to wit, Philip of Macedonia, and Ptolemæ King of Egypt; promiſing their aid of men, money, and comfort for war. And beſides from Ptolemæ there was brought * 1000 pound weight in gold, and the weight of * 2000 pound of ſilver: howbeit nothing was received, but much thanks rendered to both the Kings. And whereas both of them offered to come with all their power into Italia, and to be there in perſon, Ptolemæ was diſcharged of that offer of his, but the Embaſſadors of Philip received this answer, That he ſhould highly pleaſe and content the people of Rome, in caſe he would not fail the Conſul M. Acilius. In like manner there came Embaſſadors from the Carthaginians and Mafaniſſa, the Carthaginians made promiſe of * a thouſand Modii of Wheat, and of Barley five hundred thouſand for the army, and likewise to bring half ſo much to Rome; praying the Romans to accept the ſame at their hands as a free gift and gratuity: adding moreover, that they would n an out a fleet at their own charges, and were ready alſo to make one entrapment of their tribute behind, which they were of duty to pay by ſundry terms of many years. The Embaſſadors of Mafaniſſa, promiſed in the behalf of their King, to ſend five hundred thouſand Modii of wheat, 30,000 of barley into Greece to the army, beſides 500 men of arms and twenty Elephants, unto M. Acilius the Conſ. As touching the corn, this answer was returned, unto them, that they were content to accept thereof, ſo that they would take money therefore to the worth. As to the fleet ſoreſaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them to the worth. As to the fleet ſoreſaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them to the worth. As to the fleet ſoreſaid, which the Carthaginians made offer of, they acquit them to the worth.

While the affairs paſſed thus at Rome, Antiochus being at Chalcis, becauſe he would not fit ſtill and do nothing, all a winter time, partly himſelf ſollicited (by ſending Embaſſadors) the minds of the States, and partly alſo there came unto him Embaſſadors from thence of their own accord: and namely, among others, the Epirots preſented themſelves by the common conſent of the whole nation, and the Eleans alſo came out of Palapanſus. They of Elys craved aid againſt the Achæans, who (they verily thought) would take arms againſt their City, becauſe war was denounced againſt Antiochus: nothing to their will and good liking. Unto them were ſent 1000 footmen under the leading of Emphanes the Cretenſian. The embaſſage of the Epirots, plaid with both hands, meaning to deal roundly and ſimply with no ſide, but to go between the bark and the tree. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but ſo, as they ſtood reſt. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but ſo, as they ſtood reſt. Gladly they would make court to the King and curry favour with him, but ſo, as they ſtood reſt.

many years and ages already, and the popular government of many, grown to decay and into, which cannot poſſibly continue long without ſome change and alteration of ſtate. Well, to Antiochus he came, where all the principal and chief ſtates of Greece came flocking from all parts to meet him: Wherein the General Diet and Council of the Nation, (thoſe things he had founded the battell, and began the fray already, by giving the firſt blow, in that he had forced the Roman garriſon near Delium and Chalcis, which were to ſtop the not doubtful ſpectacles of war; yet began with the ſame kind of ſpeech, he firſt uſed, in the public and conference at Chalcis, and which his Embaſſadors had followed in the general ſynode of the Achæans, namely, demanding that they would enter into amity with him, without proſecuting theſelves enemies to the Romans, or pretending hoſtility againſt them. But there was no man there but loon found him and ſaw him welſought to what he had ſaid an act and decree in favour of the King againſt the B Romans, under a vain and light pretext and colourable ſhow of words. Having gained this nation, he returned to Chalcis from thence he ſent out his letters before unto the States of the Aetolians, that they ſhould meet him in Demetria, where he would confer and conſult with them about all their affairs to be managed; and thither came he by leaſt at the day appointed. Antiochus alſo was ſent for out of Aſchamania to this conſultation, yet, and Antiochus the Carthaginian (whole council was not required along time) was preſent at this frequent Diet and Aſſembly. Much pains and great opening there was as touching the nation of the Theſſalians; and all ſtates in place were of opinion, that they ſhould be ſounded how they ſtood affected: but about the manner and ſome circumſtance thereof, they were of divers mind, while ſome advised it to be done and executed out of hand: others thought good to put it off from winter ſeaſon (conſidering now they were in the mids thereof) unto the prime and beginning of ſpring: others again ſaid, that Embaſſadors ſhould be ſent: and ſome hot ſpirits there were, that gave council to go againſt them with all their forces, yet, and to fright and terrifie themſelves, they made ſlow halt. Now when alſo the heat and difficulty of this deliberation conſiſted in one point, Antiochus was requeſted by name to deliver his mind and ſpeak to the cauſe in queſtion: who turned the King and all that were preſent from other wandering cogitations, and induced them to the entire conſideration of the total war, and to this effect framed his ſpeech in this wiſe, "If ſince the time that we paſſed over into Greece, my hap had been to be called to any council, when as ſome queſtion was touching the Embas, the Achæans and the Bozotians, I had delivered that advice there, which now I purpoſe to utter this day in the queſtion concerning the Theſſalians. Above all things my compoſible, that Philip and the Macedonians may by all means poſſible be wrought to this our affection in the war. For as touching Embas, the Bozotians and the Theſſalians, who doubteth, but that they (as nations that ſtand upon their own bottoms and are of no force by themſelves), will always flatter them that are preſent in place, and be ready to crave pardon upon the ſame fear that they ever ſlew when they are to take counſel and relieve? who doubteth (I ſay) but to ſoon as they that ſee the Roman army in Greece, they will turn to their accuſtomed obedience, and that it will be imputed to them no fault at all, that when the Romans were ſo far off, they were not willing to try the force of you (a miſerious Prince in perſon among them) or of your armies? How much rather ought we then, ſay, how much better and more important would it be to join Philip unto us then theſe? For if he once enter into the cauſe and be ſeen in action, he can not poſſibly ſtart from us nor draw his head out of the collar: and moreover, he bringeth that power with him, which is not to be held for a ſimple ſuccour & adjuſtment to mend our forces, but ſuch aſtately of it ſelf without the help of others, was able to make head againſt the Roman poſſeſſion. Let me have this prince on my ſide, and be it ſpoken without offence of any man here: what need I doubt of the ſequel & iſſue? eſpecially when thoſe by whole means & aſſiſtance the Romans prevailed againſt Philip. I ſee now ready to enter the field againſt them? The Aetolians (I ſay) who as all the world knoweth vanquiſhed Philip, ſhall now together with Philip, enter into arms and fight againſt them. Over and beſides, Antiochus and the whole nation of the Achæans (whole ſervice in the war, next to the Aetolians, ſtood the Romans in beſt ſtead) ſhall be upon ſide, Philip at that time (O King Antiochus) ſuffered the fight and burden of the whole war, when you ſat ſiſt and ſtayed not: now both of you together, two moſt mighty monarchs, with the poſſeſſance of all Aſia and Europe, ſhall wage war againſt one City and people, which to ſpeak nothing of mine own fortune good or bad) certainly in our ſubjects, daies was not able to make their part good with one only King of the Epirots: how hardy ſoever they will be when they ſhall be marched with you both together. But what moved me to think, yes, and aſſured me, that Philip may be won unto us to join in this action? One thing is this, a common good and benefit even the greateſt bond that is of ſociety, ſaid yet there is another beſides it, namely, an independent proceeding, from you that be here of Asia: for Thom your Embaſſador (who ſpeſſeth in place) among other matters that he was wont to alledge for to animat & move Antiochus to come into Greece, evermore aſſured him of this principally, and vowed that Philip would be, but the lip ſtretched, that under the colour and ſhow of peace, there were impoſed upon him hard conditions of ſervitude and ſlavery. And he verily, I mean Thom, let out the ſell an act of being, and with all his words compared it to the wood rage of a wild beaſt bound with chains, or being enſlaved in ſome cage, would willingly break the gates and bars thereof. Now, if he be diſmiſſed thus, and of that courage, let us ſhut his bonds aſunder, let us (I ſay) force open his iron cage, that his rage pent up to long may now break out upon the common enemies. And

Antiochus.

"suppose that our embassy effect nothing at his hands, yet may we provide and take order, that "if we c.annot work and win him to side with our selves, yet that he shall not combine and band
 "with our enemies. Your son Antiochus is now at Lysimachia, who shall not so soon with those forces "which he hath about him, begin to invade and walk by the way of Thracia (the confines of Ma- "cedonia, but he shall withdraw and turn Philip clean away (from giving succour to the Romans) to "the defence especially of his own. I have here your mine advice as touching Philip: now for "the whole course and managing of the war, what mine opinion was, you have not been ignorant "of from the first beginning. If then, I might have had mine own waies, and my counsel had been "taken, the Romans should not have received intelligences of the taking of Chalcis in Encha-
 "nos of the forcing and winning of Asiatick pile upon Asiatick; but they had heard by this, that all "the coast of the Hellespont and of the Chalchian Gulls was up in arms and on a light fire of war. I "and (which would have feared and frightened them most) that Antiochus was in Italy. And (now "things standing as they do) my advice is, that you send for all your forces both by land and sea.
 "Let your carriks and bulks with victuals and provision follow after your armado & ships of war.
 "For in this place, like as we are too few to perform any martial exploits, so we are too many,
 "considering our small store of victuals. And when you rallied and united all your force together,
 "divide your navy in two parts: the one you shall keep in the rode of Corepra, to impeach the Ro"mans, that they shall not passe in safety and security, the other you shall cause to sail unto the "coast of Italy which looketh toward Sardinia and Africk. Your self in proper person, with all "your land army shall march onward into the territory of the Byllionians (thence shall ye have good
 "means for the defence of Greece, as making the Romans believe, that you are upon the point "to pass the sea, yea, and being ready indeed to cross over if need should require. This gen-
 "rally is my counsel, mine, I say, who as I will not take upon me a singular skill in all kinds of war,
 "so me thinks I should know how to war with the Romans, as having learned my skill thereby,
 "as well to my cost as advantage, and as much with my good as harm, & look whatsoever de"signs I have projected unto you, I promise and protest, that I will be faithfull and forward in "the execution thereof: and the gods approve and bless that course, which your self shall think
 "the best. To this effect, in a manner, was the oration of Antiochus directed; which all that were "in place and heard it, rather praised for the present, then put in practise and effected afterwards.
 "For no one thing was done of all that he had said, save only Antiochus sent Polyxenidus for a navy "and army out of Asia; yea, there were Embassadors also dispatched to the General Diet of the "Thebians. And a day was appointed for the Helians and Aminander to meet the army at Phe-
 "ra, whither King Antiochus came straight after with his power. And while he staid there, ex"pecting Aminander and the Helians, he sent out one Philip a Megapolitan, with two thousand men
 "to gather out the bones and reliques of the Macedonians about Cynosephala, where the war with
 "Philip was determined, and the quarrel decided by a famous battell: were it that therein he fol"lowed his own head and took a conceit, thereby to wind himself into grace and favour with the "Macedonian Nation, and to bring the King into obloquie and disgrace, because he left his soldiers
 "unburied: for that, as it is the vein (or vanity rather) engraffed in Kings by kind, he set his mind "and busied his spirits in matters, for appearance gay and goodly, but in effect fond & foolish. There
 "he made a mount (as it were) of a number of bones gathered together into one place, that lay fest-
 "tering and strewed here and there: a thing no doubt; that the Macedonians conned him no thank "for, and which Philip (you may be fore) took in foul scorn and malicious disdain. And therefore "Philip, who at that time minded to take counsell of Fortune, and to be directed by her, as the or"dained now, sent to Marcus Bibulus the Vice-Pretor, and advertised him, how Antiochus invaded "Thessaly, and if it pleased him to stir out of his winter labour, he would meet him, that they might "confer both together what were best to be done.

While Antiochus lay now encamped before Phera, where Aminander and the Helians had
 "joyined with him, there came Embassadors from Larissa, expoliating, Wherein the Thebians "had to offend either by deed or word, that he would molest and trouble them with war; and "withall beseeching him to retire & withdraw his forces, and debate the matter (if he had ought a"gainst them) by his Embassadors. At the same time they sent five hundred men in arms, well ap"pointed, under the governance of Hippolochus, to lie there in garison, who because they could not
 "passe either, by reason that all the avenues were seized and kept by the Kings forces, returned to "Scorissa. As for the Embassadors of the Larissians, the King made them a gracious answer, and said, "That he was entred into Thessaly, not by way of hostility to distress them, but in friendly man"ner to maintain and establish the freedom of the Thebians. Likewise he sent an Embassador to "Phera, to signify so much to them and in the same terms. But the Pherians giving him no an"swer again, dispatched unto the King an Embassador of their own, one Panfanus, a principal man "of their City. Who after he had pleaded the semblable remonstrances to those, that had been "in the like case alleged and laid forth in the behalf and name of the Chalcidians, in that Coun-
 "cill holden near the streights of Emripis, and besides, uttered something else with more bold-
 "ness and courage, the King dismissed him, after he had willed them to consider more of the "matter, and be well advised, that they took not that counsell which anon they would repent, "whilst they fought to be too wary, provident, and forestalling the future time. When this em"bassy was related at Phera, the Citizens took no long time to deliberate, but soon resolved in
 "the maintenance of their faith and loyalty to the Romans: for to undergo whatsoever hazard the

A the fortune of war should present unto them. Whereupon both they addressed themselves to "defend the City with all their might, and also the King began to assault and batter the walls on all "parts at once. And knowing well enough (as in truth there was no doubt) that in the issue of the "siege of that City which he first enterprised, lay the whole importance and consequence of all, ei"ther to make him despised ever after, or feared and dread of the Thebians, therefore he certified
 "the besieged inhabitants, on every side, and by all means possible that he could devise. The "first assault they sustained stoutly and manfully; but afterwards seeing many of the defendants were "either overturned or slain, or grievously hurt and wounded, their hearts began to quail: yet re"claimed by the rebukes and chastisements of their captains and leaders, and animated by their re-
 "freshall exhortations, to persist still in their purpose and resolution, they quit the utmost compas"sion of their wall (seeing a what default they were for want of men) and reined themselves more in"ward into the City, into one part thereof, which was strongly fortified with a mure and less cir"cuit and compass than the other. At the length, overcome with travell and calamities, and fear"ing that if they were forced and taken by assault, they should find no mercy nor pardon with "the conqueror, they yielded themselves. The King following the train of victory, delayed no "time, but whilst the night was fresh, sent four thousand armed men presently to Scorissa, where
 "the townsmen made no stay, but rendered the town and themselves incontinently, having before "their eyes the fresh bleeding example of the Pherians, who tamed by mere force and without mi-"series, were compelled to do that: which they obliquely refused at the first. Together with "the City it self was surrendered also Hippolochus and the Larissan garison under his hand. All of "them the King sent away without any hurt or violence offered unto their persons: for he thought "they to win the hearts and love of the Larissians. Having accomplished these exploits within "ten daies after his first coming to Phera, he marched towards Crano with all his army, and at his "first coming won it. Then he reigned and seized Cyrra and Metropolis, and the boroughs & "forts about them: so as now all those quarters were subdued and put under his subjection, except "Amar and Gyrra. Then he determined to assail Larissa, supposing, that either upon the fearful "terror of other Cities forced, or in regard of his merit in dismissing the garison to court cour"tesy, or by the present example of so many Cities yielded unto him, they would not long persist "in their obstinacy. And for to terrifie them the more, he commanded the elephants to march in "the forefront of the vanguard, and approached himself in a square battell, with four sides, in such "fort as the hearts of many of the Larissians waved in doubtfull suspense, between forced fear of "present enemies, and kind regard of absent friends.

In this time Aminander, with the whole youth and manhood of the Athamans, became mas"ter of Pelinaeus. Menippus also with three thousand Helian footmen and two hundred horse "went to Perrhebia, won Mallae and Cyrris by assault, and wasted the territory of Trapolis. Hav"ing performed these exploits with great expedition, and celerity, they returned to Larissa un-
 "to the King, and arrived even then when as the King was in consultation what to do with Larissa:
 "for the counsell was divided into diverse opinions. Some thought it good to proceed forcibly,
 "and not to defer and assail the Cities with warlike engines of battery on all sides at once:
 "alleging that the town being situated in a plain towards the champaign field side, might be ap"proached unto with ease and invested every way. Others again inserted one while, that there was "no comparison between the strength of this City and of Phera: otherwhile that it was now winter
 "and a season of the year far unfit for warlike executions, and most of all other for the siege and "assault of Cities. As the King thus hung in the equal balance of hope and despair, the Em-
 "bassadors of Pheras arrived, who, as good hap was, being come to surrender up their town, revived
 "his spirits and mightily comforted his heart.

M. Bibulus in this mean while having parlied and conferred with Philip in the Dafsaretians
 "country, sent Appius Claudius by the common advice of them both, to the succour and defence
 "of Larissa, who pished through Macedonia, and by long journeyes came to the top of those hills "that command Gonni. Now this Gonni is a town twenty miles distant from Larissa, fenced just
 "in the very streights of that Forrest and passe called Tempe; who having taken up a larger circuit
 "of ground to encamp in, then was proportionable to his number, and made more fires in them then "need was for that company, gave semblance unto the enemies (which was the thing he aimed at)
 "that all the Roman forces were there, together with King Philip. King Antiochus therefore "preceding unto his army, that the unreasonable winter that approached, after he had layed one "only day before Larissa, dislodged, and thence departed, and to returned to Demeirias. The He-
 "lions likewise and Athamans repaired to their own countries.

Appius, albeit he saw that the siege was levied (which was the only cause of his coming) yet
 "dona he went to Larissa to encourage and confirm the hearts of the allies against the time to "come. And a two-fold joy there was, both because the enemies were gone and had quit their coun"try, and also for that they saw the Roman garison within their walls. King Antiochus departed "from Demeirias to Chalcis, where he fell in love and love with a damsell of that City, daughter "of Cleopatra a Chalcidian. Now after he made means to the maidens father silt by inter"cession of messengers and mediators, and after by importuning him in his own person with earnest "respects by word of mouth (who was very loth and unwilling to entangle & tie himself, in match"ing her to high above his own calling) at length he overcame the man, that he obtained his desire:
 "and as if it had been a time of sealed and confirmed peace, he proceeded to consummate and cele-

brat the marriage. And forgetting clean, how at one time he had undertaken the charge of two affairs so important, to wit, the war with the Romans, and the deliverance of Greece, he passed away the rest of the winter in feasts and banquets, and in those delights and pleasures, which ordinarily (you wot well) follow upon the liberal drinking of wine; yea, and when he had then by rather wearied his body than fulfilled his appetite, he gave himself to sleep without compulse. The like riot and loose life took hold of the rest of the Kings captains, by example in all places, but in Bœtia especially, such as commanded the garrisons. Nay, the very soldiers were let loose and given over to take voluptuous wives, and not one of them would put on armor, keep the watch, attend the guard, or do any thing pertaining to the duty and charge of a soldier. And therefore; at the beginning of the spring, when he was come by Phœcis and Chersonæ, to the Randonæ, where he had appointed from all parts his forces to meet, he soon perceived that the soldiers had spent the winter as licentiously as their leaders, and kept no better order and stricter discipline. Then he commanded Alexander the Acarnanian, and Menippus the Macedonian, to lead the army to Stratus, a town in Ætolia. Himself having done sacrifice at Delphi to the honour of Apollon, went forward to Naupeum. And after the Diet holden of all the States of Ætolia, in the way which leadeth to Stratus, along by Chalcis and Lysimachia, he encountered his own forges as he said, that came by the gulf of Malea. Where Mnesibolus, a Principal Acarnanian, had wrought and bought with many gifts and presents, not only himself won that nation to take part, & to side with the King, but also had drawn to his own mind and affection Clitus their Pretor, who at the time had the sovereign rule there, and might do all in all. He seeing that the Leucadians (who are the chief of all the Acarnanians) could not be easily induced nor brought to revolt, for the sake wherein they stood of the Roman side, which either was with Attilius, or about Cephædonia, went cunningly to work with them. For having delivered his opinion in their general Council, that the inland parts of Acarnania were to be well guarded and defended; and that as many as were able to bear arms should go forth to Medio and Tyrrhæum, for fear those places should be seized by Antiochus and the Ætolians: there were again some who made answer and said, how there was no such need: that all should be raised and levied to tumultuously in battalions, for a garrison of five hundred men was sufficient. And when he had obtained that number of young able men, he placed three hundred of them in garrison at Medio, and two hundred at Tyrrhæum: his reach and drift was to have them put into the Kings hands for hostages. And even at the time arrived the Kings Embassadors at Medio, whose embassy being heard, they laid their heads together and consulted in the publick assembly what answer to return unto the King. Some were of opinion to continue still in the Roman society: others were of advice again, that the Kings offer of amity was not to be rejected. The counsellor of Clitus was mean and indifferent between both, and therefore accepted to wit, that they should address the Embassadors to the King, to intreat him that he would permit them to take a day of deliberation upon a matter of such consequence in a full Diet of the Acarnanians. In this Embassy Mnesibolus, and those of his faction were employed of set purpose: who having dispatched messengers covertly to King, to divert him to approach the town with his forces, trifled out the time themselves, and made no halt to set forward in their embassy. Whereupon these Embassadors were scarcely gone forth of the City, when Antiochus was entered the borders, and anon showed himself hard at the gates. And whilst they that wist nothing of this treason were affrighted, and in great trouble and tumult, called the youth hastily to arm, he was by Clitus and Mnesibolus let into the City. Some willingly of themselves came running about the King: those also that were of the adverse part, for very fear joined with him. Whom he seeing to be afraid and terrified, he entertained with gracious words, and to gently handled them, that in hope of his clemency to much divulged and spoken of abroad, certain States of Acarnania revolted and turned unto him. Then from Medio he went to Tyrrhæum, unto which place he had sent Mnesibolus and his Embassadors aforehand. But the treachery and deceit at Medio being discovered, made the Tyrrhæans more wary and careful then otherwise fearful, who made him this plain direct answer without any double ambiguity, that they would admit of no new alliance, without the advice and authority of the Roman Generals: to they shut their gates, and disposed armed men upon their walls. Now will I out very fully and happily for confirming and encouraging the hearts of the Acarnanians, that Cr. Obavius sent by Quintus, having received a garrison and some few ships of A. Polhemius, who by Attilius the Lieutenant had been appointed Governor of Cephædonia, was come to Læta, and much comforted the Allies, and put them in good hope, who also gave them to understand, that M. Acilius the Consul had already passed the seas with his legions, and the Romans were encamped in Thessaly. And for as much as this bruit carried a great likelihood of truth, by reason that the season of the year served now for navigation, the King after he had planted a garrison at Medio and in other towns of Acarnania, departed from Tyrrhæum, and passing through the Cities of Ætolia and Phœcis, returned to Chalcis.

Much about the time M. Bevirus and King Philip, who had commended and devised together before (during the winter) in the Dardaniens country, having sent Appius Claudius into Thessaly, for to raise the siege before Larissa: and because the season then was unmeet and too soon for execution of any exploit, were retired to their wintering harbours, now in the beginning of the Spring joyed all their forces together and came down into Thessaly. (Now at that time was Antiochus in Acarnania.) And at their first coming, Philip began to lay siege unto Malles Malles and Babius to Phocis: which when he had forced in manner at the first assault, he won Phœcia also with like expedition. From whence having retired himself to Atyrahe, he took Chrysa and so consequently surprised Eritrum, and after he had planted garrisons in those towns that he had thus recovered, he joyned with Philip again lying in siege before Malles. Upon the very coming of the Roman army, when the townsmen had yielded themselves either for fear of forces, or for hope of pardon, they marched jointly together with one army to recover those towns whereof the Athamans were seized: to wit, Agium, Eritrum, Gomphi, Silaia, Tricca, Atthæa, and Phœria: After this they invellied Pelidæum, where Philip the Megapolitan lay in garrison with five hundred foot, and forty horie: but before they gave the assault, they sent a trumpet to Philip to give him warning, that he should not adventure to try the utmost hazard. But he returned this answer again right stoutly unto them, that he would be content to commit himself to the Romans or the Thessalians, he passed not whether, but put his life and estate into the hands of King Philip he never would. Now when it appeared that they were to proceed by force, and that it seemed that Limnaea also at the same time might be assailed, it was thought expedient that the King should go to Limnaea, and Babius staid still to batter and force the town of Pelidæum.

It fortune at the same time that M. Acilius the Col, having passed the seas with a power of 10000 foot, and 2000 horie and fifteen Elephants, commanded certain chosen Colonels of footmen to conduct all the Infantry to Larissa, whilst himself with the Cavalry came to King Philip before Limnaea. At the coming of the Consul the town was yielded incontinently: the Kings garrison was delivered, and the Athamans withall. Then the Consul went from Limnaea to Pellæum, where the Athamans yielded first and afterwards Philip also the Megapolitan rendered himself. And as he came down from the fort, Philip the King chanced to meet with him: and in scorn and derision commanded his men to salute him with the stile of King, and himself also by way of mockage came close unto him, and greeting him by the name of brother Philip, scoffing and jesting in broad terms, far unfitting, I wot, his royall Majesty. Then was he brought before the Col, and put in ward, and not long after sent bound to Rome. All the multitude besides of the Athamans, as also of King Antiochus his soldiers, which were within the garrisons of those towns that were surrendered about that time were delivered unto Philip, who amounted to the number of 3000. The Consul departed to Larissa to consult and take advice for the general course of the whole war. And in his way there met him Embassadors from Pieria and Metropolis, for to render their Cities: Philip having courteously and lovingly intreated above all other the prisoners of the Athamans, that by their means he might win the grace and favour of that nation, and conceived some hope to conquer Athamania, led his army thither, and sent his captives aforesaid into their several Cities. Now they were of great account and reputation among their countreymen, and withall made report of the King his clemency toward them, and how liberally and bountifully he used them: And Aminander verily, whose presence and majesty had kept some of them in allegiance, fearing lest he should be delivered into the hands of Philip (who long time had been his mortal enemy) and unto the Romans, whom he knew to have just cause at that time to be offended with him for his revolt, departed out of his own Realm with his wife and children and retired himself to Ambracia. Thus all Athamania became subject to King Philip, and at his pleasure.

The Consul journeyed certain daies at Larissa, especially for to refresh his beasts, which first had been fat-sick, and afterwards were tired with long travel: and thus when he had renewed, as it were, and repaired his army with a little rest and repose, he marched to Cræta. At his coming thither, these towns, to wit, Pharsalus, Scopissa, and Phœra, together with King Antiochus his garrisons that lay there, were yielded up unto him. And having put unto their choice, either to be gone or tarry still with him: as many of them as he saw willing (and those were about a thousand) he delivered unto King Philip: the rest he sent back diarmed to Demetrius. Then he began Protræa and the fortresses and piles thereof about it. Then began he to conduct forward his army toward the gulph of Malea: and when he approached the Straights, upon which the town Thaumacia situate, all the flower of the youth in their armour quit the City, and put themselves in ambush about the woods and passages, and from the higher ground charged upon the Romans in their march. The Consul at the first sent certain unto them, to parley at hand with them, and to see if they could take them from such desperate outrage: but perceiving that they perfitted still as they began, he commanded a Colonel with two ensigns of soldiers to fetch a compass about, in such sort, that he got between those armed men and the town, and kept them from entrance: whereby he possessed himself of the City, being void of defenders. They they that lay in the forefront in ambush, hearing an outcry behind their backs of the town taken, fled backward out of all parts of the wood, and fell upon the sword. The Consul then departed from Thaumacia, and the second day came as far as the river Sperchius, and so forward unto the territory of the Hyperboreans, which he spoiled.

During the time of these occurrences, Antiochus lay at Chalcis, who by this time seeing that he had gotten in Greece, but the pleasure of one wintering, spent so deliciously in Chalcis, and a dishonorable marriage: began to blame the Ætolians for their vain promises, and especially Thous: but Amibal he had in great admiration, regarding him not only for a sage and prudent man, but also for a true Prophet, who foretold him of all things that then were come to pass: howbeit for feared that his cold slackness might not overthrow that quite, which his rash folly had begun and enterprised, he sent out his couriers into Ætolia, to give them warning to levy all their youth and assemble them together; and himself for his own part had brought thither almost 10000 footmen, who were made up full and furnished by them that after came out of Asia, and 500 horsemen besides. To this place, perceiving that there repaired smaller numbers by many degrees than ever at any time before, and that they were but the Nobles only and some few of their vassals, who protested that they had done their endeavor to levy out of their Cities as many as possibly they could: but neither by authority, nor for love and favour, nor yet with absolute command, were they able to prevail or do any good with them that refused warfare: and seeing himself thus forsaken on all sides, as well of his own subjects who dragged behind in Asia, as of his allies who performed not those matters, in the hope whereof they had called him to assist them, he withdrew himself within the Straights of Thermopile.

This mountain divideth Greece in the very middle, like as Italy is parted in twain by the ridge of the Apennine. On the fore-part of this straight and forest of Thermopile toward the North lyeth Epirus and Perrhebia, Magnesia and Thessaly, also the Phthiotz of Achaia, and the gulph Malæ: but more southward is discovered the greatest part of Ætolia and Acarnania, Phocia, Cræta and Bœotia, together with the Island Eubœa joining close thereto: behind it is situate the country of Attica, running into the sea like a promontory, and besides it Poloponnesus. This mountain taking his beginning at Leucas and the Pont or Western sea, reacheth through Ætolia the Levant or Eastern Ocean, and is so full of rocks and rough crags between, that no whole armies, no, nor so much as single travellers lightly appointed, can find but hardly and with much ado the waies and paths to pass through the utter off-brows and the hills of this mountain bending toward the east, they call Otræa: and the highest pitch and knop thereof, is called Calidromos: at the foot whereof lyeth the valley leading toward the gulph of Malæa, wherein the plain is not above three or four paces broad. And this is the only high and port-way by which an army may march, but it is not otherwise impeached, And hereupon it is, that the passage is called Pyle: and of some (because there are found therein certain natural hot waters or bairs) Thermopile: even that very place which is so famous and renowned for the memorable death of the Lacedæmonians (noted there for any worthy battell against the Persians. Here lay encamped Antiochus at this present, trying nothing that mind nor resolution as those Lacedæmonians did) within the gates as it were of the Straights, where he enclosed and stopped the passage besides, with strong defences: And when he had cast a double rampire and trench, yea, and raised a mure and wall where need was (which to do the place afforded him great plenty of stone lying every where) and had made all sure: presuming confidently that the Roman army would never venture nor be able to break through those barricadoes that way: he sent of those 4000 Ætolians (for so many were met together) some to keep a garrison in Heraclea, situate even before the very gulph and straight; and others to Hypata: for that he made no doubt but the Consul would assail Heraclea, and many polls brought word that all about Hypata was already wasted.

Now the Consul having spoiled the territory of Hypata first, and then of Heraclea, (where the Ætolians aids did no good and served to no purpose in the one place or the other) pitched his camp over-against the King, even in the very mouth of the gulph, near the fountains of the hot waters aforesaid: both those regiments above named of the Ætolians were got within the town Heraclea, and there kept themselves sure. Antiochus, who before he saw his enemies, thought all was fast enough and sufficiently fenced, began then to fear lest the Roman footsouldiers would find out some privy paths and waies, whereby they might pass and get over those high hills that commanded his camp: for a rumour ran, that the Lacedæmonians in times past were so enclosed by the Persians, and of late daies also King Philip was likewise compassed and environed by these very same Romans. Whereupon he dispatched a messenger to the Ætolians in Heraclea, willing them to do him thus much service yet in these wars, as to seize the tops of those hills and to keep them that the Romans might have no passage that way. Upon this message received there arose some dissension among the Ætolians. Some were of mind to obey the King his will and commandment, and to go accordingly; but others thought better to tarry still at Heraclea, to attend upon fortune and see what would happen: to the end, that if the King should chance to be vanquished by the Consul, they might have in readiness their forces fresh and in heart, to succour and aid their own Cities near at hand; or if his luck were to defeat the Consul, then they might follow the Romans in chase, when they were disbanded and scattered asunder. Both parts thus divided as they were, not only persisted still in their several designments, but also put the same in execution by themselves. For two thousand of them remained at Heraclea: the other two thousand parted themselves three waies, namely, to Calidromos, to Rhoduntia, and Tichius. (these are the names of three principall high hills): and each company took and held one. The Consul when he saw that the Ætolians were possessed of these higher places, sent M. Porcius Cato and L. Valerius Flaccus, two of his Lieutenants (who both had been Consuls) with two thousand chosen men against these holds of the Ætolians, to wit, Flaccus against Rhoduntia and Tichius and Cato against Calidromos: himself before that he advanced his battell against his enemies, made a brief speech unto his souldiers in this manner: "My footsouldiers, I see that the most part of you even of every quality and degree, are they that in this very Province sometime lived under the conduct, charge, and government of T. Quintius in the Macedonian war. The Straights of

A "of that passage then, near the river Aous, were more difficult to gain and get over than this: for here are very gates, yea, and one natural way (as it were) to pass through, as if allec were stopped up between two seas. There were more stronger defences, and scones against them at that time, and those placed in places more convenient and commodious. The army of the enemies then, was both for number greater & for men & footsouldiers much better: for therein were the Macedonians, the Thracians, and the Illyrians: all most fierce and warlike nations: in this are the Syrians and Asiatic Greeks, or half Asians, the vainest kind of people of all others, and born to serve. The King there, namely Philip a most noble warrior exulted and inured ever from his youth in the neighbour wars of the Thracians and Illyrians. & all the nations bordering upon him: but this Antiochus (to say nothing of all his lie besides) is he who being come out of Asia into Europe, for to make war upon the people of Rome, hath done all the long winter time nothing more memorable than this, That for to please his wanton lust he hath taken to wife the daughter of a privat person, a man (I say) of low degree and base quality among other Citizens: & this new married man, fed fat and franked (as I may to say) with dainty suppers & delicate bedchambers, is come forth (forthwith) to fight a battell, his whole strength and all his hope hath been in the Ætolians, a people of all others most vain, unconitant, and unthankfull, as ye have tried heretofore, and Antiochus findeth true at this present. For neither assembled they in great number, nor possible was it to keep them together in the camp: nay, which more is, they mutine among themselves, and having demanded and required the guard of Hypata and Heraclea, they have defended neither the one nor the other. Some of them are fled to the tops of the mountains; others have shut themselves within Heraclea. The King himself hath confessed plainly, that he was never so hardy as to meet in plain field and affront the enemy, no, nor so much as to pitch his camp in open ground; in that abandoning all that country before him, which he vaunted and bragged that he had taken from us and Philip, he hath hidden himself among the rocks, & hath not encamped before the entrance of the gulph and Straights (as the same goeth of the Lacedæmonians in times past) but pitched his tents far within. And to bewray his cowardly fear, what difference is there between so doing, and hiding himself within the walls of some City for to be besieged? But neither shall those narrow Straights have him no more than those steep hills defend the Ætolians, which they have feigned. This one thing hath been forecalt and provided for on all sides, that ye shall have nothing to make head against, but your enemies.

D Now must ye resolve upon this point, That ye fight not only for the liberty of Greece (and yet even this also were a brave and honourable title, to be said for to deliver the same now out of the hands of Antiochus and the Ætolians, which before you freed from King Philip) nor that ye shall have no other reward and recompence for your pains, but that which we shall find now in the Kings camp, but also that the great provision and furniture which daily is expected from Ephesus, shall be your prize and booty, and that ye shall hereafter make a way for the Roman Empire into Asia, Syria, and all those most wealthy and rich Realms, even as far as to the Levant Sea. And what shall let us then, but that from Gadiz to the red sea we bound and limit our State and Dominion, even with the very Ocean that environeth and compasseth the round globe of the earth? What shall hinder us, I say, but that all the nations of the world shall honour and worship the Roman name next unto the immortal gods? Prepare your hearts therefore and courage answerable to so high rewards, that with the leave and help of the gods we may to morrow fight a field. After this speech the assembly brake up, and the souldiers being dismissed, made ready their armor and weapons, before they took repast or repose. And in the morning by dawning of the day, the Consul put out the signal of battell, and let his army in array, with a narrow and pointed front, according to the nature and straightness of the place. The King seeing the ensigns of his enemies, led forth his forces likewise. Part of his light armours he placed before the rampire and trench in the forefront, then he placed the flower and strength of the Macedonians, whom they call Savissophari, i.e. Pikemen, for the surety and safeguard of his defences and fortifications. And to flank these on the left side, he put the archers, the flingers of darts, and flingers of stones, hard upon the foot of the hill, that from the higher ground they might assail and pelt the naked sides of the enemies. On the right flank of these Macedonians at the very edge and point of the mures and defences, which as they were enclosed and mounded with those places which reach to the sea, and are unpassable by reason of the bogs, muddy marshes, quagmires, and quicksands, he set the Elephants with their ordinary and usual guard. After them his horsemen and men of arms. Then leaving an indifferent space between, he ranged the rest of his forces in the second ward or middle battailon. The Macedonians who were belted before the camp and the trench, at the first sustained the Romans easily enough (who assailed on every side to make an entry) for much help they had of them, who from the upper ground weighed bullets out of their slings, as thick as an hail storm, who launched darts also, and shot arrows besides. But when as afterwards greater numbers of enemies pressed upon them, and charged them with such violence as possibly might not be endured, they gave ground, and retired within their fortifications, keeping yet their array and their ranks whole. And then from the rampier they made (as it were) another palliade with their long pikes that they held out afore them. Now the height of their camp-mure was so reasonable, that as it afforded some rise and vantage of ground for their own men to fight upon it, so by reason of the length of their spears, they might reach the enemy underneath them, in so much as many of the Romans approaching rashly, and venturing to clamber up, were run clean through: and either they had given over and done nothing, or else more of them had died for it, but that M. Porcius Cato having beaten from the top of Callidromus the Ætolians, and slain a great part of them (for he surprised them suddenly at unawares, and took of them fast asleep) appeared upon the hill that commanded the camp. Flaccus sped not so well at Tichus and Rhodunius, who laboured to get up those cliffs and holds, but to no purpose. The Macedonians and the rest that were in the Kings host and camp, at first, when they descried afar off nothing but a multitude and number marching, imagined verily, that they were the Ætolians, who having discovered the battell and fight a good way off were coming to aid them. But so soon as they beheld and discerned near at hand the ensignes and armour of the Romans, they took themselves in their own error, and were upon a sudden stricken with such fear, that they all flung their weapons away, and fled. But both their fortifications and defences in the way, & also the narrowness of the vale through which they were to be pursued, hindered the Romans in following the chafe. And the Elephants above all which were in the rearward took up the ground so, as that the footmen could hardly pass by them, and the horsemen by no means possible; so affrighted were the horses, and caused more trouble and disorder among themselves, than they did during the battell. Besides the Romans flaid sometime behind, whilst they rifled and ranlacked the camp. However, they had the enemy in chafe that day as far as Lylæum, killing and taking in the very way, not only many horses and men, but also slaying the Elephants which they could not take alive; which done they returned to their own camp, which that day had been assailed by the Ætolians, who were of the garrison of Heraclea: but that enterprise, as it was exceeding bold and audacious, so it took no effect at all. The Consul having at the reliefe of the third watch the night ensuing, sent before his Cavalry to pursue the enemy, advanced likewise the ensigns of his legions forward by break of day. The King by this time had won some ground, and got a good way before: for he never gave over galloping with bridle in horse neck, until he had recovered Elasia. Where first he gathered together the broken ends of his army thus disperied in flight, and having rallied a small and poor troop of souldiers, and the same armed by the halts, he retired to Chalcis. The Roman Cavalry was not able to overtake the King himself at Elasia, but overthrew and cut off a great part of his army, which either for weariness rested themselves dragging behind or else were scattered one from the other, as missing their way in those unknown quarters, going as they did without their guides: and letting aside five hundred which kept about the King, there was not one that escaped of the whole army, which was but a small number in proportion of 10000 (if they were no more) for so many (according to Polybius) we have written that the King conducted over with him for his part into Greece. What were they then to that great power, which (if we believe Valerius Antias) came with the King for he writeth that he had in his host threecore thousand, and that forty thousand were slain of them, and above five thousand taken prisoners, with the loss of military ensignes two hundred and thirty. Of Romans there died in all a hundred and fifty.

As the Consul marched with his army through Phocis and Boeotia, the States and Cities which were privy to the revolt and partly culpable, stood without their gates with their insules and veils in token of peace, and craved mercy, fearing they should have been pilld and ranlacked as enemies. But his host journeyed every day in a peaceable and friend-country, doing no hurt or wrong to any earthly creature, until they were come into the territory of Corona: where the Statue or Image of Antiochus erected in the Temple of Minerva Ionia kindled their choler, and the souldiers were permitted to spoil the country lying about that Temple. But bethinking themselves that (considering the said Statue was set up with the publique consent of all Boeotia) it was an indignity to deal so hardly with that territory only of Corona, the souldiers were immediately called in and reclaimed, and so they ceased the waiting and spoiling thereof. The Boeotians only had a check and rebuke by words for carrying so unthankfull hearts to the Romans, of whom they had so lately received such high favours and benefits.

At the very time of the battell aforesaid, they rode at anchor ten ships of the Kings, in the gulph of Malea near to Thronium under the charge and conduct of Isidorus. To which place Alexander and the Acarnanians, being fled from the conflikt, fresh bleeding and full of grievous wounds, brought news of the unfortunate fight. Whereupon the ships in great fear for this late terrible made halte and away to Ceneum in Eubœa, where Alexander died, and was interred. But three other ships which were come out of Asia and lay in the same road, upon the news of the defeat of the army, returned to Ephesus. And Isidorus crossed the seas from Ceneum to Demetria, if peradventure the King were fled thither. About that very time, A. Attilius the Admiral of the Roman navy intercepted and surprised great store of the Kings provisions, which had passed already the straits near the Island Andros. Some ships he sunk, others he boarded and took: as for those that came hindmost in the rearward, they turned fail, and shaped their course into Asia, Attilius being returned to Pyraeum (from whence he came) with a fleet of ships taken from the enemies, divided great store of corn both among the Athenians, and other allies also of that country.

Antiochus somewhat before the Consul his coming, loosed from Chalcis, and first fell to the Island Tenæ, and afterwards sailed to Ephesus. Against the Consul his arrivall at Chalcis the gates were set open for him, and Aristobolus the Captain there for the King, quit the place upon the approachment of the Consul. In like manner other Cities in Eubœa yielded without resistance. And so within few daies (when all troubles were appeased and set in quiet order without the hurt and damage

A damage of any one City) the army was brought back to Thermopylae, and won much more honour and commendation for the modestly used after victory, than for the victory it self.

From thence the Consul dispatched M. Cato to Rome, by whose certain and sure relation the Senate and people might have full knowledge of all the affairs that had passed. Who taking sea at Crota (a port town of Merchandize standing within the innolt gulph of Corinth) arrived at Paria, a City in Libania. From Paria, he coasted along the rivers of Ætolia and Acarnania, as far as Corinthus, and so cut over to Hydruntum in Italy, from whence he travelled by land, and in exceeding great halte within five daies came to Rome. Early in the morning before day light he entered the City, and from the gate rode directly to M. Junius the Prætor, who assembled the Senat betimes by the break of day: and thither, L. Cornelius Scipio (who some daies before had been dismissed) and sent away from the camp by the Consul (hearing at his first coming that Cato was got before him, and in the Senat repaired, even as he was relating the news, Then these two Lientenants by the commandment of the Senat were presented in the generall assembly of the people, where they declared the same, which they had done before in the Senat house, as touching the deeds achieved in Ætolia. And ordained it was that a solemn procession for three daies should be holden, and that the Prætor should sacrifice forty head of greater beasts, in the honour of what gods he would himself.

And at the same time M. Fulvius Nobilior, who two years before went as Prætor into the farther Spain, entered the City in pomp of an Ovation, or petty triumph. He canied to be born before him of silver biggats 130000. And besides that, silver in coin and ready money, 12000 pound weight. Also in gold the weight of 127 pound. Acilius the Consul sent certain messengers from Thermopylae to the Ætolians at Heraclea, to advertise them that before he came they would now all be wiser, and bethink themselves (after such experience of the King his vanity and insufficiency for to deliver up Heraclea, and crave pardon of the Senat, either for their willfull folly, or their blind error. Who used these and such like motives and inducements unto them, namely, That other Cities likewise of Greece (during this war) abandoned the Romans and revolted from them, at whose hands they had received so many benefits: yet because that after the King was fled (upon whose assurance they had disloyally broken their allegiance) they stood not out still, nor persisted obstinately in their fault and folly, were received to mercy and protection. The Ætolians likewise, albeit they followed not the King, but sent for him, and were rather conductors and leaders, than companions and associates in this war, yet if they could take up in time and repent, they might be pardoned and saved. But no answer returned they tending to peace: nay, it appeared that the master would come to a trial by arms, and for all the King was vanquished, yet the Ætolian was behind as wholly and entire as before time. Whereupon the Consul dislodged from Thermopylae, and marched directly against Heraclea: yea, and the very same day he rode on horseback all about the walls to view the situation of the City. This Heraclea is seated at the foot of the mountain Oeta: & though the town it self standeth in a plain, yet a fortels it hath built upon a high ground, which as it overlooketh the City, so it is steep on every side, that it is altogether inaccessible. After he had diligently beheld all things that were to be marked and known, he determined to assault the town in four places at once. Unto L. Valerius he gave in charge to plant his platforms and to batter that side where the river Asopus runneth, and where the publique place of exercise is built. T. Sempronius Longus had commission to assault the Castle, without the walls indeed, but yet better inhabited and more peopled (as a man would say) then the town it self. On that side which standeth toward the gulph of Malea, which part yielded the hardest access, he appointed M. Babianus. And from another pretty river which they call Medas, he set Appius Claudius opposite against the Temple of Diana. Through the great industry and earnest labour of these four gallants, striving who could perform the best service, the work went so well forward, that within few daies the frames and platforms; the Rams and all other engines of battery meet for the assault of Cities were finished. For besides that the territory about Heraclea, being a moory ground and full of tall trees, afforded them plenty enough of timber to frame and perform all sorts of fabricks: the houses also in the entry of the City without in the Suburbs standing void; by reason that the Ætolians had put themselves within the walls, yielded unto them not only poles, beams, joists, planks, and boards, but brick, and tile, plaster, mortar, and stone of all fizes for divers and sundry uses. So, the Romans assaulted the town rather with fabricks, ordnance, and artillery, than by force of arms: but the Ætolians contrariwise defended themselves by main strength and their weapons. For when as the walls should be shaken with the Rams, they caught not hold of them as the manner is with cords, and by plucking them aside, avoided their force: but armed in great number, they carried fire with they to fling upon the terraces and the fabricks. They had besides divers vaults and arches in the walls at which they could readily and fitly fall out: and ever as themselves closed up the breaches of their walls, or made new for the ruinant, they would remember to make more of those vaults still, that in many places at once they might break forth upon their enemies. Thus for the first daies, whilst they were fresh in heart, they issued forth oftentimes and many together, and quit themselves right lustily: but afterwards in fewer numbers, and more slackly every day than other. For being evermore employed about many things at once, nothing so much tamed and wearied them, as watching. For whereas the Romans had a great number of souldiers, and one guarded after another incessively by turns, the Ætolians being so few, were constrained without any change, to continue in unceasing fant labour night and day. Thus for the space of twenty four daies they had no rest nor respit, but day and night was all one unto them, maintaining fight still, and labouring without intermission against the enemies that assailed the City in all four quarters at once. When the Consul knew once that the Ætolians were wearied and overtoiled, partly by counting the time, and partly by that which he had learned of certain fugitives, he used this policy and stratagem. About midnight he founded the retreat, and having drawn all his soldiers at once from the assault, held them quiet in the camp until the third hour of the day. After that, he began to give a fresh charge, and continued it unto midnight following, and to gave over again until the same hour before noon. The Ætolians supposing verily that the cause why they furcated the assault, was for very weariness (like as themselves were tired out) so soon as the Romans had the retreat founded upon them, departed every man from his ward and quarter, as if they also by the same signal were called away, and shewed not themselves in armor upon the walls before the third hour of the next day. The Consul having at one time given over the battery aforesaid at midnight, began at the fourth watch a fresh assault again with all forcible means in three parts: and at one side, he gave commandment to T. Sempronius to keep his men together, and intensively to observe and wait for the signal: assuring himself that in the alarm by night, the enemies would run to those parts from whence they heard the noise. The Ætolians, many of them being found asleep, had much to do to rouse themselves, and were loath to rise up from their sweet sleep; their bodies being so weary with toiling, moiling, and watching before. Some of them who were yet awake ran in the dark to the place where the assailants made a noise. Their enemies laboured to get into the town some by mounting over the ruins and breaches of the broken wall, others by scaling and climbing with ladders. And against them the Ætolians ran from all parts, ready to succour and help. One quarter, whereas there stood houses without the City, was neither defended nor assailed, because there were some ready and waited for the signal to give the assault; so there was not one offered other part to resist and defend. Now began the day to peep, when as the Consul put forth the signal, and the soldiers began to mount over into the City, and found none to withstand them; they entered in the walls half broken down, others scaled them with ladders where they stood whole and sound. And the cry was not so soon heard that the City was taken, but the Ætolians left their stations on all sides, and fled into the Cattle. The soldiers that had won the town were permitted by the Consul to ransack it: which was not done so much upon a rage and despite, as for revenge, that the soldiers who had been kept short and fasting thus long (notwithstanding so many towns recovered out of the enemies hands) might once at length in some one place take the fruit of victory. The Consul, having called from thence about noon, the soldiers unto him, divided them into two parts, whereof he commanded the one to cast about the foot of the hills, and the other, which being in height equal to the Cattle aforesaid, was now (having divided from it by a valley between, seeming as if it had been sometime a part thereof) and to front it. Now the two points of the hills flur up to near together in the head, that from the top of the one, a single lance a dart into the Cattle or fortres. The Consul, with the other half of the soldiers, had been expecting a sign and token from them that were to get up the cliff behind, ready thereupon to mount up from the town side into the fort. The Ætolians that were within the Cattle could not ther abide at the first the shout of those that had seized the cliff, nor afterwards the assault of the Romans from the City, both for that their hearts failed them and were daunted, ready, and also because they were unprovided of all necessaries for to endure any long siege and assault: considering that women and children and all the other impotent multitude subject to bear arms, were got thither in so great numbers, that the place was hardly able to receive and contain much less to keep and maintain them: and therefore at the first assault, they cast down their weapons and yielded. Among other principal personages of the Ætolians, Damocritus also was delivered: he, who in the beginning of the war when T. Quintus desired to see a copy of the Decree of the Ætolians for the sending for Antiochus, answered, That he would shew it him in Italy, when the Ætolians lay there encamped. For this proud speech of his, the Romans now conquerors, were the gladder that they had got him into their hands.

During the time that the Romans assailed Heraclea, Philip also besieged and battered Lania, according as it was before agreed between them: for near unto Thermopylae, at what time as the Consul returned out of Boeotia, he met with him, of purpose to signify his joy in the behalf of him and the people of Rome, for their achieved victory: and also to excuse himself by occasion of sickness, that he was not present with him in person in the managing of the wars. From thence they parted asunder, and took divers waies, for to assault these two Cities (as I said) both at once: and distant they were one from the other near seven miles. And so much as Lania was teared upon an hill, therefore the town discovered and overlooked all the country about, but especially on that side toward Heraclea, where, by reason that it seemeth a less compass, it representeth a full prospect to the eye. When as the Romans and Macedonians laboured, and striving who could do better, were day and night employed either about their fabricke and pioneers work, or else in skirmish and fight: the Macedonians found more difficulty than they, in this respect, that the Romans were busied in platforms, mantlers, and works all above ground: but the Macedonians were put to undermine: and oftentimes (as it falleth out in such stony and craggy ground) they met with hard flints and rage not minable, and such as no iron or steel tool was able to touch and pierce. The King seeing little good donchy this means, and his enterprise going but slowly forward,

A ward, began to found the yowhimen, and to tempt them to tender the City, using the mediation whereof their chief Citizens whom he parted withall, for this reckoning he made, that if Heraclea were forced before him, they within the City would sooner yield unto the Romans than to him, and so the Consul should win all the thank to himself for levying the siege. And nothing was more of his humour, for immediately upon the winning of Heraclea, a messenger came unto him from the Consul, willing him to surseale the assault and the siege: alledging, it was more reason, that the Roman soldiers who had fought in ranged battell with the Ætolians, should have the reward and recompence of the victory. By this means Lania was abandoned, and by the ruin of Heraclea her neigbouring City avoided and escaped the like calamity of her own.

Some few daies before that Heraclea was won, the Ætolians having assembled a Diet at Hypada, addressed Embassadors unto Antiochus and Thes among the rest, even he, who aforesaid had been sent unto him. His commission and charge was, first, to request the King that once again he would rally his forces as well by land as at sea, and in person pass over into Greece: secondly, if any other important affairs hindered him, yet that he would lend unto them both men and money. For as it touched his Highness in honour, reputation, and credit, not to see his allies abandoned: so it made for the safeguard and security of his own Realm and royalties, not to suffer the Romans (after they had once defeated the Ætolians) to sail over into Asia at their ease and pleasure, with all their forces. There were no fained devices, but true remonstrances indeed: and therefore prevailed the more with the King. Whereupon he delivered money presently to the Embassadors, sufficient to defray the charges of the war, and promised casually to lend men to serve both by land and sea. These alone of all the Embassadors he kept still with him, who was not himself unwilling to stay behind, because he might be ever at hand to call upon the King for to perform his word and benefit. But the winning of Heraclea killed the heats clean of the Ætolians in the end. And within few daies after that they had dispatched their Embassadors into Asia, about the relieving of the war and tending for the King, they laid apart all designs of arms, and addressed their Orators unto the Romans to crave peace. Who, as they began to make their speech, the Consul cut them off, and said, he had other matters of greater importance to think upon and to dispatch, and commanded them to content themselves with a truce for ten daies, and to return to Hypada: and with them he sent Antiochus Flaccus, unto whom they should declare those things that they were about to deliver unto him, and whatsoever else they desired. When they were arrived at Hypada, the chief and principal Ætolians assembled themselves in the lodging of Phileas, consulting with him what course they were to take in their treaty with the Consul. And when they went in hand to alledge the ancient rights of the leagues, and to lay abroad their good denitions, and what they had done for the Romans: "Flaccus bad them to draw these, and speak no more of the privilege of those covenants and accords, which they themselves had broken: shewing unto them, that they should speed better and gain more by a simple confession of their trespass, and in recourse only to prayer and humble supplication: forasmuch as all the hope they might have of safety, rested not in their own defence and goodness of their cause, but in the meer clemency and mercy of the people of Rome: promising for his part to assist them and second their petitions as well to the Consul as the Senate of Rome, since that either altho they must of necessity lend an Embassy. This way seemed to them all, the best simply for their safety, namely, to put themselves to the disposition and devotion of the Romans: for they suppooled by this means to drive the Romans for very shame to have regard of them, & not to offer hurt or violence contrary to them, coming in the habit of poor suppliants: and yet withall, if any opportunity of better fortune should in the mean time offer itself unto them, to be their own Masters nevertheless and at their choice. When they were come before the Consul, Phileas the chief of the Embassy, made a long Oration, couching and framing his words finely and sweetly artificially, to mitigate and assuage the wrath of the conqueror, which he knit up and concluded with this speech, saying, That the Ætolians committed themselves and all that they had to the mercy and protection of the people of Rome. When the Consul heard those words: Set you do so ther. Indeed (quod he) O ye Ætolians, and take heed I advise you that you do herein bond fide. Then Phileas brought forth and shewed a iake instrument of a Decree, wherein the same was engrossed in plain terms, since that (quod he again) you mean good earnest, and are at our disposition. I demand that ye deliver unto me out of hand Decree such a ratification of yours, and Menelaus of Epirus, (who being engaged into Naupactus with a garriſon, had compelled the City to revolt) also Aminander and all the Nobles of the Athamans, by whose counsel and suggestions ye fell from us and rebelled. Phaceus interrupted the Consul before he had well made an end of his speech, We yield not our selves (quod he) to be your vassals and slaves, but as we are to be protected by you: and I am verily perswaded you know not what you do, to impose these things upon us in this manner and custome of the Greeks. The Consul replied again: I have said little, I assure you (quod he) greatly what the Ætolians deem well or ill done according to the custom of the Greeks: all the whiles that I, after the custome of the Romans, have that power and command over them, who ere while by virtue of their own decree yielded unto us. And therefore by force of our arms have been vanquished and subdued by us. And therefore, mine that be executed which I command, yea, and with speed my will is, that presently here you be bound hand and foot: and with that he commanded chains and gyves to be brought forth, and the Lictors to come about them for to lay hold upon them. Then the stout courage both of Phœnus and the rest of the Ætolians, was well cooled & abated: and so at length they saw in what poor plight they were. And Phœnus made answer, That both himself and the Ætolians there present in place, knew well, that those things were to be performed which were imposed upon them, but (quoth he) there needs a Council of the Ætolians for to enact a decree thereof, and therefore he requested the Consuls to allow a lullcase of arms only for ten daies. Then Phœnus began to speak for the Ætolians, and at his request the said abstinence was granted, and so they returned to Hypna. When Phœnus had related in the privy Council of those elect peers of that nation called Apeltes, as well the demands that were commanded, as what had like to have fall upon them selves in perion, the peers sighed deeply and groaned again, to see their miserable condition; howbeit they were all of opinion, that the victor must of necessity be obeyed, and a general Parliament assembled of the Ætolian Burgeses out of all their towns and Cities. When all that multitude was gathered together, and heard the same related again, their hearts loosed within them at the cruelty and indignity of those Lordly commands, that if they had been well settled in peace, yet such a fit of anger had been enough to have put them into arms, And to stir the fume and choler the more, the difficulty of effecting the things demanded, helped well: for how possibly could they compass to deliver Aminander, being as he was an absolute King? But even then there was presented unto them by chance a new hope. For Nicanor at that very time, coming from King Antiochus, filled the peoples heads with this vain expectation, namely, that the King made wondrous provision for war, as well by sea as land. This Nicanor having accomplished his Embassy, and made return again into Ætolia, within the compass of twelve daies, after he was embarked, arrived at Phalera in the gulph of Mælas: from whence having brought the monies which he had, down to Lamia, whiles himself with certain nimble men and light appointed, travelled toward Hypna in the evening, between the Roman and Ætolian camp, through paths that he well knew: he chanced to stumble, ere he was aware, upon the corps de guard of the Macedonians: and was brought to the King before supper was done, the table taken up, and the King risen, when Philip was advertised thereof, he flew no other countenance, than if a friend or guest, and not an enemy was come; he bad him sit down at the board, and eat his meat. Afterwards he kept him there with him fill in the room, and joyed all the rest, willing him in no case to be afraid. The blundered greatly the bad courtes and demeanments of the Ætolians (which evermore lighted up on their own price) who first had brought the Romans, and then Antiochus into Greece. But for my part (quoth he) since things done and done, past, may sooner be blamed than amended, I am content to forget and put all under my foot, and will never be the man that will seem to impute over them in their distress and adversity. And so should the Ætolians likewise take up in time, and lay aside all their rancor and malice to me: and Nicanor especially ought to remember this day, on which by me his life was preserved. With that he sent him away with a good convoy, until he was past all danger: and Nicanor, as is before said, came to Hypna, even as the Ætolians were in deep consultation about peace with the Romans.

M. Attius having either fold outright, or given away to the soldiers the booty of the country about Heraclea, and hearing that the Council at Hypna nothing tended to peace, and that the Ætolians were run together to Naupactum, for to abide in that place the whole violence of the war: M. Attius went along with 4000 soldiers to seize the tops of the mountains, whence as the passages were difficult: and himself ascended up to the hill Orion, and sacrificed to Heracles in that very place which they call Pyra, by occasion that the mortal body of that god was there consumed with fire: from whence he departed with his whole army, & performed the rest of his journey well and marched with ease. Being come to Corax (an exceeding high mountain between Calipolis and Naupactum) he lost there many of his labouring beasts and supper horses, which together with their loads and fardels, as they went, tumbled down headlong from the mountain, and his men also were much troubled and encumbered. Whereby it was soon seen, with how lazy and idle an enemy he had to deal, who had not beset and kept with a guard that difficult passage, to empeach and shut up the thorough-fare from the enemies. Howbeit, as much roiled and troubled N as his army was, he defended to Naupactum. And having erected one Fort against the Castle, he invited all the other parts of the City, and divided his forces according to the situation of the walls. This siege he found as toilsome and painful, as that at Heraclea.

At the same time began the Achæans to lay siege to Messene also in Peloponnesus, for that it refused to be of their Council and association. For these two Cities, Messene and Elis were exempt from the Achæan Diet and accorded with the Ætolians. Howbeit, the Eljans, after that Antiochus was chased out of Greece, gave the Embassadors of Achaia a more mild answer, to wit, That when they had discharged and sent away the Kings garrison, they would consider of the matter what to do. But the Messenians having without any answer at all, sent the Embassadors away, had levied war: and fearing much their own estate, seeing their territory overspread with an army, and every where burned; yea, and their enemies encamped near unto their City, addressed unto Chalcis their embassadors to T. Quintius (the very man who before had set them at liberty) to signify unto him, That the Messenians were ready both to open their gates, & also to surrender their City unto the Romans, & not to the Achæans. Quintius so soon as he had heard their embassy, sent a messenger incontinently to Megalopolis, unto Diophanes, the Prætor there of the Achæans, to command him presently to retire his host from Messene, and to repair unto him. Diophanes obeyed

A obeyed his commandment, and having raised his siege, marched himself lightly appointed for speed before the rest of his army, and about Andania, a small town between Megalopolis and Messene, encountered Quintius. Unto whom after he had shewed the causes of the siege, he received at his hands a gentle rebuke only, for that he had enterprised a matter of too great consequence without his authority: with an express commandment also to raise and discharge his army, and not to disturb and trouble the peace, made for the good and benefit of all. The Messenians likewise he charged to call home their banished persons into their City, and to joy with the Achæans in their general Diet and Assembly. And if they either had any matters to refuse, or would willingly provide for themselves against the future time, he willed them to make their repair unto him at Cornith, and enjoined Diophanes immediately to summon the Diet of the Achæans for him, where personally himself would be. Where, after he had complained as touching the Island Zacynthus, that by fraud and treachery they had come by and kept, he required that it should be restored to the Romans. Now this Isle had sometime appertained to Philip the King of the Macedonians, and he gave it unto Aminander, in consideration, that he might conduct his army into the higher parts of Ætolia, through Arhamonia: in which expeditions and exploits of his, the Ætolians hearts were so abated and quailed, that they were constrained to seek peace. Aminander made first Philip the Megapolitan governour of this Island; but afterwards, in time of that war wherein he banded with Antiochus against the Romans, he called him away from thence to employ him in martial affairs, and sent Hierocles the Agrigentian to succeed him in his place. This Hierocles, after the defeat and flight of Antiochus from Thermopyle, and the expulsion of Aminander out of Arhamonia by King Philip dispatched of his own motion certain messengers unto Diophanes, the Prætor of the Achæans, and for a sum of money agreed upon between them, betrayed the Island to the Achæans. The Romans thought it great reason, that this Island should be theirs, in recompence for the wars which they had maintained; forasmuch as M. Attius, the Consul, and the Roman legions fought not at Thermopyle for Diophanes, nor yet for the Achæans, Diophanes to these challenges and demands sometime excused himself and the whole nation, otherwise flied to it, and avowed the action, and maintained the cause by a plea of right. Somewhere were of the Achæans there, that both protested, how from the beginning they utterly disliked the course, and also at this present much blamed the Prætor for his wilful obduracy. And by their advice and authority an act was set down, that the whole matter should be referred and put to Quintius, to determine what he pleased. Now had Quintius this nature, if a man crossed and thwarted him, he was fierce and fell: if one yielded and gave place, he was gentle again, and pliable. And therefore, without shewing any sign of debate, either in language or countenance, thus he spake, "If I thought (qd. he) and were persuaded in my heart, that it were good and commodious for the Achæans to hold and possess this Island in question, I would advise the Senat & people of Rome to let you enjoy it. But like as a Tortoise, so long as it keepeth her self close within her shell (I see) is sure and safe enough, against all blows and offence whatsoever; but when the once putteth forth any parts, look whatsoever is discovered and naked, the same is weak and subject to injury: even so you Achæans, being enclosed round about with the sea, are able easily to adjoin unto your selves whatsoever lyeth within the precinct of Peloponnesus, and keep the same aloof. When you have laid it to you: but so soon as for a greedy desire of having more and encroaching further, you go beyond those bonds, you lie open without, and are exposed to all hurt and damage. Thus Zacynthus was delivered to the Romans with the assent of all the Council there assembled, and Diophanes durst not say a word more to the contrary.

At the same time King Philip asked the Consul as he marched to Naupactum, Whether it was his pleasure, that he in the mean while should recover and regain those Cities which were revolted from the association of the Romans? And having a grant and warrant from him, he led his forces against Demetrius, knowing well enough in what terms of troubles that City then stood. For being forlorn and in utter despair, seeing Antiochus had forsaken them and no hope at all remaining in the Ætolians: they looked every day and night either for the coming of Philip their heavy friend; or else even the Romans themselves a worse enemy, like as they had a more just cause of anger and indignation against them. A confused and disordered fort there were of King Antiochus his soldiers, who being but a few at first left there to lie in garrison, grew after to be more, and most of them unarmed; such as after the field was lost [at Thermopyle] thither chanced to flie, and neither had strength nor heart enough to abide a siege. And therefore when Philip sent certain messengers before unto them, to signify, that there was some hope that they might be pardoned: they made them this answer, That the gates were open for the King, and that he might enter at his pleasure. At his first entrance, certain chief men of mark quit the City and departed, and Eurilochus killed himself. The garrison soldiers of Antiochus (for so they had captured) were conducted to Lysimachia through Macedonia and Thrace, accompanied with a company of Macedonians, for fear that any man should do them harm. There were some few ships also in the rode of Demetrius, under the command of Isidorus, which together with their leader and Captain were dismissed. After this, he regained Dolopia, Aperantia, and certain Cities of Perthæbia.

During the time that Philip was employed in these affairs, T. Quintius having recovered the Island Zacynthus, departed from the Diet of the Achæans, and crossed the seas to Naupactum, which had been beleaguered already two months, & was at the point to be forced and lost: which if it might have been won by assault, it was thought that the whole nation and name of the Ætolians there would have perished for ever. And albeit he had good cause to be highly offended and displeased with the Ætolians, in remembrance that they only checked and impeached his glory, at what time as he let Greece free: and that they were nothing stirred and moved with his authority, when he (forewarning them that those things would happen which afterwards fell out just to indeed) would have discomfelled and scared them from foolish and furious designs: yet, supposing that it was a speciall part of his charge and work, that no nation of Greece (now freed by him) should utterly be subverted and destroyed, he began to walk up and down along under the walls, to the end that he might be seen, and soon known of the Ætolians. And anon the very formost guards took notice of him, & noised it was presently throughout all the ranks and companies that Quintus was there. And thereupon they ran from all parts up to the walls, every man stretched forth his hands, and with one accord and consonant voice called by name unto Quintus, beseeching him to help and save them. And albeit he was moved at these their piteous cries with commiseration, yet for that time he signified by the turning away of his head, that he refused and denied them: asking withall, What lay in him to do them any good? But afterwards, being come unto the Consul, "Know you not (quoth he) O M. Acilius whereabout we are, and what we have in hand? or if you be a man provident enough, esteem you not that it mainly concerneth the common-weal? He let the Consul by these words a longing, and caused him to give more attentive care what he would say and withall, Why do you not speak forth (quoth the Consul) and utter your mind what the matter is? Then quoth Quintus: "See you not that after you have vanquished Antiochus, you spend and lose much time here in the siege and assault of two Cities, when as now the year of your government is wellnigh come about? And Philippus the mean time without seeing a battell or the enignes of his enemies displayed, hath gained and joyned to himselfe not Cities only, but to many nations already, namely, Achæmans, Peribæus, Asperantia and Dolopia? But it is nothing to good and expedient for us, nor standeth it us so much upon, to take down the Ætolians and pare their nails, as to look unto Philippus that the war is too great: and (seeing you and your souldiers have not got yet two Cities in reward and recompence of victory) not to suffer him to go clear away with so many nations of Greece. The Consul accorded hereunto: but he thought it a shame and dishonour for him to give over the siege and effect nothing: but afterwards, all the matter was put unto the disposition of Quintus. Who went again to that side of the wall, whereas a little before the Ætolians called and cried aloud unto him. And when as they intreated him more earnestly and with greater affection to take pity of the Ætolian people, he willed some of them to come forth unto him. And immediately, Phanias himself with other principall persons of the Ætolians, went out unto him: unto whom lying prostrate and groveling at his feet: "Your present fortune (quoth he) and hard estate wherein you are, caused me both to temper my choler and also to flay my tongue. Those things you now see are faine out, which I foretold would come to pass. And not so much as this is left unto you, That the calamities fall upon your heads can be truly said to have light upon them that have not deserved as much. Howbeit, since it hath been allotted unto me as it were by destiny to be a foster-father (as I may so say) to suttie up Greece, I will not cease even to you good, as thankles and ungratefull persons as you are. Send your Orators to the Consul, to intreat him to grant you a truce for so long, untill you may address your Embassadors to Rome, by whom you shall wholly refer and submit your selves to the Senat: and I will not fail to be an intercessor and advocate to the Consul for you and likewise unto the Senat. And, as Quintus counselled them, so did they. Neither rejected the Consul their Embassie, but granted them abstinence of war for such a term as within which they might have an answer of their Embassie to Rome: so he dislodged the siege was raised, and the army sent into Phocis. The Consul together with Quintus passed over the sea to Egium, unto the generall Council of Achaia. There was much treaty and partly about the Eleans, and the restoring of the Lacedæmonians: yet, but nothing was effected in the one or the other. As for the Lacedæmonians, the Achæans were desirous to reserve that for themselves, and to win thereby a thank, as proceeding from their speciall grace. And the Eleans, chose rather to come and be united to the Achæans: Parliament of themselves, than by the mediation of the Romans. The Embassadors of the Epirots came unto the Consul, who (it was well known) carried not themselves found and upright in the entreating of the Roman army: howbeit, they had not levied a souldier for Antiochus. Charged they were to have relieved him with money: and deny themselves they could not: but they had sent their Embassadors unto the King. And when they put up a petition, that they might be accepted again into the ancient band of amity: this answer the Consul returned unto them, That he knew not yet whether to range them in the number of enemies, or peaceable friends, and thereof the Senat should be judge: and therefore he referred their whole entire cause to Rome. And to that purpose a truce he granted them of fourscore and ten daies. The Epirots thus sent to Rome, presented themselves before the Senat, and when they stood rather upon those terms in recounting those things wherein they had not shewed any open hostility, than in declaring themselves of those matters that were laid against them: they received such an answer, as whereby they might be thought rather to have obtained pardon, than to have made good and justified their cause. The Embassadors also of King Philippus about that time had audience given them in the Senat: who came to congratulate with the Romans, testifying their own joy, and wishing

A theirs for their victory: and upon their request, that they might sacrifice in the Capitoll, and offer an oblation and present of gold in the Temple of Jup. Op. Mias, the Senat gave the good leave. So they presented and offered a crown of gold weighing one hundred pound. Their Embassadors had not only a friendly answer and gracious dispatch: but also Demetrius the son of King Philip, who had lien as an hostage at Rome, was delivered unto them, for to bring home again unto his father. This was the war achieved and brought to an end, which M. Acilius the Consul waged against King Antiochus in Greece.

The other Consul P. Cornelius Scipio, who's lot was to govern the Province of Gaul, before that he took his journey to that war which he was to make against the Boians, demanded of the Senat, that money should be assigned unto him: for to perform those plaies and games which he had promised by vow, as V. e. Prætor in Spa, when he was driven to a great extremity in a battell. This seemed to be a strange and unreasonable demand. Whereupon the L. of the Senat ordained, That what plaies the Consul had vowed on his own head without asking the advice and counsell of the Senat, the same he should exhibit and let forth either with the issue of the spoils gotten from the enemies, (it haply he had received any money raised thereout to that purpose) or else let the charges out of his own purse. These plaies and games P. Cornelius represented for the space of ten daies. And near about the same time, the Temple of the great goddesses dame Jeph (or Ida) was dedicated. This goddess being brought out of Asia in the time that P. Cornelius Scipio (surnamed afterwards Africanus) and P. Licinius were Consuls, was conveyed from the sea-side into the mount Palatine. The Temple was set out to be built at a price (according to the rate of the Senat) by M. Livius and C. Claudius the Censors, when M. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. Thirteen years after the bargain was made for the edifying thereof, M. Junius Brutus dedicated it: and for the honour of this dedication were the first stage-plays exhibited. (as Valerius Antias mine author saith) called thereupon Mægæscæ. In like manner C. Licinius Lucullus one of the two Dittators dedicated the Temple of the goddesses Juvencus, in the great Reace called Circus Maximus. The same had M. Livius the Consul vowed sixteen years before, eventhree day in which he defeated Asdrubal and his army. The same Livius in his Consulship, went through and bargained for the building thereof, whilom M. Cæcilius and T. Sempronius were Consuls. And in the honour of dedicating this Temple, the plaies were let forth: and all was done with more devotion, because there was a new war intended against King Antiochus. In the beginning of this year in which these things passed, whilom P. Cornelius the Consul staid still behind at Rome. (for M. Acilius was gone forth already to war:) it is found in records, that two tame oxen climbed up a ladder in the street Crima, to the tile-roof of a certain house there. And the footlayers gave expresse order that they should be burnt quick, and the ashes to be thrown into Tiber. Also it was reported, that at Tarracina and Amitemum, it rained stones sundry times. Item, that in Minerva the Temple of Jupiter and the shops about the marketplace, were blasted and smitten with lightning: and in the very mouth of the river Vulturnus, two ships caught fire from heaven, and were consumed. In regard of these fearful prodigies, the Decemvirs by order from the Senat went to the books of Sibylla, and perused them: and out of their learning pronounced, that a solemn fast should be now instituted in the honour of Ceres, and the same to be observed and holden every five year: also that a novendiall sacrifice for nine daies together could continue: and a supplication for one day: and that they who went in this procession and supplication, should wear garlands and wreaths of flowers upon their heads: lastly, that the Consul P. Cornelius should sacrifice to what gods, and with what beasts, the Decemvirs would appoint and pronounce. When the gods were pacified as well by the accomplishment of the vows accordingly, as by taking order for the expiation of those wondrous signs the Consul took his journey into his province: from whence he commanded Cneus Domitius the Pro-Prætor (after he had cased his army) to depart to Rome: and himselfe went with his legions into the territory of the Boians.

Within a little of that time, the Ligurians (by vertue of a sacred law that they had) levied and assembled an army, and by night assailed the Camp unawares to Quintus Minucius the Pro-Consul. Minucius kept his souldiers in order of battell untill day within his hold, having an eye and circumspect regard, that the enemy should not mount over the trench and defences in any place. And at the day-break he sallied forth at two gates at once: neither were the Ligurians repulsed (as he hoped they should) at the first charge: for they sustained and held out the skirmish above two hours, with doubtfull event on both sides. At the last, when band after band issued out, and still fresh souldiers succeeded in the room of the wearied, for to maintain fight, the Ligurians in the end (besides other distresses, lost for want of sleep also) turned their backs. Of the enemies were slain above four thousand: of Romans and allies under three hundred. Two months after or somewhat less, P. Cornelius the Consul gave battell to the Boians and won the day: slew 28000 enemies. (as Valerius Antias writeth) took 24000 prisoners, gained 124 military ensignes, 1230 horses, chariots 247: and of the winners (as he saith) there died not above 1484. Where (by the way) how little credit soever (as touching the number) yet apparant it is, that a right great victory it was: both for that the camp was won. and the Boians after that battell presently yielded themselves: as for that in regard of this victory a joyfull procession was by order from the Senat holden, and greater beasts slain for sacrifice.

Not much under or over this present time, M. Fulvius Nobilior returned out of the farther province of Spain in pomp of an Ovation, and carried in shew 10000 pound weight of silver in bellio: of Bigars in silver coin 130000, and in gold 126 li. weight. P. Cornelius the Consul, having first taken hostages of the Boian nation, and disfigured them of the one half of their country to the inhabiting whereof the people of Rome might if they would lend their Colonies: at his departure from thence toward Rome to an undoubted and assured triumph, licensed his army, with commandment to meet him there and give their attendance upon his triumph-day. The morrow after that he was come, the Senat had summons to assemble in the Temple of Bellona; where after he had discoursed of his acts and deeds achieved, he required that he might be permitted to enter the City riding in triumph. P. Sempronius Blesus a Tribune of the Commons for the time being, stepped forth and said, "That his advice was that Scipio should not flatterly be denied the honour of a triumph, but to put it off to a farther day. And why? The wars (qd. he) of the Ligurians have always been joyed and linked with those of Gaul: which nations being so near together, are ever mutually one to succour another. If P. Scipio (after the Boians defeated in battle) had followed the train of victory, and either himself in proper person with his brave conquering army passed into the territory of the Ligurians, or but sent part of his forces to Q. Minucius, who now for three years (or fast upon) both were detained within those quarters in a way of doubtful issue, we might have seen and ere this of the Ligurian war also. But now (forsooth) his soldiers are dismissed, and brought home to accompany him & to solemnize his triumph: who might well have been employed still and done good service to the Common-wealth: yea, & may do yet (if the Senat be so disposed) by deferring the time of triumph, for to make amends and regain that, which by over-hastiness of triumph hath been over-slipped. And therefore, in my opinion (qd. he) they should do well to command the Consul to go his waies back again, and take his army with him into his Province, & to do his best and utmost endeavour to subdue the Ligurians also. For unless they be brought under and made subject unto the people of Rome, the Boians be sure will not long be quiet: either we must have peace or war at once in both places. And so P. Cornelius in quality of Pro-Consul (as many others before him, who in their full Magistracy triumphed not) may after some few months have his triumph. To this the Col. answered again and said, That neither the Province of the Ligurians was any part of his charge by law, neither warred he at all with the Ligurians, nor yet demanded to triumph over them. As for Q. Minucius (qd. he) I hope that shortly after he hath subdued them, he both will require his due triumph, and shall likewise obtain the same. For mine own part, I seek no more but to triumph over the Boians in Gaul, whom I have vanquished in plain battell, beaten out of the field and camp: whose whole nation within two daies after the fight and their general discomfiture, yielded and rendered themselves into my hands: and from whom I have carried away hostages, & assured pledge of future peace: nay, that which is much more than all this, I have had the killing of so many Gauls in open battell, and fought with so many thousands of Boians as no General ever did before me: the better half of 50000 men are slain upon the edge of the sword, and may a thousand taken prisoners: so as the Boians have none left but old folk and young children. Can any man make a wonder then, why a victorious army, leaving no enemy behind in the Province, is come to Rome to honour the triumph of their Consul? Whose employment, if they cannot be disposed to use in any other service or Province, Whether of these two waies think they will make them more willing and ready to put themselves into new dangers, and enter into other fresh labour and travell; either to pay them with our delay & content them with the due & deserved hire of their former peril and pain, or to send them away with bare hope only, instead of the substance, for to expect still without effect: since they have been once already put by and disappointed of their first hope and expectation? Now for mine own part, I obtained honour enough that day on which the Senat sent me (deemed & declared the best man in all the City) to receive that great goddess & dame of Ida, this title alone, without any other addition of triumph, shall be sufficient to recommend to all posterity for honesty & honour both, the image of P. Scipio Nasica. This said, not only the whole Senat themselves condescended generally to grant him triumph, but also with their countenance & authority compelled the Tribunes of the Commons to give over their hold, and forsake their interposition of a negative voice. So P. Cornelius the Col. triumphed over the Boians. In which triumph he caused to be carried for shew in French chariots, armor, ensigns, and spoils of all sorts: also French vessels of brass and copper. He commanded likewise to be led in pomp a number of horses taken, together with Noblemen and Gentle-men captives. Of chains of gold he made a shew of 1470. Besides, there was born in pomp, of gold 245 pound weight: of silver unwrought and wrought into plate, not unworkeably after their manner (and namely in sundry French vessels) 2240 pound weight: lawfully of bigars in coin 234. To his soldiers that followed his triumphal chariot he gave 25 Aspes apiece, double as much to a Centurion, and trebble to an horseman. The next day after he called the people to a general assembly, whereafter he had discoursed again of his exploits, and complained of the wrongs that the Tribune had offered unto him in that he would have tied him to the war of another, with intent to deprive himself of the fruit of his own victory, he called his soldiers and discharged them quite.

While these affairs thus went in Italy, Antiochus remaining at Ephesus, rested very secure and careless of the Roman war, as if the Romans had no purpose nor intention to pass over into Asia. This security of his was occasioned by many of his friends, who partly upon ignorance, and partly upon flattery persuaded him so. Only Antiochus, who at that time was of greatest credit, and might do moit with the King, said unto him, "That he rather marvelled much why the Romans were not already in Asia, than doubted of their coming. For a neerer cut, (quoth he) it is by Sea out of Greece into Asia, than out of Italy into Greece: and a greater motive to war is Antiochus than the Etolians. And as for their valour and power, as hardly they are and mighty at Sea, as on Land: and their fleet hath hovered a good while already about Malta. Moreover, I heard lay of late, that new ships be arrived, and a new General come out of Italy, to follow and perform this war. And therefore, let Antiochus need no longer upon a vain hope, and promise himself a permanent peace: for shortly he must make account to fight with the Romans in Asia, yea, and for Asia, both by Sea and Land: and no mean there is, but that either himself must lose his Kingdom, or take from them their foreign feignery, who affect and pretend to be LL. of the whole world. He was the only man thought to forecast, and truly to foresee what would ensue. Whereupon the King himself in person, with those ships which he had ready rigged and unrimshed, sailed to Chersonesus, with intent to strengthen those places with good garrisons if happy the Romans should come by Land. The rest of the navy he commanded Polyxenus to prepare and put to Sea, And al about the Island he sent about his pinnaces and brigantines as espials to discover the coasts, C. Livius the Admiral of the Roman navy was arrived at Naples from Rome with fifty covered ships, At which place he gave commandment, That the open vessels, which by covenant were due to be sent from the allies of all that tract, should meet. From whence he sailed to Sicily, and passed the Straights by Messina. And when he had received six Carthaginian ships sent to aid him, and called upon the Rhegians and Locrians, and other afficiats comprised in the same league and holding by the same treaty, for that shipping which of duty they were to find, when he had also taken a survey of all his armado at Lecornum, he weighed anchor, and put to the main Sea. Being arrived at Corycora, which was the first City of all Greece, that he came unto, he enquired in what terms the war-affairs stood: (for as yet all was not thoroughly quiet in Greece) and where the Roman fleet was? After he heard that the Roman Consul and King Philip, were about the pals of Thermopylae, and there lay in guard: that the fleet rid at anchor in the port and harbor of Pyraeus: he thought it good to use expedition, and to make speed for all occasions whatsoever, and inconviniently determined to sail forward to Peloponnesus. And having at one instant waited Samos and Zephyrus as he went, because they chose rather to band with the Etolians, he set sail for Malta and having a good wind, within few daies he arrived at Pyraeus, where the old fleet anchored. At Scyllium King Eumenes met him with three ships: who had been a long time at Adria, unresolved in himself, whether he should return to defend his own Kingdom (for he heard that Antiochus made preparation at Ephesus for war, as well by Sea as Land), or not to depart a foot from the Romans, upon whose fortune depended his whole State. Antiochus, to soon as he had delivered to his successor five and twenty close ships of war, took from Pyraeus and came to Rome. So Livius with a fleet of eighty one ships, armed at their beakheads with brasen pikes, besides many other smaller vessels, (which open as they were, had brazen heads, as is aforesaid: or if they were without such pikes, served for espials) sailed to Delos. Much about that time the Consul Acilius assailed Naxos, At Delos, Livius for certain daies was staid by contrary winds (for that quarter among the Cyclades is exceeding windy, by reason that these Islands are divided slender, some with broader gulfs, some with narrower.) Polyxenus being certified by the post-ships (sent in diversie places to discover) that the Roman armado did anchor near Delos, dispatched messengers to the King, who leaving all matters which he encompassed in Hellaspontus, returned to Ephesus as fast as ever he could make sail with his ships of war, and presently called a council, where it was debated, whether he were best to hazard a battell at Sea or no? Polyxenus was of opinion, "That he should not slack the time, but in anywise give battell and trie a fight, before that the fleet of Eumenes and the Rhodian ships were joined with the Romans: for so in number they should not be much overmatched, and for all other things have the better, as well for nimbleness and agility of ships, as for variety of aid-soldiers. For the Roman ships, as being unworkeably built, they are heavy of keelage and now slowly, laden they are and fringed besides with provision of victuals, as they are commonly that come into the enemies country. But as for your ships (seeing they leave all about them peaceable and quiet) they shall be charged with nothing but with men and munition. Besides the skill of these seas and lands, and of the winds in these quarters, will be a great help unto you: whereas the enemies must needs be much troubled, for want of knowledge in them all. The decision of this council had credit given unto him on all parts, and the rather, for that he was the man himself to put in execution the same counsel. Two daies they made stay to let all things in order and readines, the third day they set forward with a fleet of a hundred sail, whereof 70 were covered the rest open and all of the smaller making and for Phoca they shaped their course, G The King hearing that the Roman Armado approached, departed from thence (for that he was not to be present in person at the conflict upon the sea) and went to Magnesia near Sipylus, for to levy land-forces. But his navy made sail to Cyssa, a port of the Erythreans, to attend the coming of the enemy there, as in a place more commodious. The Romans, when the Northern winds were once laid (for they were aloft for certain daies, and locked them in) sailed from Delos to Phoca, a haven Town of the Chians, bearing toward the Egean sea. From thence they cast about with their ships to the City, and there having victualled themselves, they crossed over to Phoca. Eumenes

Brutii, and L. Atinius Sicyus. Moreover that Consul, who was to be employed in Greece, had at his commission granted, besides that army which he should receive of M. Acilius (and those were two legions) to furnish himself with a supply of 3000 footmen, and 100 horsemen of Roman citizens; also of 5000 foot, and 200 horse of allies that were Latins: and besides granted it was in the same commission, that when he was arrived into his Province, he should pass over with his army into Asia, if he thought it so expedient for the Common-weal.

Unto the other Consul was allowed an entire whole army of new souldiers, consisting of two Roman legions, and fifteen thousand foot and six hundred horse of the Latin allies. Q. Minucius had direction (by reason that he wrote how he had performed in his Province all that there was to be done, and that the whole Nation of the Ligurians had yielded subjection) to translate his forces out of Liguria into the Boians country, and to deliver the same to P. Cornelius the Pre-consul. Out of that territory which he had taken away from them after they were vanquished, those City legions were withdrawn, which had been levied and enrolled the year before; and committed they were to the charge of M. Tuccius the Pretor, besides 15000 foot, and 6000 horse of Latine allies: and all these forces were to be employed for to defend and keep in obedience, Apulia and the Brutians country. As for A. Cornelius the Pretor of the former years, who with an army had the government of the Brutii: he was commanded to deliver unto M. Acilius (if the Consul thought it good) the legions transported over into Etolia, if he would remain there still: but if Acilius would rather return to Rome, then A. Cornelius with that army, was to remain in Etolia. Thought good it was, that C. Atinius Labeo should receive of M. Acilius, the government of Sicily and his army: and if it pleased him, to take up and enrol out of that very Province 2000 foot and 100 horse, for to supply and fill the broken companies. P. Junius Brutus had commandment to levy a new army for the government of Tuscany to wit, one Roman legion, and 10000 foot of Latine allies, and 400 horse. Also L. Emilius the Admiral, was to receive of M. Junius the Pretor of the former year, twenty Gallies, and the mariners and oars thereto belonging: and besides, to levy himself 1000 mariners more, and 2000 footmen: and with those ships and souldiers to sail into Asia, and to receive the fleet of C. Livius. As for them that were already in the government of both the Provinces of Spain and of Sardinia, they were to continue there still for one year longer, and to have the same armies at command: This year were two twents of corn levied of Sicily and Sardinia: and order was given for all the Sicilian comto be sent into Etolia to the army: but out of Sardinia, that one part should be brought to Rome, and the other transported over into Etolia, even to the same place that the other of Sicily should sail.

Before the Consuls set forward into their Provinces, it was thought meet, that the Pontifics should give order for the expiation of certain prodigies: for at Rome the Temple of Iano Lacina was smitten with lightning; so as both the lantern, yea, and the leaved dore thereof, were foully disfigured. Likewise at Puteoli, the Town walls in many places, and one gate, was blasted with lightning, and two men besides were stricken dead therewith. At Narvis it was for certain known, that the day being fair and clear, there arose a stormy tempest, wherein also two free men lost their lives. The Tullians reported, that with them it rained earth. And the men of Rates brought word, that within their territory a female mule foled. These prodigies (I say) were expiated: and the Latine festival holy-daies were celebrated anew, for that the dole of flesh was not given unto the Laurentins, which of duty should have been delivered. Moreover, a solemn supplication was ordained, in regard of all errors and faults escaped in divine service and religious observances. Also out of the books of S. Elyia, the Decemvirs declared and shewed, to what Gods, sacrifice should be made: and ten young springalls free born, and ten Virgins likewise, whole Fathers and Mothers yet lived, were employed about the misery of those sacrifices. The Decemvirs also by night sacrificed young sucklings. And P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, before he took his journey, erected an arch in the Capitol (over-against the high street that leadeth thither) with 7 gilded statues and 2 horses: and before that arch, he set up two cesterms or fountains of marble. About this time, 43 principal persons of Etolia, (among whom were Demetrius and his brother) were conveyed to Rome, by two Squadrons or cohorts sent for purpose from M. Acilius; and there were laid up fast in the prison called 'Thestone quarries': which done, the cohorts aforesaid were commanded by L. Cornelius the Consul, to make return to the army. From Ptolemus and Cleopatra (King and Queen of Egypt) there came Embassadors, testifying their joy which they conceived in the behalf of the Romans, in these terms, That M. Acilius the Consul had charged King Antiochus out of Greece, exhorting also the Romans to transport an army into Asia for that not in Asia only, but likewise in Syria, all men were smitten with fear and amazed. As for the KK. of Egypt, they would be ready to do for their parts, whatsoever the Senat should set down. Thanks were returned to the K. and Q. aforesaid, and order was taken, that to the Embassadors for a reward should be given 40000 braken Assees.

L. Cornelius the Consul, having accomplished all things to be done at Rome, published an Edict in a general assembly, That all such souldiers whom himself had enrolled for supply, as they who were with A. Cornelius in the Brutians country, should all meet at Brundisium upon the Ides of Quintilis. Moreover he nominated three Lieutenants, Sex. Digintus, L. Apollonius, and C. Fabricius Luscinus, for to gather ships together out of all the Sea-coasts into Brundisium. And when he had prepared and set all things in good order, he departed from the City, clad in his

A rich coat of arms. There preferred unto the Consul as he went forth, to the number of 9000 Roman lunatics, Romans and allies together, who had served their military years in the wars under the conduct of P. Africanus, and now were exempt from souldiery, who all offered to go with him and to be enrolled as preit souldiers. Much at the time that the Consul took his journey (during the festival Apollinarian games in the honour of Apollis, upon the first day before the Ides of July) it chanced, that in the day time when the air was clear and fair, there arose a sudden darkness during the Eclipse of the sun, by reason that the body of the moon was directly under the Circle and rundle of the sun. L. Emilius Regillus also Admiral of the war, at the same time went to Sea, L. Antiochus was charged by order from the Senat, to build 30 Gallies with five banks of oars, and 30 Gallies with three banks, because a bruit was blown and blazed abroad, that Antiochus upon these late battail at Sea, was about to prepare a much greater armada.

The Etolians, after their Embassadors were returned from Rome and had made relation, that there was no hope of peace, albeit all their Sea-coasts (especially toward Peloponnesus) were besieged and waited by the Achians, yet minding more their peril to enlure, than remembering their loss received, seized the mountain Corax, intending to impeach and stop the passage of the Romans. For they made no question nor doubt, but that the next spring they would return to besiege and assault Naupactum. Acilius, who with well what they expected, thought it better to get in hand with an enterprise unlooked for, and namely, to assail Lamia: for thus he thought. Thus seeing they had been already brought to a great strait and extremity by King Philip: now they might be taken suddenly and surprised at unwarres, because they stood in fear of nothing less. Whereupon, removing from Elatus, he encamped first in the country of his enemies near to the River Spercheus: from whence by night he dislodged, and advanced forth with his engines, and by the day broke forth: he inveted their walls round about. Great fear and hurly there was, as in an accident unlooked for: yet all that day they defended the City more resolutely than a man would have believed and thought they could have done in so sudden a danger: whilst men stood at defence upon the walls, women set up ladders in many places, and brought the men weapons and garb of all sort: yea, and Hones up to the walls unto them. Acilius, after he had sounded the retreat, brought back his men into the camp about noon: and after they had there refreshed their bodies with meat and rest, he gave them warning (before he dismissed the Prætorium) that ere day-light the next morning they should be ready in arms: for that he would not come back again with them into the camp, before they were masters of the Town. At the same time as the day before, he gave assault in many places: and for as much as the Townsmen strength decayed, their darts and weapons failed, and above all, their hearts fainted, within few hours he won the City. After he had made a riddance of the pillage, sold some part, and given away the rest, he fell to take counsel what to do afterwards. There was not one man of opinion to go against Naupactum, considering that the Etolians held and kept the pals of Corax. Howbeit Acilius, to the end that he would not keep the field in summer without doing some exploits, and that the Etolians might not enjoy that peace by the slackness of the Roman souldiers, which obtain they could not at the Senat hand, he purposed to besiege Amphissa: and to the army was conducted thither from Heraclea, by the mountain Oeta. When he had encamped himself under the Town walls, he began to invest it round with men as he did Lamia, but with ordnance and engines to batter it. In many places at once he ran with the ram against the walls: and albeit they were shaken, the Townsmen went not about either to make ready, or to devise and invent any means of defence against that instrument or engine. All their hope was in trutty armour and hard valour. And so often they sallied forth, that they disordered and troubled not only the guards of the enemies, but also those that attended about the fabricks and artillery. Howbeit, in many places the wall was battered and breaches made: and even at that very instant news came unto him, that his successor had landed his army at Apollonia, and was coming by the way of Epirus and Thessaly. Now came the Consul with a power of 12000 foot, and five hundred horse. And by this time was he passed as far as to the vale and level of Males: and having sent certain afore to summon the City Hydruntum, and received answer again, that they would do nothing but by a publick decree of the Etolians: because the siege of Hydruntum should not lay him, and Amphissa not yet won, he led his forces against it, and sent his brother Africanus before. Ere they came, the Oppidan had quit the Town, for by this time the wall in many places lay open and naked, and were all armed and unarmed into a Castle which they had, impregnable. The Consul pitched his camps six miles from the Town.

Thither arrived the Athenian Embassadors, and first they repaired to P. Scipio, who as we have said, was gone before the main army, and afterwards to the Consul, intreating for the Etolians. Of the twain they received a gentler answer at the hands of Africanus, who (seeking some honest occasion to leave the Etolian war, set his heart and eye wholly upon Asia and King Antiochus: and to this purpose he willed the Athenians to persuade not only with the Romans but also with the Etolians, to prefer peace before war. And speedily, through the motion and perswasion of the Athenians there was a solemn embassage of the Etolians dispatched from Hydruntum. Induced "they were the rather to hope for peace by the speech of Africanus (for to him they came first)" "who discoursed unto them, how that many Nations and Cities in Spain first, afterwards in "Africa", had put themselves under his protection, and in them all he had left generous testimonies "of his clemency and bounty, than of his warlike valour and martial prowels. Thus they had brought Polyxenidas still by false semblance encouraged the error and vain imaginations of Pausanistratus: for his ships indeed he drew land and laid up dry; and as if he meant to hale up more; he repaired and amended the docks. Oremen and mariners he sent not forth out of their winter harbours to go to Ephebus; but secretly assembled them to Magnesia. Now it fortuned that a certain soldier serving under King Antiochus, who was come to Samos about some private affairs of his own, was apprehended there for a spy, and brought to Pausanistratus before the Admiral Pausanistratus. Who being demanded what he did at Ephebus: I know not whether for fear; or upon small loyalty that he bare to his Prince and country, discovered all: namely, that the fleet rid in the haven rigged, decked and trimmed in readiness: Items, that all the rowers and mariners were sent to Siphia in Magnesia: Items, that some vessels, and those very few were drawn up to land, and the docks and harbours were shut up close: and lastly, that never at any time before, the navy was so carefully looked unto, nor Sea-affairs so well managed. But the mind of Pausanistratus was so carefully I before, with foolish conceits and vain hopes, that he would not believe their informations and intelligences for true. Polyxenidas having let all things forward and in good readiness, by night sent for the rowers and mariners from Magnesia: and having in great haste shot to Sea, and let afloat those vessels which lay at one side upon the land, after he had spent the whole day, not to much in making provision, as in telling out the time on set purpose, because he would not have the fleet to be seen when it set forth, weighed anchor and loosed after the sun was gone down: and with 70 sail of covered ships, because he had a contrary wind, entered the Bay of Pyrga before day, where resting all the livelong day for the same purpose as before, the next night he sailed to the secret coasts of Samos. From whence he gave commandment to one Nicanor an Archiprator to set sail for Palmyra, with five close covered ships, there to land; and from thence to march with his armed souldiers over the fields the nearest way to Panormus, and to come upon the back of the enemies: himself in the mean while divided his fleet into two parts, and made way to Panormus, there to keep the entry and mouth of the haven on both sides. Pausanistratus at first was troubled for a while at this unexpected occurrent: but afterwards, as one that was an old bearded souldier, he quickly took heart again, and calling his wits together, supposed that he might more easily repulse the enemies by Land than by Sea: and led his souldiers in two Squadrons unto the prison-tories which bearing out into the Sea like two horns, to force the haven: from which two capes or heads he supposed, that he might easily let back and put by the enemies with shooting darts from both sides. But Nicanor who was sent by Land, impeached this design of his, so that he was forced suddenly to change his mind and alter that counsell, and therefore commanded all his men to go a shipboard and away. Hereupon exceeding fear there was both among the souldiers and also the mariners, as if they were to take their flight by Sea and not to fight, seeing themselves environed at once both by Land and Sea. Pausanistratus supposing the only way to escape and save themselves, was to make way through the mouth of the haven, and so to recover the room: after he had seen all his men embarked, commanded the rest to follow, and himself first flying and labouring hard with oars, scudded again with his ship to the entrance of the haven. Now when she was once past the freight and come into the open Sea, Polyxenidas was there to welcome him with three Galeaces of five banks of oars, and so to belest him. The poor ship was wounded with the iron pikes bearing out in the beak heads of the Galeaces, and so bouged and sunk withal. The defendants upon the hatches were overwhelmed with shot of darts, and among the rest, Pausanistratus himself manfully fighting lost his life. The rest of the ships were boarded and taken, some before the haven, others within: and some there were that by Nicanor were seized as they laboured to loose from the land, and to lanch forth. Five ships only of Rhodes, and two of Cous, escaped dead and fled, which made themselves way even among the thickest of their enemies, by the means of a fearful burning flame of fire that they had with them. For they let me two long perches or poles bearing forward at the prow, like two spire-sails, in every ship, carrying iron pots and pans aloft them full of light fire. The Gallies of Erythrae, meeting the Rhodian ships not far from Samos as they fled, the which were coming to help them, turned their course backward into Hellepontus, unto the Romans. About the same time Selenus gained the City of Phocaea by treason, entering in at a gate which the wardens let open of purpose for him. And for fear, Cyme and other Towns of that coast revolted unto him.

Whiles these things thus passed in Aeolia, and that Abydus had endured the siege for certain dayes by the defence of the Kings garrison that manned the walls: now that all were overtold and wearied, the Magistrats of the City (by the permission of Philotas Captain of the garrison) aridged with Livius upon conditions to render the Town. The only point whereupon they stood, and which stayed the conclusion, was this, for that they could not agree whether the Kings souldiers should be sent away armed or disarmed. And whiles they debated hereabout, news came of the Rhodians defeat, and so the opportunity of gaining the Town slipped out of their hands. For Livius fearing, lest Polyxenidas pushed up with the success of so great an exploit, would surprise the fleet that rid at Cane, leaving presently the siege before Abydus, and the gading of Hellepontus, put to Sea afresh those ships that lay dry at Cane, and Eumenes came to Elea: But Livius went to Phocaea with all his fleet, to which he had adjoynd two tireme gallies of Mitylene. But when he heard he had pilld the sea-coast, and charged hastily his ships with a good booty, & those were prizes of men especially, he stayed no longer there than until Eumenes might overtake him with his fleet, but directed his course straight to Samos. The Rhodians upon the first news of this their overthrow, feared much, and withal mightily followed: for besides the loss of their Sea-souldiers and ships, they lost also the very flour and strength of their youth: for almost as many young Gentlemen of their nobility, accompanied Pausanistratus, among other motives, in regard of his authority, which was right great and for good desert among his country-men. But afterwards considering how treacherously they were over-wrought, and namely, by one of their own citizens, born among them, their melancholy turned into choler, and their sorrow into anger. Whereupon they sent forth ten ships immediately, and few dayes after other ten, under the conduct of Eudemus the Admiral over them all: who albeit he were not for other fears of arms and martial skill equal to Pausanistratus, yet they supposed verily he would be a leader to much the more wary and circum-spect, as he was the less hardy and courageous. The Romans and King Eumenes first fell with the land Erythrae, where they stayed one night, and the morrow after gained the point of Corycus, a promontory of the Teians. From whence when they purposed to cross over to the nearest parts of Samos, not waiting for the sun-rising, by which the Pilots might observe the disposition of the weather, they hoiled up sails against a very doubtful and dangerous tempest: for the wind turned from North-east to full North, as they were in the mids of their course, whereby they began to be mightily tossed among the surging billows of the rough and angry Sea. Polyxenidas supposing that the enemies would take their course directly to Samos, there to join with the Rhodian fleet, departed from Ephebus, and first anchored at Mynesus: from thence he sailed to an Island called Maecius, to the end that as the enemies fleet failed by, he might take advantage to let upon either some ships singled and severed from the body of the fleet, or play upon the tail and rear-gard thereof. After that he perceived the whole fleet to be dispersed by force of the tempest, he thought first to take that occasion to fall upon them: but the wind rising till more and more, and raising greater waves, because he saw he could not possibly come near to board them, he cut over to the land Ephialtes minding the next day to assail the ships in the main Sea as they passed to Samos. Some small number of the Roman ships in the beginning of the night put into the haven of Samia, which they found void and empty: the rest of the fleet after they had been tossed and tossed all the night long in the deep, at length light upon the same harbor. Where being advertised by the peasants of the country, that the enemies ships lay in the rode of Athalie, they fell so consult, whether presently to bid battail and put it to the hazard, or expect the arrival of the Rhodian fleet. Deliering therefore that enterprise (for so upon advertisement they were agreed) they travelled to Corycus, from whence they came. Polyxenidas likewise, having laid at anchor in vain returned to Ephebus: and then the Roman ships, while the Seas were thus clear of enemies, sailed over to Samos. Thither also arrived the Rhodian fleet few dayes after: and that it might appear how long looked for it was, they all presently let sail for Ephebus, with purpose either to try an issue by a battel at Sea, or else if the enemy refused the trial, to exprels and wring from him a plain confession of cowardice: which was a material point and of great importance to move the minds of the other neighbour-cities. Being arrived to the very haven mouth, they embattailed their ships and stood directly affront opposed unto it. And when they saw none make sail nor set out against them, the one part thereof rode afloat at anchor still in the very haven mouth: the other discharged the souldiers and let them a land. Upon whom (as they were driving a mighty booby which they had raised by foraging all the country over) Andronicus a Macedonian, who lay in garrison at Ephebus, sallied forth, even as they approached the walls of the City: and having called them of a great part of their prey aforesaid, he chased them to the Sea unto their ships. The morrow after, the Romans having bestowed an ambush about the mid-way between, marched in order of battail against the City, to see if peradventure they could train forth the Macedonian again without the walls: but perceiving that no man durst come abroad for suspicion and fear of an await, they returned to their ships again: and when they saw their enemies would not abide them neither at Sea nor on Land, in the end the fleet sailed again to Samos from whence it came. Thence the Pretor made out two Gallies of Italian confederates, and as many Rhodians under the conduct of Epicrates the Rhodian Admiral, to defend and keep the streights of Cephalenia, which Hirpinus the Lacedaemonian together with the youth of the Cephalens, infested with his roving and robbing in so much as there could no ships pass by Sea to and fro with victuals between Italy and that coast. At Pyraeus Epicrates met with L. Aemilius Regillus coming to succeed in the Admiralty: who hearing of the defeat of the Rhodians, and having himself but two Quinqueme Gallies, brought Epicrates back with him into Asia with four ships. There accompanied them the Galeaces, brought Epicrates back with him into Asia with four ships. Thither also arrived the open ships of the Athenians, and he passed over by the Sea Agæum. Thither also arrived Timalcater the Rhodian in the dead of the night with two Quadrime gallies from Samos, Who being brought unto Eumilius, declared how he was sent to quiet and defend that Sea-coast, which the Kings roving ships and men of war by their often excursions from Hellepontus and Agæum, had made too hot for the Hulks and other ships of burden which used to pass that way. As Eumilius failed from Chios to Samos, two Rhodian Quadrime Gallies were sent by Livius to meet him and King Eumenes also with two Quinqueme galleaces presented himself unto him. Being all arrived at Samos, Eumilius after he had received the navy of Livius, and sacrificed orderly as the manner was, called a council. At which C. Livius (for his opinion was asked first) spake and said, "That no man giveth more sound and faithful counsel than he, who perdweth another man to that which himself would do in the same case. As for me, my intent and purpose was, to

"withdraw your fleet and army? or rather wait and expect to know the Consul his mind; and advise, the Senate pleasure and ordinance, and the general assent of the people in that behalf; it remaineth then after that is done, that you stay still in Asia, and that your forces being brought back again into their wintering harbours, (after they have done with warfare) fall to consume and eat out our allies, by charging them with provision of victuals: and afterwards, if it shall please the higher powers, and those that are in authority so to ordain, we must begin to war anew, which now we are able (if we lack not the time, nor stop the forward course wherein we are) before winter come, with the favor and power of the Gods, to finish and bring to a full end. This advice took place; and answer was returned unto Antiochus, that there could be no treaty of peace before the Consul his coming. Antiochus having thus in vain sought his peace, when he had first foraged and wasted the territory of Elaea, and afterwards of Pergamus, left his son Seleucus there, and went himself in person to Adramyttium, pillaging and spoiling all the way as he journeyed, in all kind of hostility. Now this territory is a rich country, called The champion plains of Thebe: much renowned by the Poet Homer in his poems; and in no one place besides of all Asia got the Kings soldiers a greater booty and more pillage. Thither arrived also Adramyttium both Eryllus and Eumenes (having for a compals by sea) for the defence of the said City. During this time, they sent for a thousand foot, and a hundred horse out of Achaia to come unto Elaea: all which forces were commanded by Captain Diophanes. So soon as they were disembarked and landed, there were ready to receive them certain men sent from Attalus of purpose to meet them, who by night conducted them to Pergamus. They were all old soldiers, and well experienced in fears of war; and their leader Diophanes had been brought up and trained under Philip the great, the greatest warrior in those days of all the Greeks, who took but two days to rest his horse and men, and to take view of the enemies guards, namely, in what places and at what time they used customably either to come forward, or to retire. The Kings soldiers were approached almost to the very foot of the hill, where the City is situate. By means whereof they might forage behind at their will, and there was not one issued out of the City so much as to take a dart also against the corps de guard of the enemies. After they were once so near discoverers, that they were fain to keep themselves close within the walls, the Kings soldiers without began first to contemn, and afterwards to neglect them. Many of them had not their horses so much as saddled and bridled, and some few were left in arms and in ordinance of battle: the rest were gone aside and spread over all parts of the champaign: some went to play and took themselves to youthful sports and wanton riot: others fell to feeding, pampering their bellies, and making good cheer under covert shade, and many were laid along asleep. Diophanes beheld all this manner hereof aloft from an high turret of the City Pergamus, and presently gave commandment to his soldiers to take arms and to be ready at the gate. Himself went to Attalus, and told him, that he purposed to assail the enemies corps de guard. Attalus (although he were very loth) gave him leave: for he saw full well, that he was to fight with one hundred horse against three hundred: and one thousand foot against four thousand. Being out of the gate, he sat him down not far from the enemies corps de guard, waiting when some good opportunity and occasion would offer itself. Both they within Pergamus of one side, deemed this to be folly rather than hardiness; and also the enemies on the other side making towards them for a while, and perceiving them not to stir, altered nothing of their usual negligence, and that which more was, made a mockery and scorn of their small number. Diophanes kept his men still a good time, as if he had brought them forth only for a shew, to see and to be seen: but after he perceived once the enemies to be disbanded out of their ranks and ranges, he commanded the footmen to make all the hast they could after, whilst himself leading the way first among his horsemen, ran with his whole troop upon the spur as hard as ever he could, and letting up a shout and cry aloud on all hands, as well with foot as horse, charged suddenly upon the enemies guards, ere they were aware of them. Man and horse both were greatly scared: and the horses especially having broken their collars and halters wherewith they stood tied, made foul work and much trouble among their own party. Some few of the horses kept their standing still unafrighted, and even those that had much ado to saddle, to bridle, and to mount upon; with so great a terror came the Achaeans, and with much more than so small a number could be thought to make. And as for the footmen in order arrayed and well provided, they fell upon those that were negligently dispersed abroad, ere they looked for them, and in manner half asleep. Great execution and butchery was committed upon them all the fields over, and they fell a main. Diophanes, having followed the chase as they ran away in scattering wise, so far as he might well with safety of himself, returned to the guard and defence of the City, having won great honor to the nation of the Achaeans by this exploit: for not only the men, but women also beheld this service, and looked on him from the walls of Pergamus. The next day after, the Kings Corps de guard were better ordered and kept closer together yet, and retired half a mile farther from the City, where they encamped themselves. The Achaeans likewise much about the same time advanced to the very same place. Many hours together they looked one upon another who would begin first, expecting every minute when the charge should be given. But after the sun was near going down, and that it was time to return into the camp, they of the Kings part began to ruffle their ensignes and guidons together, and set forward with their bands, ordered in manner of a march for the way, more like than marshalled troops to fight a battail, Diophanes sat still so long as they were within sight: but then he charged upon their rearward,

A mind, with as great violence and fury, as the day before, and put them again into so great affright and trouble, that they gave them leave to wound them on their backs, and not one would stay to make head and resist, but trembling for fear, and hardly keeping the order of a march, they were beaten into their camp. This boldness of the Achaeans forced Seleucus to dislodge and remove out of the territory of Pergamus.

Antiochus after he heard say that the Romans and Eumenes were come to the defence of Adramyttium, medled no more with the town itself, but after he had laid the fields waste, departed from thence, and forced Persea, a Colony of the Mityleneans. As for Coton and Coryllus, Aphrodisias and Pryne, they were won at the first assault, and so he returned to Sardis by Thyatira. Seleucus remaining still upon the sea-coasts, as he affrighted some, so he defended others. The Roman fleet together with Eumenes and the Rhodians sailed hither to Mitylene, and back again from thence, returned to Elaea from whence she came. So they held on their course to Phocaea, and fell with an Island called Bacchus, situate above the City of the Phocaeans: and after they had pillaged and spoiled by way of hostility the Temples, which heretofore they had forborn, and taken away the Images (for the Island was magnificently adorned and beautified therewith) they crossed over to the City itself, which they assailed in divers quarters, according as they had divided their forces into three parts: but seeing that it might not be won with bare scaling and strength of arms, without planting engines of battery and other fabrics: and besides, that three thousand armed men sent from Antiochus for defence, were entered into the City, presently they gave over the siege, and the fleet retired to the Islands, having done no other exploit, but only pillaged the territory about the City.

This done, it was thought good that Eumenes should have licence to depart into his own kingdom, that he might provide for the Consul and the army all necessities toward the passage over Hellespontus: also that the Roman and Rhodian fleets should return to Samos, and there remain inguard, and have an eye unto Polyxenidas, lest he removed from Ephesus and made some attempt that way. So, the King returned to Elaea, the Romans and Rhodians to Samos, where M. Annius the Praetor his brother departed this life. The Rhodians, after his funeral obsequies performed, failed to Rhodes with thirteen ships of their own, one quinquerem galeace of Cons, and the other of Guidos, there to lie in rode, ready to make head against the fleet, which as the storm blazed, was aloft and coming out of Syria. Two daies before that Endamius loosed from Samos with the Armado, thirteen ships sent from Rhodes under the conduct of Admirall Pamphilus to encounter the said Syriack fleet, taking with them four other ships, which were for the guard of Caria, delivered from siege Dadaia, and other petty forts which the Kings soldiers assailed. Then it was advised that Endamius should incontinently set forward on his voyage. And to that fleet which he had under his charge, he adjoynded also four open ships. Being departed, he made sail in all haste that he possibly could, and arrived at the port called Mesippe: where he overtook those that were gone before: from whence they came in one band and train joyntly together unto Phaselis, and then they judged it the best way, in that place to attend the coming of the enemy. This Phaselis Randeth upon the confines between Lycia and Pamphylia. It lieth far within the sea. It is the first land that sheweth itself to them that sail from Cilicia to Rhodes: and from thence a man may ken and discover ships under sail afar off: for which cause especially, this was chosen for a fit and convenient place, wherein they might encounter the enemies fleet. But by reason the air was unwholsome, and the season of the year unhealthful (for it was midsummer) and the smells and stinking favaours such as they had not been acquainted with; many contagious diseases and maladies which they foresaw not, began to spread commonly abroad, and especially among the mariners: for fear of which plague and mortality, they departed from thence, and passed beyond the gulph of Pamphylia: and being arrived in the river Erymudon, they received advertisement from the Alpendians, that the enemies were already before Sida. Those of the Kings side had failed but slowly in regard of the adverse season of the winds named * Etesiae, which kept their set and certain time, like as those do which they call * Favonii. Now of the Rhodians there were 32 quadrigeme Gallies, and 4 other triremes besides. The Kings fleet consisted of 37 and those of greater burden and bulk: among which were three mighty Gallieaces of 7 banks of oars on a side, and four of 6, besides 10 ordinary trirreme gallies. There were others also that knew by a sentinell or watch-tower standing on a certain high place, how the enemies were at hand. The next morning by break of day both these fleets set forth of the haven, as if they would have fought that very day. And after that the Rhodians had passed the cape, which from Sida hangs over into the sea, then presently were they discovered of the enemies, and the enemies likewise descried by them. The left wing of the Kings fleet, flanked with the main sea, was commanded by Annibal: and Apollonius one of his gallants and courtiers led the right: so as now they had ranged their ships broad in a front-rank. The Rhodians advanced forward ordered in length and calling their battell into files. In the vanguard the Admirall ship of Endamius was foremost; Carystus governed the rereguard; and Pamphilus had the conduct of the middle ward. Endamius seeing the enemies battell arrayed and ready for conflict, put forth into the open sea, commanding those that followed after in order to keep their array, and to directly affront the enemy: which at the first required some trouble, for he was not so far advanced into the deep, that all the ships could be set in array along the land side: and besides, himself making too much haste, with five ships only encountered Annibal, for the rest followed not after him, because they were bidden to range about. Now the reward had no room left them toward the land: and thus without they hastily were jumbled together, the fight by that time was begun in the right wing against Antibal. But at one instant the Rhodians cast off all fear, as well in regard of the goodness of their ships, as of their own experience and usual practice in service at sea. For their ships with great quickness and agility making fall into the main sea, made room for every one that came after along the land side: and withal, if any one hapned to run upon a ship of the enemies with her piked beak head, either it rent the prow, or wiped away the oars, or passing clear through, between the ranks and files turned again and charged upon the poop. But the thing which terrified the enemy most was this, That a great galleace of the Kings which had seven banks of oars on a side, was boughed and took a leak with one only knock, that it received by a Rhodian ship far less: whereupon the right wing of the enemy doublets inclined to flee away. But Antibal pressed Eudamius very much in the open sea, most of all with multitude of ships: for otherwise in all respects Eudamius had the odds and better hand of him by far: and certainly he had compassed and enclosed Eudamius round, but that a flag was put out of the Admirall, (by which signall the dispersed ships are wont to rally themselves together:) whereupon all those that had got the better of the enemy in the right wing, made haste to joyn in one for to succour their fellows. Then Antibal also and the ships about him, took their flight: but the Rhodians were not able to make way after them and to maintain the chase, by reason that the rowers many of them were sick, and therefore the sooner weary. Whereupon they cast anchor in the main sea, and laid to rest and take some refection for to strengthen their bodies. And in this while Eudamius surprised and beheld the enemies how they haled and towed by ropes at the tail of the open ships (that were only with oars) certain other which were lame, maimed, sore bruised, and cracked: and might see so others not much sounnder than they, to leave the rest and depart: whereupon calling an Opti and silence to be made from an high turret in the fore-castle of the Admirall, arise they heare (alth he) and see a pleasant sight yonder and a goodly spectacle. So they all arose at once and beheld how the enemies were afraid and what poor shift they made in haste to flee, and with one voice they all in a manner cried out to follow after and pursue them. Now Eudamius his own ship was shaken in many places and sore bruised: whereupon he commanded Pamphilides and Charidides to make way after them, to far forth as they thought they might without danger. And for a good time they held them in chase: but seeing Antibal approaching near the shore and fearing lest the wind would lock them within the enemies coast, they returned toward Eudamius, and drew along with them the great galleace which they took and which at the first encounter was pierced, and with much ado trained it to Phaselis. From thence they retired themselves to Rhodes, not joyous for this victory, as blaming one another that they had not either sunk or taken the whole fleet of the enemies, having so good means as they had to do it. Antibal daunted with this one unfortunate battell, durst not even then pass along the river of Lycia, but desired to joyn unto the old fleet of the Kings as soon as possibly he could, to impeach him for effecting that the Rhodians let out Charidides and twenty war ships with piked stems, toward Patara and the Port of Myrsis: and commanded Eudamius to return unto the Romans to Samos with seven of the tallest ships in all the fleet whereof he had the command: to the end, that he might induce the Romans with his counsell and advice, yea, and with all the countenance and authority that he had, for them to lay siege unto Patara and to assault it. The Romans took great joy and contentment, first at the news and report of this victory, and afterwards at the return of the Rhodians. And it seemed if that one City stood not in their way to flay them, and that they were once rid of that care, they would without any let and impeachment, make all the sea coasts sure enough for any danger and damage from those quarters. But because Antiochus was departed from Sardis, the Romans held them back, and would not suffer them to abandon the guard and defence of Eolis and Ionis, for lest the Cities upon the sea-side might be surpris'd. And so they lent Pamphilides with four covered ships to the fleet that lay about Patara.

Antiochus gathered together not only the garrisons and aids of all the Cities that were about him, but also addressed his Embassadors with letters to Prusias the King of Bithynia, wherein he gave out hard words of the Romans for their passage into Asia: namely, "That their coming only was for this, to demolish, put down, and overthrow all kingdoms, and to set up the only Roman Empire that none else might stand in the whole world. That Philip and Nabis already were subdued and deposed and now himself was to make the third, against whom they were come. And that they would they make an end there but go on still, like a continual fire that burneth forward, and take all afore them, and ever as they vanquished one, proceed to another that is next. And no doubt, they would make a bridge of him to pass onward into Bithynia, now that Emenius hath gently taken upon his neck the yoke of voluntary servitude. Prusias was somewhat touched with these letters, but when there came others written from Scipio the Consul, and his brother Africanus, especially, he was wholly averted from entertaining any such suspicion. For Africanus besides the continual custom that the people of Rome had, to advance and amplify the Majesty of KK, their allies and confederates with all kind of honour, alledged for his part, the domestic examples of their own house and family: inducing Prusias thereby to enter into a desire to win his love and friendship. For he discours'd and said, "That those Princes and petty KK in Spain, whom he had received into his protection, he left behind him when he went away, mighty monarchs, that he not only had placed & established Masaniassa in his fathers realm & throne, but but sealed him in the kingdom also of Syphax, who before had chased & expelled him: so as now he was not only the richest potentate and most wealthy K, of all Africa, but also for majesty & puissant forces a paragon equal to any other K, in the whole world. As for Philip and Nabis, & enemies they were and vanquished by L. Quinctius, howbeit they remained KK, afterwards within their own Realms. And Philip verily the year that is past, had his tribute forgiven him and his son an hostage delivered unto him: yea, and some Cities without the dominion of Macedony, have received them as their K, and the Roman Generals have winked therat and been contented. And surely Nabis had been likewise graced and honoured, but for his own peevish folly and the treacherous fallhood afterwards of the Stolians, which was his utter undoing and overthrow. But the chief thing of all that most confirmed the mind of K. Prusias, was the coming of Livius unto him in embassage from Rome, he, who before time in quality of Prator, had been Admiral of the navy. Who shewed and declared unto him, how the hope of victory was much more assured to the Romans than to K. Antiochus: and withall how the Romans would be the faster and surer friend of the twain, yea, and make more conscience of keeping amity.

Antiochus being put besides all hope of the association with Prusias, departed to Ephesus from Sardis, to that and see the fleet, which for certain months had been rigged and in readiness: and this he did the rather, because he saw that he could not hold out with the Roman army and the two Scipios the commanders thereof, than for that his sea-service in itself at any time before sped well, or could assure him now of great and certain success. Yet some little dram he had of good hope for the present, in that his intelligence was, that a great part of the Rhodian fleet was about Cyprus, and King Emenius also with all his own ships departed into Hellepontus, to meet with the Consul. Besides this, in some measure his spirit was puffed up with the remembrance, how the Rhodian Armado had been defeated at Samos, by a cautious plot and practice contrived beforehand. Having laid these conceits for a ground, he sent Polyxenidas away with his navy, to hazard the fortune of a battell in some sort or other (it made no matter how:) whilst himself in person led his whole army to Notium (a town of the Colophonians, seated upon the sea, and distant about two miles from the ancient City Colophon.) The City it self he had a good mind to conquer and bring in subjection unto him: for, being so near unto Ephesus as it was, there could not any thing be done either by sea or land, but it was within the eye of the Colophonians, and by their means notified (straightwaies to the Romans. Now he made full account that they would remove their fleet from Samos to succour that assailable City of theirs, and so Polyxenidas might thereby take his time and good opportunity to execute some notable exploit. Whereupon he went in hand to plant fabrics against Colophon, and having raised his rampiers, and cast trenches on both sides also, even to the very sea, he approached with mantlets and terraces, as well the one part as the other, close unto the walls, and under the roof-works, laid upon them with the push & force of the ram. The Colophonians much troubled and affrighted with these dangers and distresses, sent their Orators to Samos unto L. Emilius, to crave in humble manner the aid and succour of the Prator and people of Rome. Emilius was much discontented and offended in his heart, that he had made so long abode at Samos and performed no service. Nothing less thought he than that Polyxenidas, whom twice already in vain he had challenged and bidden battell, would now offer to fight. He perceived it also for a disgrace and shameful indignity unto him, that Emenius his fleet should the Consul to wait for the legions into Asia, and himself was assigned and enjoined to succour and aid the City of Colophon besieged, the issue whereof would be so doubtful and uncertain. Eudamius the Rhodian, who was the man that had derained and kept him still at Samos, when he was desirous to pass over into Hellepontus, yea, & all the rest were instant with him, shewing and declaring how much better it was, either to deliver his allies from siege, or to defeat the fleet again, which had been once vanquished, and so to put the enemy quite besides the possession of the sea: than with the abandoning of his confederates, and betraying Asia both sea and land into the hands of Antiochus, to depart into Hellepontus (where Emenius with his fleet was sufficient to hold him play) and to quit that part of the war which was committed to his charge. Well they looked from Samos to provide victuals for that all their own provision was spent, & shaped themselves to cross over unto Chios. That was the garner and storehouse of the Romans, and the very place unto which all the ships of burden, and the hulks sent out of Italy, used to set sail and direct their course. So they set a compass about, toward the coast of the Island that lay farthest off from the City, opposite to the Northeast, in regard of Chios and Erythraea. And as they were about to pass over thither, the Prator was certified by letters, that great store of corn was come out of Italy to Chios: that the ships which were charged with wine, were kept back by contrary and cross winds. Likewise, reported it was, that the Teyans had furnished King Antiochus his fleet with victuals plentifully and liberally, and had promised also unto him five thousand vessels of wine. Whereupon he shifted still suddenly in the midst of his direct course, and made head for Tenis, intending either with their good wills to serve himself of the provision prepared for the enemy, or else to hold them for no better than enemies. Having directed the prows of their ships toward the land, they might descry, as it were, fifteen ships near unto Myonisia, which the Prator supposing at the first to be of the Kings fleet, resolved to make way after them: but afterwards it appeared, they were brigantines or pinnaces, and certain small barks of rowers and men of war. These rovers having harried and spoiled all the maritime coasts of the Chians, were upon their return with great store of prizes and pillage: but when they discovered a fleet in the deep sea far off, they made all the sail they could, and fled. Yare of steerage they were and of good of sail, by reason that their vessels were more light, and made of purpose to rid way, and besides nearer they were to land. And therefore they had recovered Myonessus, before the fleet could come any thing near unto them. The Prator thinking verily to force them out of the haven made after without direction of a skillful pilot, and knowledge of the place. Now this Myonessus is a promontory or cape between Teios and Samos, a very mountain made in fashion of a steep broad enough at the foot, but rising narrower fill, and runneth up to the top sharp pointed. On the main or land side it hath one passage by a straight and narrow path. From the sea it is founded upon rocks, beaten and eaten with the continual furling waves of the sea, in some places in some places the cliffs that hang over, bear more into the sea than the vessels that lie under the harbor, take up of the sea. The Prator with his ships durst not approach near unto those crags, for fear of being within the flout of the pirates, who were perched upon the top of those steep rocks, and to they spent that day and lay off. At the last, a little before night they gave over that vain enterprise without effect, and the morrow after arrived at Teios; and having lodged their ships within the harbor, which themselves call Geraethum, (and it lieth out at the back side of the City) the Prator let ashore, and sent out his souldiers to forage the territory about the City. The Teians seeing how their lands were spoiled even under their very noses, addressed certain Orators to the Roman Admiral arraigned all in white, after the manner of humble suppliants. And as they would have seemed to excuse their City, for having done or said any thing against the Romans tending to hostility; he both charged them directly that they had relieved the fleet of the enemies with victuals, and also told them what quantity of wine moreover they had promised to Polyxenidas. But and if they could be content to do the like by the Roman fleet, he would recall his souldiers from pillage, otherwise he would repute them for his enemies. The Embassadors aforesaid made relation of this heavy answer. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City assembled the people together, for to consult and conclude about this matter what they were best to do. Thither as it happened, was Polyxenidas arrived with the Kings Armado; who having looked from Cerlephon, when he heard that the Romans were departed from Samos, that they had chased the Pirates as far as Myonessus, and were now waiting and harrying the lands of the Teians, also that their ships anchored in the rode Geraethum, himself also cast anchor over against Myonessus, hard by an Island which the Gailers and mariners call Macris, in a secret bay hard by, escounting and clying from this near harbor, what the enemies did and intended. And at the first in good hope he was to discomfit and defeat the Roman fleet, like as he had beforetime the Rhodian Armado near unto Samos, by seizing the mouth of the haven, and empeaching their issue forth. For this bay was in all respects like unto the other, lying just between two Capes which meet so near, and in manner enclose the mouth thereof, that hardly two ships at once can go forth together. And to this purpose Polyxenidas intended in the night season to take possession, and make himself sure of the said straits, there to place ten galleies under either Cape, which standing there at a vantage should from both points flank the broad sides of his enemies ships in their going forth; and withall out of his other vessels to disburk and land armed souldiers, like as he had done at Parosmus, and so at once to assail them both by sea and land, and make an end of them for all. Which designment of his no doubt had taken effect, but that the Romans, after that the Teians had promised them to do whatsoever they should command, thought it more commodious for the receiving of their provision of victuals, to pass with their ships unto the other harbor which was before the City, to the open sea. Some say that Eudamius the Rhodian, shewed the inconvenience and discommodity of the other harbor, by occasion that two galleies fortuned in that strait to be so intangled, that they brake one anothers oars with jussling together. And among other motives the Prator was induced to change the harbor, because from the land side there he should lie within danger, considering that Antiochus himself was encamped not far off. Thus the fleet being brought about close to the City side the souldiers and mariners (without the knowledge of any commanders) were disembarked for to dispose & dispense the victuals and wine especially to every ship. But about noon-tide a certain peal of the country chanced to be brought before the Prator, who gave intelligence, That there was a fleet of ships which two daies already rode at anchor under the Island Macris; and that but a while ago, certain vessels of them were seen to weigh anchor, as if they would hoise up sail and be gone. The Prator moved at this sudden occurrence, commanded the trumpets to sound the alarm, and to give knowledge and warning, that in case any were straggling abroad in the fields, they should retire. The Colonels he sent into the City to gather the souldiers together, and the mariners, that they might repair to ship-board. This alarm caused great a trouble and confusion, as usually is seen in a sudden scarefire, or when a City is surprised by the enemies. Here was kudding into the City to recall their fellows; there was running out of the City to recover their ships; not knowing who commanded, by reason of the dissonant noise of men and sound of trumpet; howbeit, as hap was, at length they ran all toward the ships, but in such a hurly-burly and disorder that they scarcely knew their own vessels; if they did, they could hardly for the crowd and press, get thither, and embark themselves. Neither had this affright passed clear without danger both by sea and land, but that Amphilus gave direction to every one what to do, and put out of the haven first himself with the Admiral ship into the open sea, & there received every vessel as they followed one after another in their order, & ranged them all affront: and Amphilus also with the Rhodian fleet had not staid at the shore to see good order, that the

A souldiers might be let aboard without hurrying in wastful haste, and every ship go forth as it was fitted and made ready. By this means both the closeness of the vanguard were arranged in the sight of the Prator, and the Rhodians also kept their order in the vanguard in such sort, as they put themselves into the open sea in as good array, as if they had seen the Kings fleet under sail. But they were between the two promontories, Myonessus and Corymbus, before they did reach the enemy. The Kings Armado came forward in long files, two and two in a rank, who displayed and spread themselves also affront towards the wing in such wise, that they might be able to compass and enclose the right wing of the enemy. Which Eudamius the reer-admiral perceiving, and seeing with all that the Romans could not possibly make head alike and extend themselves as broad as the enemy, and were at the point already at the right wing to be environed, made haste with his own vessels (for the Rhodian barks were of all other in the whole fleet swiftest by far) and after he had fronted equally and matched wing for wing, he made head with his own ship against the very admiral of the enemies, wherein Polyxenidas himself was aboard. By this time the battell began between both the main fleets, all at once from every part. Of the Romans side there fought fourscore in all, whereof two and twenty were Rhodians. The enemies armado consisted of fourscore and nine, all ships of greatest bulk and making, and had among them three galleaces, all six banks of oars on a side, and two of eleven. For goodness and strength of ships, as also for valour of souldiers, the Romans far surpassed the Rhodians. But for agility and nimbleness of their vessels, for skillful knowledge of Pilots, and expert cunning and readiness of mariners, the Rhodians were as much beyond them. And those above all the rest that carried fire before them in their noses Croubled and feared the enemies most; and that stratagem and device which had been their only help and means of safety, when they were surprised and beset at Parosmus, was now the thing that stood them in best head to win the victory. For the Kings ships fearing the fire that threatened their very faces, turned aside, because they would not run affront with their prow; so as, they neither could themselves smite and hurt the enemies with their brazen pikes in the beak head, nor yet avoid them, but expose their own broad sides open to receive all pushes and violence from them. If any one fortuned to encounter and run upon them, his was sure to be paid and sped with fire that was flung and cast into her; and more running there was to quench the flame, than otherwise to fight. Howbeit, the resolute valour of the Roman souldiers (which ever in war prevailed most) it was that did the deed. For after the Romans by mere force had broken and closed the main battailon of the enemy in the very midst, they turned about again and presented themselves behind, and plaid upon the backs of the Kings ships whilst they fought afront and made head against the Rhodians; and thus at one instant the battailon in the midst, and the ships in the left wing that served King Antiochus, were beset round about, and sunk to the bottom of the sea. The right wing as yet entire and sound, was more terrified at the loss and overthrow of their fellows, than for any proper danger of their own. Howbeit, after they saw the other invested, and the Admirall her self with Polyxenidas in her, to abandon her companions and to hoise up sails, they likewise in haste set up all their cloth and small triquer sails for a good forewind they had for Ephesus; and fled as fast away as they could. Two and forty ships they lost in this fight: of which thirteen were boarded and taken for the use of the Romans, the rest were either consumed with fire, or devoured of the sea. Two Roman ships were shattered and broken in pieces, and some other hurt, bruised and cracked. One Rhodian chanced to be taken by a notable and memorable adventure. For having with her piked beak head stricken a Sidonian ship, with the violence of the blow she shook out her own anchor, which by one of the flouks took fast hold as if it had been a grappling hook by the prow of the other ship. The Rhodians much troubled herewith, gave over rowing straight, as willing and desirous to be loosed and parted from the enemy; and whilst they were busied thereabout, the cable which the anchor drew with it caught among the oars of her own ship, and swept them clean away, and so left one side of it naked, whereby the ship being much weakened and enfeebled, was taken by the other that was smitten and tied fast unto her. Much after this manner was the battell fought at sea near Myonessus. Whereupon Antiochus was sore affrighted: for being thus dispossessed of the sea, he distressed himself that he should not be able to hold and defend the places farther off; and therefore commanded the garrison to retire from Lysimachia, for fear it should be surprised there by the Romans. But this was but a bad piece of council as the sequel and issue proved afterwards. For it had been an easier matter not only to defend Lysimachia against the first assault of the Romans, but also to hold out the siege all winter; yea, and by drawing out the time, or length, to bring the very assailants themselves lying in leiguar, to extreme necessity and want of all things: during which space they might have taken some occasion and opportunity, to find a mean and make way for peace. Neither did he only quit Lysimachia and leave it for the enemies after this unfortunate battell, but also sent his galleies before Colophon and dislodged yea, and retired himself to Sardis: from whence he sent into Cappadocia to Ariarates for aid, and to all other places where he could, to gather more forces; and now was he set upon no design at all, but to give battell, and to hazard all upon the fortune of the field.

After this Navall victory, Regillus, and Amphilus sailed directly to Ephesus, where he embattelled his ships in array even before the haven, and when by this bravado he had wrought again from the enemies a plain and evident confession that they had abandoned the sea unto him, he set sail for Chius, unto which he had intended to shape his course from Samos before the late battell upon the sea, There he repaired and calked his ships which were shaken and cracked in the forsaide fight: which done, he sent L. Aemilius Scaurus with thirty sail toward Hellepontum to transport the army. And when he had rewarded the Rhodian ships with part of the pillage, and honoured them with the navall spoils, he gave them the renvoy, and sent them home. But the Rhodians lustily out-failed Scaurus, and prevented his ships to set over the forces of the Consul: and after they had performed that service also, then they returned to Rhodes.

* In Malony;

The Roman Armado sailed from Chios to Phocaea. This City is seated far within the gulph of the sea, builded so, as that it lieth out in length. The wall containeth in compass the space of two miles and an half: and from both sides is growth narrow (fill, and meeteth in the midst, resembling the form of a wedge or * coin, which the Inhabitants themselves call Lampyr, in which place the City is a mile broad and a quarter with the vantage. From which canton or corner there is a bank of firm land running a mile on end into the sea like a tongue, which divideth the haven just in the midst, marked out (as it were) just by a certain line. Where it joyneth to the narrow straights it hath two most fure harbors of both sides, and those lying two contrary waies, That which looketh toward the South, is called according as it is indeed, N. ussahmor [namely, a ship-rode, or harbour] for it is able to receive a great number of ships: the other haven is near unto the very Lampyr aforesaid. When the Roman fleet was once possessed of both these most fure and safe harbours, the Prator thought good before he set in hand either to scale the walls, or to raise any fabricks and plant engines against the City, to send certain of purpose to found the minds and affections of the principall Citizens and the Magistrates within. But after he perceived they were ordinarily bent, and would not come on, he began to lay battery against it in two severall quarters. The one part was not much peopled, and had but few dwelling houses in it; and the Temples of their gods took up a good space thereof: and there began he first to approach with the ram, and therewith to batter the walls, and shake the turrets: and by that time that the multitude ran thither in great numbers, and presented themselves ready to defend, the ram was pushing also at the other part: So as now the walls were laid along in both places: and upon the fall thereof whiles some of the Roman souldiers presently gave the assault at the very breach, mounting and marching upon the ruines of the stones that were faine: others also assailed to gain the top of the upright walls with scaling ladders. But the townsmen withstood them so fiffly, and with such resolution, that it was well seen they repuled more hope of defence in arms and valor, than in the strength of their walls. Whereupon the Prator seeing in what danger his souldiers stood, and fearing to expose and sacrifice them ere they were aware to the fury of these people enraged like desperate and mad perions, commanded to found the retreat. And notwithstanding the assault ceased and was given over, yet betook not the townsmen themselves to rest and repose, but ran from all parts every one, to raise countermures, fill up the breaches, and repair the ruines where the wall was down. As they were wholly employed about this busines, Q. Antonius went from the Prator, came toward them: who, after he had reproved and rebuked their willfull obduracy, and made remonstrance unto them, that the Romans had more care and regard than they themselves of the City: that by continuall assaults and batteries it should not utterly be destroyed: and how it they would be reclaimed and forgo their outrageous folly. he would make them this offer. That they should yield under the same conditions and in those very terms, as at other time they had submitted to C. Lucius when they came under his protection: At the hearing of which, they demanded and had five daies space to consider of the matter: during which time they made means to receive some aid from Antiochus: but after their Embassadors whom they dispatched to the King, had made relation, That there was no succour to be expected from him: then they let open their gates, having articulated and capitulated beforehand, that no outrage by way of hostility should be exercised and committed upon them. As the Romans entered into the City with banners displayed, the Prator declared with a loud voice, That his will and pleasure was they should be spared, inasmuch as they had yielded. Whereat the souldiers on all hands set up a great cry. That it was an intolerable shame that the Phocceans / who were never true and loyall confederates, but always dogged and malicious enemies / should go away so scotfree, and not suffer for their sins. At which word (as if the Prator had given them a signall of ransacking) they ran into all parts of the City to rife and spoil. Aemilius at first staid them what he could: and reclaimed them again, saying, That it was not the manner to sack Cities rendered by composition, but such as were forced and won by assaile; and even those also were at the disposition of the General and not of the souldiers. But seeing that they in their angry mood of revenge, and covetous desire of goods, were of more power than the respective reverence of his person, his quality and commandment: he sent out beades and trumpeters throughout the City, charging all persons of free condition whatsoever, to repair before him into the market place, to the end, that no villany and outrage might be done upon their bodies. And so the Prator did his best to perform his word and promise in whatsoever lay in his power: for he restored unto them their City, their lands, and their own laws. And for that the winter approached, he made choice of the two harbours of Phocaea to bestow his ships there for the winter time.

Near about that time, the Consul having passed beyond the borders of the Adrians and Maronis, received news, that the Kings navy was defeated at Myonesus, and Lysimachia dismistured of the garrison: and this latter tidings was more acceptable and pleasing unto him, than the other of the navall victory; and especially, when they came thither: where in very truth the City

A (pleasantly stored with all sorts of victuals, as if they had been provided of purpose against the coming of the army) received them courteously; whereas they made no other account, but to endure extremity of want and painfull travell in behewing thereof. I here they abode some few daies as it were in camp, untill such time as their carriages and sickly perions of their train might reach unto them: such as they had left behind in all the forts and cities of Thrace, wearied with long journey and enfeebled with divers infirmities. When all were come and well refreshed and recovered, they put themselves again in their journey, and marching through Cherfontus, they came to Hellepont: where, finding all things in readines for their transporting (such was the industrious care and diligence of King Eumenes) they passed over without trouble and molestation into the peaceable coasts of their allies and friends, without impeachment of any person, notwithstanding some ships arrived in one place, and some in another. And this was the thing that much contented the Romans, and mightily encouraged them to see they had free passage into Asia, which they made till reckoning would have been a matter of great difficulty and trouble. After this, they encamped and made their abode a certain time near Hellepont, by occasion of those daies which happened then to be, wherein the S. L. used to dance with their institutions called Anelia; during which time they made use of conscience to take any journey: untill those Anelia were bestowed again in the Temple of Mars. By reason of which daies, P. Scipio also withdrew himself apart from the army upon a more strict regard of conscience & religion, which touched him nearer than other, because he was himself one of the S. L., and was the cause that the army staid behind and came not forward to overtake the camp.

C And even then there happened to come unto the camp from Antiochus, one Heraclides a Byzantine, having in charge to treat as touching a peace: and good hope he conceived to obtain the same with ease, by reason of the long abode and stay of the Romans in that one place: of whom he had looked for no other, but that as soon as they had left root in Asia, they would have marched apace straightwaies against the Kings camp. Howbeit this course he took not to go directly unto the Consul before he had spoken and conferred with Scipio, (and indeed in such direction and charge he had from the King himself) in whom he had repoled his greatest hope: for besides his magnanimity and noble courage, as also the satiety of glory and honour, whereof already he had his full (great inducements unto the King that he would be easily wrought and made most pliable to hearken after peace) all the world knew full well how foberly he had carried himself in his victories first in Spain, and afterwards in Affrick: and more than all this, a son of his was captive in the said Kings hands. But where, when, and by what chance he was taken prisoner, writers agree not no more than in many things else. Some say, that in the beginning of the war, he was beset and enclosed round within the Kings ships, at what time as he sailed from Chios to Oream. Others write, that after the Roman army was passed over into Asia, he was sent out in espial with a troop of Fragelian horsemen to view and discover the Kings camp: and when the Kings Cavalry made out to charge upon them, he made haste to retire, and in that hurry his horse fell with him and so he and two other men of arms with him, was surprized, taken, and brought to the King. But this one thing is for certain known, that if there had been fire and firm peace between the King and the Romans, nay, if there had been familiar acquaintance and hospitality between him and the Scipios, this young Gentleman could not possibly have had more friendly entertainment, nor been more kindly intreated, liberally used, yea, and honourably regarded than he was. For these causes the Embassador attended the coming of Scipio: and so soon as he was arrived, presented himself unto the Consul, requesting that he might deliver his message and be heard. Whereupon in a frequent assembly he had audience given him, and thus he spake: "Whereas (quoth he) there have been divers and sundry embassages passed to and fro as touching peace, and no good as yet done: I lay this for a ground and assure my self now to speed, because the former embassadors hitherto have effected and obtained nothing: for in all those treaties and disputations the question was about Smyrna, Lampiscus, Alexandria, Tras, and Lysimachia, which is in Europe. Of which Cities, the King my Master hath already quid Lysimachia, to the end you should not say that he hath any one City at all within Europe: and as for those other in Asia, he is ready to surrender them also: yea & all the rest whatsoever which the Romans would recover out of the Kings hands and dominions, in regard they had sometime sided & taken part with him. And for the charges which the Romans have defraied about this war, the King will be willing to disburse and make good the one moiety unto them again. And thus much spake he concerning the articles and conditions of the peace. The rest of his speech behind, was bestowed in advertizing and putting them in mind of the alternative revolution of this world, and the affairs thereof: that as they should use their own good fortune and prosperity with measure and moderation (so they ought not to prels down others in their adversity): but hold themselves contented within the bounds and limits of Europe, and that was a dominion sufficient (as man would think) and exceeding great: considering this, that it is an easier matter to win one thing after another by way of conquest, than to hold and keep them all together when they are won. To conclude, if the Romans were minded to dismember any part from Asia, so they would make amend once, and limit out the same within certain precincts without any further doubt and differences, the King for the love of peace and concord, would suffer the Romans in their unmeasurable desire and appetite, to surmount and outgo his temperance and moderation. But those matters which the Embassador supposed were of great importance and effectfull to obtain

obtain peace, the Romans made a pith at it, and lightly regarded it, for they judged it but meet and fit reason, that the King should discharge all the expenses they had been at in this war, considering through his default it first arose: also that he ought to withdraw his garrisons not only out of Ionia and Æolis; but also like as all Greece hath been made free and delivered, so the Greek Cities likewise in Asia ought to be enfranchised and set at liberty: which possibly might not be unless Antiochus were dethroned of the possession of all Asia on this side the mountain Taurus. The Embassador perceiving well, that there was no reason to be had in the assembly, assayed privately to sound and to win the heart and good will of Scipio, according as he had in charge from the King. And first this way he went to work and laid, That the King was minded to fend him his son again freely without ransom: then (ignorant as he was both of Scipio his nature and the manner of Romans) he promised him a mighty mass of gold, yea, and to be made equal companion in the government of the whole kingdom (the Kings name and royall style only reserved) in case he would be an instrument and means to effectuate peace. To these motives and offers Scipio returned this answer, "That you neither know the Romans all in general, nor my self in particular: to whom you were sent, I tell marvel, seeing you are altogether ignorant of the state of him who hath sent you hither. For if ye had meant to have fought for peace at our hands, as of men who were in care for the doubtful event and issue of the war, ye should have held and kept Lyfimaachus still, for to have empeached our entrance into Chersonesus, or else ye should have made head against us in Hellepontus; and staid our passage into Asia: but now seeing ye have granted passage into Asia, and suffered your selves not only to be bridled and curbed, but also to be yoked, and like beasts to bear and draw too; since I say there is no remedy but ye must endure, be under our subjection, what equal and indifferent means of treaty is there left for you? Now, as concerning my son, I will accept it as a great present, and becomming the munificence and liberality of a King, in case he send him to me again. As for the other matters, I pray God I never driven in regard of mine estate, to have that need: for surely, I carry a mind that will never find the mile and want thereof. And for these great offers that the King maketh unto me, he shall find me thankfull unto him, if it please him for any private benefit unto me done, to require, as at my hands a private favour and pleasure again: but as touching the State and publique weal, he shall pardon me: I will neither receive ought from him, nor bestow any thing upon him. And all that I can do for him at this present, is to give him good and faithful counsell. Go your ways; therefore and tell him from me, that his best course is to obtain from war, and not to refuse it, condition of peace whatsoever. But all this nothing moved the King, who made reckoning that any hazard and fortune of war would be good and safe for him, since that there were laws imposed upon him already, as if he had been quite vanquished and overcome. Whereupon, without any more part of peace for this time, he bent his whole mind and employed his study about provision and preparation for war.

The Consul having given order for the execution of all his plots and designs, dislodged from thence, and marched hith to Dardanium, and after to Rhætem: the inhabitants of both which Cities came forth to meet him upon the way in great multitudes. From thence he went forward to Binus and encamped in a plain under the very walls: then he entered into the town, and ascended up into the Cattle, where he offered sacrifice unto Minerva, the patroness of that City. The Illyrians entertained him with all shew of honour, as well in deed as in word, acknowledging that the Romans were delivered from them, and the Romans again were as joyous and glad to see the place of their first original and beginning. From thence they removed, and the sixth day after arrived at the head or spring of the river Caucus. Thither also Eumenes, the King (who at first assayed to bring his fleet back from Hellepontus to winter before Ela, and afterwards, when he could not for certain daies double the point of Leitus, by reason of the contrary winds, went a land) because he would not fail but be present at the beginning of these great affairs, made haste the next way with a small power to the camp of the Romans. From the camp he was sent back to Pergamus, to give order for purveyance and provision of victuals; and after he had delivered out corn to those whom the Consul had appointed to receive it, he returned again to the same leaguer. The Consul his purpose and intent was to be provided aforehand of victuals sufficient for many daies, and together in one train to go against the enemy, before the winter surprised them.

Now the Kings camp lay about Thyatira: where Antiochus hearing that P. Scipio was carried sick to Ela, sent certain Embassadors of purpose, to present and deliver his son again unto him. As which present of his, he took not only great contentment in his spirit, as a father might do for receiving his dear son, but much easement also and comfort to his sick body. After he had satisfied himself at length with much embracing of his son, "Ye shall (saith he) recommend me unto the King your Master, and tell him from me, that I thank him most heartily, and that I have no good thing at this time to send to him again, but only this, That I advise him to take heed that he return not into the field to give battell, before he hath heard for certain, that I my self am returned" to the leaguer. Upon relation hereof, Antiochus albeit he was in camp seventy thousand foot, and twelve thousand horse, and above strong (which puissant power otherwise animated, and fed him with the hope of good issue of battell) yet moved with the authority of so great a personage as Scipio was in whom he reposed his whole refuge against all doubtfull events of the fortune in war, he retired back, and passed over the river Phrygius, and pitched his camp about Magnesia near unto Syngam. And fearing, lest (if he should be minded to make long stay and abide there)

A there) the Romans would assay to force his defences, he cast a trench, six cubits in depth, and twelve in breadth; and this trench he environed with a double bank and couree of strong stakes and pales, and upon the inward circuit and enclosure he oppoled a more with main turrets, for the more easie empeachment of the enemy, when he should pass over the trench. The Consul (supposing the King to be about Thyatira, marched continually, and upon the first day came down into the plains of Hircania. And when he understood, that the King was dislodged and departed thence, he followed him by the tracks, and on this side the river Phrygius encamped four miles from the enemy. Where about a thousand horsemen shewed themselves (for the most part * Gallogrecians, some Dacians, with certain archers on horseback of other nations intermingled among them) who in great haste having passed over the river, charged upon the corps de guard of the Romans. At the first they put the Romans to some trouble, finding them out of order and array; but as the skirmish grew hotter and continued longer, and the number of the Romans soon increased, (by reason their camp was so near to yield them succours) they of the Kings side being now wearied and not able to make their part good against so many of them, began to retire: and certain of them before they could take the river, were overtaken by those that followed the chace, and killed outright. For two daies after they (tired of no hand, for neither the one nor the other went over the river. The third day after the Romans all at once passed over, and encamped about a mile and a half from the enemies. But as they were pitching their tents, and busied about fortifications and defences, three thousand chosen horsemen and foot together from the Kings Camp, came upon them with a great trouble and assay. The number of them that were in guard, was (as a good deal) howbeit, of themselves alone, without calling to help and aid the souldiers from their work about the fortification and defence of the camp, they not only at first received the charge with equal valour, but also afterwards, as the fight encreased, put the enemies to flight, when they had killed some hundred of them, and taken prisoners almost as many. For the space of four daies next ensuing, both armies stood embattled on either side before their Camp. And upon the fifth day the Romans advanced forth into the middle of the plain, Antiochus came not forward with his ensigns, inso much, as the hindmost were not an hundred foot off from the trench. The Consul perceiving that he fell off and would no battell, called a council the next day, to be advised and resolved what he were best to do, in case Antiochus would not be fought withall. For considering that the winter approached, the souldiers were either to lie in the field under their tents, or else if they minded for the winter season to retire unto their garrison towns, the war must be put off untill the next summer. Now the Romans never made so small reckoning of any enemy as of him. Whereupon, throughout the whole assembly they called upon the Consul with one voice to lead forth to battell out of hand, and take the souldiers whiles they were in this heart ready if the enemies would not come out into the field, to pass over ditch and rampier, and break into the camp amongst them: making account, that they were not to fight with so many thousands of enemies, but rather to make a slaughter and butchery of so many beasts. Whereupon Cn. Domitius was lent to discover the way, and to view the place where was best entering upon the trench and rampier of the enemies. After he had brought certain relation of all things, it was thought good the next morrow to approach near unto their camp: and on the third day the engines were displaced forth into the midst of the plain, and they began to range the army in battell array. Antiochus likewise supposed it was not expedient to lie off and stay any longer, for fear lest in refusing still to fight, he should either abate the courage of his own men, or increase the hope of his enemies, and therefore came abroad with all his forces, and advanced so far forward from his camp that it appeared well he meant to fight. The Roman army stood embattled in one manner of form, as well for men, as munition and armor: for of Romans there were two legions, and of Latine associates as many, and every legion consisted of five thousand four hundred. The Romans put themselves in the main battell, and the Latines kept both the spoins. The Hastati were placed with their ensigns foremost in the vanguard, after them the Principes in the midst, and the Triarii in the rearguard. Without this compleat battell, thus marshalled, the Consul set to the right point the auxiliary souldiers of Eumenes, mingled together with the targeteers of the Achæans, to the number almost of three thousand, whom he ranged equally a front, and beyond them more outward he oppoled about three thousand men of arms: whereof eight hundred were sent from Eumenes, the rest were the Cavalry of the Romans. Without all these in the outmost place, he put the Trallians and Candiors, who in all made up the number of five hundred. As for the left wing, it seemed to need no such succours, by reason it was flanked with the river and high steep banks, howbeit, in that side there were planted four troops of horsemen. Thus you see all the forces that the Romans had besides two thousand Thracians and Macedonians mingled and blended together, who followed as volunteers, and were left for the guard of the Camp, and sixteen Elephants, which they bestowed in the rearguard for the defence of the Triarii. For, over and besides that they were not like to hold out against the Kings Elephants, which were in number fifty and four, you must consider that those of Affrick are not able to match them of India, say they were in number equal: either because in bigness the Indians exceed the other (as in truth they are much greater by odds) or surpass them in courage and stomach. But the Kings army was composed of divers nations, different as well in arms as in souldiers. He had of Macedonians sixteen thousand footmen, heavily armed after their manner, called Phalangia; these made the main battell, and in the front stood divided in squadrons.

squadrons, parted and severed one from the other by two Elephants placed between. More inward behind the forefront, the battell was displayed in two and thirty ranks of soldiers. This was the strength of the Kings army, and as in other respects, so especially in regard of the Elephants amounting aloft over all the soldiers, represented to the eye a fearful and terrible sight. For besides that they were high and lofty of themselves, their crested headstalls with plumes upon them, their turrets upon their backs, and in every turret four men standing in glittering armour, besides the Master and governor himself, made the appearance and show far greater. On the right wing he placed, aloft upon the Phalangites, a thousand and five hundred horsemen of the Gallogreeks: unto whom he adjoined three thousand lances in complete armour, mounted upon bard horses, and those men of arms they themselves called Campylarchi. To these were added another wing of a thousand horsemen, which they named Agema. Medes they were, elect and chosen men, together with more horsemen of the same region, mingled of many nations one with another. Close unto them in the rearguard was set a troop of sixteen Elephants. On which side also in a wing somewhat farther drawn out stood the King his own cohort, bearing the name of Agrapsidi, by occasion of the silvered shields which they bare. After them followed 1200 Dacians, archers on horseback. Then, three thousand footmen lightly armed, and composed partly of Candians, and partly of Trallians, in number almost equal, and 2500 Myrians attended upon the archers. And the utmost side and tail of that wing was guarded with four thousand Cyrenian slingers and Elymean archers forced together. On the left wing likewise there stood fast unto the Phalangites aloft a 1500 horsemen Gallogreeks: and two thousand Cappadocians armed after the same manner, sent from King Antiochus. Then the Auxiliaries of all sorts 2700; besides three hundred lances in complete harness upon bard horses armed at all pieces, and 1000 other horsemen. As for the Cornet of the Kings, it was more lightly armed, as well themselves as their horses: but their letting out and furniture otherwise, all one. And these were Syrians for the most part, with Phrygians and Lydians together. Before this cavalry went the chariots of four wheels, and drawn by as many horses, armed with sharp and trenchant hooks like fish-blades, and the camels called by them for their swiftness Dromedaries. Upon these were mounted the Arabian archers, who also were armed with keen swords four cubits long, that if they did aloft, they might notwithstanding reach their enemy. Then after these were set another multitude equal to that in the right wing, whereof the foremost were certain horsemen called Tarentines, and after them 2500 Gallogreecian horse. Likewise of Neocretans 1 thousand; and of Carians and Cilicians one with another 1500 armed alike. As many Trallians, and three thousand targeteers. These were Pisidians, Pamphylians and Lyicians: and last of all, the succours in the rearguard of Citreans and Elymeans, in like number as they that were placed in the right wing, with sixteen Elephants also distant a pretty way aloof. The King himself in person had the conduct of the right point of the battell, and ordained Selenus his son and Antiochus his brothers son to command the left. The main battell in the midst was committed to the leading and governance of three Captains, to wit, Minio, Zenist, and Phily the Master of the Elephants. There was a certain mist arose in the morning, and as it waxed farther day gathered aloft into thick clouds and made the weather dark: besides, by the South-wind it reolved into a small drizzling rain, which wet and drenched all. This did little harm to the Romans: but contrariwise, was much hurtful to the Kings side. For, albeit the air was dim and dark, yet by reason that the Roman battallions took up no great compass of ground, they could for all the air was overcast, discern from one end to the other: and the moisture that fell, didled nothing at all (so speak of) either the swords or javelins of them that were heavily armed: whereas the Kings army being embattell'd in broad, had much ado, and hardly could discern from the middle of the main battell to the wings of each hand, and much less discern from one skirt and flank of the battell on to the other. Moreover, the dropping weather slogged their bows, soiled their slings and loops of their darts. Their sisted chariots also, wherewith Antiochus made full account to break the arrayes of his enemies, turned to the disorder and fright of themselves. Now these chariots aloft were in this manner armed for the most part: certain sharp pikes they had about the spine-pole, bearing toward from the spring-tree, ten cubits in length, like unto horns, with which pointed pikes they would pierce through whatsoever they encountered. Also at each end of the said spring-tree there were two blades flied out, the one of just and even height with it, the other lower and bearing downward to the ground: the former was devised to cut through whatsoever came near the side thereof, the other to reach and tear them that were slain to the earth, or came under the chariot. Likewise at both ends of the axle-tree without the nave of the wheel there were two such like hooks fastened and bended divers waies. Those chariots thus armed the King had placed in the front of the battell as we said before, because if they had been set either in the middle or the rearguard, they should have been driven through their own battallions. Which Eumenes perceiving one that knew well enough the manner of that kind of service, and how dangerous it was in case a man rather frightened the horses than charged them directly by ordinary warlike force: he commanded the Candian archers and slingers, with some other horsemen that lanced darts, to run forth not thick in troops, but scattering as far asunder as they could, and at once from all parts to discharge their shot upon them. This forerunning tempest (as it were) so maddened the horses partly by yelling, wounding, and pelting them with darts, arrows, and stones, discharged from all sides at them, and partly with the strange and uncouth noise which they made, that suddenly as if they had been unbridled and without their goers, they flung out every way, and ran at random: which violence of theirs the light-armed soldiers, the nimble slingers, a full swift running Candians avoided easily with a noise. And the horsemen withall following the chase, redoubled the fright and hurry amongst themselves, yea, and the dromedary camels too; which likewise were unbridled and set a madding; and this hurly burly the manifold cries from the multitude all about, helped well forward. Thus were the chariots chased in the middle of the plain between both armies: and when these main-bugs were once out of the way, then the alarm and signal was given on both parts, and they charged one another in battell-wise. But as foolish an accident as that was, it caused soon a discomfiture and overthrow indeed. For the auxiliaries and aids behind which were placed next unto them, terrified with the fear and affright of the chariots, fled, and left all naked and disurnished even to the bard horses, in such sort, that when the rearguard was in dismay, the Roman Cavalry entered upon the forehead horse, and charged them so hotly, that part of them was not able to endure the first shock and encounter: some were put to flight, others were born down with the point and weight of their harness and weapons. And presently thereupon the whole left wing of the battell began to retreat. And after that those succours were disbanded and in dismay which were between the Cavalry and the heavy armed horsemen called Phalangites, the disorder and fear went as far as to the midst of the main battell: where so soon as the ranks and files were broken and shuffled together, by reason of the enter-course of their own fellows among them, they had no use at all of their long pikes, which the Macedonians call Surfissa. Then the Roman legions advanced their engines, and lanced their darts against those disorder'd ranks huddled together. The very Elephants that were placed between, nothing troubled and affrighted the Roman soldiers, as who had been used in the African wars, both to avoid the furious rage of those beasts, and also either with their javelins to flank and hurt them overhead, or else if they could come near unto them, to hew them and cut their hamstrings with their swords. By this time now was the front of the main battell decayed and beaten down: and the rearguard behind environed and cut in peeces: whereas the Romans withall, might perceive their own fellows flying from the other part, and hear the cry of those that were affrighted, even almost as far as to their camp. For Antiochus keeping the right wing, seeing in the left point of the Romans no other defence, (by reason that they trusted upon the river) but only four troops of horsemen, and those also by drawing themselves close to their fellows, to leave the bank-side void and naked, charged that point with his Auxiliaries and lances upon bard horses, and not only made head and pressed them afront, but from the river also set a compass and enclosed them; and flanked that wing so long, until the horsemen were first discomfited, and then the footmen next unto them were put to flight, so as they ran again toward their camp. M. Amyntus a Colonell, and unto M. Lepidus, who a few years after was created the High-Priest, had the charge of the camp: he with his whole guard came forth, and where as he saw them to flee, there he opposed himself, and first commanded them to stand, and afterwards to return to battell, checking and rebuking them for their beastly fear, and shamefull running away. Moreover, he proceeded to minatory words, saying, That in case they would not be ruled by his direction, they should run headlong like blind beetles upon their own mischief: and in the end, he gave a sign to his own company, for to lay upon the foremost of them that thus fled, and caused the multitude that followed, with dint of sword and drawing blood of them, to turn their face again upon the enemies. Thus the greater fear overcame the less: for seeing danger before and behind, first they staid their flight, and afterwards returned to the battell. Amyntus also with his own regiment (which for the guard of the camp had 2000 tall and valiant men in it) withstood the King right stoutly as he followed hot in chase upon those that fled. Moreover, Attalus (brother of King Eumenes) in the right point of the battell, who at the first charge had discomfited the left wing of the enemies, perceiving that his fellows fled in their left point, and fearing a greater alt about the camp, came to the rescue in good time with 200 horsemen. Antiochus, when he saw them turn head again whose backs ere while were toward him, and begin to fight afresh, and perceived withall a number coming against him, both out of the camp and also from the battell, turned his horse head and took himself to flight. By this means the Romans obtained the victory of both the wings, and passed directly to the rising of the camp over the dead bodies, which in the main battell most of all were massacred and lay by heaps: where the strength and flower of the hardiest men ranged close together and the weight besides of their heavy armor, would not give them leave to flee away. The Horsemen of Eumenes were the first of all others that pursued the enemies: after them, the rest of the Cavalry followed the chase all over the fields, and ever as they overtook any of the hindmost, killed them outright. But that which troubled and plagued them in their flight more than all besides, was their chariots, elephants and camels, intermingled among them as they fled: so far much as being once disbanded and put out of their ranks, they tumbled one upon another like blind men, and were bruised and crushed under the beasts feet which came running upon them. Great execution also there was committed in the camp, yea, and more in manner than had been in the battell: for the first that fled, and those that fought in the vanguard, took their way most of them to the camp, and upon assured confidence of this multitude, the garrison within fought more valiantly, and held out longer in the defence of the hold. The Romans being thus laid in the sea and kept close in the rampier which they thought verily to have forced and slain at their feet, when they were once at length broken through and got in, made the Roman army slaughter amongst them for very anger and delight that they had kept them for so long. It is said there were slain that day about fifty thousand footmen and 4000 horsemen. 14000 taken prisoners together with fifteen elephants with their governors. A number of the Romans were hurt and wounded, but there died not in the field above 300 footmen and 24 horsemen, and of the regiment of King's men not past five and twenty. And for that day verily the conquerors after they had razed only the tents and pavilions of their enemies, returned to their own camp with great spoil of pillage: but the next morning they fell to spoiling the bodies of the dead and gathered their winners together. And upon this victory there came Embassadors from Thyrrina and Magnesia to Syracusa for to surrender and deliver up their Cities.

Antiochus, who fled accompanied with some few, having gathered unto him many more in the way, who rallied themselves unto him, arrived at Sardis about midnight with a small power of armed men; and hearing that his son Selenus and some other of his friends were gone before to Arpame, himself also at the fourth watch departed thence with his wife and daughter toward Arpame; after he had committed the charge of guarding the City Sardis unto Zeno, and appointed Timon governor of Lydia. But the inhabitants of the said City and the garrison soldiers within the Castle, despised their governors, and by general consent addressed Embassadors unto the Consul.

Much about the same time also, there arrived Embassadors from Tralles and Magnesia (which standeth upon the river Meander) and likewise from Ephesus to yield up their Cities. For Polyarchus (advertised of the issue of this battle) had abandoned Ephesus, and having sailed with the fleet as far as Patara in Lycia, for fear of the Rhodian ships which did in guard within the harbour of Messige, disembarked and put himself ashore, and with a small company marched by land into Smyrna. The Cities of Asia were surrendered into the hands and protection of the Consul, and submitted to the people of Rome. By this time now was the Consul possessed of Sardis and thither repaired unto him Scipio from Elae as soon as ever he could endure the travail of journey.

At the same time there came an herald from Antiochus unto the Consul, who by the mediation of Scipio, made request and obtained thus much, That the King might send his Quarters and Embassadors unto him. And after few daies Zenit (who had been governor of Lydia) together with Antipater (Antiochus his nephew or brother's son) arrived. Who first dealt with King Bumenes and communed with him, whom by reason of old jars and quarrels they supposed truly to be the greatest enemy unto peace, and that he would never abide to hear thereof; but him they found more reasonable and inclining to peaceable terms, than either the King their Master or themselves hoped and looked for. So by the means of Scipio and him together, they had access unto the Consul: who at their earnest petition granted them a day of audience in a frequenterly, there to declare their Commission and what they had in charge. "Then (quoth Zenit) "we are not so much to speak and deliver ought of our own selves, as to ask and be advised of you (Romans) what course to take, and by what means of satisfaction we might expire and satisfy the trespass of the King our Master and withal obtain grace and pardon as your hands whom we the victors? Your manner always hath been of a magnanimous and haughty spirit, to forgive Kings and nations by you vanquished: How much more then is it decent and becoming you to do the like: yea, and with a greater mind and more generous and honourfull heart, in victory and conquest, which hath made you L.L. of the whole world? For now it behooveth you to lay down all debate and quarrel with mortal men here upon earth, and rather like the immortal gods in heaven, to provide for the good and safety of mankind, and them to pardon and forgive. Now was it agreed upon before the coming of the Embassadors, what answer to make unto them; and likewise thought good it was that Africanius should deliver the same, who spake by report in this wise: "We Romans, of all those things which are in the power of the immortal gods, have that measure which they vouchsafed to give us: as for heart and courage which doth pendeth upon our own will and mind, we have born (and ever will) the same without change and alteration in all fortunes: neither hath prosperity raised and lift it up aloft, nor adversity debased and put it down. For proof hereof, I might produce your friend Antiochus as witness, to say nothing of others, but that I can report me to your own selves. For as he we had passed over Hellepont, even before we saw the Kings camp and army, when the hazard of war was indifferent, when the issue doubtful and uncertain, look what conditions of peace we then offered on even hand, and whiles we were equal one unto the other, and stood upon terms of advantage the same and no other we presented unto you at this time, now that we are conquerors. Forbear to meddle within Europe and depart wholly out of Asia, so much as is on this side Taurus. Moreover, in regard of the expences defraited in this war, ye shall pay fifteen thousand talents of silver according to the computation of Ephesus: five hundred in hand, two thousand and five hundred at the assurance and making of the peace, by the Senate and people of Rome; and a thousand talents yearly for twelve years next ensuing. Also ye shall make payment unto Bumenes of four hundred talents, and the remnant behind of the corn and grain which was due unto his father. And when we have contracted and concluded these covenants, to the end that we may rest assured that ye will perform the same, we demand for a gage and sufficient pawn "that

"that ye deliver into our hands twenty hostages, such as we shall like well of and chuse. And for as much as we can never be persuaded that the people of Rome shall enjoy long peace there, where Antiochus is, we demand above all things to have him in our custody. Also you shall deliver into our hands Thas the Asiatic, the principal harbour and firebrand of that war with the Asiatic, who do offend you to take arms against us, upon assurance that he give you of their; and likewise armed them upon the trust they had in you. Item together with him you shall deliver Antiochus the Asiatic, together with Philo and Eubolus the Asiatic. The King shall now contract peace in worse estate then he was, by reason he maketh it worse then he might have done. But in case he hold it still and defy, know he well thus much that the royal majesty and port of Kings is with more difficulty abated & taken down from the bright pitch and degree unto the midst; then from that mean estate, cast down headlong to the lowest. Now these Embassadors were sent from the King with this charge, to accept of any articles of peace whatsoever. And therefore it was decreed that Embassadors should be shortly sent to Rome. The Consul divided his army into garrisons for to winter, some in Magnesia upon the river Meander others in Tralles and Ephesus. After few daies the hostages above said, were brought to Ephesus from the King, and Embassadors also came who were to go to Rome. Eubolus likewise went to Rome at the late time that the Kings Embassadors; and there followed with him moreover of all the States of Asia.

While the affairs of Asia passed thus in these terms, there were two praetors returned one of their several provinces, both in manner at once, upon hope to obtain triumph, to wit, Q. Minucius out of Liguria, and M. Acilius out of Asiatic. When the exploits were heard, as well of the one as the other, Minucius was flatly denied triumph, but Acilius had it granted with great Content of all men: who rode into the City triumphant over Antiochus and the Asiatics. In which triumph there were carried before him 3500 engines, 3000 pound weight of malleable iron in ballion; of coin in Attic Tetradrachms 1300000 in Ciloporus 348000. In plate many vessels engraved and chased, of great weight. He carried also in pomp the implements of the Kings hold all of silver, with rich and sumptuous apparel. Also crowns of gold 45 presented unto him by Cilician officers: besides all sorts of rich spoils, and moreover he led divers noble men prisoners, and fift all 36 captains, as well Asiatics as those who served under the King. As for Demetrius, a great commander of the Asiatics, who some few daies before had broken prison and escaped by night, he was by his keepers that made fresh out after him, overtaken upon the bank of Tyberis: but before he could be attached by them, he fell upon his own sword, and ran himself through. Only there wanted those that should have followed after his chariot; otherwise the triumph had been magnificent and rarely, both for the pompous show and also of the honor and renown of exploits achieved. But the joy of this triumph was blemished with heavy tidings out of Spain, of a shock and overthrow received of the Portuguese, in the country of Valerians, near the town Lycos, under the conduct of L. Amylius; where 6100 of the Roman army were left dead in the place, and the rest discomfited and beaten back into the camp; which they had much ado to defend and hold, and were faine to retire in manner of flight, and by long journeys recovered the peaceable quarters of their friends. And this was the news out of Spain.

From out of France the Embassadors of the Placentians and Cremonians; were brought by the Pretor L. Aspranuleius into the Senat: where they made much moan and complaint for default and want of inhabitants, whereof some were devoured by the edge of the sword in wars, others consumed by maldy and sickness; yea, and certain of them departed out of their colonies for wealths they had of the Gauls their near neighbours. Whereupon the Senat ordained C. Laetius the Consul to enroll, if he thought to good, six thousand families, for to be distributed among those Colonies afore said; L. Aspranuleius the Pretor to create three Commisaries called Triumvirs, for the conducting of the coloners and inhabitants thereof. And created there were M. Annius Serranus, L. Valerius Flaccus the son of Publius, and L. Valerius Tappus the son of Caius.

Not long after, against the time of the Consuls election which approached near, C. Laetius the Consul returned out of France to Rome, and he not only by virtue of the act of the Senat made in his absence, enrolled certain Coloners to supply the want in Placentia and Cremona, but also proposed a bill, and according to it the L.L. of the Senat ordained, that two new Colonies should be conducted into the land that appertained to the Boians. And at the very same time were letters brought from L. Amylius the Pretor, as touching the battell aries fought near to Mopsus in which letters also gave intelligence, that L. Scipio the Consul had transported his army into Asia. For joy of the said naval victory, there was ordained a solemn procession for one day, and it began that the Roman army was then first on foot in Africa, the said procession continued another day with supplication to the gods, that this voyage might turn to the prosperity and joy of the Commonwealt. And the Consul was joynted at each procession and supplication, to sacrifice with head of greater beasts. After this ensued the solemn assembly for the chusing of Consuls, which was holden with great strife and contention. For M. Amylius Lepidus stood for Consul, in grown into an ill name, and hardly spoken of among the people, in that he had left his government and charge in Sicily for this occasion and business only, without making full unto the Senat and craving leave so to do. Together with him were competitors in election, M. Fulvius Nobilior, Cn. Manlius Vulso, and M. Valerius Messala. But Fulvius was chosen alone, because the bid yet not sufficient voices of the Centuries, and he the morrow after nominated Cn.

M. natus for his colleague, and gave the repulse unto Lepidus; for Maffella kept silence and held his tongue. Which done, the Pretors were elected, namely, the two Quintus Fabii, the one formerly named Labo, the other Pictor who had been banished that year for the Flamin Quirinal; M. Sempronius Medicatus, Sp. Posthumus Albinus, Lucius Plantinus Hyppicus, and L. Aebutius Dives.

During the time that Ad. Fulvius Nobilior and Cn. Manlius Vulso were Consul, Publius Aetolius writeth that there was a great rumour raised at Rome, and held for certain, that L. Scipio the Consul, together with P. Africanus, were called forth to a parley with King Antiochus, touching the enlargement and delivery of young Scipio the son of Africanus, and by that means were both of them arrested and taken prisoners: also that when these chief commanders were under arrest, the Kings army incontinently advanced against the Roman camp, the same was surprised and forced and the whole power of the Romans utterly defeated. By occasion whereof, it went current also, that the Aetolians began to look aloof, refused to obey, and shook off their allegiance: also that their Princes and chief States were gone into Macedony, Dardany and Thracny, to levy and wage auxiliary forces: moreover, that A. Terentius Varro, and Marcius Claudius Lepidus were sent unto out of Asia, from A. Cornelius the Propretor, for to report these news at Rome. Last of all, to make up the tale, he addeth and saith, that the Aetolian Embassadors among other things, being examined in the Senate about this matter, and demanded of whom they heard and understood, that the Roman Generals were taken prisoners in Asia by King Antiochus, and the whole army overthrowen? answered directly, that they had advertisement thereof by their own Embassadors, who had been with the Consul. But because I find no other author besides him that maketh mention of this rumor, I dare not for any thing that I can say of my self, report it for a certain truth, nor yet omit it as a meer fable or loud lie.

The Aetolians Embassadors were permitted to come into the Senat house; and being induced (in regard of their own cause and present condition) to confesse a truth, and as humble supplicants to crave pardon and forgiveness either for their fault, or misprision and error, began with a bed-roll of their favours and good turns done unto the people of Rome, yea, and in manner to upbraid the Romans with the valour which they showed in the war against Phlip. But with their arrogant and insolent language they offended the ears of the Senators; and by ripping up old matters done and past (time out of mind and utterly forgotten) they handled their own cause so, and brought it to this passe, that the LL. of the Senat began to call to mind much more harm and mischief contrived and practised by that nation, then kindnesses and countelies received at their hands: inasmuch as the Aetolians having need of their mercy, incurred their heavy displeasure, and provoked them to anger and hatred. Being asked this question by one of the Senators Whether they would refer and submit themselves to the capture and judgment of the people of Rome? and likewise of another, If they could be content to hold them for their friends or enemies whom the Romans so accounted; they answered not a word: and thereupon immediately were commanded out of the Court: and presently all the Senat began to cry out with one voice, that the Aetolians were all still for Kings Antiochus, depending wholly and only upon that hope, and therefore they ought to war against them as undoubted enemies, and to take down and tame the so proud and felonious hearts of their own. Over and besides all this, another thing there was that incited and kindled the stomacks of the LL. against them, because at the very same instant when they seemed to require peace at the Romans hands, they warred against Dolopia and Asbanania. So there passed a decree of the Senat, (and the same was moved by M. Acilius, who had vanquished and subdued Antiochus: and the Etolians) That they should void that very day out of the City of Rome; and within fifteen daies next ensuing, out of all Italy. An. Tarentium Varro was sent to conduct them on the way: and this warning they took with them, that if ever after there came any Embassadors from the Aetolians, without the warrant, license, and permission of the chief General who governed the province, or not accompnyed with a Roman Legat, they should be repudged all of them for no better then enemies. In this manner were the Aetolians dismissed & sent away.

After this the Consuls propoled unto the Senat, as touching the government of the province, Nile. And thought good it was that they themselves should call lots for Ætolia & Asia. Unto him whose lot it fell to govern Ætola, was appointed that army which L. Scipio had. And for turnish it fully - and make up the decayed bands, he was allowed to have four thousand foot men & four thousand with two hundred horse-men of lies that were Latins, eight thousand foot and four thousand men of arms, and with these forces be was to make war against Antiochus. The other Consul had assigned unto him that army which was Ætolia: and liberty he had for supply of that broken army to levy the same number of Citizens and allies that his comp in government had enrolled. To the same Consul was granted a commission likewise to let in order, furnish, and take with him those things which the former year were prepared and rigged, and not only to make war with the Ætoliens, but also to fall over into the Isle Cephalonia. And withall, the said Consul had in charge to return home to Rome for the election of Magistrats, if he might so do conveniently with the good of the Common-wealth. For besides the annual Magistrats (who were to be chosen one under another) it was agreed upon, that Censors also should be created. But in case his affairs detained him, that he might not return in perion: then he was to give advertisement, and signifie so much to the Senat, that he could not possibly be present at the time of the foresaid Election. So Ætolia fell by lot to M. Furius, and Asia to Cn. Marcius. Thenthe Pretors fell to draw lots for their provinces. Sp. Porcius Cato had the jurisdiction over Citizens

A citizens and foreigners both: M. Sempronius Tuditanus governed Sicily; and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinal Flamin, Sardinia; Q. Fabius Labio was admiral of the navy at sea; and L. Plautius Hyppus was allotted to the rule of high Spain, and L. Rabius Dives of the lower. For Sicily one legion was appointed, together with that fleet which was already in that province. Also there was order given that the new Pretor should impole two tenths of corn upon the Sicilians, and send the one into Afra, and the other into Helisia. The like impolition was laid and executed upon the Sardinians, and the said corn to be conveyed into the same armies that the Sicilian corn was. A supply was granted unto L. Rabius for Spain of a thousand Rom, footmen and fifty horse besides: besides fix thousand Latin foot, and two hundred horsem. Unto Plautius Hyppus for the higher Spain were allowed a thousand Roman footmen; with two thousand Latine allies, and two hundred horse. Besides these supplements, both the provinces of Spain were allowed each of them one legion. The Magistrate and governors of the former year continued till in place of command for one other year, to wit, C. Calpis with his army, and P. Iunius also the Propretor in Beirwin with those forces which were in the province M. Tuccius likewise in the Brutians country and Apulia.

But before the Pretors went into their provinces, there hapned a variance between P. Licinius, the Arch-Pontiffe or chief Pretor, and Q. Fabius Pictor the Quirinal Flamin, like unto that which tometime fell out between L. Metellus and Poppeianus Albinus. For at what time as Poppeianus the Consul was upon his departure and journey to his fleet in Sicily, together with C. Laetanius his colleague, Metellus the Archbishop for the time being, kept him back upon occasion of certain sacrifices to be celebrated: I meably, when as Fabius the Pretor would have gone into Sardinia, P. Licinius the high Priest detained him. Much strife and hard hold there was hereabout, as well in the Senat house, as before the people. Inhibitions passed to and fro. Cautions and pledges were distrained: fines they imposed one upon anothers head: the Tribunes were called unto on both sides for to interpole their authority, and they appealed both unto the people. In fine, religion, and the regard of holy rites took place, and carried it clear, and the Flamin was enjoined to obey the chief priest: and by order and expresse commandment from the people, all fines were taken off and forgiven. And when the Pretor for very anger and spite that he was debarred from his province, would have surrendered and resigned up his government, the LL. of the Senat impeached and testified him by their absolute authority, and ordeined that he should minister justice, and exercise civill jurisdiction between aliens. After that the matter's D were ended within few dayes (for many souldiers were not to be levied and enrolled) both Consuls and Pretors took their journey into the provinces. After this, there arose a bruit concerning the occurrences and affairs in Asia, blown and spread abroad I wot not how, nor from what author it proceeded: but after few daies there came certain messengers with letters from the Generall of the Roman army, sent of purpose to the City, which caused not to great joy presently ensuing upon the Irish fear afore said (for why, they were no more afraid of Asiatic by them already conquered) as dashed quite the fame and opinion that went on Antiochus, whom in the beginning of this war they supposed would have been a dangerous enemy unto them, as well in regard of his own puissance, as for that he had the direction and conduct of Antibal in the war: howbeit, they thought good to alter nothing, either as touching the sending of the Consul into Asia, or E diminishing his forces, for fear they should have war with the French.

Not long after M. Aurelius Cotta, a lieutenant of Scipio, came to Rome with the Embassadors of King Antiochus, and likewise King Eumenes and the Rhodians. Cotta reported and declared first in the Senat, and afterwards in a full assembly of the people (by order and commandment from the LL. of the Councell) what affairs had passed in Spain. Whereupon ordeined it was, that there should be holden a solemn procesion for 3 daies together: and order was given, that a head of greater cattle should be killed for sacrifice. This done, the Senat assembled for to give audience to King Eumenes; first above all other matters: who briefly in few words having rendered "thanks to the LL. of the Senat, for that they had delivered him and his brother from siege, and" "proceeded his realm against the wrongs and outrages offered by Antiochus: also having testified his joy by way of gratulation for their prosperous and fortunat affairs achieved both by land and" "sea (especially, in that they had discomfited and put to flight K. Antiochus, & driven him out of his" "camp, that he could not keep the field; and withall disfeized and dispossessed him first of Europe" "and afterwards of all that part of Asia which lieth on this side the mountain Taurus, he concluded" "died and knit up all with this, That as touching his own demerits and employments about their" "affairs, he had rather they took knowledge by their own generals, captains and lieutenants," "than from his mouth. They all approved well of this speech of his, and willed him to speak boldly" "without bashful modesty in that cause. What he thought in equity and reason the Senat and people" "of Rome was to yield unto him by way of fully recompence: assuring him that the Senat would do" "it more willingly and liberally (if possibly they could) according to the worth of his desert."

The King answered thus again, that in case any other had made him that offer, and given him the" "choice of his own rewards, he would gladly have used the Councell of that honorable court" "of the Roman Senat (to he might have the means and liberty to ask their advice) to this end that" "he would not be thought, either to exceed measure in covetous desire, or pass the bounds of" "modesty in craving a recompence. But now considering they are themselves to give that reward," "much more reason it is that their magnificence and bounty to him & his brethren should be re"ferred to their own abatement and dilation. The LL. of the Senat were nothing moved at this language of his, but urged him still to speak himself in his own cause. And after a certain time that they had strived a-vice, the LL. in courteous and kindnets, the King in modesty and thankfulness, yielding one unto the other reciprocally, in such amiable and mutual manner as hardly can be exprest, Eumenes departed out of the temple. The Senat perswaded nevertheless in their resolution saying, it was very absurd and unbecoming that the King should be ignorant upon what hopes he was come, and what he purposed to make suit and petition for: and himself must needs of all others know best what was meetest and most expedient for his own Kingdom: yea, and was far better acquainted with the estate and affairs of Asia than the Senat w.s. And therefore no remedy, but he must be called again, and compelled to declare and deliver what his will, desire and mind was to have. Heron upon the King was brought back into the temple by the Pretor, and urged to speak. I then at last, my LL. (qd. he) I would have perswaded still in silence, but that I knew that soon ye will call the embassage of the Rhodians in place, and that after audience given unto them, must neither will nor choose but make some speech of necessity: and verily with so much more difficulty shall I speak, because their demands will be such, as if they would seem not only to require nothing prejudicial and hurtfull unto me, but also (which more is) matters little or nothing pertinent to themselves. For plead they will and maint. in the cause of the Cities in Greece, saying, they ought to be free and at liberty: which being once obtained, who can make doubt but rather they will withdraw from our obedience, not only the Cities which had been freed, but also those which have been homagers and tributaries unto us of old time? yea, and will keep them as subjects in very deed and wholly at their devotion, whom being thus bound and obliged to them by so great a benefit, they call by the name of Associates, and would make the world believe they repay them for no other? Yet forsooth (I wot well) in affecting and aspiring to this great power & puissance, they will carry it so cleanly & make semblant as though this in no wise touched and concerned them: but it is befitting you alone, correspondent & answerable to other former deeds of yours. But be ye well advised, and let not their glowing words deceive you, take ye heed, I say, that ye go not with an uneven hand nor bear your selves equally, whilst ye deprede and abate too much some of your allies, in promoting and advancing others beyond all measure: and above all, beware that they who have lifted up their spear and born arms against you, be not more kindly interested & in better condition, then your loving friends and faithful confederates. For mine own part, in all other things I would gladly be thought of every man, rather to keep within my compass & yea, and yield somewhat of my right whatsoever it is, then to strive too much in the maintenance and holding thereof: but in the question of your friendship, my affection towards you, and to the honour which shall come from you, I cannot endure with patience that any one should out-go and out-run my self. This I account the greatest inobedience left unto me by my father the first, of all those that inhabit in Greece and Asia, who was entertained in your amity and continued in the same alwaies most fast, most constant and sure ever to his dying day: who not only shewed fond affection and loyal heart unto you, but also was in person employed in all your wars which ye made in Greece, as well at land as at sea; assisted and aided you with all kind of provisions, in such sort, as none of all your allies besides was any way comparable or came near to him. And finally, as he earnestly exhorted the Boeotians to accept of your society, he sunk down, swooned in the very assembly & not long after yielded up his spirit and dyed. His footstepes have I trodden, and followed his good example. For affection verily and floudious desire to honour you, I could not have more then he had (for I suppose it was impossible to surpass him therein:) but in kind pleasures, effectual services, offices, countesses, and favours, to surmount and go beyond him; the goodness of fortune, the occasion of times, King Antiochus and the war of Asia, have mingled ample and sufficient matter unto me. Antiochus King of Asia and part of Europe gave me his daughter in marriage, and with her endowed me with the repossellion of those Cities which had revolted from you. He fed me moreover with great hopes of increasing my dominion in time to come, if I would have sided with him against you. I will glory and vaunt of this, that I have done nothing to offend and displease you: I will rather rehearse those pleasures and services which are becoming the ancient amity and friendship between our house and you. In forces as well for land as sea, I have friended and helped your Generals in such wise, as I forbid all your allies besides to do the like: furnished them I have with victuals on the land, with provisions at sea. In all the battels and conflicts by ships (which were many and in sundry places) I was present in person. I underwent all travells, adventures all perils, and no where favoured my self and thought much of my pains: yea, that which is the greatest calamity and misery that followeth wars, I was besieged, and endured it: I was shot and flut up within Pergamus, to the utter hazard of my life and of my realm and royal dignity. And after I was delivered from that danger and the siege raised, albeit Antiochus of one side and Selenus on another, lay encamped about the principal fortresse of my Kingdom, I quit mine own affairs and laid all aside, to come with my whole fleet into Hellaspis; & there to meet with L. Scipio your Consul, and to aid him in transporting and waiking his army into Asia. And when your forces were passed over, I never afterwards departed from him: there was not a Roman soldier more remain ordinarily in your camp then my self and my brethren. No expeditions, no rodes, no exploits of horse service was there without me. In battel have I stood foot & guarded that quarter which the Consul appointed me to keep. I will not say, my LL. what

the Rhodian Embassadors.

A "one person there is that hath done so good service for you in the last war as I my self, and who is any way comparable unto me: nay, I dare make comparison with all states and Princes whatsoever, whom you esteeme and honour so highly? Antiochus before he was your friend, was your professed enemy: he came not to you with his aids in the time of his uprigh fortune, and whilst his Kingdom flourished in good estate; but when he was banished, driven out of his Kingdom, and turned out of all, he fled into your camp, accompanied only with a small troop and cornet of horsemen: Yet nevertheless, because he fled fast to you and bare himself in all loyalty, and shewed his prowess in your behalf against Sphax, and the Carthaginians in Africa, you not only restored him to his fathers Kingdom, and placed him again in the royal throne, but you laid unto his dominion the richest part of the realm of Sphax, made him the most puissant and greatest Prince of all the Kings in Africa. What reward then, nay, what honour are we worthy to have at your hands, we (I say) who never were enemies, but ever friends? My father, my self, my brethren, have born arms in your quarrell by land, by sea, not only in Asia but far from our own home and native soil in Peloponnesus, to Bactria, in Ætolia, during the war with Philip, with Antiochus, with the Ætolians. What recompence demand you then? My some man say. Forasmuch as (my LL.) you will have it so, and it is your pleasure that I should speak my mind, good reason it is that I obey. This shall stand for all; if you have disposed Antiochus of all on this side Taurus with this intent, to hold those lands your own selves: none better then you, and whom I would rather wish to be my neighbours and to confine upon me: neither can I think me, of any means in the world more important to the safety and strength of my Kingdom. But in case your purpose be to deprede and retire your forces from thence, I dare behold to say, that of your allies, (and put them all together) there is not one more worthy then my self to have and hold that which you have won by conquest. But an honourable deed it is and magnificent, to set free and deliver Cities out of thralldome and servitude. True and I my self am of the same opinion, provided alwaies, that they had attempted nought by way of hostility against you. But in case they had taken part and sided with Antiochus, how much more would it redde with wisdom, nay, with equity and reason, to be merciful to your allies who have so well deserved at your hands, then to regard your enemies. This Oration of the King much pleased the LL. of the Senat, and soon it was seen by their countenance that they would deal bountifully and liberally with him. yea, and gratified him in what they might. Then audience was given to a brief embassage of the Smyrneans, who by occasion that some of the Rhodians were absent, came between and delivered their message. Highly were these Smyrneans commended, in that they chose rather to endure all extremities then to yield themselves unto King Antiochus. Then the Rhodians entered in place: and the chief man of their embassage, after he had declared the first occasion and beginning of the amity which they had with the people of Rome, and shewed withall the good actions and services which the Rhodians had performed in the wars first against Philip and then against Antiochus, went on and spake as followeth. Right honourable, there is nothing more difficult and troublesome unto us in all the businesse that we have in hand then this one thing, that there is some variance and matter to be debated between us and Eumenes, the only King of all others, with whom especially every one of us in privat, and (that which toucheth us more) your City in publick, doth entertain the bond of friendship and mutual hospitality. Howbeit no repugnancy is in our affections (my LL.) but even the course of this world and nature it self (the mightiest thing of all) which do joyneth us and causeth difference: this maketh us (being men free born) to defend and maintain the freedom also of others: this is it, that moveth KK. to be desirous to have all in servitude and subjection under them, and at their command. But howsoever it is, our modesty and the reverent regard we have of the King person butteth us more, then either the debating of our cause with him is otherwise difficult unto us, or the deciding thereof like to be intricate and troublesome unto you. For in case it were so, that you could not honour and reward a King, your ally and friend, for his good service done in this war (for recompence whereof you sit in consultation) by no other means, unless you deliver free Cities into his hands, to serve in bondage; then were it hard for you to resolve: for fear lest either ye should send away a prince (your friend and confederate) without guard and honour: or seem to change that laudable enterprise of yours which you have begun, to stain and blemish your glory now (which you have acquired by the war against Philip) with reducing so many Cities and states into servitude. But your happy fortune causeth you right well of this difficulty and necessity, that you need not fear either to impair your credit and favour with your friends, or to endamage your reputation and honour among men. For (the gods be thanked therefore) you have achieved victory, no less rich then glorious, and sufficient (if I may so say) to discharge all your debts, and set you clear with all the world. For Lycania, Phrygia both the great and the lesse, whole Pisidia, Cheronesus, and in brief all the confines of Europe are under your dominion. Of all which provinces, if you lay but one by (which you will your selves) for K. Eumenes, you shall mightily enlarge and amplify his Kingdom: but, give him, if you will, make him equal to the greatest princes and monarchs that are. You see then by this, that you may recompence and enrich your allies out of the conquest gotten by war, and nevertheless hold out your good custom that you have begun, remembering alwaies what title you pretended first in your war with Philip, & know lately with Antiochus considering withall, what you did then after Philip was vanquished, & what is required and expected at your hands now: not so much because you have used it already dy, as for that it was meet and decent you should do. Many cities there be (and those colour-ably just and lawful) to enter into arms; one pretended this, another that some in right of land and territories, other of villages; some lay claim to towns and Cities, others challenge the possession of ports and havens, and one tract or other of the sea-coasts. As for you, before you enjoyed these things, you desired them not: since then ye have now compassed the whole earth, and are LL. of the world, you cannot possibly cover the same any more. Warred you have and fought for honour and glory, in the fight of all the nations of the earth, who now this long time behold and regard your name and empire, no less than they do the gods immortal. And I wot not well, whether those things which we hardly come by be not with more difficulty holden & kept afterwards, than they were purchased. You undertook to deliver & rid out of the servitude and oppression of Kings, and to maintain liberty, a most ancient and noble state, renowned for their worthy and famous acts, and right commendable for their singular learning and knowledge in all sciences. For your honour it is, having once received all this nation in your safeguard and protection, to defend and preserve the same for ever. And think not, that those Cities only are more Greek which are built and seated upon the ancient soil of Greece, than their colonies which have been drawn from them, & in times past went from thence into Asia: for the changes of air and place hath wrought no alteration, either in the nature and complexion, or the manners and fashions of the people. As for us, endeavoured we have do better and better, and each City hath entered into honest contention and religious emulation to out-go and surmount their forefathers and first-founders in all good arts and commendable virtues. There be many of you who have been in Greece, many have visited the Cities of Asia, and setting aside this only, that we are farther distant and remote from you, there is no difference and odds between us and them. The Massilians, whom if possible it had been, that an imbred temperature might be-steeled and overcome with the strength and nature, as it were in the soil) in many wild, barrous, and untamed nations, environing them round about, would have made cruel and savage long before this day; we hear say and understand to be in that request and cultivation (by good right, and their desert) among you, as if they dwelt in the very midst and heart of Greece, for not only they retain still the very natural language of their own, they keep them to their old fashion of apparel and attire, and carry the same port in their gesture and countenance, but also above all things they have kept and observed their customs, their manners, their laws and natural disposition pure and entire, notwithstanding the frequent commerce with those, in the midst of whom they converse and inhabit. Well, the mountain Taurus at this day is the limit of your empire and signory one way: and therefore whatsoever lieth between you and that bound, you must not think it remote, but look how far your arms have reached, so far let your laws and jurisdiction extend. Let Barbarians, who know no other laws than lords' beils, have their Kings, since they take much pleasure in them, and much good may they do their hearts: as for the Greeks, they must do as they may, and are not (we confess) in so good case as you, howbeit they carry with them as brave a mind as your selves: and the day hath been, when they were Monarchs, when they conquered by their own sword a mighty dominion, and held the same when they had it. Now they are content with that empire where it now is, nay, they wish it may remain and continue there for evermore, where it is settled at this present. They shall be well spared, and think they are well, to maintain their liberty by your force of arms, since they have no means of their own to defend the same. But (will some man say) there be certain Cities that held a fide and banded with Antiochus I answer again, so were some before that took part with Philip, so there were that combined with Pyrrhus, as for example, the Tarentins: and so say nothing of other States, which I could name and rehearse, even Carthage it self enjoyed freedom and is governed by her own laws. Consider then my LL. what a precedent therein ye have set down to your own selves, and how ye ought to confirm and uphold to good an example. You must resolve to deny that unto the covetous desire of Eumenes, which you would not grant to your ownire against the Carthaginians, which they had most justly deserved. And as for us Rhodians, with what valour and loyalty we have served and aided you, as well in this war, as in all others which ye have had in those parts and quarters, we report us to our own selves, and leave it to your judgment. And now in time of peace, we here present unto you that consell, which if you will accept and approve, all the world will believe and say, That you have born your selves more honourably in the usage, than in the achievement of your victory.

This Oration seemed to fit well the greatness and majesty of the Romans. When the Rhodians had done, the Embassadors of Antiochus were called in. Who after the usual and hale manner of those that crave pardon, confessed the King was in fault, and humbly besought the LL. of the Senat to have more regard of their own accustomed gracious clemency, than remember the Kings repulse, who had paid sufficiently for it already: and finally that they would ratifie and confess by their authority, the peace granted by L. Scipio the Lord General, according to those conditions, which by him were capitulated and set down. So both the Senat thought good to admit of that peace, and also within few daies after the people gave their assent and established the same. And this accord was solemnly confirmed in the Capitol, with the Kings Proctrator or agent, to wit, Antipater, the chief of the embassage, who also was Antiochus his brothers son. This done, the other embassages of Asia had audience, and were all dispatched with this one answer, that the Senat would send ten deputies or commissioners, according to the ancient

ancient customs of their ancestors, to hear, decide, and compose all their affairs of Asia. But the final conclusion of all should be this, That whatsoever pertained to the dominion of Antiochus on this side the mountain Taurus, should be assigned to King Eumenes, excepting the countries of Lycia and Caria, so far as the river Maander, all which must lie to the figuory of the Rhodians.
Attouching the other Cities of Asia, which had been tributaries to Antiochus, those also were to pay tribute to Eumenes: but such as were sometimes homagers to Antiochus, those should be enfranchised and remain free. The ten commissioners whom they appointed were these, to wit, Q. Minucius Rufus, L. Furius Purpureo, Q. Minucius Thermus, App. Claudius Nero, Cn. Cornelius Metellus, M. Iunius Bruttus, L. Anturuncius, L. Brutius Paulus, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Tiberio. These men had plenary power and full commission to take order and determine as they thought good, in all the occurrences that were presented in these Affairs. But they had direction from the Senat, as touching the principal points: Imprimis, that all Lycia and Phrygia, both the more and the less, that Mysia, with the Kings chaires and forrells, that the Cities of Lycia and Ionia, except those that were free at the day of the battell fought with Antiochus, and expressly by name Magnesia near Sipylus, together with Caria, which is called Hydrata, and all the territories of Hydrata lying toward Phrygia; moreover Telmessus and the forts of the Telmessians, relieving only that territory which belonged to Ptolemus the Telmessian; that all these countries, I say, and Cities above written, should be given and granted to King Eumenes. Item, That the Rhodian should be enfranchised in Lycia, without the forcell Telmessus, the forts and territory appertaining sometime to Ptolemus Telmessus: which parcels, I say, were referred as well from Eumenes, as the Rhodians. Item, to the Rhodians was granted that part of Caria, which lieth beyond the river Maander, near to the ille Rhodes, together with the towns, villages, fortresses, and lands bounding upon Pisidia: except those towns which were free the day before the battell with King Antiochus in Asia. The Rhodians, when they had given thanks to the Senat for their graunties, were in hand with them for the City Soli in Cilicia: they alleged, that they likewise as well as themselves, were descended from Argos: by occasion of which consanguinity and nearalliance, they loved together as brethren by nature: in regard whereof, they made petition that over and besides other donations, they would do them this extraordinary favour, as to exempt that City also from the servitude and subjection of K. Antiochus. Then were the Embassadors of King Antiochus called for, and treated withall about this matter, but to no effect. For Antipater stood stoutly upon this point, pleaded hard, that the accord was past already, and might not be revoked or altered: and that against the tenour of the articles and covenants therein comprised, it was not the City Soli, but also Cilicia that the Rhodians demanded; and never would they rest till they were gotten over the mountain Taurus. Then were the Rhodians called back again into the Senat, unto whom the LL. of the Senat, after they had made relation how earnest the Kings Embassador was with them upon the point, added thus much moreover and said, That if the Rhodians deemed in very deed that the matter concerned the honour of their City and State, the Senat would work all possible means to cause the Kings Embassadors to relent, how stiff and obstinate soever they stood. For this courteous, the Rhodians thanked them much more heartily than for all theret before, and said withall, that they would yeild and give place to the arrogant spirit of Antiochus, rather than seem to give any cause or occasion of troubling the peace. And so as touching the City Soli, there was no alteration made.

Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed, the Embassadors of the Massilians brought intelligence, that L. Babius the Pretor, being in his journey towards his province of Spain, was entrapped and enclosed by the Ligurians, and many of his train killed outright in the place, that himself mortally wounded fled without his horse and sergeants unto Massilia, and within three dayes left this life. The Senat upon the advertisement ordeined P. Iunius Brutus the Pro-pretor in Heitruia to go in person into the farther Spain, and govern the same as his own province: but first to leave Heitruia and the army there to one of the Lieutenants whom he pleased to make choise of. This decree of the Senat, together with letters from Spurius Posthumus the Pretor of the City was sent into Heitruia: and so P. Iunius departed as Pro-pretor into Spain. In which province L. Aemilius Paulus (who afterwards won a right glorious victory of King Perseus) having the former year fought unfortunately, now a little before the arrival of his successor, gave battelle to the Lusitanians with an army rallied and assembled in batt in which the enemies were put to the worse and driven to flee. One thousand eight hundred of them well armed were left dead in the field, 3300 taken prisoners, and their camp forced and ransacked. The bruit that went of this victory let all matters in Spain in greater quietness.

The same year upon the third day before the Calends of January, L. Valerius Flaccus, M. As-tinius Serranus, and L. Valerius Tappo, the three Triumvirs, by order from the Senat, planted a Latin Colony at Bolonia; and three thousand people were thither sent to dwell. Every gentleman by calling that served on horseback had 70 acres of ground for out unto him, and the rest of the coloners fifty apeece. The land divided thus among them had been conquered from the Boians in Gaul: and those Gauls first had disposed of the Twelvins of the same.

This year there were many men of mark and name that sued to be Censors: and this competition as it had not been of sufficient importance it self to move matter of debate, was the occasion of a contention and variance much greater. The competitors were these, T. Quinctius Flamininus, P. Cornelius Scipio, the son of Cneus: L. Valerius Flaccus, M. Porcius Cato, M. Claudius Marcellus.

29. December.

Marcellus, and M. Atilius Glabrio, even he who had vanquished Antiochus and the Epirotes at Thermopylae. To this man last rehered the peoples favour and affection most inclined, by reason of many congiaries and largesses which he had given amongst them in publick, by means whereof many a man was obliged and bound unto him. The rest, being to many and nobly defended with all, took it to the heart, and could not endure that such a person as he newly risen and come up, all, took it to the heart, and should be preferred before them; whereupon P. Sempronius Gracchus, and C. Sempronius Rustilius, two Tribunes of the commonalty, com-mended action against him to answer at a day, laying to his charge that there remaineth a surplussage of the Kings army and other pillage gotten in the camp of Antiochus, over and above all that he either carryed and shewed in triumph, or brought in accompt into the City chamber. Many and sundry depositions there were to prove this indictment, as well of lieutenants as of colonels. But M. Cato above all other witnesses was most noted: whose great authority acquired in the whole countrey his life (which he had passed hitherto in all upright conversation and constant gravity) was much empaired and discredited now, with his white robe that he bare on his back. He being proceeded as a witness, deposed and gave evidence, that he had seen certain plate as well gold as silver, as among the rest of the pillage found in the Kings camp, which he never could see eye on in all the triumph above said. In the end, Glabrio, because he would bring some displeasure particularly, and most of all upon Cato, said, he would give over his suit for the Censorship, since that there was another competitor as newly come up as himself, (whereat the Nobles indeed took indignation inwardly, although they said nothing) who pursued the cause to against him, even within credible and inestimable perjury. Well, a fine was set upon his head of a thousand asses. And twice was the matter traversed, whether the mulct should be taken off or paid. But when the third day was come, and the party in trouble (Atilius) had quite increased to sue for the dignity, the people would not give their voices as touching the payment of the fine aforesaid, and the Tribunes also themselves left fall their action. So T. Quinctius Flaminius, and M. Claudius Marcellus were created Censors.

About the same time the Senat sate within the City in the temple of Apollo, in regard of L. Aemilius Regillus, who had vanquished the Admiral of King Antiochus in battell at sea; where he had audience given, and when he had declared what exploits he had done, namely, against how puissant Armados of the enemies he had fought, and how many ships of theirs he had either sunk or taken; The LL. of the Councell without one generall consent and accord, granted unto him a navall triumph. And he triumphed upon the Calends of February. In which triumph there were born in shew fifty crowns save one, of beaten gold: but nothing that store of coin as such a royal triumph required, only there were carried in pomp 33700 Attick tetradrachms, i. 13300 cistophors. After this (by decree of the Senat) there were processions celebrated in consideration that L. Aemilius Paulus had brought his affairs in Spain to an happy issue.

Not long after L. Scipio came also into the City, who became he would not be inferior to his brother in the honourable addition of his name, caused himself to be furnished Asiatick. He discomfited before the Senat, and in the publick audience of the people, as touching his worthy deeds. Divers there were who construed the thing thus and said, That the war was greater in name than difficult unto him in the manning; for with fighting one only memorable battell the matter was achieved and ended, but the glory indeed of that victory was begun unto him and prepared for his hand at Thermopylae. But if a man should judge hereof aright, and according to truth, the battell of Thermopylae may rather be accompted an exploit against the Epirotes than King Antiochus. For what great forces I pray you had Antiochus there in the field of his own? But in the last battell foughten in Asia, the whole power and puissance that he had in all Asia, stood there to be seen, yea, and all the aids and succours which he could levy out of the nations as far as to the utmost parts of the East. Great cause therefore they had both to render much praise and thanksgiving to the immortal gods, in as ample manner as possibly they could devise (for vouchsafing unto them to brave a victory as it was, and the same with such ease and expedition) and also to grant a triumph to the General. He triumphed upon the last of February, even in the very day that maketh the leap year. This triumph of his was much greater than that other of his brothers in regard of the magnificent pomp and shew represented to the eye: but if one call to mind the substance of the things themselves, and compare the dangers, the conflicts and difficulties of the one war with the other: there is no more equality between them, then if a man should in comparison of captain, set Antiochus to match with Annibal. He shewed in triumph two hundred thirty four field ensigns and standards: he carried before him the portraits of two hundred thirty four towns and Cities: a hundred thirty four teeth of ivory: two hundred thirty four crowns of gold: 23700 pounds weight of silver: 234000 Attick tetradrachms: 231090 cistophores: 10000 Philip-perces of gold: of silver plate, and that was all graven and chased: 104 thousand four hundred twenty four pound weight: of golden plate as much as weighed 104 thousand four hundred twenty four pound weight: 32 great commanders: either governors of provinces under the King, or attendants in his court. Every souldier serving on foot, had given unto him 25 deniers: every centurion had double so much; and the gentlemen or knights triple. After the triumph done, the souldiers had their pay double in money, yea; and the portion of corn likewise was doubled. He had moreover given them already a double proportion in Asia, presently upon the end of the battell. A year it was almost after his Consulship expired ere he triumphed. And

A And much about one and the same time, both Cn. Manlius and the Consul entered into Asia and Q. Fabius into the Pretor repaired to the fleet. Moreover the Consul had work enough and wanted not matter of war within France. The seas were quiet after that Antiochus was defeated and subdued: Fabius therefore studied which way to take, and how to employ himself and his force at sea, because he would not be thought and reputed idle in his province: so he resolved at length to put over with his fleet into Crete. Now they of Cydon warred at that time against the Gortynians and the Gnosians: and the voice went that there was a great number of Romans and Italians, captives, living in slavery and bondage in every quarter of that Island. He looked therefore from Ephesus and set sail for Candy, and so soon as he was arrived and set land, he sent his messengers about to the Cities, willing them to abandon their armor and increase from war, and to seek and seek up throughout all the Cities and territories those captives and prisoners aforesaid, to bring them to him: and moreover, to send their Embassadors or agents, with whom he would treat concerning the affairs that in common touched as well the Candians as the Romans. The Islanders made small regard of these messages: and unless it were the Gortynians, there was not one that delivered the captives. Valerius Antias hath recorded, That out of the whole Island there were rendered to the number of four thousand; because the inhabitants were frighted with threats of war. And that this was the cause why Fabius, although he performed no other exploit, obtained of the Senat a navall triumph. From Crete, Fabius returned to Ephesus: from whence he let forth three ships to the coast of Thracia, and commanded that the garlions of Antiochus should quit Aenus and Morona, to the end, that those Cities likewise might be set free and untroubled.

The eight and thirtieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the eight and thirtieth Book.

D Marcus Fulvius the Consul besieged the Ambracians in Epirus, and recovered them upon compulsion to mercy. He subdued Cephalonia, vanquished & brought under his subjection the Acetians, and made peace with them. The Consul Cn. Manlius his colleague, overcame the Gallogreeks, the Tellophagians, the Tellofages, and the Trocmians, who were passed over into Asia under the conduct of Brennus: the only people that within the mountain Taurus yielded not obedience to the Romans. The first beginning and rising is set down: also the time when as they seized first of these places which they hold. Here is recounted also the example of the rare valor and chastity of a woman, who being the wife of a certain King of the Gallogreeks, chanced to be taken prisoner, and when a Centurion had forced and abused her body, she killed him with her own hands. The Centurion being assailing of the City: in which by computation were numbered 258328 souls of Roman Citizens. E Amity was contraited with Ariarathes King of Cappadocia. Cn. Manlius triumphed over the Gallogreeks, notwithstanding the contradiction of those ten Commissioners, by whose advice and assistance he had entered and engrossed the accord of alliance: with Antiochus, and pleaded his own cause himself in the Senat against them. Scipio Africanus was indicted as for a say, by Quintus Petilius Atricus a Tribune of the Commons: as others, by Naevius, for that he had defrauded the City Chamber of some part of the Pillage which he got from Antiochus. When the day was come that he should make his answer, he was called up to the publick pulpit and place of audience, and with a loud voice said unto the people, My masters you that are Citizens of Rome, this very day have I won Carthage: and with that he ascended up into the Capitoll, and the people accompanied him thither: and from thence because he would avoid these hard and injurious courses of the Tribunes, and be no more tormented with them, he retired himself to Litterium, as it were into both places. L. Scipio Asiaticus (the brother of Africanus) was accused of the same crime of embezzling the publick treasure and robbing the common-weal, and thereof condemned: but as he was led to prison, and should have been laid up in bonds and irons, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus Tribune of the Commons (who before time had been an adversary and enemy unto the Scipios) interposed himself and rescued him: and for that pleasure done, he took to wife the daughter of Africanus. When the Pretor sent the treasurers of the City, so far off they were from finding any remnant or token of the King riches and money, that they could not meet with as much as would satisfy the fine wherein he was condemned. And when his kinsfolk and friends had contributed and raised an infinite masse of money for him, he would not receive the same: and as much only was redeemed and bought again, as might serve for his necessities to find and maintain him.

During

During the time of the wars in Asia, the affairs also in Etolia were in small rest and quietness: which troubles arose first from the Athamanians, who after that Aminander was dispossessed of his Kingdom, were held in obedience by garrisons under the captainship of King Philip: and they bare themselves so proud, insolent, and outrageous in their government, that the Athamanians found a great misse of Aminander, and were desirous of his again. Now remained he at that time as a banished person in Etolia: and upon letters received from his own nation (concerning the late wherein Athamania then stood) he conceived some hope to recover his crown again; whereupon he sent the messengers back to Argirhea (the chief City of Athamania) unto the principall men of the country, with this credence, That if he might be assured of the affection and love of the people, he would procure the aid of the Aetolians and come unto Athamania, accompanied with the elect partionages (and those are the council of the nation) and Nicanor the Pretor. When he understood and perceived that they were prest and ready to do him all service, he advertised them oftentimes upon what day he would enter with his army into Athamania. At the first there were but four persons that conspired against the Macedonian garrison and these took every one six more unto them for to be assistant in the execution of their complot. But afterwards trusting but little in this small number of their adherents and complices (who indeed were fitter to keep counsell and conceal a matter secretly, then to perform any thing valiantly) they adjoynd unto them the like number unto the other: so as now they were two and fifty in all; and they divided themselves into four companies. One crew of them went to Heraclea; another to Tetraphylia, where the Kings treasure was usually kept; a third took their way to Theudoria; and the fourth to Argirhea. But they all agreed upon this purpose, to hold themselves quiet and peaceable at their first coming, and to converse in the market place of these Cities, as if they were come about some particular negotiation of their own: and upon a certain day appointed to set to it at once, and to raise the whole multitude for to expell the Macedonian garrisons out of their fortresses. Now when the day was come, and Aminander ready upon the frontiers with his forces of a thousand Aetolians, the garrisons of the Macedonians were at one instant chased out of those four Cities aforesaid, like as it was comploted before hand: and letters were dispatched from all parts into other Cities, advising them to deliver and free themselves from the tyranny of Philip, and restore Aminander into his lawfull kingdom and throne of his father. Thus the Macedonians were expelled in every quarter: only the town Theium made resistance and held out some few daies against the siege, by occasion that Zeno (captain of the garrison there) had intercepted the letters, and they that sided with Philip were possessed of the castle. But in the end he surrendered it was likewise unto Aminander, and all Athamania reduced unto his obedience excepting only the fort of Atheronum, situate upon the marches of Macedony.

Philip advertised of the revolt of Athamania, accompanied with a power of six thousand fighting men, put himself in his journey, and with exceeding expedition, marched as far as Gomphi. Where he left the greater part of his forces, (for they had not been able to endure so long a journey) and with two thousand came to Athamania, the only place held by his garrison to his use. And from thence, after he had founded the next neighbours, and soon found that there was nothing but hostility among them, he retired to Gomphi, and joined withall his forces together, returned into Athamania. Then he sent Zeno before with a thousand footmen, and gave him in charge to seize upon Ethopia, a place that directly for his purpose commandeth Argirhea; and seeing that his men were possessed thereof, himself sat him down, and pitched his tents about a certain temple dedicated to the name of Iupiter. There he was forced by reason of the frost and stormy weather to stay one whole day, and the morrow after he went forward with his army to Argirhea. As they marched, behold they discovered the Athamanians, running from divers parts to the hill tops, which stood over the way along. They had no sooner espied them, but the foremost ensignes made slay, and all that regiment of the vanguard was surprised with fear and flight. Every man began for his part to cast many counsels, and think with himself what should become of them, in case their companies were entred once into the vallies, so checked by those rocks aforesaid. This tumult and trouble caused the King perforce to call back those in the vanguard, and to retire the same way that he came, notwithstanding he was very desirous (if they would have seconded him) to have made quick speed, and gotten through those streights. The Athamanians at first followed after them aloot quietly enough: but when they had once joined with the Aetolians, leaving them behind to come upon the tail of the enemy, they spread themselves all about and flanked them on both sides: some of them also got afore their head by the next waies which they were acquainted with, and beset the passages; insomuch, as the Macedonians were to greatly troubled, that forced they were (more like men that fled in disarray, then marched in good order) to leave much of their armor, and many of their men behind, to passe over the river; and there the chase ended. From thence the Macedonians returned safely to Gomphi, and to forth into Macedony.

The Athamanians and the Aetolians assembled from all parts to Ethopia for to surpris and defeat Zeno and that regiment of a thousand Macedonians which was with him. But the Macedonians, reposing no great trust in that place, retired from Ethopia, to an hill much higher and steeper

A steeper on all sides, and therefore lesse acceptable. The Athamanians having found out diverse passages unto it, enforced them to forgo that hold also. And when they were dispersed among the blind rocks, and unto them unknown, and could not readily find the way out, some of them were taken prisoners, & others slain. Many for fear tumbled down headlong from the pitch of the cliffs, and brake their necks, and very few escaped with Zeno to the King. The next day after they obtained truce, until they had committed their dead to earth.

Aminander having thus repossessed his realm, sent Embassadors to Rome unto the Senat like-wise unto the Seepios in Asia (who after the great battell with Antiochus, sojourned in Ephesus) He craved peace, and pardon, he excused himself in that he had recovered his fathers Kingdom by the means and help of the Aetolians, and withall laid great fault and blame upon King Philip. As for the Aetolians, they departed out of Athamania, and made an expedition against the Amphilochians, and by consent of the greater part (reduced the whole nation under their puissance and subjection. Having thus regained Amphilochia (for in times past it appertained to their suzerainty) rose the same hope they passed over in Aperrantia, which yielded also for a great part thereof, and came under their obedience. As for the Dolopians, they never belonged to the Aetolians, but unto Philip. And at the first they assembled together in arms, but understanding once that the Amphilochians took part with the Aetolians, that Philip was fled out of Athamania, and that his garrison was put to the sword, they revolted likewise from Philip, and turned to the Aetolians. Who making now full account that they were low enough on all sides from the Macedonians, by reason of so many nations which envired them about, they took knowledge (by the common opinion) of the defeat of Antiochus by the Romans in Asia, and not long after their own Embassadors returned to Rome without hope of peace, relating withall that Fulvius the Consul had passed the sea already with an army. Upon these news, they were much troubled and afraid; and in this perplexity, they induced and procured first the Rhodian and then the Athenian Embassages, to the end that by the credit and convenance of these two States, their praier lately rejected, might have more easie access to the Senat: and with them they sent to Rome once again the principall personages of their nation, to try their last hope of obtaining peace; and never forsook to prevent war, before the enemy was come welnear within their sight. Now had M. Fulvius transported his forces to Apollonia, and devised with the princes and states of the Epirots, where to begin war. The Epirots advised him to assail Ambracia, which as then was united to the Aetolians. And why? if either the Aetolians should come to the defence of the place, they had a goodly large and open plain all about to bid them battle, or if they refused the field, and would not fight, they should find no great difficulty to assault and force the town. For not only there was at hand store enough of timber and other matter to raise mounts, maneleets, and other fabricks; but Arcthon a river navigable, very commodious to transport all necessaries unto them, runneth under the wals of the City; and besides, the summer was a fit season for war-service. With these reasons they persuaded the Consul to conduct his army through Epirus. But when the Consul was come before Ambracia, he found it was no easie peece of work to besiege, and assault the town. This Ambracia is situate under the stony and craggy hill, which the inhabitants call Perambra. The City it self looketh unto the West, what way as the wall reacheth toward the fields and the river: the fort and castle thereof standeth upon the hill, and regardeth the East. The river Arcthon running out to Acarnania, dischargeeth itself into an arme of the sea, which beareth the name of the City near adjoyning, and is called Ambracia. This town, besides that it is well guarded with the river of one side, and defended with hills on the other, is fortified also with a strong wall, in circuit somewhat more then three miles about. Fulvius encamped strongly on the fields side, in two holds of a pretty distance asunder, and raised one sconce upon an high ground, opposite against the fortres of the town. All these places he determined to enclose within the compass of a trench and rampier, to the end, that they who were shut up within the town, might have no egrets, and that from without there should be no ingrets, for any aid and succour whatsoever. The Epirots were assembled already at Stratus by an edict from the Pretor Nicanor, to continently upon the rumour that ran of the siege of Ambracia, intending fully at first to march from thence withall their forces. But afterwards, when they perceived that a greater part of the City was streightly beleaguered already, and blocked with trench and rampier; and withall, that the Epirots were encamped upon a plain on the other side of the river, they were of advise to divide their forces in two parts. Eupelemus accompanied with a regiment of a thousand men lightly appointed, passed through the fortifications of the enemies, before they were joined and united together, and entred Ambracia, Nicanor with the rest of the forces pursued at the first by night to assail the camp of the Epirots, considering that the Romans could not easily succour them, by reason of the river running between. But afterwards upon better advise, supposing this to be a dangerous enterprise (for fear lest the Romans should discover their march, and to intercept them that they might not retire again in safety) he altered his mind, and turned to the spoiling and waiving of Acarnania. Now when the Consul had made an end of all his fabricks devised for to inveill and enclose the City, and finishing his engines where with he meant to shake the wall, he approached neer and gave assault in five places at once. Three batteries he planted in equal distance asunder, and where the easiest passage and access was from the plain, full upon that place of the City which they call Pyrhaum and one over against the temple of Aesculapius; and another opposite to the Castle. With ramps the thook the wals, with long poles and hooks he fetched off and plucked down the battiebatlements of the walls. The opponents at first were afraid to see their strange engines, and huddled to hear the terrible noise of their walls battered: but afterwards, seeing that the wall stood upright beyond their expectation, they plucked up their hearts again, and with wisper weighed either great counterpoises and weights of lead, or huge stones, then with a swing they let them fall as in upon the ramp of the engines, or else tumbled mighty big logs of timber thick, and so either brake them pieces, or bare them down. And as for their hockt store, they caught hold of them with iron hooks like anebors, and to draw them over the walls to the other side with a witness and brake both them and their poles. Moreover, they sallied out in the night upon the watch that attended their engines, infused out of themselves in the day time, assailed the corps de garde, and put them great fear. As things stood in these terms before Ambra, the Ætolians by this time were returned to Stratus from their rides which they made into Acarnania. And that Nicander the Pretor conceiving some hope to levy the siege by some seditious and hardy adventure devised that one Nicodemus should put himself within the town of Ambra with a five hundred Ætolians; and appointed one certain night, and an hour also of the same night, when both they from out of the town should assail the forticks and engines of the enemy planted against Pyrrhus, and also himself charge upon the camp of the Romans at the same time, and put them in flight: supposing by this twofold alarm (especially in the night which maketh every thing more fearful) there might be some notable act and memorable exploit done. And Nicodemus verily by his part in the dead time of the night, having passed unseen and not detected by some of the sentinels, and by rebell force broken through the rest of the watches, passed over an arm of the river and recovered the City, and in some measure by this means heartened the beleagured inhabitants to adventure anything, and put them in better hope to accomplish it. And when the night appointed was come, all on a sudden he let upon the engines, as it was before agreed between them. The adventure of this enterprise was much more than the effect, because there were no forces without to join with him; were it that the Pretor of the Ætolians was afraid to be bold, or that he thought it was a better piece of service to aid the Amphilochians newly recovered, whom Perseus King Philip his son, sent from his father to reconquer Dolopia and Amphilochia, assailed with great force and violence. The Romans had planted their ordinance and artillery, as is aforesaid in these places against Pyrrhus, which the Ætolians charged all at once, but not with like preparation of means, nor with the same violence. For some came with burning and flaming firebrands, others carried tow and herbs with pitch, and tapers of dry sticks, and other like matter easy to be kindled, in such sort as all their companies shone again with a light fire. Many of the Romans they killed at the first onset, but when the alarm and tumult was heard within the camp, and the sign given by the Consul, they took arms, and ran space out of all the gates for to relieve and defend them. In one quarter the Ætolians did their deed, and fought with fire and sword: but in another two places after they had given the attempt, rather than began any skirmish, they retired and went their ways. The heat of the fight inclined wholly to one quarter, where the two captains Episthenus and Nicodemus, encouraged their men as they fought from two divers parts, and entertained them with an assured hope, that Nicander according to agreement would be there and charge upon the back of the enemies. This for a good while maintained the courages of the soldiers: but perceiving there was no sign appeared of their countrymen, and that they kept not touch with them, and seeing withal how the number of the enemies increased, and themselves disappointed and destitute, they flaked their fight, and were not loozer upon the enemy, and in the end gave over and having much ado to retire in safety, were chased into the City, after they had burnt some of the Roman engines, and slain a few more of their enemies than they died of themselves. And surely if the service had been followed in execution according as it was compassed and agreed, those deviled engines no doubt might have been destroyed, if not wholly, yet in one part at leastwise, and that with great murder and slaughter of the enemies. The *Ambra*ns, together with those Ætolians which were within the City, not only gave over that nights enterprise, but ever after shewed more coldness to byard themselves again, as if they had been betrayed by their own fellows. Not a man would rally forth upon the ward and watch of the enemies, but they all from their walls and towers stood upon their guard only, and with the vantage of the place defended themselves in safety.

Perseus advertised that the Ætolians approached Amphilochia, quit the siege of the City which he was about to assault: and after he had only barred and waited the territory about respected from those quarters and returned into Macedony. The Ætolians likewise were enticed to depart from thence, by reason that their less-coals were spoiled and overrun: for Plinius the King of the Illyrians, was entered into this river of Corinth with a fleet of 60 barks, and with the fleet of the Acbaean ships that lay in the rode of Patre invetted the maritime tract of Etolia. Against whom were sent a thousand Ætolians, who waited upon the fleet at every turn as they doubled any reaches, and with the vantage of the short waies and next passages by the land, were ready to welcome them on the banks and make head against them.

The Romans lying still in siege before Ambra, by battering and shaking the walls in many places, had diminished a great part of the City, and laid it open: howbeit, they could not enter with it. For at every breach where the wall was broken down, they were ready to make a new encounter, and the soldiers standing upon the very ruins, served in stead of a bulwark. The Consul seeing he could not prevail by open force, determined to undermine and make a secret way

A way in the ground into the City: but first he covered the place where they wrought with mantles. For a good while the pioneers were not perceived by the enemies, notwithstanding they wrought both night and day, not only digging under the earth, but also casting up the mould as they went. But an huge heap of earth bearing up close from the left, was discovered, and gave them within the town to understand what the enemies were about, and fearing that they had wrought so far already as under their walls, and that they were at the point to make a way into the town, they within began likewise to strike another trench, just against the place covered with mantles aforesaid: and when they had digged to that depth as the bottom might be of the enemies mines, they made no words within, but in great silence laid their ear to in divers places close to the earth, harkning if haply they might hear any noise of the pioneers: and when they once had got in ear of them they contented mind directly against them. And long they were not about it: for anon they came as far as to the void hollow ground, whereas the foundation of the wall stood upon stones and props, which the enemies had set to bear it up. Now when their works were met together, and that there was a continued passage out of this trench into the Mine, the pioneers first let it off and sufficed with their spades, shovels, and mattocks, and such other tools that they had used to work withall: but soon after, armed soldiers entered and encountered within the vaults, and closely skirmished under ground. But within a while that manner of dealing grew more cold and slack by reason that they stopped up the Mine between when they first, one while with facks and haircloath, otherwhies with doors and such stuff, as they could come by in haste, and stood next hand. One new invention above the rest was devised against those within the Mine, and the same but a slight matter, and made without any great trouble, and this was, The townsmen took a great run or dryfat with a hole boared in the bottom, of that capacity as might receive a pretty pipe like a faucet within it; and withall they made a pipe indeed of iron to fit it, and anon laid likewise to cover the other end or mouth thereof, but the same had many holes in divers places of it. Now this vessel they stuffed full of down and soft feathers, and then let it with the head forward against the very Mine. From the lid or cover aforesaid these stood breaking out long sharp pikes, which the Macedonians call Shovels, for to keep off the enemies. Within the vaults they put a cole or spark of fire, and then with a pair of smiths bellows (the noise whereof went into the pipe aforesaid) they blew the cole and set it on a smothering fire within the vaults. By which means there arose not only a mighty deal of smoke, but also a corded with fire, and flaming away, by the reason of the feathers burning within; and so filled all the Mine underneath that scarce durst any man abide within for fear of being choked.

During their affairs about Ambra, Phanates and Demotus two Embassadors sent from the Ætolians by a general decree of the whole nation, came with a full and plenary commission unto the Consul. For their Pretor (seeing of the one side Ambra besieged, and on the other side the sea coast endangered with the enemies ships, and in a third quarter the Amphilochians and all Dolopia continually waited by the Macedonians; and that the Ætolians were not able to oppose themselves and make head at once against three wars in divers parts) had assembled a general Diet for to consult with the chief of the Ætolians what was to be done in this case. All their opinions jumped in this one point, "To seek for peace (if it were possible) under equal and indifferent conditions: if not, yet in as tollerable terms as they might. In confidence and assurance (say they) of Antiochus, the war began: and now that Antiochus is vanquished both by land and sea, ye are hunted as it were out of the compass of the world into an angle beyond Taurus, what hope remaineth to maintain and wage the war any longer? And therefore Phanates and Demotus were to deal as in such a case and time, as they thought best according to their wisdom and fidelity, and the common good of the Ætolians for what other counsell remaineth, what course else can they take, or what choice beside hath fortune left them? With this so large and free commission they were these Embassadors sent: who be sought the Consul to spare their City, to have mercy and pity of their nation sometime linked in amity unto them, and soaked through very calamity and misery (for loath they were to speak of any injuries and wrongs offered) to fall into such follies: neither have the Ætolians in this late war of Antiochus deserved to suffer more harm than they were worthy to receive good for their service in the former war against Philip; and when they were not largely rewarded and recompensed then, so they ought not to be punished and chastised extremely now. The Consul made answer again, that the Ætolians had made suing for peace many a time, but sincerely and truly at no time: and since they had solicited and drawn Antiochus to war let them hardly follow his example in craving peace. Like as he therefore hath not quit and rendered some few Cities which were in question about their liberty and freedom, but parted with a rich and wealthy kingdom, even all Asia between this and the mountain Taurus: so unless the Ætolians will simply lay all arms aside and come to treat for peace, unarmed he would never give them audience. And to be short, if they will peace have, they must deliver up their armour and all their horses first, yea, and make payment of a thousand talents of silver, and the one moiety thereof to pay down right upon the nail before hand. Over and besides this branch, I will annex to the accord and covenant, that they shall hold for their friends and enemies, those whom the people of Rome repudiate to be theirs, & none other. To this answer the Embassadors said never a word, both (for that they were very hard and grievous impositions, and also because they knew the nature and minds of their countrymen and neighbours at home, how unstable they were and not so benighted if they once took a pitch: whereupon whereupon they returned unto them, without doing any thing at all, to know the advice once again of the Prator and the principal States, what to relolve upon in every respect, whilst all stood whole and upright. But they were welcomed with outcries, and well shent for their labour, in that they had not dispatched and made an end, and so were sent away, and commanded to bring back with them one peace or other. As they went again toward Ambracia, they were forelayd and surprized in an ambush laid for them near the high way side by the Acaranians (with whom at that time they were layd and were had to Tyrrhenum and there imprisoned. And by this occasion the peace was delayed.

* Ambracia, or Arta.

Whiles the Embassadors of Athen and Rhodes (who were come already to intreat for them) remained with the Consul, Aminander also (the King of the Athamans) presented himself under false conduct in the Roman camp, and took more care for the City of Ambracia (where he had sojourned the greatest part of his exile) than in the behalf of the Ætolians. By them, the Consul was certified of the hard hap of the Ætolian Embassadors; and then he gave commandment, that they should be brought from Tyrrhenum. When they were come, they began to treat of peace, Aminander in the mean while laboured what he could in that enterprise which he especially had undertaken, namely, to induce the Ambracians to submit unto the Romans: but when he saw he did but small good, for all his parling with the principal persons of the City from their wall at length by the Consul's permission he entered into the town; where, partly by good counsel, and partly by prayer and entreaty, he persuaded them in the end, to put themselves into the Romans hands. Now as touching the Ætolians, they found much favour by the means of C. Valerius the son of that Levinus, who first contracted amity with that nation; and was besides half brother unto the Consul by the same mother. And the Ambracians after capitulation made, that the Ætolians who came to aid them might go forth without harm, let open their gates. Then arrived it was with the Ætolians Imprimitus. To pay 500 Euboick talents of silver; two hundred presently, and the other 300 at six payments yearly by even portions. Item, To render all Roman captives and fugitive traitors and runagates that they had, into the hands of the Romans. Item, To challenge jurisdiction over no City, whilence the time that T. Quintius passed over into Greece, was either forced by the Romans or entered voluntarily into amity and society with them: provided always, that the life Cephallenia be not comprised within this capitulation. These articles, albeit they were somewhat easier than they looked for, yet the Ætolians requested, that they might acquaint their Council withall; and permitted they were so to do. Some small variance and debate distracted, and held them awhile as touching those Cities, whilence having been in times past within their feignory and jurisdiction they hardly could abide to be dimembred (as it were) from their body. But in the end there was not one but agreed to accept of the peace. The Ambracians gave unto the Consul a present a coronet of beaten gold, weighing 150 pound. Their statues of brass and marble, their painted tables (wherewith Ambracia was better stored and adorned, than all the other Cities of that region, because it was the royal seat of King Pyrrhus where he kept his court and residence) were all taken down and carried away: nought else was touched nor any hurt done besides.

The Consul dislodged then, and removed from Ambracia into the higher and more inland parts of Ætolia, and encamped before the City called Argos Amphilochoium, two and twenty miles distant from Ambracia; and thither at length repaired the Ætolian Embassadors unto him, who marvelled much at them, why they itaid so long. When he understood by them that the general council of the Ætolians had approved of peace, he willed them to go directly to Rome unto the Senat: and permitted also the Athenians and Rhodiens (their mediators and advocates) to go with them and as orators to speak in their behalf: moreover he granted, that his half brother C. Valerius should accompany them: which order when he had taken, himself crossed over the water to Cephallenia.

When they were arrived at Rome, they found both the ears and hearts of the chief Senators wholly possessed beforehand, with many complaints and imputations that Philip had enforced against them: for he by means of his Embassador and letters (complaining that the Ætolians had unjustly taken from him the Oleapians, the Amphilochoians, and Athamanians; and that his garrison, yea, and last of all his son Perseus, were driven out of Amphilochoia) had wholly amazed the Senat from giving any ear at all to their requests and prayers: howbeit, the Rhodiens & Athenians had audience given them with patience & silence. The Athenian Embassador Leon (by report) moved and persuaded the Senat with his eloquent tongue: and by a familiar parable and similitude, he compared the people of Ætolia to the nature of the sea: For like as it, being oft itself calm is troubled and made rough by the winds: even so (saith he) the people of that nation, all the while they entertained friendship with the Romans, and performed their faithful promise unto them so long were in their right kind, and continued peaceable and quiet: but after that Thous and Dicaarchus began to blow from out of Asia, as after that, Menetas and Dametrius blustered and puffed from the parts of Europe, then arose a storm and tempest, with the gusts of whereof driven they were to Antiochus, and cast (as a man would say) upon a rock. Well he the Ætolians after they had been much tossed a long time from post to pillar, in fine effected, that these articles of peace ensuing, were freely agreed upon. Imprimitus, The nation of Ætolia shall maintain faithfully and truly the Empire and Seignory of the people of Rome. Item, They shall suffer to pass through their country and confines no army that shall be conducted against their allies and friends; nor assist them with any aid or maintenance whatsoever. Item, They shall repute the enemies, of the Romans for their enemies, and wage war against them. Item, They shall deliver unto the Romans and their confederates, all runagates, all fugitives, and prisoners that are among them, excepting such as having been once taken and returned home, chained to be caught against the same time: or those, who being Roman enemies, were taken prisoners by them, at what time as the Ætolians served in garrison under the Romans. As for the rest, as many as are forth-coming and may be found, shall be delivered (without fraud or covin) within 100 daies next ensuing, to the Magistrate of Corcyra: but those that appear not within that time, shall belikewise rendered whensoever their fortune is to be met withall. Item, They shall yield forty hostages, such as the Roman Consul in his discretion will approve and like well of: provided, that none of these pledges be under twelve years of age, nor above forty. Neither shall there be taken for hostage any Prator or Captain over horsemen, nor public Notary or Secretary to the State, nor yet any one that hath lain in hostage before time. Provided also, that Cephallenia shall be exempt from the articles of this accord. Item, As touching the sum of money which they are to pay, and the manner and terms of the payment, there shall be nothing changed of that which hath been concluded with the Consul: yet, if they had rather pay the same sum in gold than in silver, they may so do; provided that, they keep the rate and proportion, of one for ten, to wit, that one golden peece of coin go for ten times so much in weight of silver, and no more. Item, What Cities, what lands and territories, what persons (soever, which having at any time heretofore held tenor of the Ætolians, were by the Consuls T. Quintius and Cn. Domitius, or any time since their Consulship, either subdued and conquered by force of arms, or otherwise of themselves came under the obedience of the people of Rome, the Ætolians shall make no claim nor challenge unto them. Finally, the Æniades with their City and territory, shall appertain to the Acaranians. Under these conditions above said, the accord was concluded with the Ætolians.

Not only in the same summer, but also much about those very daies wherein these affairs were managed by M. Fulvius in Ætolia, Cn. Manlius the other Consul maintained war in Gallio, whereof at this present I will begin to write. This Consul in the beginning of the spring came to Ephesus: where, after he had received the army of L. Scipio and taken a review and survey thereof, he made an Oration to his soldiers: wherein, first he praised their valour and virtue, in that with one battell they had finished the war against Antiochus: then he exhorted them to enter into a new war with the Gauls who had succoured King Antiochus with aid; and were beside of name so untamed, that unless their puissance were abated and their courage taken down, to little or no purpose it was that Antiochus was removed beyond the mountains of Taurus. Last of all, some discourse he made of his own person, which was nothing prolix and long, implying neither vain words nor excessive reports. The soldiers gave audience to the Consul with great joy and a general applause, making this account, that since King Antiochus was vanquished, the Gauls alone (who were one part of his forces) would be of no puissance to withstand them. But the Consul supposed that it was much out of his way, that Eumenes should be absent (for then he was at Rome) who knew the countries, was acquainted with the nature of the people, and whom it imported and concerned very much, that the power of the Gauls should be enfeebled and abated. And therefore he sent for Attalus his brother, from Pergamus, and exhorted him to enter into action with him and take arms. And when Attalus had made promise to aid him both in his person and with all the power that he could make, he sent him into his country to levy soldiers. After some few daies, when the Consul was departed from Ephesus, Attalus (accompanied with a regiment of a thousand foot and two hundred horse) met him at Magnesias: and had given order to his brother Athenaus, to follow after with the rest of the forces: having committed the guard and government of Pergamus and the kingdom to those, whom he knew to be faithful and to his brother and himself. The Consul, after he had praised and commended the young gentleman, marched forward with his whole power as far as Maander; and there encamped, because it was not possible to pass the river at any foord, and therefore boats and barges were to be gotten together for ferry and transport the army. When they were set over the river, they went to Hiera Come, where there was a magnificent and stately Temple of Apollo, and an Oracle in it. And by report the Priests and Prophets there, deliver the responds and answers of the Oracle in verses, and those not rudely composed without rhythm & meter. From hence they removed, and at two daies end arrived at the river Harpagus: & thither were embassadors come from the Alabandians requesting the Consul, either by virtue of his authority, or by force of arms to compel one of their fortresses which lately had revolted from them and rebelled, to return again to their former obedience. And hither Athenaus also, brother to Eumenes and Attalus, was come together with Leontius the Cardiot, and Corragus the Macedonian, bringing with them 1000 foot, and 300 horse, of divers nations mingled together. The Consul sent one of his martial Tribunes or Colonels with a mean company to summon the Castle or fortress above said and after it was forced and recovered, he delivered it into the hands of the Alabandians. Himself kept on his direct way, and turned on the side until he came unto Antiochia upon the river Maander, where he encamped. This river Maander riseth from Celene, where the first head and source thereof is to be seen. Now this Celene had been in times past the capital City of all Phrygia. But in process of time this old Celene was abandoned by the Inhabitants, and not far from it they peopled a new City called Apamea bearing the name of Apamea the sister of Selenus. The river Marfus likewise springing not far from the foresaid Ionnes of Maender, did charge it self therein too. And as the common fame goeth, that this Cleaitis was, where Marcius the Musician gave defiance to Apollon, and challenged him to play upon the flute. This Maender above named, issuing out of an high hill at Clarus, turneth through the middle of the City and first keeping his course along the country of the Carians, and afterwards of the Ionians, falleth at the last into an arm of the sea between Priene and Miletus.

Whiles the Col. lay encamped about Antiochia, Selenus the son of Antiochus presented himself unto him with corn for his army, according to the covenant contracted with Scipio. Some small variance and difference there was as touching the aid demanded of Antiochus: for Selenus pleaded that Antiochus had capitulated only to find corn for the Roman souldiers. But this debate was soon at an end by reason of the strict resolution of the Col. who sent a Colonel to warn and charge the souldiers to accept no corn before the aid souldiers of Antiochus were received. From thence he marched to Gordianicus (a City so called) & so toward the third day to Tat. This City is seated upon the frontiers of the Pisidians, in that coast which boundeth upon the Pamphylia sea. This quarter was able to yield lusty men for war, when it had not been any way endangered, but remained entire and whole. For proof whereof, even then also there issued out of the City a cornet of horsemen, who charged upon the Romans as they marched, and at the first onlet troubled them not a little. But afterward, seeing themselves neither for number, nor yet for power comparable unto them, they were driven back into the town, & craved pardon for their trespass, ready to surrender their City into the Col.'s hands. The Col. imposed upon them a payment of 25 talents of silver, and 10000 medimms of wheat, and upon that composition their surrender was accepted. Three daies after the Romans came to Chau the river & from thence to the City Eretria, which at the first assault they won. After this the army marched as far as to a Castle called Thebustion standing over the river Indus, so called of a certain Indian, whom an Elephant threw and cast into it. Now they were not far from Cyrra, & yet no embassage appeared from the tyrant of that country and state, Morgestes a disloyal and treacherous man in all his dealings, and besides extremely hard and unreasonable. Whereupon the Col. sent out before C. Helvius with 4000 foot and 500 horse to sound his disposition and mind. As these companies entered into his frontiers they encountered them his Embassadors, giving them to understand that the tyrant their Master was ready to do whatsoever they would command: only his request was unto H. Helvius to pass peaceably through his country, and to restrain his souldiers from wasting & spoiling the territories: & 15 talents they brought with them for to make a crown of gold. Helvius promised to live his lands for being spoiled and wasted. And he willed the embassadors to go to the Col. Now when they had related the same unto him he made them answer in these terms: We cannot gather by any sign (qd. he) that the tyrant beareth good will and affection to us Romans: & again it be like an one as the world taketh him for we are to think rather of his chaflement than of admitting him into our army. The embassadors were troubled at this word, requested him for that present no more, but to take the crown of gold, and to permit that the tyrant himself might have access to his presence for to speak with him and clear himself. The morrow after, by permission of the Col. came the tyrant into the camp bearing no port of a Prince. For a private person and mean man of small wealth would have gone in better apparel and carried a greater train about him than he neither went he so meanly but he spake as lowly, hacking and hewing his words, as if he had not been able to speak them out. He complained of his own bareness and want, & likewise of the poverty of the Cities under his signiory (for besides Cyrra he held in possession Syrium, & that which is called Alimure). Yet he promised to see what he could do if haply by undoing himself & spoiling his subjects he might make up five and twenty talents. Mary he mistrusted greatly that he should never effect to much. Are you thereabout? (qd. the Col.) Now verily I can no longer endure this mockery. Was it not enough that in your absence you basted not to delude and disappoint us by your Embassadors but you must persist still in the same impudence now that you be here yourself in person? And would you make us believe indeed, that the disbursing of 25 talents will beggett you and your whole kingdom? Come on for, I say: Bring me hither within three daies, and lay me down in ready money 500 talents, or look for no other favour, but your territory to be N wifed, and your City besieged. Greatly affrighted was he at these minatory words, howbeit he continued still obstinately, countering it & pretending his neediness and poverty, and afterwards bafe hucking and riling by litle and litle, one while basting and wrangling, another while praying and entreating. (And that with whining and putting finger in the eye) he was fetcht over at length, and came off to pay 100 talents of silver, and to deliver 10000 medimms of corn besides. And all this was exacted of him to be performed in six daies. From Cyrra the Col. conducted the army through the country of the Sindenians, and after he had passed over the river Calaurus, he there pitched down his tents. The morrow after they marched by the lake or meat Carabris, and set the next City the inhabitants fled for fear: whereupon the town void of people, but replenished with abundance of all things was ransacked and rifled. This done, they arrived at the head or spring of the river Lycus and the next day marched toward the river Cobolatus. The Trocmians at the same time having forced and won the City of the Lyrians, were now upon the point to assault the Castle. They who were within besieged, seeing no other hope of succour, sent their Embassadors to the Consul, beseeching his help, and making pittifull moan, how they with their wives and children were shut up within the fortres, and looked every hour for death, either by famine or the sword.

A sword. This fell out as the Col. wished, namely, to have (on good occasion presented unto him, of turning his way into Pamphylia. At his first coming he delivered the Lyrians from the siege. To Terminus he granted peace, upon composition that he should receive first 30 talents. In like sort he dealt by the Apesidians and other States of Pamphylia. In his return from thence, the first day he encamped fast by a river called Taurus, and the next day following, near a town which they call Xylus-Come. From whence he marched and held on his journey continually, until he came to the City Corasus. The next City unto it was Darsa, which he found abandoned by the Inhabitants for fear, howbeit full of all kind of goods. As he marched till along the marshes, there met him Embassadors from Lycina, who came to render their City into his hands. After this he entered into the territory of Sagalassus, a fertile & plenteous quarter, for all sorts of corn & fruits. The Pisidians inhabit those parts, who are the best warriors in all that country. Inevard whereof, as also for that their territory is fruitful and well peopled, and their City strongly situate (as few like unto it) they were grown to be hardy and courageous. The Col. seeing no embassage presented unto him in the course of the frontiers, sent out foragers to fetch in booties. When they perceived once their goods hurtled, and arrived away before their faces, their homacks came down, and then they sent their embassadors, and upon composition to pay 50 talents, 10000 medimms of wheat, and as many of barley they obtained peace. From thence he passed to the mountains of Obrima, until he came to a village which they name Apuridon-Come, and there he encamped. Thither repaired the next day Selenus from Apamea. And the same day, after he had sent away unto Apamea his sick folk and other baggage and felt that he had (good for nothing) he took guides of Selenus for the way, and entered into the plains of Metropolis, and the next morrow marched as far as Dindia in Phrygia. After this, he entered into Synada, where he found all the towns about abandoned for fear, and left deserted. With the booty and pillage whereof his army was so heavily charged, that hardly he could march five miles a day; and so he came at length to Bendis, named. The old, from thence he passed to Anabara and the next day to the source of Alender, and the third day pitched down his tents near Abissus. There he lay encamped many daies together, because he was now arrived into the country of the Tolistobogians.

The Gauls in times past being a mighty people in number were induced to take a voyage, either for want of land to inhabit, or for hope of booty and prizes: and supposing withall, that they could not pass through any nation whatsoever, comparable to themselves in feats of arms, entered under the conduct of Brennus into the country of the Dardanians. Where, they began to ravine among themselves: by occasion whereof it happened, that to the number of twenty thousand of them, following two of their Princes Lomnorus and Lutarius, departed from Brennus, and took their way to Thracia: where partly by warring with them that made resistance, and partly by imposing tribute upon them that craved peace, they came at length as far as to Byzantium: and after they had held tributary a good time the coast of Proponis, they possessed themselves also of the good towns and Cities of that quarter. After this they had a mind and desire to invade Asia: for they heard say, being so near, how fertile and plenteous the soil of that country was. And after they had surprized and won Lysimachi, by a wile, and by force of arms conquered all Chersonesus, they descended to Hellefont. Where seeing how they were divided from Asia but only by the straits, and that it was but a small cut thither, their desire was much more inflamed to pass over, and for this purpose they dispatched certain carriers to Antipater the governor of that coast, to demand passage. But by reason that they effected not this so loon as they hoped, there arose another new edition between the Princes themselves. Whereupon Lomnorus accompanied with the greater part retired to Byzantium from whence he came. But Lutarius took from the Macedonians (who under colour of an embassage were sent from Antipater in elpiali) two covered ships, and three brigandines. By means of these vessels, within few daies he had set over all his army, transporting them one after another day and night continually. Not long after Lomnorus also passed over into Asia from Byzantium, by the aid of Nicomedes Kings of Bithynia. After this, the Gauls joyed again together in one, and accompanied Nicomedes in his wars against Zybas, who held a part of Bithynia, and by their help and assistance especially, Zybas was vanquished, and all Bithynia became subject to Nicomedes. Then they departed out of Bithynia into Asia. Now of twenty thousand there were not above ten thousand armed. Yet to great a terror they struck into all nations on this side the mountain Taurus, that both they to whom they approached not near, and also they whom they came unto, as well the farthest as the nearest, submitted themselves, and ranged under their obedience. In the end, being three nations of them to wit, the Tolistobogians the Trocmians, and the Teftages, they divided Asia likewise into three parts, and parted them equally among themselves, that each nation of them possessed a severall tract which paid them tribute. The coast of Hellefontus was given to the Trocmians: the Tolistobogians had for their share Lydia and Ionis: and unto the Teftages were allotted the inland parts of the main continent of Asia. And in one word they demanded tribute of all Asia on this side Taurus. But they planned and feasted themselves about the river Halyd. The bruit of their name was so fearful and terrible, and especially after their issue was multiplied and increased in great number, that the Kings also of Syria in the end refused not to be their homagers and give them tribute. The first of all the inhabitants in Asia that denied them homage, was King Antiochus the father of Eumenes: and fortune beyond the expectation of all men, favoured his hardy and courageous enterprise: for he vanquished them in battell. Howbeit, he danted not their hearts so much, but still they upheld and maintained their sovereignty, in such sort, as their puissance continued until the war between Antiochus and the Romans. Yea, and after that Antiochus was vanquished and chased out of part of his Realm, they conceived great hope to hold their own still; by reason they were so remote from the sea, and therefore thought that the Roman army would never pierce so far as to them. The Consul now, forasmuch as he was to war with this nation, so terrible to all their neighbours in those quarters; assembled his souldiers to a publicke audience, and in this manner made speech unto them.

"I am not ignorant, my souldiers, that of all the people which inhabit Asia, the Gauls are most renowned for valiance in war. And why? this fierce and cruell nation having run over the world in a manner, and warred with all countries, chose them a place of abode, and to settle themselves in the midst of a generation of all other most mild and tractable. Big and tall they are, of stature; and perlonage: their hair they wear long in golden crimped and shining locks: they carry bucklers of huge bignesse, and handle swords of exceeding length. Besides, when they enter into battell, they use to hog, to hoop, and dance, and with clattering their targets and weapons together, alter the guise of their country; they make an horrible noise. And all this is done of purpose by them to terrifie their enemies. But such devices as these be, let the Greeks the Phrygians, and Carians be afraid of, who are not used and accustomed to hear and see such things: as for the Romans, acquainted with the Gauls sudden and tumultuous wars, they can skill well enough of these their toys and vanities also. Once indeed, and but once, at the first encounter they discomfited the Romans at the river Alia: but since that time our Ancestors for the space of two hundred years have made havock of them, killed, put to flight, and driven them like sheep before them: and of later, I dare well say, have they triumphed of the Gauls, than of all the world besides. Thus much we know of them by experience, that if a man be able to stand out their first shock and violence (which upon a furious heat of their own by nature, and in blind choler and anger they spend all at once) all the parts of their body run to sweat and become faint: their weapons are ready to fall out of their hands: their bodies are to render, their courages so feeble after their cholarick anger is once allayed and passed, that the very heat of the sun the dunt and the drought is able without drawing sword, to overthrow them and lay them along. Proof and trial we have had of them, not only legions to legions, but man to man. T. Manlius and M. Valerius shewed plainly how far Roman vertue and prowess surpasseth the furious rage of Gauls. Why? even Marcus Manlius, one man alone: repulsed and beat down the Gauls as they climbed up by numbers to the Capitoll cliff. And those ancetors of ours beforenamed, had them dole with natural Gauls indeed, born and bred in their own country: whereas these here, by this time now are a baslard sort of them, and clean degenerate, mingled they are with others, and in truth as they be called, so are they Gallo-greeks. And as fereish with them as with plants, fruits, and living beasts in which we see that the seed is not of that vertue, & so effectual to keep and retain still the own kind and nature as the property of the soil and the air where they are nourished is to change the same. Thus the Macedonians who inhabit Alexandria in Egypt, who dwell in Seleucia and Babylonia, and other Colonies dispersed over the earth, are grown out of their own kind, and in manners become Syrians, Parthians, and Egyptians. Massilia seated among the Gauls, hath drawn somewhat of the nature of the nations adjoining and bordering upon them. And what have the Tarentines left them of that severe, rough, and hard disposition of the Spartans? For, whatsoever is ingendered and bred in the own proper place, is evermore kindly, and retaineth its own nature better: but look what is transplanted into another soil, doth soon degenerate, and grow into a baslard kind: for nature transformeth her self, and changeth into that where with she is nourished. Be sure therefore, that like as ye have defeated these Phrygians (for no better they be) overcharged and laden with French arms in the battell against Antiochus, even so being now conquerours, ye shall subdue and hew them in pieces once already vanquished. And I fear me more that ye shall win too small glory of them, then I doubt by fighting too little with them that ye shall have their hands too full of war against them. Why even King Attalus many a time and often hath discomfited and put them to flight. Neither would I have you to think, that savage beasts only newly taken, and keeping at the first their self and wild nature, after a time that they have been fed by mans hand, grown to be tame and gentle: but that the fierceness and cruelty of man is likewise of the same nature to be daked and made tractable. Are ye perswaded that these Gauls resemble their fathers and grandfathers in conditions? Their forefathers long since left their native country for want of ground and land to possess; and being driven to pass through the most rough and difficult country of Illyricum, first came into Pannonia & afterwards travelled all over Thracia, fighting ever as they went with most fierce and cruell nations, until at length they ceased upon these parts and settled there. After (I say) they had been hardned and made more fell by so many travels and dangerous adventures, they were received in the end within such a land, as through abundance of all good things might feed and frack them up. All that the fierceness and savage nature of theirs, which they had when they came first thither, is (no doubt) mollified by the goodness of the most fertile soil, by the sweetness & pleasure of a moist temperate air, and last of all by the gentile and delicate bonit nature of the inhabitants their neighbors. And even you also (in good faith) are to look unto it: (martial men although you be, and the very offspring of M. himself) ye are (I say) to take heed and beware of these delights of Asia: and besides to get you forth from them. So

"forceable are these forraign pleasures and delicate enticements to quench and corrupt the rigor of your spirits: to powerful is the commerce and conversing with strangers; so potent is the contagion (as it were) of their manners and discipline of neighbour inhabitants. Yet this one good turn ye shall have, that as against you they have not that contagion which in times past they had: so among the Greeks here, they are of as great name as ever they were in ancient time. So that amongst your allies you shall win as great honour by your victory, as it should have been if you had conquered the Gauls, when they were at the height of their valour and prowess. After the assembly dismissed, and Embassadors sent to Epiphonius (the only Prince in those parts who perished in battell with Antiochus), and had refused to aid Antiochus against the Romans) the Consul marched forward. The first day he came to the river Alander, and the morrow to a certain village which they call Tysson, thither repaired unto him the Embassadors of the Orochians, craving to be accepted as friends; but they were enjoined to pay two hundred talents: and when they requested leave to make relation and report thereof at home, they were permitted. From thence the Consul led his army to Plitendun; and after that he encamped at Alphar. Thither returned they who had been sent to Epiphonius together with the Embassadors of Prince Compulsius, requesting the Romans not to war upon the Teutobogians: for that both himself and Epiphonius also, would go in person to them, and perwaded the nation to do whatsoever they should be commanded. The Prince obeyed their request: and so from thence the army began to march through the land which they call Aylas: and well it might be so called, for it hath no wood at all in it: nor beareth it much as thornes nor any thing else to burn and maintain fire: cow-dung is all their burning, for want of other fuel. Whiles the Roman lay in camp before Cuballum (a fortress of Githogedon) they disordered the Cavalry of the enemies coming toward them with a great hurly and tumult: and they charged so fiercely and suddenly upon the corps de guard of the Romans, that they not only troubled and disordered them, but also killed many of them. The alarm being given within the camp, the Roman horsemen at once issued forth of all the gates, discomfited the Gauls, and slew many of them in the chace. The Consul perceiving now that he was come into his enemies country, and had not from thenceforth without sending out his espials before, and kept his army together in battell array with great heed and carefulness. Thus he held on his journey continually till he came to the river Singarius, where he purposed to make a bridge, because there was not a single river at any foord. This Singarius ariseth out of the mountain Adoreus, and running through Phrygia in joyneth with the river Thymbria near unto Bithynia, and so growing bigger by receiving a double current, keepeth his course through Bithynia, and discharge himself into Propontia river, not so famous and noble for the greatness thereof, as because it yieldeth fish abundantly to all the nations bordering and dwelling thereupon. When the bridge was finished and the army passed over, as they marched along the bank side, the Galli or Priests of Cybele (the great mother of the gods) were come from Pessinus, and with streamers, insules and other ornaments meet them: and in their fanatical verities (as men distracted of their wits) seemed to prophesie and foretell, that the goddes vouchsafed the Romans a fair way to war and victory; yea, and the conquest and feignory of that country. Hereat the Consul said, That he accepted their words for a pretage of good fortune, and thereupon in that very place he pitched his Tents. The next day he went as far as Gordium: a town verily it is none of the greatest, but more frequented and resorted unto for traffique and merchandise, then usually such dry towns are that stand far within the land. Three seas there be triangle-wise of equal distance all from it. On the coast toward Smyrna, it hath Hellepont and the shores of the other tract, whereas the Cilicians inhabit by the sea-side. Moreover, it bordereth upon the confines of many great nations, who for their mutual need and commodity, have commerce of negotiation, and meet together in that one place. This town at that time they found altogether dispeopled, by reason that the inhabitants were fled for fear: but well stored, and full of wares and goods of all sorts. Whiles the Romans lay there encamped, there came Embassadors from Epiphonius, reporting unto them, that he had made a journey to the Princes of the Gauls, but could obtain no reason at their hands: also, that they were dislodged out of the champaign country, had quit their villages and lands in great numbers, and together with their wives and children driven before them and carried with them whomever they could, and were retired to the mount Olympus from whence they purposed to defend themselves by force of arms and the strong situation of the place. The Embassadors likewise of the Orochians, gave more certain intelligence, to wit, That the whole people in general of the Teutobogians had seized the hill Olympus: that the Teutobogians severally by themselves had taken another mountain called Macana; that the Trocmians, had committed their wives and children to the guard of the Teutobogians, minding with a main army to aid the Teutobogians. Now at that time the Princes of those three States were Orginio, Conthionianus, and Galatius. And the principall reason and means that these had to enterprise war, was this, That being possessed of the highest hills of that country, and having brought thither provision of all things to serve them for a long space, they supposed to weary and wear out their enemies in procees of time. For this account they made, that they would never venture to march against them, through so hard, so difficult and disadvantageous places: and if they assued to do so, they might be impeached, repulsed back and beaten down with a small company: again, if they would sit still in leguer at the foot of those iron mountains and do nothing, they were never able to endure the cold and the scarcity which they should find there.

And

And notwithstanding the very altitude and height of the places defended them, yet over and besides they cast a trench, and made other defences round about the tops of the mountains which they held. Also for provision of darts and other shot, it was the least of all their care, supposing that the rough places would furnish them with sufficient store of stones to sling. The Consul forecasting in his mind that he should not deal with their enemies close at hand-fights, but a far off when he was to assail their holds, had made provision also of great store of darts, light velletary javelins, arrows, bullets of lead, and small stones that might be levelled and sent out of slings. Thus being well appointed and furnished with such kind of shot, he led his army toward the mountain Olympus and about five miles off he encamped. The next day he together with Artidius advanced forward with 500 men of arms to view the nature and standing of the mountain, together with the situation of the Gauls camp. But the enemies horsemen being double in number to them, issued out of their camp, and put them to flight, slew a few of them in the rout, and hurt many. The third day he set forward with all his forces to discover the places, and by reason that there came not one of them out of their defences and fortifications, he rode round about the mountain in safety at his pleasure, and perceived that on the South-side, there were certain little hills, all of of clean earth without stones, and the same rising up with an easy ascent to a certain place but to the North were high rocks, and the same in manner steep upright, and whereas all the rest were inaccessible three only waies and adventures he found, the one directly toward the middle of the mountain (where those little mounds of earth stood) the other two were difficult, the one lying Southeast, and the other Northwest. After he had considered and viewed these places that day, he pitched his camp at the very root and foot of the hill. The morrow after he sacrificed and finding by the first beats which he killed, that the gods were pacified and favourable unto him, he divided his army into three battalions, and so advanced against the enemy, and himself in person with the greatest part of his forces, mounted up the hill, whereas it yielded the easiest ascent. He commanded his brother L. Manlius, from the Southwest to get up the hill, as the place would permit with safety, giving him in charge that if he met with any dangerous places steep and hard of ascent, that he should not wrestle with the difficult sides of the ground, nor strive against those things, which to force and overcome were impossible; but rather to traverse the ground, and retire toward him, and so to join with his battalion. As for C. Helvius, he willed him with a third part of the forces to wheel about by little and little, and fetch a compass at the hill foot, and then from the Northwest to mount up. Likewise the aids of Artidius, he divided into three equal parts, and took order that the young Prince himself in person should keep with him. The Cavalry and the Elephants he left in the next downs beneath the hills, and charged the Captains thereto to have a carefull eye and good regard to mark what was done in every place, yea, and to make haste to rescue and succour wheresoever need should be. The Gauls making full reckoning that on two sides they were sure enough, and the place that way to be inaccessible; because they would stop the other adventure by force of arms on the South side, sent forth about four thousand armed men to seize upon a certain hill within a mile of their camp, which hill commanded the way, supposing there, as from a fence and fortress to debar them of passage. Which when the Romans perceived, they put themselves in readiness to fight. A pretty space before the ensignes, marched the skirmishers, together with the Candior archers and slingers from Artidius; likewise the Tribunes of Thrace. The ensignes of the footmen followed softly after (as well as they might) against the hill, bearing their targets before them so, as they seemed to cover themselves only to avoid the shot, and meant not to enter into any fight hand to hand. The fight at first was equally performed with shot a good distance off: for as the Gauls got the advantage of the ground, so the Romans had the odds for variety and store of darts. But as the skirmish continued and increased, there was no more equality seen. For the shields of the Gauls being made long, and not broad enough for their bodies, and withall flat and plain without, hardly covered and defended them: and by this time all their shot was spent; & weapon had they none but their very swords, whereof there was no use at all, considering the enemy came not to close fight. The only help they had was with stones, and those too big for their handling and not easy to wield, by reason they were not provided before, but such as in that haste came next to their hand without any choice. Moreover, being not used and exercised to slinging, they had neither the artificial sleight, nor yet sufficient strength to help themselves withall: but contrariwise, from all parts were pelted with bullets of lead and galled with arrows & darts at unawares, which they could neither ward nor avoid and for that with anger & fear together their wits & understandings were blinded, they wist not what to do, seeing themselves surprised and overtaken in a kind of fight whereunto they were least of all fitted. For as in close conflict hand to hand, where blows are dealt, where raps are given and taken interchangeably, choler kindlyeth courage: even so when men are wounded aloof with light darts, & from whence they know not, they wot not upon whom to run & at whom to make in that blind fire of theirs, but they turn upon their own fellows without all reason as a venture like wild beasts O galled with arrows sticking in their sides. Now, they receive not a wound but it is seen by reason that they fight naked, and their bodies are fair flitk and white, as being never bare but in battell, by which means greater store of blood pourth out of the wounds in their fleshy bodies, the same they appear greater, and their white skin much more stained with black blood. But they pain not so much for broad & wide flashes (for otherwise when the skin is cut away & the wound rather broad than deep, they take more pride therein, & think they fight with greater honor.) Many if it happen

As happen at any time, that an arrow head or a bullet sticking within the flesh all hidden, put them to pain and torment; notwithstanding the hurt be small in appearance, yet when they seek to pull out an arrow, and the head will not follow, then they take on and are stark mad, for shame that so small a prick should plague them so, and be ready to kill them, in much as they call themselves on the ground, and lie wallowing along every where. Others there be of them that run full upon their enemy, and those were sticked with arrows and darts from all parts & when they came near to hand were by the skirmishers killed and cut in pieces with their swords. Their louders use to cover themselves with a shield of three foot long, carrying in their right hand certain spears to use aloof, and wear by their side a Spanish sword, now in case they come to hand fight, they shift their spear out of their right hand into the left, and take them to their swords. By this time there were few out of the Gauls left alive; who perceiving that the light armed skirmishers of the enemies were too good for them & seeing withall the ensignes of the legions to approach near unto them, took them to their heels on all hands, and began to flee again toward the camp; which now was full of cheer and trouble, as where women and children and a multitude of feeble folk (not fit to bear arms) were crowded and thronged together. The Romans following the train of their victory, seized the hills abandoned by the enemies that were fled. About the same time L. Manlius and C. Helvius, having mounted so far as they could find way, traversing the sides of the hill, when they were come to an end, where they could fee neither way nor path, they turned to that quarter of the hill which only afforded a way, and both of them began to follow the Consul's battalion a pretty distance aloof, as if they had agreed beforehand to do so; and that which at first had been simply the best thing to be done, they were of necessity forced at last to put in execution. For in such difficulties and places of disadvantage, in court behind in a rearward have oftentimes served in right good stead: that if those in the vanguard should have to be beaten back, they in the second place might receive and protect them, and also begin in such a new fight. A ter that the foremost ensignes of the legions were come to those hills; which the light armed before had seized the Consul commanded the louders to retire them awhile and breath themselves, and showed them withal where the bodies of the Gauls lay dead along all over the mountains. And it (quod) the light armed skirmishers have made such a riddance of them, what is to be looked for at the hands of the legionary louders, armed all over in compleat harness? What will they do that carry the hearts of most noble warriors? Surely they must needs win the camp, into which the enemy is chased, and driven by the light armed louders. Howbeit he commanded the light armed to go after who all the while that the legions retelled themselves spent not the time in vain, but employed it in gathering together the darts and javelins that lay about the hills, to the end that they might have sufficient shot. Now the Romans marched forward and approached the camp. The Gauls likewise for their parts, fearing lest their defence would not be able to defend them, stood armed before their trench and rampier. But afterward being overcharged with all sorts of darts, they were driven in the turning of an hand within their hold, (for the more they were in number, and the thicker they stood, the less lighted any dart in vain) only they left strong guards about the gates and entrance into the camp. Moreover, among the multitude which was driven into the camp, there was discharged at random a mighty number of darts: and that many of them were hurt thereby, appeared by their cry mingled with the shrieks of women and children. Now again, when that they warded the gates, and took up the avenues with their guards the legionary louders in the forefront let fly their javelins. And albeit they were not wounded in their bodies, yet by reason that their shields & bucklers were pierced through, they were most of them entangled one within another and stuck fast. Long they could not abide the violence of the Romans in forms as before that the victors could enter into the camp, the Gauls fled forth at all the gates wide open, and ran they wist not whither like blind men, as well through places which had no way as those that were passable. No rocks so steep with downs, no cliffs so rough with crags, could stand in their way: and nothing feared they affront; their enemies only at their heels affrighted them. And therefore most of them either fell headlong down a mighty height and brake their necks, or else for very feebleness lost their breath, were windless, and ready to die. The Consul after he had taken their camp, would not suffer it to be ransacked, but commanded the louders every one to follow the chase hard; and whiles the enemies were thus affraid, to affright them thoroughly. Then came the other regiment with L. Manlius, but the Consul would not suffer them to enter the camp, but sent them forthwith to pursue the enemies. Himself also in person anon after followed; when he had delivered the charge of keeping the prisoners, unto the military Tribunes of the army: for this reckoning and resolution he made, that the war was at a final end if in this tumultuous fright of theirs he might either kill or take prisoners a number of them. The Consul was no sooner departed, but C. Helvius came with his third regiment, but he could not hold his louders from the pillage of the camp, in much as the booty and prizes were most unguilely dealt among them who were at no end of the skirmish. The Cavalry stood all this while still and wist not of the fight, or that their fellows had gotten the victory: but afterward they also spying the Gauls dispersed about the root of the mountains made after them as well as their horses would mount against the hills: some they flew and others they took prisoners. The just number of those that were slain cannot easily be counted, because they stood fir and near among the cranks and windings of the mountains, where they were killed in sundry orders. Many of them besides, having engaged themselves to the crags and rocks that had no way forward, ward, tumbled down into the valleys of a monstrous depth underneath. Yea, and some hapned to be killed in the woods amidst the thickets & bushes. Claudius, who writeth of two battles fought upon the mount Olympus, reporteth that there died there forty thousand enemies. But Valerius Antias, who otherwise is wont to overreach and exceed in number, hath recorded not above ten thousand. But without all question the prisoners amounted to forty thousand full, because they went with a train of all sorts and ages, more like men dislodging and removing out of one country unto another, than going to war. The Consul, after he had burned all the armour of his enemies in one heap, commanded his soldiers to bring forth the rest of the pillage and spoil into one place, and either sold and made money of that which was to come into the publick treasury of the City, or else parted it amongst the soldiers indifferently, with great regard, that every one should have a just and even portion. Moreover, he commanded them all in open audience, and rewarded every one besides with gifts according to their several merits. But above the rest, and with the general accord of all he both praised, and also recompensed Attalus. For surely that young gentleman shewed not only singular valour and forwardness in all travels and dangers, but also a special modesty and rare sobriety.

There remained yet entire and whole the war with the Tectosages, against whom the Consul made an expedition, & upon the third day arrived at Ancyra, a noble City in those parts, from whence the enemies were little more than ten miles distant. During the time that he lay there encamped, there hapned a memorable act, performed by a captive Lady. Among many more prisoners, there fortune'd to be kept in ward, the wife of Ortiagon, a woman of surpassing beauty. The Centurion who had her person in safe custody, was lecherous and covetous withal, as many of these soldiers are. Her he solicited and tempted first to commit folly; but seeing her altogether unwilling, and that she abhorred to prostitute her self unto him, he did violence upon that body of hers, which fortune had made bond and thrall unto him. But afterwards to mollify and assuage the indignity of this villany, he put the woman in good hope, and promised that he should return home again to her friends; yet he would not do all for pure love alone and freely without ransom, for he bargained to have a certain sum of gold besides. And to the end forthwith that no person belonging to him might take knowledge thereof, he permitted her to send one of the prisoners whom she self called messenger to her friends and kinsfolk, and appointed a place near unto a river, whither the next night (following should repair two and no more (of the said captive Ladies friends, with the gold above said) for to receive her at his hands. It fell out so, that among the rest of the captives committed to his guard, there was a bondslave of her own; this messenger at the shutting in of the evening the Centurion conducted without the campus guard. The morrow night after came accordingly to the place appointed, both the two friends, the said of the gentlewoman, and also the Centurion himself with his prisoner, where they shewed the gold, amounting to the full sum of one Attick talent (according as it was agreed between them) and with that the woman spake unto them in her language and commanded them to draw their swords, and kill outright the Centurion as he was weighing the gold. Which done, she caused his head to be stricken off, and wrapped it her self within her garments, and so carried it home to her husband Ortiagon, who from Olympus had fled and escaped to his own house. But before that she clipped and embraced her husband, she threw down the Centurion his head at his feet. And when he wondered what mans head it was, and what act this might be, as passing a womans deed, she confessed to her husband the injury that her body had suffered, and likewise the revenge for the abuse of her chastity by force and violence: and as it is reported, she maintained the honour of this matronlike act ever after even to her dying day, in all sanctimony of life and modest carriage of herself like a chaste dame.

Whiles the camp lay at Ancyra, the Orators of the Tectosages shewed themselves unto the Consul, requesting him not to dislodge and remove from thence before he had parled with their Lords and Princes: saying withal, that they would accept any conditions of peace whatsoever, rather than war. The time was set down, even the next morrow, and a place likewise appointed as just in the mid way (as it could be guessed) between the camp and Ancyra. The Consul, thither came at the hour assigned, accompanied with a guard of five hundred horse: but perceiving no Gaul at all there, he returned into the camp. And thither repaired the same Orators unto him the second time, excusing the default, and saying that their Princes could not be present by occasion of some scruple of conscience that arose the while: howbeit, the chief persons besides of the whole nation should appear by whom all matters might be composed as well as with themselves. The Consul made answer, that he likewise would send Attalus in his stead. So they came to this paring from both parts, Attalus had three hundred men of arms about him for his guard: and certain conditions of peace were drawn and propounded: but so far as they might not grow to any final conclusion in the absence of their chief Commanders, accorded it was that the day following the Consul and their Princes should meet in that place together. Now the drift of the Gauls in making these delays and trifling off the time, was this, that first they might gain some convenient place to transport over the river Helys all that ever they had (which they would not hazard with their own persons, together with their wives and children) and afterwards to lay a train of an ambush for the Consul himself, who took small regard and was not provided for to prevent their villany intended under the colour of that conference. For that purpose, they chose a thousand horsemen out of all their cavalry, of especial valour and approved hardiness, for the execution of this treacherous design. And surely this their fraud had taken effect, if fortune had not defended and maintained the law of nations, which to break and violate they had completed. Certain souldiers of the Romans sent out to purvey forage, and fowls, were directed to those very quarters whereas the party above said should be kept. The Colonels thought it the fittest place for them, because they were to have the Consul guard also opposed for their defence against the enemy: howbeit, they set another corps de guard of their own, consisting of 600 horsemen nearer to the camp. Now by reason that Attalus assured the Consul so certainly, that their Princes would come, and that the matter might be soon knit up and dispatched, he departed out of the camp with the same guard of horsemen as before, and when he had marched almost five miles forward, and was not far short of the place appointed, he discovered all of a sudden the Gauls riding in full gallop against them in most furious manner as enemies: whereupon he raised the march and made a stand: commanding the horsemen to make ready their weapons and resolve to fight. The first charge and shock he received right valiantly, and stepped not back one foot: but afterwards as the multitude pressed still upon him, he began to give ground and retreat, but so as he brake not the ranks of his troops. But in the end, when they found more danger in longer stay, than commodity and help in keeping their array, they all at once turned their horie heads and fled. When they were dilarrained once, the Gauls pursued hard and killed them: and no doubt a great part of them had died for it, but that the foragers guard of 600 horse foresaid came to relieve them. For they hearing afar off the fearful cry of their fellows, made ready their armor and horses, and being fresh & in heart, entred upon the fight that was given over by their wearied and discomfited companions: whereupon fortune quickly changed, and the fear turned from the losers to the winners: for at the first encounter the Gauls were put to flight: and withal, the said foragers and souldiers came running out of the fields, and from all parts made head and affronted the Gauls: inasmuch as they could neither flee readily nor escape surely, because the Romans with their fresh horses followed them in chase, and they themselves were already tired: few therefore went away with life, and not one was taken prisoner, for the greater part by odds paid dearly by the loss of their lives, for violating of this their party under the colour of truth and fidelity. The Romans whiles their Romans were inflamed with anger, the very next day came against them with the pursuit of all their forces. But the Consul, employed two whole daies himself in viewing and discovering the situation and nature of the hills, because he would not be ignorant of any thing requisite. Upon the third day, after he had first taken the auspices and presages of the birds, and afterwards killed a sacrifice, he led forth his army divided into 4 battalions. Two of them were to mount up the midst of the hill & the other two he set in the sides to flank the wings of the Gauls, and to march up against them. The Tectosages and Troximons, who were the whole flower and strength of the enemies, made their main battel in the midst, consisting of 50000 men: and because there was no use of horse among those rough & uneven rocks, the cavalry alight on foot to the number of 10000, and those they put in the right wing. The Cappadocians with Ariaratus, & the auxiliary Morzians who arose to the number almost of 4000 men, held the left. The Consul, (like as before in the mount Olympus) marshalled his light armed for skirmish in the forefront of the vanguard, & gave order to have ready at hand as great store of darts & other shot of all sorts as he had before. When they approached one another, all things answered both of the one side & the other, like as in the former conflict: saving that the courage of the victors increased in regard of their former success, & the hearts of the enemies were much abated and danted. For albeit themselves had not yet been foiled & vanquished, yet they took the overthrow & loss of their countenances for their own. And therefore as the beginning of the battell was fustable, so the issue was likewise. For the Gauls battell was overspread & covered again as it were with a cloud of light shot. And not one of them durst run forth out of his range, for fear he should discover his whole body & lay it open to take all that came: and keeping still together as they did, the thicker they stood, the fairer mark they were for the enemies to level at, & the more wounds they received. The Consul, perceiving they were already of themselves troubled, and supposing that if he set forward & presented unto them the ensigns of the legions, they would immediately all of them flee, received the light armed loose shot, & the rest of the auxiliary souldiers within his own ranks and files, and then advanced his legions. The Gauls affrighted with the fresh remembrance of the late defeat and overthrow of the Tolistobogians, carrying also about themselves the darts sticking in their bodies, weary besides with long standing afoot, and overcharged likewise with many a wound, could not abide so much as the onset and shout of the Roman legions. Then began they to take their heels and flee toward their camp, but few of them recovered it, and got within the rampier and other defences. The greater number fled here and there on both hands, and dispersed themselves into all parts as they took them in the head, and as every man in this confused fright caught a way by himself. The Conquerors followed them still even hard to the very camp, and all the way charged upon their backs and beat them down. Which done, they fled and stuck still in the camp for desire of pillage, and there was not one that followed one foot after. The Gauls in the wings stood to longer, by reason that it was later ere they were set upon but able they were not to abide the first charge and shot of the Roman darts. The Consul, who could not possibly pick those out of the camp that were once entred in for greediness of spoiling and rifling the tents, sent out the consul immediately to be in the wings to follow the enemies in chase still forward. These pursued them a certain space: howbeit in this flight, (for in truth it was no fight at all) there were not above eight thouland that left their carcasses behind them; all the rest recovered the other side of the river Hayti. Many of the Romans remained that night within the enemies camp: the rest the Consul brought back again to his own. The next day he took account and survey of the prisoners and prizes, which was so great as a man would conceive that a nation of all others most greedy of pillage and spoiling might possibly take and heap together for so many years, as they held all those parts within the mountain Lacry by force of arms. The Gauls thus scattered in flight, rallied themselves into one place, as being many of them hurt or disarmed, and stripped clean but of all they had for their ambassadors into the Consul to treat for peace. The Consul willed them to give attendance upon him at Epilysus: himself made haste to remove out of those cold quarters by reason that the mountain Tamus was so near (for now it was the midst of Autumn) and led back his victorious army to pass the winter near the seaside.

While the affairs thus passed in Asia, all was quiet in the rest of the Provinces. At Rome the Consuls T. Quintus Flaminius and M. Claudius Marcellus made a new choice of Senators; and Publius Africanus was chosen the President of the Senat now the third time: four only were left outland discarded; but not one of them had born office of State; and had the honour to sit in the Curule chair. The Consuls shewed themselves likewise passing mild in the review of the Cavalry and order of Knighthood. They put out to framing the foundations and ground works upon the Aquilum in the Capitoll: and likewise they bargained for to pave the street with hard flint or pebbles from the gate Capena to the Temple of Mina. The Campans demanded of the Senat, in what place they should be assailed and enrolled: and thereupon a decree passed for their enrolment at Rome. The rivers were out, and great deluges happened that year. The Tyber overflowed his banks twelve times and drowned Marcellus and all the low parts of the City.

After that Cn. Manlius the Consul had brought the Gauls war to an end in Asia, the other Consul M. Fulvius having utterly subdued the Aetolians, passed over into Cephalenia: and sent to all the Cities about the Island certain messengers, to sound them whether they would rather yield themselves unto the Romans or hazard the fortune of war? And so forcible was fear among them all, that there was not one person refused to surrender. And being enjoyed (according to the ability of the people who were but bare) to give hostages, the Nehotes, Cranians, Petionians, and Samaeans delivered twenty apiece. This peace no sooner shone upon the Cephalenians beyond all their expectation, but suddenly one City of the Samaeans revolted, and upon what cause it is not known: themselves alledged and said, That forasmuch as their City was seated in a commodious place they feared greatly to be dispossessed and turned out of it by the Romans. But whether they only imagined this and put themselves in fright, and so changed their quiet and repose for war and foolish fear: or whether there had been question heretofore among the Romans, and upon much cavilling in mens mouth the rumour of such a matter, came unto them, it is not certainly known. Only this much, after they had given their hostages, they shut their City gates upon a sudden; and desired they would not from their enterprise, for all the entreaty and prayers that their own hostages made, whom the Consul had sent (on purpose) even under their walls, to move their countenance and parents, to pity and compassion. When as therefore they would make no answer, depending upon peace, the Consul began to assault the City: and all the ordinance of artillery and engines of battery were under his hand, which had been brought from the siege of Ambracia. And look what works and fabricks were needfull besides to be made, the soldiers with great diligence and forwardness performed. So in two places at once they planted rams against the City and battered the walls. The Samaeans on the other side for their part omitted and neglected nothing, that might either annoy the enemy or impeach the works. But two things there were principally wherewith they made resistance and withstood their violence: the one was a contrivance within the City which they ever raised new instead of the old & as strong as it was, that was demolished and broken down: the other was their often sudden sallies, one while upon the fortifications and fabricks, otherwhiles upon the corps de guard of the enemies: and for the most part in these skirmishes they had the better hand. But one mean there was devised, and the same of small shew to speak of, to refrain and keep them in from falling forth. The Romans sent to Agemus, Patras, and Dime, for an hundred slingers. These nations from their childhood used to exercise themselves (after the manner of the country) to discharge out of slings into the open sea certain round stones, which commonly the shore is overspread with among the sands, by reason of which exercise, they have more skill both to sling farther from them; and also to strike more sorely and give a smarter tap and stroke than those of the Baleares. For their sling is not made with one only cord as the Baleares are, and those of other nations, but it hath three leather thongs hardened and made stiff with many sinews and sinews left in the leather were soft and gentle, the bullet and stone within should wag to and fro and roll out in the delivery and hurling of it: but being seized and counterpoised (as it were) it went merrily away, and sent and driven out of the noose of a stone-bow. And so well practised they were in this, that they could a great way off level a bullet through garlands, rings, and hoops of small compass; and misn not say, they would be sure to hit, not only the head of an enemy, but any part of the face that they aimed at, point blank, and never fail. These slings they made the Samaeans to pluck in their hands; that they durst not fly out neither to offend nor to defend as they did. To whom as from the walls, they requested the Achaens for a while to stand aside and repose themselves, and see them how they skirmished with the corps de guard of

of the Romans. Four months space the Samaeans endured the siege. Now when of that small number which they had, some or other daily dropt away, and were either killed outright or wounded; and they that remained, were both tired in body, and danted in courage: the Romans one night passed over the wall by the fortrefs which they call Capena for the City where it boun- deth upon the Sea, yeth toward the West, and entered so far as the market place. After that the Samaeans perceived that one part of the City was taken by the enemies, they fled with their wives and children into a greater fortrefs, and the next day yielded: the Town was ransacked, and they themselves were all sold in open market to who would give most.

The Consul having first the State of Cephalenia in good order, and put a garrison within Samaeans, passed into Peloponnesus, having been called and sent for to come thither a long time, principally by the Aegians and Lacedaemonians. Time out of mind, and from the first beginning of the Diets of Achaia, the whole nation used to assemble and meet at Aegium ordinarily, were it to grace and honour the City, or because the place was commodious therefore. This ancient custom Philopomen that year began first to infringe, and went about to make a law and ordinance, That in all the Cities of Achaia, their Councils and Diets shall be holden in course and order at their times. And against the coming of the Consul, when the Demingues of the free Cities and States summoned the Diet to be kept at Aegium, Philopomen (Pretor for that time) came with a count- less summons and proclaimed it to be held at Argos. And when it was evident to be seen, that they all in manner minded thither to resort: the Consul also (albeit in affection he favoured the Aegians) came to Argos; where, after much debate, seeing the matter growing the other way, he de- parted from his design and gave over the cause. After this, the Lacedaemonians averred him thence, and drew him away to the deciding of their controversies and dissensions. Certain ban- nished persons they were who most of all disquieted and troubled that State: and many of them had their abiding place in the Castles coasting along the frontiers of the Laconian territory toward the sea, which was taken wholly from the City. The Lacedaemonians much discontented and offended heretofore, entered one night a certain borough called Lus, surprised it unawares to the inhabitants, and kept it to their use: to the end that if need were at any time to send Embassadors to Rome or else whither, they might have some free access unto the Sea: and withal, be served of a mart-town for yent, and a place of recit for all forrain merchandise from strangers to their necessity uses. The Townsmen within, as also the exiles aforesaid (there dwelling) were terrified at the first with this sudden and unexpected occurrence: but afterward (before day-light) when they had once rallied themselves together, with small ado and skirmish chased forth the Lacedaemonians: howbeit the least parted over all the Sea coast, so that in one general accord, the Castles and Villages of every one, year, and the exiled persons (as many as there inhabited) dispatched their Embassadors to the Achaens. Philopomen their Pretor (who ever from the beginning friended the cause of the banished, and had always advised and counselled the Achaens to abate and take down the puissance and reputation of the Lacedaemonians) granted them at their request and seeking a Diet, in which (upon a motion by him made) there passed a decree in this form: That whereas T. Quintus and the Romans, had committed and delivered to the safeguard and protection of the Achaens, the fortresses, burroughs, and villages, situate along the Sea coast of the Laconians, and (by vertue of a covenant and accord) the Lacedaemonians had nothing to do therein, but ought to forbear them; and yet notwithstanding, the Town Lus was by them forced, and a great massacre there committed: therefore unless the principals and accessories both of that outrage, were yielded to the Achaens, they deemed the covenant and accord in that behalf provided, to be broken. Hereupon incontinently were Embassadors addressed to Lacedaemon, to challenge and demand the parties above said: but the Lacedaemonians took this for so proud a commandment, and thought it such an indignity, that without all doubt, if they had been in as good estate then, as sometimes they were, they would immediately have taken arms. But nothing troubled and disquieted their spirits so much as this, for fear lest if once they received the yoke of subjection upon their necks, in yielding obedience to their first demand, Philopomen would proceed and put in execution that which he long intended and went about: even to deliver the City Lacedaemon into the hands of the banished aforesaid. Enraged therefore with choler and anger, they fell upon thirty of that faction who were comptrolled in council with Philopomen and the exiles, and slew them out-right: and withal made a decree, To renounce and reject all society with the Achaens: and forthwith to send their Embassadors to Cephalenia, with commission, to deliver Lacedaemon unto M. Fulvius and the Romans; and to beseech him to take the pains to come into Peloponnesus, therto to receive the City Lacedaemon under the obedience and protection of the people of Rome. When the Embassadors had made relation hereof to the Achaens, presently war was proclaimed against the Lacedaemonians by common consent of all the States of that assembly and general council: but the winter impeached them for entering into any action or present execution. Howbeit they made small rodes into their frontiers, and wasted the same not only by Land, but also by Sea, after the manner of robbery and piracy, rather than of warlike hostility. The troubles drew the Consul, into Peloponnesus, and by his commandment a Diet was published to be holden at Elis; and thither were the Lacedaemonians sent forth to argue and debate their cause. Where there was not only much reasoning and dispute, but also wrangling and altercation. The Consul who in other points bare himself nicely enough, and answered in doubtful terms, as one willing to entertain both parts, determined and ended the controversy in one word, bounds of their own territories. After this, having gathered into one place all the vessels from the Sea coasts, together with the entire fleet of King Eumenes, which by his brother Attalus was brought from Elea, he transported all his forces into Europe. From whence he marched through Chersonesus by short & easy journeys, because his army was heavily charged with prizes and booties of all sorts; and encamped at Lysimachia, purposing there to rest a while, to the end that his travelling beasts of draught and carriage might be fresh and in good heart to pass through Thracia, which was a voyage and journey commonly feared and abhorred. The same day that he dislodged from Lysimachia, he came to the River which they call Melas, and from thence the next day to Cypselia. When they were past Cypselia, they had for ten miles almost no other way, but through wild woods, narrow freights, and those rough withal and uneven underfoot. For the difficulty of which passage, the army was divided into two parts. The one he commanded to march before, the other to come behind in the rearward a great distance after; and in the midst between, he bestowed the carriages with bag and baggage, and amongst them were waggons and wains, laden with the publick treasure, and other pillage of great price. As he thus marched through the freight pass, there were about 10000 and not above, raised out of four nations of Asia, to wit, the Attians, Carians, Maduarenes, and Coletes, who beted the freights to debar them of passage. It was supposed that King Philip of Macedony his hand was herein, and that they entered not into this action without his privy and fraudulent practise; who as he knew that the Romans could return no other way but by Thracia, so he was aware and witt well enough what a mass of money they carried with them. The Roman General himself was in the vanguard, careful only and troubled about the difficulty of the way. All this while the Thracians (as still and stirred not until the armed soldiers were passed by. But when they perceived once, that the vanguard was gotten out of the freights, and that the rearward was far enough behind, they fell in hand with the packs and coffers of the carriages; and after they had killed the guards some of them ranfacked and rifled that which was in the waggons, others away the pack horses and other lumber beasts with their load and burden on their backs. Hereupon arose a cry and alarm, and was first heard of those that followed, but afterwards of them also in the forward & so from both ends they ran to the midst, and at one time in diverse places, skirmished without all order confusedly. The Thracians heavily charged and encumbered with pillage and moft of them without any weapon at all, because they might have the use of their hands more nimble and agile to snatch & catch unto them their prizes, were by this means more exposed to receive hurt, and soon killed. The Romans again were much distressed and annoyed through the disadvantage of the ground and the waies; which the barbarous people were well enough acquainted with, and out of them would issue forth to encounter, and otherwhiles lurk within hollow blind caves, and not be seen. The very packs likewise and the waggons, standing and lying unto wardly in the way, sometime of one, and sometime of other (as it happened), troubled and hindered them much in their fight. So as here in one place lay the tree dead, there in another the true man that pursued him. And according as the plot of ground was good or bad, as well for the one sort as the other, as their hearts and courages lifted or failed them and as the number was more or less, so the skirmish and fight was variable: and in one word, on both sides many a man lay in the dust and lost his life. By which time the night approached, and the Thracians departed out of the conflict, not so much to avoid wounds and for fear of death, as for that they had perished themselves sufficiently of prizes. The Roman vanguard encamped without the forest in the open ground about the Temple of Neptune. The rearward remained still behind in the midst of the woods to guard their carriage, fortified within a double pallisado of strong stakes. The morrow after, when they had well discovered by their espials the way before them, they joined themselves with the vanguard. In this battle (over and besides a great part of their pillage lost, and a number of camp-followers and jacks slain, with some soldiers also, for that there was skirmishing every where throughout the chafe) there died Q. Minutius Thermus and a right great loss there was of him for he was a man of much valour and execution. That day the army marched as far as to the River Hebrus. From whence they passed through the confines of the Arrians, near unto the Temple of Apollo whom the inhabitants name Zerynthus. And there they met with another freight passage about a place called Tempra, as rough and cumbersome underfoot as the former. But forasmuch as there were no woods about it, it yielded no good place for ambushes. Howbeit the Thracians (a people likewise of Thrace) assembled together, hoping also to light upon the like booty. But by reason that the valleys lay naked and open, so as if any beted the narrow waies they might be discovered a far off, the Romans were less afraid and troubled. For, say that they were to fight in some place of disadvantage, yet they might arrange themselves in battel array in open field, and join in close fight hand to hand. Being therefore embattled in Squadrons thick and strong they charged the enemy with a great shout and cry, and at the first shock forced them to retreat and lose ground, and afterwards to turn back and fly, and in the rout they were beaten down and killed; for even their own freights which they seized for their vantage, empeached and hindered themselves. The Romans having gotten the victory, encamped near a village of the Maronians, called Sarz. The next day they marched through the champaign open country Priacicus, where they to journeyed three daies to take in corn, partly from out of the fields of the Maronians, which willingly of themselves they copied upon them, and partly out of their own ships, which followed after, well furnished with all kind of provision. From this place they made but one daies journey to Apollonia, and so passing through the territory of the Abderites, they came to Naples. All this way they journeyed peaceably through the Colonies of the Greeks. But the rest behind, if it were not dangerous unto them for any hostility, yet speeded still it was, all the whiles that they passed night and day through the midst of the Thracians, until at length they came into Macedony. The same army conducted sometime before by Scipio that very way, found the Thracians more gentle and tractable, for no other cause, but that they had less force of pillage and booty with them to let their teeth on water, and fingers on itching. And yet even then also (as Claudius writeth) there were fifteen thousand Thracians that encountered Marius the Numidian, as he marched before the vanguard to discover the coasts; and he saith, that he had in his company four hundred Numidian horsemen, and some few Elephants: also that his son with an eleet wing of a hundred and fifty horse, brake through the midst of the enemies, who also with a while after, (when his father Marius having placed the Elephants in the midst, and the Horsemen in the flanks, joined in battel with his enemies, charged them upon their backs, and put them in great fear) by means of which form and tempest (as it were) of the Cavalry, they never came so far, as to deal with the battel of the footmen. Cn. M. Julius led his army through Macedony into Thessaly, and marching on by the way of Epirus, arrived at Apollonia, where he abode all winter. For he made not so light a matter of winter failing, that he durst take the Sea, and hazard the passage at that time of the year.

The year almost expired, M. Valerius the Consul returned but of Liguria to Rome, for the creation of new Magistrates, having achieved no such memorable exploit in his Province during the time of his government, as might have yielded any colourable reason of his long stay, in that he came more tardy (than the usual manner was) to the assembly for an election of Consuls: (for he had then it was upon the 12 calends of March) wherein were created, M. Emilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius. The next day after these Pretors were elected; namely, Ap. Claudius Pulcher, Ser. Sulpicius Galba, Q. Terentius Cillo, L. Terentius M. Siffidius, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, and M. Furius Crassipes. After the election of Magistrates the Consul propoied to the Senat as touching the Provinces and governments of the Pretors. And the L. decreed, that two of them should remain at Rome to minister laws and execute justice: other two should be employed out of Italy, in Sicily and Sardinia: two in Italy, to wit, at Tarentum and in Gaul. Immediately before they entered into office they were enjoined to visit Asia and Ser. Sulpicius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and Q. Terentius of strangers and aliens: L. Terentius took the charge of Sicily, Q. Fulvius of Sardinia, Ap. Claudius was to govern Tarentum, and M. Furius to rule Gallia. It furnished the same year that L. Manlius and L. Manlius were delivered to the Carthaginian Embassadors, by the hands of the Fæd heralds at the commandment of M. Claudius Pretor of the City for the time being, and transported over to Carthage. For that the voice and speech went, that they had beaten the said Embassadors. A bruit and rumour there was of a great war begun in Liguria, which encreased every day more than other. Whereupon the Senat ordained to both the new Consuls the Province of Liguria, that day on which they propounded unto the Senat to consult about the Provinces and the affairs of the Common-weal. But Lepidus the Consul opposed himself against this their act and ordinance, alleging, "That it was a shameful indignity, that both the Consuls should be shut up and enclosed within the valleys of Liguria; whereas for two years already M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius had reigned like Kings, the one in Europe, the other in Asia, instead of Phil and Antiochus. And if (qd. he) it be the pleasure of the Senat that there should be armies maintained in those parts, more meet, I wot, it were, that Consuls should have the command & conduct thereof, as of such private persons. As for them, they range about those nations, certifying them with threats of war against whom there hath been none proclaimed; imitating merchandise and selling peace among them for sums of money. Now if it be requisite and needful to keep two armies for the government and defence of those Provinces, like as M. Fulvius and Cn. Manlius Consuls, succeeded M. Atilius and L. Scipio Consuls: so C. Lælius and M. Valerius the Consuls ought to have entered in place of Fulvius and Manlius. At least while now, when the Ætolian war is finished and brought to an end, Asia recovered and conquered from Antiochus, and the Gauls vanquished subdued, either ought Consuls to be sent unto their armies, or else the legions to be brought back from thence, and at length delivered to the Common-weal. The Senat notwithstanding they gave him the hearing, persisted still in their resolution, that both Consuls should be employed in the Province of Liguria. Yet thought good it was, that Manlius and Fulvius should leave their Provinces, withdraw their forces from thence, and return to Rome. An old grudge there was and a rankred enmity between the said M. Fulvius, and M. Emilius the Consul: and among other matters of discontentment, Emilius gave out, that by the means of Fulvius, himself was created Consul two years later than otherwise he should have been. And therefore to work him delight and make him odious to the World, he caused the Embassadors of Ambracia (whom he had suborned and set on for to lay matters to his charge) to enter into the Senat: These being in place, complained that M. Fulvius had wronged upon them, and were also that they were in peace, performed all that other Consuls before had imposed upon them, and were also that they were peaceably spoiled and waited: then were they terrified with the sacking of our City, and threatened with the killing of our people, that for very fear we were forced to shut our gates. Afterwards we were beleaguered and assaulted, and against us all kinds of hostility practised, by sword, by fire, by ruining and ranfacking our City. Our wives, our children, have been led and haled into captivity and bondage) our goods violently taken from us; (and this which we have all we need to our heart) our Temples throughout the whole City despoiled and robbed of their goodly ornaments: the images of our Gods, and finally our Gods themselves plucked out of their shrines and places, and so carried away: yea, the very walls and pillars left bare and naked, so as the Ambracians have no Gods remaining amongst their rocks, and to whom they might make their prayers and supplications. As they poured out their complaints, the Consul of a mind to aggravate and heap more matter upon his adversary, ceased not to propound unto them many interrogatories (as it was plottened between them before) and drew them out to speak many things, as if with their good will they would not have uttered them. When the rest of the LL. were moved herewith, then the other Consul C. Flaminius undertook the apologetic defence of M. Fulvius, saying, "That the Ambracians trod in an old beaten way, and did no other worse than some before them had done. For even so was M. Marcellus accused by the Syracusians, so was Q. Fulvius charged by the Capuans. And why by the same means suffered they not? Quintus was by King Philip, M. Aelius and L. Scipio by Antiochus, Cn. Manlius by the Gauls, and the same Fulvius himself by the Ætolians and people of Cephallenia? That Ambracia was assaulted, battered, and forced in the end: that images and ornaments were taken from thence; that other acts were done and committed, which usually follow upon the winning of Towns; think ye my LL. that either I in the behalf of Fulvius will deny, or Fulvius himself will deny? who in regard of these worthy exploits and noble acts, is minded to demand at your hands the honor of a Triumph, who purporeth to carry before his triumphant chariot the portraiture of Ambracia as it was taken, the images which they accuse him to have carried away and other spoils of that City; yea, and to set them upon the posts of his house for a memorial to posterity? No reason there is that the Ambracians should sever themselves from the Ætolians, and do more than they, for their safe and condition is all one. And therefore let my colleague shew his rage and malice, and bewray a festered enmity in some other cause: or if he will needs follow and pursue this forward, let him intertain and keep still his Ambracians unto the coming of M. Fulvius. And for mine own part, I will suffer no act to pass either of the Ambracians or the Ætolians, so long as M. Fulvius is absent. Æmylius accused his enemy for having a crafty head of his own, and for his subtle fetches, as being notorious and well known to all men for no better; saying, that full cunningly he would trifle out the time, and make delays all the year long, that he might not come to Rome so long as his adversary was Consul. Thus in this debate between the two Consuls two dayes were spent and nothing else done. And it appeared evidently, that so long as Flaminius was in place and presence, nothing could be concluded and determined. Whereupon a time was spied out when Flaminius chanced to be sick, and by that occasion was away. Then upon a motion made by Æmylius there passed an act of the Senat. That the Ambracians should have all their goods restored unto them again; that they should enjoy their freedom and franchises, and live under their own Laws: and finally might take what customs, toll and imposts they would for portage, as well by Land as Sea: provided always that the Romans, and their allies the Latins, should be exempted and free therefrom. As for the images and other ornaments which they complained were taken out of their sacred Temples, the Senat ordained that when M. Fulvius was returned to Rome, the college of the Pontifics should have the hearing and deciding thereof, and look what they awarded and set down, it should stand and be performed accordingly. And the Consul not content with all this, took the vantage when there were but few Senators in the house, and procured an other act of Senat in this form. That they judged Ambracia not to be reputed a City forced by assault. This done, there was by virtue of an order from the Decemvirs a solemn supplication holden three dayes for the health of the people, in regard of a grievous pestilence that did despoiled both City and Countrey. After that the Latine feasts and holy-dayes were celebrated. When the Consuls had accomplished these dedications, and rid their consciences of scruple, and withal made a full and compleat levy to furnish legions (for both of them were desirous to have new souldiers) they departed unto their Provinces, and called all the old.

After the Consuls were set forward on their journey, the Pro-consul Cn. Manlius returned home to Rome. For whose sake the Pretor Servius Sulpicius assembled the Senat in the Temple of Iuliana. Where after relation made of his deeds achieved, he demanded that in consideration thereof, due honor and thanksgiving should be rendered to the immortal Gods, and withal, that himself might ride triumphant into the City. The most part of the Legats and Commissioners, who had been with him gainst and desired the same, and above all the rest L. Furius Purpuris, and L. Æmylius Paulus, who stepped forth, and informed against him in these terms: "That they had been sent in commission to assist Cn. Manlius, for the making of a peace with Antiochus, and finishing of that accord and those covenants and conditions, which were commended and agreed between him and L. Scipio. Yet Cn. Manlius, say they, endeavored all that ever he could to trouble that peace yea, and to have supplanted and intrapped Antiochus by means of ambush. If he had ever come in his way, or within his reach, but the King being a ware of the Consul's fraud and deceit, albeit there was made great means many a time to have caught him by colour of parley and conference, yet avoided evermore not only to have speech and communication with him, but also to come within his sight. And when Manlius would needs have passed over Taurus, hardly and with much ado could he be kept back, notwithstanding all the commissions prayed for and

and be sought him to slay, and not to hazard himself and incur the danger of a notable loss and overthrow, fore-told by the verities and propheties of Sibylla to light upon them that would pass beyond the bounds limited by the fatal destinies. All this notwithstanding he advanced forward and approached with his army, yea, and encamped near the very pitch and top of the mountain, where all the water that falleth from above, runneth contrary wayes into divers Seas. And when he could find no quarrel there for which he might make war (because the Kings people and subjects were still and quiet) he turned the army about to the Gallagrecs, against which nation there was no war intended either by warrant and authority from Senat, or by grant and commission from the people. And what man was ever so hardy and bold, as to war upon his own head? The wars against Antiochus, Philip, Annibal, and the Carthaginians, are most fresh in each mans remembrance: and of all these the Senat was consulted with, and the people granted their ordinance. Embassadors many a time and often were addressed before: restitution and amends were by order demanded: and last of all, heralds were sent, solemnly to denounce and proclaim war. Now tell me, Cn. Manlius, Which of all these things were done: that we may call this by the name of a publick war, allowed by the State of the people of Rome; and not rather a private brigandage and robbery of your own? But contented you your self with this, and did you no more? marched you directly forward, and took you nothing but that which was in your way? leading your army against those only whom you took to be your enemies? or rather at all turnings and windings, nay, at every forked high way leading on both hands, when you were at a stand, followed not you like a mercenary and waged Consul unto Attalus (King Eumenes his brother) with the Roman army, what hand soever he turned and marched? There was not a crank and nook but you visited; there was not a corner that you left unsearched, in all Bithia, Lyconia, and Phrygia. There was not a tyrant, Prince nor Potentate, there was not a Lord of any borough or castle, how far soever out of the way, but you had a saying to them to pill and poll them, and to pick pence out of their purses. For what business had you with the Orontians? What had you to do with other nations, as innocent and guiltless as they? Now as concerning the war, (in regard whereof you demand a triumph) in what sort managed you it? fought you a battail either in place commodious, or time convenient? Surely, I must needs say, great reason you have and good cause, to require that honor and praise be given to the immortal Gods: first for that their gracious will and pleasure was that the army should not smare for the temerity and rashness of their chief leader, warring as he did against the law of nations; then in that they preferred unto us, not men indeed for enemies, but very beasts and no better. For ye must not think, that it is the name only of the Gallagrecs, which is mingled and compounded for long time before, both their bodies and minds have been mixed and corrupted, and then themselves bafard and degenerate from their first nature. Had they been the same Gauls with whom we have fought a thousand times in Italy, and with doubtful issue, and lost as much as we won, and every foot received as good as we brought, think ye there would have returned one messenger from thence, to bring us news, for any good at least, wife that our General there did? Twice he came to conflict with them; twice he encountered them in place of disadvantage; mounting with his army against the hill, and ranged in the bottom of the valley, even under the enemies feet: in such sort, that if they had lanced no darts against us from the higher ground, but only come upon us with their naked and disarmed bodies, they had been able to have overcome us and gone over our bellies. And what hapned hereupon? God-amercy the good fortune of the people of Rome: we may thank (I say) the great and terrible name of the Romans. Their fresh renown of the late ruins and overthrowes of Annibal, Philip, and Antiochus, amazed and astounded (as one would say) these men with their so corpulent and mighty bodies; with slings and arrow-shot only were they discomfited and put to flight, so affrighted were they. There was not a sword once bloudied in all this Gauls war: at the first twing of the bow and ringing of the arrow, they fled away like swarms of bees with ringing of balons. And yet believe me, even we the same and no other (as if fortune would admonish and shew what had become of us if we had affronted an enemy indeed) in our return, when we returned to fight upon certain petty robbers and thieves of Thrace, were soundly beaten, killed, and put to flight, and spoiled and well stripped of our bag and baggage. Q. Minutius Thermus (by whose death we have sustained a far greater loss, than if Cn. Manlius had miscarried, whose rashness was the cause of all this calamity and misfortune) with many a tall and valiant man besides, lost his life in this skirmish. Our host bringing away with them the spoil and pillage of K. Antiochus, was discombed and parted into three troops: the vanguard in one place, the rearguard in another, and the carriages in a third: were faine to take up their lodging one whole night amongst bushes, briars, and brambles, and lurk within the caves and dens of wild beasts. Are these the brave and worthy exploits, for which you demand a triumph? But say, that you had received in Thrace, no other damage nor dishonor: which be the enemies over whom you would needs triumph in all the hazard? tro they be those whom the Senat & people of Rome destined & assigned to be your enemies: for so was triumph granted to this L. Scipio here in place: so likewise to that M. Aelius before him over K. Antiochus: so to also ere while to Q. Quintus for the victory of Philip; and so to conclude unto P. Africani for subduing Annibal the Carthaginians, and K. Syphax. And when the Senat had ordained war, yet before they enterprised and began these high and hairy affairs, they made some doubt and pause in such petty circumstances as these, to wit, unto whom they should should send defiance and denounce the said war: whether to the Kings themselves in their own persons or it were sufficient to give intimation to one garrison or other within their frontiers. And would ye now (my matters) that all these observations and ceremonies should be polluted and confounded, that the rights and laws of the Feciales and heralds should be abolished, that there shall be no more Fecial at all. But let religion and divine service (God forgive me, if I seem to blaspheme) be trodden under foot: suppose the Gods were utterly forgotten of you, and their remembrance quite exiled out of your hearts: Is it your pleasure also, and think ye I meet, that the Senat be consulted no more for their advice in question of war? or that a bill be not proposed to the people, in this wise: Pleadeth it you or no, to ordain that war be levied against the Gauls? The other day, and no longer since, the Consuls were delirious and exorbitant to govern Greece and Asia, yet when they perceived you to be reolute and perill still in offering unto them both, the Province of Liguria, they were content and obeyed. Great reason shall they have therefore to demand a triumph at your hands, after they have achieved an happy victory and finished that war, which they first enterprised under your warrant and authority. After this manner as ye have heard, spake Furius and Emilius. And Manius again, as we find in record, answered thus, much to this effect, as followeth: "Right honorable & my very good LL., the Tribuns of the Commons were ever wont afore-time, to repugn and cross them that demanded triumph: and I take my self much beholden unto them for this favour, that either in their love to my self, or in regard of my great and notable exploits, they have not only by their silence given their consent for my honor, but also seem ready and prett to propound the same unto the people, if need had been. Burnow forsooth, whom have I (and God will) for mine adversaries, but even some of my ten adjacents or suffragans, whom our ancestors thought good to give unto their Generals in the wars, as a council both to assist and aid them, and also to countenance and grace them in their victory? L. Furius and L. Emilius are the men and none but they, who inhibit and debar me for mounting up into the triumphant chariot: they are ready to pluck from my head the glorious and honorable crown that I should wear: eventhose (I say) whom (if the Tribuns had hindred and impeached my triumph) I would have reported myself unto as witnesses of my worthy acts. Certainly, (my LL.) far be it from me, that I should envy and repine at the honour of any man: but I remember well, that of late daies when certain Tribuns of the Common state (men of great courage and action) went about to flay and forbid the triumph of Q. Fabius Laber, ye by your authority diverted and scared them from their intended enterprise: and he triumphed in the end, notwithstanding his adversaries gave out and said aloud, not that he had fought a war unjustly, but in reprochful manner charged him, that he had not so much as set eye upon the enemy. And I, who have lo often in ranged battell fought with an 100000 most fierce and warlike enemies, slain or taken prisoners more than 40000 of them, forced and won two of their camps: and left all places on this side the ridge of the mountain Taurus, more peaceable and quiet than is the Land of Italy, am not only frustrate and put beside my triumph, but also stand here before your honors to defend my self against the challenge of these mine own Council and Suffragans. Which accusation of theirs, I counteth (as ye have heard my LL.) of two principal points: for objected they have, first, that I ought not at all to have made war with the Gauls; and secondly, that I conducted and managed the same, rashly and without discretion. The Gauls (say they) were no enemies of ours; but being quiet in peace, and ready to do whatsoever they were charged, were by you abused and wronged, I will not require (my LL.) that ye should have the same hard conceit of the Gauls which inhabit in Asia, as touching their cruelty and mortal hatred against the Roman name, which ye know generally to be in the people of the Gauls: Do but consider and judge of these Gauls as they be in themselves simply without respect of the infamous name and odious opinion that goeth of the whole generation: O that King Eumenes were here. Would to God that all the States of Asia were present in place, that ye might hear them rather what complaints they would make, than my self accusing of them. Send but your Embassadors to all the Cities of Asia, and enquire whether servitude were greater and more grievous, that which they were delivered from by the chasing of Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, or this whereof they are now eased by the subduing of the Gauls? Let them relate unto you, and make report how often their territories have been wasted by them, how many booties have been driven, and prizes carried away out of them, and how they were brought to so low a pass, that they hardly could find means and make any shift to redeem their prisoners by ransom. Let them tell you what they heard there besides, how they killed men, yea, and their children, to sacrifice, unto their Gods. But know ye now from me, that your allies yielded tribute to the Gauls, yea, and should have paid still at this day, notwithstanding they were by you delivered from their subjection under King Antiochus. If I had not bestirred my self the better, for the farther that Antiochus was removed from them, the more proudly and outrageous would these Gauls have ruled like LL. over all Asia, and whatsoever lands had lien on this side the top of the mount Taurus, you should have laid to the legacy of the Gauls and not annexed to your own Empire & dominion. All this is true will some one say, and what of all that? These Gauls likewise once spoiled the temple at Delphos, repented in times past the common Oracle of the whole world and situate in the very heart and midst of the earth, & yet the people of Rome neither denounced nor made war for all that. Certainly, I always would have thought there had been some difference to be made between those daies, when at neither

A Greece nor Asia was under your jurisdiction and obedience (that you should need to take care and regard of what was done in those parts) & this present time, in which ye have yet the mountain Taurus to be the bound & limit, wherunto your Empire extendeth, in which you give freedom and immunity to Cities: in which ye enlarge the confines, and take in the precincts of others, finishing these cities with forreiture & lots of their territories, and take in the precincts and tributes: in which I say, you augment and diminish realms, give and take in kingdoms at your good pleasure: and in one word, in which ye judge it a matter that concerneth you, to provide that there may be a general peace both on land and sea. Were you so much pleased, that Asia might not be counted free, unless Antiochus had withdrawn his garrisons, and kept quiet within their fortresses and castles, and flattered not forth and thought you with gifts granted unto King Eumenes, might be assured unto him, and the freedom likewise of the Cities, established unto them, if whole armies of Gauls might range all about to and fro in the precincts? But why stand I to much arguing and reasoning in this manner, as if I had not here to do with Gauls enemies, but rather caused them to be our enemies? O L. Scipio, I call you now to witness, into whose charge and government I succeeded, whole virtue and felicity withal, I besought the immortal Gods to vouchsafe unto me (and my prayer was not in vain) and you likewise, O P. Scipio, who with the Col. your brother and in the whole army, had the room & place indeed of an adjoint Lieutenant and no more, but carried the Majesty of a Colleague & joint companion; I speak frankly both of you upon your knowledge, whether whole legions of Gauls served not in the army of Antiochus? Tell us, whether you saw them not in the field, marshalled in both the points and flanks of the main battell, as the very flower and strength of the whole puissance of Antiochus? Say directly, fought ye not with them, when they slew you them not, & carried away their spoils, & undonned and lowly enemies? And yet both Senat decreed and people ordained war with Antiochus by name, and not with the Gauls. But I too (or else I am much deceived) within this decree and ordinance, they included all those besides that came to aid and assist him. Of whom (excepting Antiochus himself, with whom Scipio had articulated peace and alliance, and ye also had expressly given order therefore) they all were our enemies no doubt, who had born arms against us in the quarrel and behalf of the said Antiochus. Now albeit the Gauls above all others were comprised in this number, together with some petty Kings and Tyrants besides, yet I contrasted accord and peace with others, (after I had forced them to suffer due punishment according to their treachery) as far forth as I thought it expedient for the honour of your Empire: yea, and assisted also to gain and win the hearts of the Gauls, if haply it had been possible to have dulced and reclaimed them from their inbred fierceness and natural cruelty. But when I perceived that they were untractable, untamed, and implacable, then and not before I resolved, that it was high time to bridle and bring them into order by violence and force of arms. Now that I have cleared the former point of my accusation, as touching the enterprise of the war, it remaineth that I proceed now on account of the conduct thereof. Wherein verily I would make no doubt to approve mine innocence, and justify the goodness of my cause, if I were to plead, I say not, in the Senat of Rome, but even at the council table of Carthage, where (as men say) they make no more ado, but trust up hang and crucify their Generals, if they proceed to execution of any service in a City, which therefore vouch the name of the Gods both before they begin, and also when they proceed to the managing of all their affairs, (because no person should come to detract or deprave that militiously, which the Gods have once approved) and which City in the grant & ordinance either of procession or triumph, useth this solemn form of words: For that he hath well and happily accomplished and managed the weal publick: In this City, I say, if I were unwilling, nay, if I reputed it an odious matter, and favouring too much of pride and arrogance to vaunt my self and boast of mine own prowess; yet if in regard of the happy success and felicity of my self and mine army, in that without any loss of soldiers, we vanquished and subdued in great and mighty nation, I demanded first that due honour and thanksgiving should be rendered unto the immortal Gods, and then, that I might my self ascend and mount up the Capitol in triumph, from whence I descended to take my voyage, after I had conceived and pronounced my vows, and made my prayers after the solemn and religious order: would ye deny both me and the immortal Gods also? Yes marry would you, and why? Forsooth I fought in a place of disadvantage. But tell me then, I pray you, in what ground I might have fought with better vantage? Considering the enemies were seized of the hill, and kept themselves within their strength and fort. Should have gone unto them, if I had been willing to have vanquished and overcome them. What? how if they had been there within a strong City? how if they had kept within the walls, and would not have issued forth? You must then have laid siege unto them and given the assault. Must I so indeed? And how I pray? Fought M. Acilius (I beseech you) at Thermopylae in a place of advantage? Why? did not T. Quintius after this manner dispossess Philip of the high Mountains, which he held over the River Aous? In faith, I cannot yet devise what kind of enemies they either imagine to themselves they were, or would have you to take and esteem them to be. If degenerate, if effeminate, if enervate with the delights and pleasures of Asia, what danger was it to march up the hill against them with all disadvantage? If redoubtable and terrible for fierce courage and bodily strength, deny ye triumph for so noble a victory? Envy (my good LL.) is blind, and can skill of nothing, but to detract and defame vertues, to falsify

"and corrupt the honors and rewards due thereto, Pardon me I beseech your Hts and hold me "excused; I have been over long and tedious. It is not, I assure you, any delight and pleasure that "I take to put forth and glorify my self, but a necessity imposed upon me (in mine own defence, "to confute these crimes objected against me) which hath driven mine Oration out in length. To "proceed, was it possible also that in Thrace I could make the passes within the forests large and "wide, which naturally were straight and narrow? the ground plain and smooth, which by na"ture was uneven and rugged? Could I make level downs of steep mounts? open champion and "fair fields of woodland overgrown, and rough wylds. Lay it in me, to prevent those Thracian
 "cheeves that they should not hide themselves within their lurking holes and ordinary covert "thickets? Was it in my power, to impeach them that they might snatch and carry nothing of "our baggage? Was I able to warrant that none of our laboring beasts out of our great number, I "should be driven and led away from their company? that no person should be hurt and finally,
 "that Q. Minutius a brave and hardy knight, should not die of his wound? My adversaries pressed "hard and much upon this misfortune, that it was our unlucky hap to lose loe worthy a Gen"eral: but they never think that if they would say nothing but suppres and conceal all, yet you "should know (since the whole army is here present to testify that which I say) That although "the enemy assaulted us in a narrow flight, in an inconvenient place of great disadvantage, yet
 "both our battalions at once, as well the vanguard as rearguard, compassed the army of the "Barbarians busily and occupied in rifling of our carriage, slew many thousands of them that very "day, and within few daies after either killed or took prisoners a greater number of them by far.
 "Well, if I had not drawn a sword in Asia, if I had not seen an enemy there, yet I Pro-consul had "deserved a triumph well enough for those two battels in Asia. But enough hath been said of "these matters, and I am to request you rather (my Lords all) to forgive me for my boldness, if "I have held you longer than my will and desire was.

The acclamation that day had prevailed more than his own defence, but that they continued arguing and debating in the Council-house until it was late in the evening. Then the Senate rose with this mind (as it should seem) to deny him a triumph. The next morning, the kinsfolk and friends of Cn. Manlius laboured all that ever they could; Likewise the authority of the ancient stood him in great stead; who said plainly that the precedent could not be found in any histories;
 That a General who had vanquished his enemies, accomplished the full time of government in his Province, and brought his army back, returned into the City as a private person, without the honor of the triumphal chariot and the laurel garland. The very indignity and shame of this example, surmounted the malice of his adversaries, in so much as the Senators in a frequent assembly granted him triumph.

The remembrance and memory of this debate, was afterwards drowned in a greater contention that arose with a far mightier and more noble personage. For as Valerius Ant. as hath recorded, the two Q. Petilii called P. Scipio Africanus into question, and set him down a day peremptorily to make his appearance, and answer for himself. This action divers men construed diversly, according to their several disposition and affection. Some blamed not so much the Tribunes of the Commons, as the whole City in general, for suffering such an abuse; discoursing in this wise: That the two chiefest States and Common-wealths in the World were become at one time unthankful, but Rome more ungrateful of the twain. For Carthage being subdued, had banished Annibal likewise vanquished; but Rome a victress was about to expulse Africanus a conqueror. Others again reasoned thus: that in no State there ought to be a citizen so pre-eminent and high above the rest, that he might not be under law, and brought to answer unto interrogatories accordingly. And nothing, preferreth liberty in a City, and maintaineth equal liberty more, than to have the mightiest man to hold up his hand at the bar. For what may be safely committed to any man (and surely the sovereign rule of the state least of all other things) if he be not to yield an account of the managing of his affairs? And verily, he that can abide to be equal unto others, to proceed against such a one by rigor and force, is no injustice at all. Thus men commonly talked pro & contra, until the judicial day came of his personal appearance, and answer to be made. Never was there man known before that day (no, not Scipio himself when he was at the highest, either Consul or Censor) accompanied with a greater train of men of all degrees and qualities, than he that day was conducted unto the common place and court of Pleas as an accused person, there to plead his cause. Being commanded to speak in his own defence, he began his oration without any mention at all of the imputations and matters with which he was charged, and entered into a discourse of the acts by him achieved; and that with such a Majesty and magnificence as it was well known and confessed, that never man was praised either better or more truly than he. For with that courage and mind he achieved those his brave exploits indeed; with the same spirit he delivered them in words. And no man thought him tedious and was weary to hear his speech, because all that he related was for his own defence in this his danger, and not upon vain glory and ostentation. The Tribunes of the Commons his adversaries, when they had laid open certain supposed crimes committed of old, as touching his wastful excesses whiles he wintered in Syracusa; as also the riot and outrage of Pleminius which hapned at Locris; they proceeded to charge him by presumptions and suspitions, rather than by direct evidences and proofs, for embezzling and averting to his proper use certain treasure gotten from King Antiochus; and namely, that his son being taken prisoner, was rendered unto him without ransom; and that in all other things, Scipio was respected

A alone had carried the Roman peace and war under his guide. Altho that he bare a strong hand over the Consul, more like, I wot, a Dictator and absolute commander, than a Lieutenant and assistant unto him, all the while he was in the province. Neither aimed he and his lieut. any other mark, when he went that journey, but that the same, which long before was notoriously known to Spain, Gaul, Sicily, and Africa might as evidently appear to Greece, to Asia, and all to the Kings and nations of the East parts, to wit, that he was the only man, he was the chief, the head and pillar of the Roman Empire, that under the shadow of Scipio his wing, that City which is the lady of the world, was covered and protected; that a beak and nod of his head, was as good as all arrests of Senat and helts of people. Thus when they could not touch him in life, nor fasteen upon him any note of infamy, they charged him all that ever they could with matter to kindle envy. Thus with orations they spent the time until night came, and the business was put over to another day: which being come, the Tribunes, only in the times in the morning were set in their places within the Rostra [or common place] the defendant was called, who garded with a great company of his friends and followers, passed through the mids of the assembly, approached the Rostra and stood full under it. Then after an exor; and silence made: "My "Masters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes of the commons, and likewise Quirites, my neigh"bors and citizens of Rome, upon this very day of the month it was that I fought a great bat"tle against Annibal and the Carthaginians, with right fortunate and happy success; meet there"fore and good reason since it is, that to day all pleas and actions faulter: I will go directly "and immediately from hence to the Capitol and present my self before Imp. Opt. Max. before
 "Jove and Minerva, with all the rest of other gods and goddesses, presidents and patrons of that "temple and fortress, to perform my humble duty unto them to salute and thank them, for that "they have vouchsafed me that resolute, affection and powerful means with all, both on such a "day as this, and also many times besides, to perform my devoir well and truly unto the Com"mon-wealth. As many of you (before Quirites) as well may, go ye with me, and pray the "gods to lend you like governors to ourselves, and no worse. If I say (and not else) as you ever "thought I was seventeen years of age, even to these mine old daies, you alwaies advanced me to
 "the honors before the ordinary time of mine age, so I again advanced and prevented the said honors "with good service and noble deeds. This said, he departed from the Rostra and ascended up to the Capitol; whereas the whole audience there assembled turned at once and followed Scipio;
 so much as last the scribes and notaries, ye, and the very servants left the Tribunes there alone, without any to bear them company but their own bondservants and the common cryer, who still from the Rostra called and cited the defendant. Scipio not only visited the temples upon the Capitol hill, but also made a perambulation with the people of Rome throughout the whole City to all the churches and chappels of their gods and goddesses: This was in manner a more solemn day unto him in regard of the affectional favour of men, and the elimination of his true gender indeed, then on which he rode into the City in triumph over King Syrax and the Carthaginians: But it was the last fair day that ever he saw; and never shone the sun again pleasant upon P. Scipio. For after this, foregoing envy growing toward him, and what a life and how full of dangers he should have with those Tribunes, upon a longer day granted for the process of law against him, he retired himself apart to Laternum, of set purpose to make default and not appear to plead his cause any more: He carried a greater spirit with him, his heart was too big, & used he had been to an higher degree of port & honour, then to take knowledge what it was to be accused; he could not skill to vail himself and stoop so low, and to abate himself to the abject condition of those that plead for themselves at the bar. Now when the day was come, and that in his absence his name began to be called, L. Scipio answered for him, and alledged sickness to be the cause why he was away. But the Tribunes his accusers, would not admit of that excuse, replying and saying: "That upon the same pride of heart, in which he avoided once before, his judicial trial, and left the Tribunes and the whole assembly, he now also would not appear to make his answer.
 "Even so triumphed he then over the people of Rome, when accompanied with those whom he called after him as prisoners (after he had once taken from them their power and liberty to give their sentence and doom of him) he requested himself that day, by way of an insult (from the Tribunes of the Commons) into the Capitol. Well are ye now served therefore (say they) and justly punished for that daies folly and rashness. For lo how he himself now abandoneth you, whose your motive and leader then, to forsake us. See how every day more then other our courage is fallen and heart abated: and dare not we now send folk to fetch him (a private person and no more) out out of his farm and house in the country, and make him to appear and plead his answer: unto whom not past 17 years ago, at what time as he was General of an army on land, & Admiral of the Armado by sea, we were so bold as to send Tribunes of the Commons Adile, to arreik and bring him away with them to Rome? In the end, the rest of the Tribunes of the Commons being called earnestly unto by L. Scipio for their lawful favour, set down his order & conclusion: that if sickness were alledged for his excuse, and that there were nothing else that had occasioned his absence, it should be received for good & lawful, and their colleagues should adjourn his trial to a farther day. It fortuned at that time that Tib. Sempronius Gracchus was one of the Tribunes between whom & P. Scipio there was some quarrel, he forbade expressly that his own name should be subscribed to the instrument of the adjournment of his colleagues. And with every man looked to hear, some heavier sentence denounced against Scipio, he awarded in this manner. "For as much as Lucius Scipio executeth the absence of his brother by sickness, it is good and sufficient in my opinion. And then that as I will not for my part suffer P. Scipio to be accused before he return again to Rome. Yea, and then also, if he call for my helpings, he and I will give him assistance, and stop the course of pretence against him. And as to the main point of the cause, this is my resolution, that P. Scipio being advanced to highly as he is to that pitch of honor, by his noble and famous exploits, and by the dignities received at the hands of the people of Rome, as if both gods and men had condescended to set him aloft, for him to come down now and stand pleading below at the bar beneath the Rostra, and there have his eyes glow and ring again with the cheeks and taunts of certain green heads and butchery cuts, were a great shame and disgrace to the people of Rome, then to himself. Nay, he shamed not thus with this bare award, but sealed and set it on solely with words of indignation, testifying his discontentment for this course and manner of proceeding. And shall Scipio (quoth he, my master Tribunes) that renowned conqueror of Africa, stand under your feet at your devotion? Dejected he and put to flight in Spain a most brave and noble Generals of the Carthaginians, with their 4 entire armies? Took he Syracus prisoner, vanquished he Annibal, subdued he Carthage and made it tributary unto us? Chased he Antiochus beyond the mountain Taurus, (for it must be confessed, that in this glorious conquest L. Scipio and his brother copartner with him) and all for this, to be trodden under foot of two Patritii? And that ye should seek to triumph over P. A- fricanus? Will it never be better? Shall great personages (with all the good deeds of their own for all the dignities and honors by you upon them conferred) never reach and attain to a strong fort and sure place of defence, wherein they may make account to be safe and past all danger, L and wherein their old age may rest and repose, if not with worship and honour, yet at least with in security, exempt from abuse and violent outrage? The sentence it self of Gracchus (enforced with such a speech especially) moved not others only, but also the wiser aculeus themselves; who made no other rejoinder again but thus. That they would consider better what they might by their place and what they ought of duty to do. When the assembly of the people was broken up, the L.L. of the Senat began to sit in council, where the whole order of the Senators (but principally the ancients and as many as had been Consuls) highly commended and thanked Tib. Gracchus, for that he had preferred the weal-publick, before privat grudges and particular quarrels. But the Patritii were well spent and baited with reproachfull checks and biter rebukes, in that they would seem to rise by the fall of another, and to grace themselves with the disgrace of Africanus, and seek to triumph over him and be enriched with his spoils. Well after that, there was no more words of Scipio Africanus. The rest of his life he passed at Liternum and never had mind to come to the City: there ended he his daies in a country village; and (as they say) he charged his executors upon his death bed, to inter him in that very place. And there his tomb or monument was built, because he would not that so much as his funeral obsequies should be performed at Rome, (his native country) to be unthankfull as it was. A rare man he was and worthy to be recommended to the memory of all posterity: howbeit the former part of his life was more singular and memorable, as well for the conduct of martial exploits in war, as the governance of civil affairs in peace, then in his latter daies. For in his youth, he followed the war continually; whereas in his old age, as his body decayed and faded, to whatsoever he did, M lost much of the wonted beauty and lustre. Besides, there was no matter presented, to employ that wit and spirit of his. What odds was there between his former Consulship and the second, although ye put his Consulship to in the balance? What comparison was there, and what semblable thing in that lieutenancy of his in Asia of so little or no employment was it by reason of his own sickness; and beblimished withall, by the occasion of the misfortune of his son. And afterward, his return home again was no lesse unfortunate, for the hard choice whereunto he was driven, forced of necessity to abide the trial of a doubtfull issue in judgment, to quit with his native City for ever. Howbeit he alone went away with the honor above all other, of finishing the punick war, as great and dangerous to the Romans as any that ever they made.

When Africanus was once dead and his head laid, his adversaries and enemies were wont of whom, M. Porcius Cato was the chief and principal: a man who was wont to bark (as it were) and rail against him during his life in regard of his greatness. And it is thought, that the Patritii were set on by him, and procured through his perswasion, both in the life of Africanus to be drawn out, and after his death to have preferred a bill in this form and manner following: May it please you to grant and ordain, that true feach and diligent enquiry be made, what sums of money were taken in prize, carried away, and levied away of King Antiochus and those which were under his obedience and dominion; and that of as much thereof as came not into the publick treasury and chamber of the City, Ser. Sulpicius (the Pretor of the City) may propose unto the Senat, to know their advice and pleasure touching it: that whensoever of all the Pretors for the time now being, it shall please the Senat to appoint, he may sit in commission and inquiration thereof. This bill was first crossed by Q. and Lucius Mammilius, who thought it meet and reason, that the Senat alone (as at all times heretofore) should make due enquiry of the monies so parloined and embezzled: as is aforesaid, and not brought into the account or chest of the City. The Patritii charged the Scipios for being over great and mighty, and as it were XX in the Senat, to call all before them. L. Furius Purpureo (a man that had been Consul, and one of the ten consularians in Asia, was of opinion, that the foyled enquiry should be granted in more large & ample terms, namely, namely, as touching the money not only taken from Antiochus, but also from other Kings and the provinces covertly taxing herein Cn. Manlius his old enemy. L. Scipio on the other side stepped forth to disprove this matter: albeit it was thought he would rather speak in defence of himself than against the thing. He complained much and shewed his grievances, that such a bill as this should come forth now, and be set on foot after the death of his brother Africanus, the most valiant knight and noblest personage that ever was: As if it were no sufficient, that P. Africanus wanted the solemn Panegyrick oration at the Rostra after his death, but he must be accused also. Why? the very Carthaginians are contented with the exile of Antiochus, and seek no more:

but the people of Rome is not satisfied even with the death of Scipio, unless his own good name after he is buried be wounded and mangled, and his brother also (to fill up the measure of their malice and hatred) be killed and sacrificed upon his tomb. M. Cato spake in the behalf of the bill, and perswaded that it might passe. His oration as touching the treasure of King Antiochus was so pleasant to be heard, and by the majesty of his authority, he diverted the two Patritii Tribunes of the Commons, clean away, from interposing themselves any more. When they once had denounced and given over their negative, all the tribes in general passed their voices affirmatively. Vitruvius. After this, Ser. Sulpicius propoposed unto the Senat: Whom they would appoint for this enquiry according to the act Patritii? and the L.L. of the Senat deputed Q. Tere- ntius. This Pretor was to great a friend to the house of the Cornelii: that some authors, truly to be true, who report how P. Scipio both died and also was carried forth to be entered at Rome (thus that bruit is so runneth current) have written, How he went at his funerals before the bier and the mourners, with a cap of liberty on his head, like as he had done before in his triumph, and gave sweet wine or merriment to all those that attended the convey, as far as to the gate Capena. This honour he did Scipio at his death, for that among other priviledges in Africa, he was by his honors recovered out of the enemies hand, but it should seem rather, that he was such an enemy to that family, that for the carked rancour and malice which he carried against that name, he was by the adverse faction of the Scipios, chosen especially of purpose to sit upon & execute that inquisition. But certain it is, before this Pretor (and in his extremities, who either in love & friendship, or in hatred and enmity, kept no mean) information was given immediately against L. Scipio.
Presentments were made likewise, and the names received of his lieutenants A. Hostilius and L. Hostilius both Caeso: and of his treasurer besides, C. Furius Aculeo. And to the end that it should appear to the world, that they were all attain of this crime of purloining and robbing the publick treasure of the common-weal if one complor, there were two secretaries also and one of his lieutenants called into question. But these three last mentioned, and L. Hostilius before-named, were found unguilty and acquit, before Scipio had his judicial trial: howbeit Scipio and
A. Hostilius his lieutenant, together with C. Furius were condemned. Scipio, for that he (as Valerius Maximus writeth) to make a more easie peace to the contentment of Antiochus, received 6000 pound weight of gold, and 480 pound weight of silver more than he brought into the City chamber. A.
Hostilius, for that he likewise detained eighty pound weight of gold, and 483 pound of silver; and Furius the Quellor for keeping back to his own use 130 pound of gold, and two hundred of silver. These sums I set down of gold and silver, as I find them gathered and registered by Valer- ius in his Chronicle. As for the sum of gold and silver, which L. Scipio should embezzle, I would rather think that the clerk or secretary faulted with his pen in writing the copies, than that he should fail to loud with his tongue in the first inditing of the Original. For it is more likely of the twain, that the weight of the silver was more than of gold. As also for the fine wherein he was doomed, I should amount but to forty thousand Sesterces, then arise to two hundred and fifty thousand. And I am rather induced thus to calculate, because it is said, that P. Scipio himself was required in the Senat to give his account but of such a sum; and when he had bidden his brother L. Scipio him that book of accounts, he took it of him, and there before the Senat, tore and rent it with his own hands, with indignation, that having brought into the Treasury two millions of Sesterces, he was called to his account for forty thousand. In which confident boldness of spirit and courage, when the Quellors durst not (against the order of law) take forth money out of the Treasury, he called for the keys, and said he would be to bold as to open the chests of the Treasury since he was the cause that they were locked. Many things besides are diversely reported of Scipio, especially as touching the latter end of his life, his trouble and accusation, his death, his funerals, and last of all, of his sepulchre and tomb, which distract me so, that I wot not what report to cleave unto, nor which records to beleve. For they accord not as concerning his sever. Some write it was M. Nevius, others again say that they were the Patritii that called him to his answer. Neither agree they in the time when he was troubled, nor in the year, no, nor the place wherein he died, nor yet where he was entered. Some affirm he ended his daies at Rome, others at Liternum. And in both places there are monuments and Statues of him to be seen. [For of Liternum there stood a tomb, and over the same tomb an image of his personage erected, which of late time we our selves saw overthrow in a tempest. At Rome likewise without the gate Capena, there be three statues upon the monument of the Scipios, whereof two are said to be of Pub. and L. Scipio, and the third of Q. Ennius the Poet. And this difference among authors is not touching his acts and affairs only, but also about the very Orations that he uttered were the orations indeed of P. Scipio & Tiberius Gracchus, which are commonly to taken and carried about, which disagree so much as they do. For the title of the oration that goeth for P. Scipio, hath the name of M. Nevius, a Tribune of the Commons: but through the whole

Oration it self there is no mention at all of that accuser. He termeth him one while Nepos [Knaue] and another while Nugator [Confuser.] In like sort the oration of Gracchus maketh no mention at all either of the Perila, the accusers of Africanus, or of the day assigned unto him for his answer. And we must devise to tell the whole tale otherwise, it would have it to agree with the oration of Gracchus; and for taking bribes of King Antiochus, his brother Africanus was Ambassador in Tulemy; and upon the news of his brothers misfortune, left his embassy and made hal to Rome. Where he took his way directly from the gate to the common place (for that was told him how his brother was going to prison) and thrust the sergeant from his body, yea, and when the Tribunes themselves would have restrained him, he used violence against them, and carried himself in this action off, as he shewed more kindness and love to his brother, than manners and civility otherwise. For thus complaineth Gracchus in his oration, that the Tribunes authority and power was infringed and broken by a privat person. And in the latter end, when he promised to assist L. Scipio, he knit up his speech with these words, that it was a thing more tolerable that both the Tribunitian puissance and the Common-weal should seem overcome and overcome by Tribunes themselves, then by a privat man. But he aggravated and enforced this violence and excessive outrage against him, and made it odious in such sort, that in blaming him for so much overshooting himself and degenerating as it were from his own nature, he rehearsed the commendable parts of his moderation and temperate carriage of himself aforesaid, and that in so good terms and ample manner, that thereby he made him some part of amends for the sharp reprehension he used for the present. For he said, that in times past he had rebuked and reproved the people, when they would have made him a perpetuall Consul and Dictator; that he had forbidden expressly, that any of his Statues in triumphant habit, should be set up and erected in the public places of assemblies, as in the Comitium and Curia, in the Capitoll and chappell of Iupiter Opt. Max. These commendable reports of him, if they were uttered in an oration passed of purpose for his praise, must needs testifie and shew a wonderful magnanimity of him, in the modest use of high honours according to a civil port; which an enemy by way of reproach and upbidding him, acknowledgeth and confesseth. But all writers accord, that Gracchus, took to wife the younger of his two daughters (for the elder without all question was affianced and given in marriage by his father to F. Cornelius Nasica, But it is not so certainly agreed upon, whether the was both betrothed and wedded alownto him, after her fathers death or no. As also, whether it be true (as it is reported) that when L. Scipio was a leading to prison, Gracchus, seeing one of his own fellow Tribunes to succour and release him, swate a great oath and protested that he was an enemy still to the Scipios as much as ever he was, and would not do any thing to carry favour with them, or to come into their grace, yet could he never endure that he should be carried to the prison, into which he had seen his brother Africanus lead Kings, great generals and commanders of enemies, captive. Moreover, that the same day the Senat furnished to be at supper together in the Capitoll, and arose up all at once, and requested Africanus to affianse his daughter to Gracchus, before the supper and banquet was ended. Which epoulsals being performed with all due complements accordingly, during the time of that solemn feast, Scipio, when he was returned home to his house, said unto his wife Emilia, that he had fancied and bestowed his daughter upon a husband. She then falling into a fit of choler like a woman, and chafing that he had not made her acquainted with the matter, and taken her advice touching the maiden, who was as much her child as his, brake out into these words withall, that if he had given her in marriage to Tiberius Gracchus, yet good reason it was that the mother should have been at the making of the bargain. Whereupon Scipio took great contentment and joy at this conformity of judgment in the choice, and inferred straightwaies, that he was the man to whom she was espoused. Thus much I thought good to relate of this worthy and noble person, albeit there is great variety of opinions, and diversity of writings in that behalf.

After the Pretor Q. Terentius, had finished the inquisition and whole process thereof, Hyllinus and Furius, who were attaint and condemned, that very day put in sufficient sureties to be bound in recognisance to the treasurers of the City, for the payment of their fines. But Scipio debating the matter still, & pleading that all the money which he had received was in the City chamber, & that he had purloined none of the publick treasure, was laid hold on to be had away and committed to prison. P. Scipio Nasica called unto the Tribunes for their help, and made a speech full of true praises and commendations, not in generall only of the whole name and family of the Cornelii, but in particular also of his own blood. And nemely he alleged and said, That himself and P. Africanus, together with L. Scipio (who now was going to prison) had to their fathers Cn. Scipio and P. Scipio, most noble and famous personages: those who for certain years in the end of Spain, advanced the renown and glory of the Roman name, managred the heads of many captives & armies, as well of Carthaginians as Spaniards; not only in martial feats of war, but also in this especially, that they had given testimony and proof unto those nations, of the temperate government, & faithful dealing of the Romans: and in the end both of them spent their blood and lost their lives in the quarrel of the people of Rome. And albeit it had been sufficient for all their posterity to maintain only & uphold the glory from them received, yet P. Africanus so far surpassed the praise worthy acts of his father, that it was verily beleevied he was not born of human blood, but descended from some divine and heavenly race of the gods. As for L. Scipio, who now is in trouble, to say nothing of his worthy acts which he achieved in Spain and in Africa, when he

As was lieutenant there to his brother Consul) he was both reputed by the Senat sufficient, with- out any calling of lots, to undertake the province of Africa and the war against King Antiochus, and also esteemed by his brother Africanus to worthy a person, that himself who had been Consul twice, Censor once, and had ridden in triumph, thought not foor to accompany him unto Africa in quality of his lieutenant. In which province (to the end that the greatest & so splendend glory of the lieutenant should not dim the brightnes of the Consul, and to drown his vertues and good parts) it so fell out, that the very same day, on which L. Scipio vanquished Antiochus near Myndes, P. Scipio lay sick at Elea, a City distant certain daies journey. He defeated I say an army there, nothing inferior to that of Antibal, with whom his brother had encountered before in Africa. In which battell among other great commanders and captains under the King, Antibal was himself imploied in person, even he who had been the grand General in the Punick war. Which service was so well conducted and managed, that a man posibly could not find fault so much as with fortune, or any second that happened there. And now when the war is unsplendend, there is picked matter of crimination in the peace and it (they say) was bought and sold for money. In which challenge the ten deputies and assistance in council, are also touched and noted with corruption, by whole advice the said peace was granted and concluded. Well, of those ten, there were some that stepped forth and accused Cn. Manlius: yet to far off was that accusation of theirs from being credited, that it did not so much as hinder and delay the very time of his triumph. But (beleevae me) in Scipio his case, the very conditions of peace favour strongly of bribery and indirect dealing, for that they are advantageous, respective & favorable to Antiochus. For his kingdom is left entire and whole unto him; now that he is vanquished he posselseth as much as before the war began; and Scipio having received from him a mighty made of gold and silver, hath brought nothing into the common treasury, but averted all from thence, and converted it to his proper use. Why? was there not carried in pomp at the triumph of L. Scipio in the very sight of all men as much gold and silver, as in ten triumphs before (and put them all together) could not be shewed. For what should I speak of the confines and frontiers of his realm? Namely, that Antiochus before time held under his dominion all Africa, and the marches of Europe adjoining; & great a part of the world that is, which extendeth from the hill Taurus, and stretch out so far as the Egean sea; how many not Cities only, but spacious countries and populous nations it containeth, all men know right well: as also that this country, bearing upon its length more then 30 daies journey, and in breadth between two seas ten daies journey, is even as far as to the top of the mountain Taurus, is taken from Antiochus, & he driven into the smallest angle and corner of the globe of the earth? What could he have been diseized of more in case his peace had cost him never a penny of money? When Philip was conquered, he had Macedony left unto him: when Nabis was subdued, he enjoyed still Lacedaemon: and no man ever went about to call Quintius in question for it. And why? may he had not to his brother Scipio Africanus, for whose sake the envy and malice of men hath defaced and hurt L. Scipio, whereas his brothers glory ought to have graced and helped him. Would any man of fence and reason judge, that so much gold and silver was brought into the house of L. Scipio, as may not possibly be raised, if all the goods he hath were sold to the worth? What should become of all the gold of the Kings? Where be those great purchases of lordships and inheritances that he hath made therewith? Certainly it cannot be, but in that house that hath not exceeded in superfluous expence, there should be seen some heap and mount of this new treasure. But what care his enemies for this? That which cannot be made of the substance and goods of L. Scipio they will make good on his body and back; which they mean to torture (belike) and expose to contumely & villany, to the end that a man of the best mark and quality that ever was, should be shut up in a dungeon among robbers by the high-way side, amongst night thieves and cut-purses, and there in the hard rocks and balefull darkness render his last breath; and when he is dead, to have his body cast out naked at the prison door. But be it whensoever it shall, this will be a greater Blot to the house Cornelia, then a shameful reproach for ever to the City of Rome. Against all these remonstrances, the Pretor Terentius opposed and read the law Perilia, the decree of the Senat, and the sentence given of L. Scipio, and he for his own part said, he could not do withall, but if the sum wherein he was condemned, were not brought into the common Treasury house, he knew no other remedy, nor what else to do, but to command him (a condemned person) to be apprehended again, and had away to prison. Then the Tribunes went apart to consider (to be apprehended again, and had away to prison). And within a while after C. Flaminius pronounced aloud, according to his own advice and the opinion of all his Colleagues (excepting only Gracchus) that the Tribunes would not interpose themselves, but that the Pretor might do and execute his office and his authority to the full. But Tib. Gracchus let down his own decree in this form, That as touching the sum wherein L. Scipio was condemned, he would not be against it, nor impeach the Pretor, but that he might use his power according to his place, and take it out of his goods, as far as they would extend. But that L. Scipio who hath subdued the mightiest and most puissant monarch in all the world, who hath drawn out and extended the bounds of the Roman empire, as far as the furthest frontiers of the earth; who hath obliged and bound King Eumenes, the Rhodians & so many Cities and States besides of Africa, and made them beholding to the people of Rome for favours and benefits bestowed upon them; finally, who hath himself laid up fast in prison many a General captain over the eunemics, after he led them in triumph: that he I say, should lie in prison & iron among the enemies of the people of Rome he would never suffer: and therefore he commanded him to be released and set at large. This decree was heard with great applause, and all men were (so joious to see L. Scipio delivered, that hardly a man would have believed (unless he had seen it) that there had been such a judgement: passed in the same City. Then the Pretor sent the Quæstors or Treasurers, to enter and seize upon all the goods of L. Scipio, in the name and to the use of the City: whereof there was not to be found, so much as any one token or mention of the Kings money, no, nor to great a sum could be raised, as the fine came to wherein he was condemned. The friends, kinsfolk, followers and wellwillers of L. Scipio, made such a contribution of money for him, that if he would have accepted of it, he had been a richer man by odds, therefore this crime and calamity fell upon him. But he took never a denier. His nearest kinsmen in blood bought again and redeemed as much of his own goods, as served for his necessary maintenance and no more. And the envy and hatred of men intended against the Scipios, turned upon the heads of the Pretor and his counsell, together with the accusers themselves.

The nine and thirtieth Book Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the nine and thirtieth Book,

Marcus Emilius the Consul after he had subdued the Ligurians, made the street or highway from Plautine to Ariminum, until it met with the way Flaminiæ. In this book are recounted the beginnings of virtuous and dissolute life brought in by the Asian army. All the Ligurians on this side Apennine are tamed and brought under. The Bacchanals (a Greekish feast and celebrated in the night season, the very seminary and nurse-garden of all wickedness, being grown to this enormity, that therein was contrived a conspiracy and comploit of a mighty multitude) were now visited and touched into by the Consul, and put down with the punishment of many persons. L. Quintus Flaminius, the brother of T. Quintus, was deprived of his Senators dignity by the Censor, to wit, L. Valerius Flaccus, and Mar. Porcius Cato, a right excellent man, as well for fears of arms as peace. The cause was this, for that while he was Consul and governor in Gaul, at the request of one Philippos Pæzus, a notorious wanton Gæmyde whom he loved, he slew a certain Gaul with his own hand, so, as it have written, because at the entreaty of an harlot, upon whom he was enamoured, he beheaded one of them that were condemned. The invective oration of L. Cato against him is extant. Scipio departed this life at Læternum, and (as fortune would have his funeral accompanied with the death of the same time of two most renowned and great personages) Annibal poisoned himself, by eating the Prusias King of Bithynia (unto whom he was fled for succour after the defeat of King Antiochus) would have yielded him into the hands of the Rome, who had sent of purpose T. Quintus Flaminius to demand him. Likewise Philippos the General of the Achæans, an excellent man, was poisoned by the Messenians, who took him prisoner in war. Colonies were sent to Pollentia, Pisaurum, Mutina, and Parma. Over and besides, this book contains the prosperous affairs against the Celtiberians, also the beginning and cause of the Macedonian war, whereof the original spring arose from Philip, much discontented, that his Kingdom was empowered by the Romans, in regard that he was forced by them to withdraw his garrisons out of Thrace and other parts.

The nine and thirtieth Book of T. Livius.

During the time that these affairs passed at Rome (if this were the year wherein they happened), both Consuls made war against the Ligurians, a nation born as it were to maintain the military discipline of the Romans, and to find them occupied in all times of rest and rest from greater wars: neither was there any other province that gave a sharper edge to the valour of the soldiers. For Asia with the beauty of their Cities, the abundance of all commodities as well by sea as land, the effeminate tenderness of the enemies, and the royalty of the Kings riches, had made their armies more wealthy than valiant: and especially under the government of Cæneus Manlius, ruled they were in much looseness and negligence. And thereupon it was, that finding the way in Thracia a little more rough and difficult than ordinary to travel in, and an enemy better practised and exercised to deal withal, they received a great toil and loss among them. Now in Liguria, they met with all things that might rouse and awaken slothful soldiers: the country rough and full of mountains, that much ado they had to make themselves to seize the fame, and as great a labour they found to dislodge the enemies, that were before posted off them: the waies, steep up-hill, narrow, and dangerous for ambushes: the enemy, light, swift, nimble, and suddenly leaping upon them, giving no time of rest, no place of repose and security. Driven they were of necessity to assault strong and fortified Castles, with great difficulty and danger both: the country poor and needy, which caused the soldiers to spare and live hardly, and afforded them no opportunity of preys and prizes: and therefore no victuals, collions, soldiers boyes and lackies, followed the camps, neither the labouring beasts for carriage, took up a length in their march: nothing there, but armour and men, reposing all hope in their their arms, and nothing else. And never wanted they some matter of quarrell, and some occasion or other to make war: for by occasion of their barrenness and penury, they made roads into the lands of their neighbours, but so, as they never ventured all at once, nor put the main chance in hazard.

C. Flaminius the Consul having fought sundry times with the Friniat Ligurians, and in many battels gotten the better hand over them, even at home in their own country, brought the whole nation by compulsion under the obedience, and disarmed them: but because in the delivery of their armour, they dealt not soundly and faithfully, and should have been chastised therefore, they abandoned their villages & fled to the mountain Apennine; whither the Consul pursued them hard at heels: howbeit, being disbande and scattered again, and most of them disarmed, they fled into the valley through places where no wayes led, and over broken and caggied steep rocks, whereas the enemies could not possibly follow after, and so passed the other side of Apennine. But as many as kept still within their hold, were beset round about and overthrown. Then were the legions led to the further side of Apennine, where the enemies for a time while, defended themselves by the height of the place, but soon they yielded. Then was their armour sought for with more care and diligence then before, and they were disarmed and stripped out of all. After this, was the war diverted and before turned wholly upon the Apuan Ligurians, who had so overrun the territories of Pise and Bolonia, that they could not be manured and tilled. The Consul having subdued them also, granted peace unto the borders: and now that he had brought the province into quietness and rest, to the end that his soldiers should not be idle and do nothing, he made a cauley or street-way from Bononia to Arretium.

The other Consul M. Emilius, set on fire the villages, and wasted the lands of the Ligurians, as well in the campaign fields as the valleys, when the inhabitants themselves were retired into the two mountains Baifia & Swissmontium, which they held. Afterwards he assailed them also who had taken the hills afore said: and first wearied them with light skirmishes; after wards, he forced them to descend into the pl. in, and there in a set battell vanquished them: in then conflict he vowed a temple to Diana. Thus having subdued all on this side Apennine, he then set upon those that dwelt beyond the mountain; among whom were the Friniat Ligurians, (so far as to whom C. Flaminius went not:) all choise, Emilius, subdued despoiled them of their armour, he forced the multitude of them to forsake the mountains and come down into the plains. After he had quitted the Ligurians, he led his army into the country of the Gauls, and made an high way from Plautia to Arminum, so as it met with the cauley Flaminiæ: and in the last battell, wherein he fought with banners displayed against the Ligurians, he vowed a temple to Queen Iuno. And there were the exploits for that year, in Liguria.

M. Furius the Pretor in Gaul, seeking in time of peace for some pretence and colour of war, had taken from the Cenomans their armour notwithstanding they were innocent and did no harm. The Cenomans made complaint hereof at Rome to the Senat, and were put unto the Consul Emilius, unto whom the Senat had directed a commission of view and determine. After great debate with the Pretor, they overthrew him in the action, and had their armour delivered unto them again: and so the Pretor was commanded to give over his government and depart out of the province.

After this, the Embassadors of the Latin nation, who assembled and resorted in great number out of all parts of Latium had audience given them in the Senat. These complained, that the great multitude of their own natural citizens, were removed and gone to inhabit in Rome, and there were enrolled: whereupon a commission was granted to Q. Terentius Culles the Pretor, to make search for such: and look how many of them those Latine allies could prove to have been enrolled (either themselves or their fathers) in any City or corporation of theirs, either at the time that C. Claudius and M. Livius were Censors, or after their Censorship, to force those to return thither again, where they had been entered or matriculated. By virtue of this inquisition, to the number of 12,000 Latins returned home again into their own country: for now the City of Rome was overcharged and pestered with a multitude of strangers and forerunners.

Before that the Consuls repaired to Rome, M. Fulvius the Proconul returned out of Ætolia: who, for he had discomfited of his exploits performed in Ætolia and Cephalonia, before the Senat assembled in the temple of Apollo, requested of the L. to judge to meet and requit, and accordingly to grant and ordain, that praise and thanksgiving might be rendered unto the immortal gods, and himself allowed to triumph, for that he had so well and happily managed the affairs of the common-weal. Then stepped forth M. Aemilius a Tribune of the Commons, and declared openly, That in case they went about to pass any decree in that behalf, before the coming of M. Emilius the Consul, he would cross it: for that the Consul himself was minded to contradict the proceeding, and had given straight charge unto him, at what time as he took his journey to the province, that the consule of this matter should be referred wholly until his return home. And Fulvius (quoth he) Th. I hope so much time: and when the Consul himself is present in place to still, then might the Senat move what decree it pleased them. Then answered M. Fulvius and said, If men were ignorant either of the grudge and quarrell between me and M. Emilius, or with what outrageous spirit and Kinglike cholour and indignation he pursued the said enmity and variance, yet it were not a tolerable thing and to be endured, that the absence of the Consul should both impeach the honour due unto the immortal gods, and also hinder and stay the triumph

"triumph which I have so justly deserved: that a General (I say) who had so worthily achieved his service, and an army so victorious, should stay and give attendance, without the City gates, until it pleased the Consul to return home: who no doubt of very purpose and on set purpose, upon this occasion would make slow halt and take his leisure. But now considering that the enmity and heart-burning that the Consul beareth to me is so notorious as it is, What indignity and reasonable dealing may a man look for at his hands? who taking the advantage of the time, when a small number of Senators were assembled, caused an act of the Senate to be passed by stealth, and entered it in the treasure house, containing thus much in effect, that Ambraclia should not be reputed as a town forced by assault, notwithstanding it were assailed with mantilets and platforms: where we were driven to erect new fabrics, and plant other engines and ordnance of war after the former were consumed with fire: where we maintained fight about the walls, as well under the ground as above, for the space of 15 daies together; where after that the souldiers had scaled and gained the walls, the conflict endured notwithstanding a long time doubtfull, from morning to night; and where were slain above 5000 enemies. Now as touching the sacrilege committed (after the City was forced) in spoiling the churches of the immortal gods what a slander think ye, hath he raised of me? what a matter hath he made thereof, and how he hath informed the Pontifics and Bishops? unless a man would say, that lawful it was not for the City of Rome to be garished & beautified with the ornaments of Syracusa & other Cities won by force; but the law of war extended it to this only City of Ambraclia? I beseech you therefore the L.L. of the Senat, yea, and I request the Tribuns, not to suffer me to be mocked and abused by a most insolent and proud adversary. Then at all hands they dealt with the Tribune, some intreated him, other rebuked and blamed him; but the speech of Tib. Gracchus (one of his colleagues) moved him most of all others: who shewed, that it was no good precedent and example, that men should maintain and follow their own privat quarrels in time of magistracy and publick government, but a shamefull matter and a foul indignity it was, and much becoming the Tribuns of the Commons and their sacred laws, that a Tribune should be Proditor to other men and prosecute their actions and comities. "Men ought (quid he) according to their own discretion and judgment, either to love or hate the persons, to like or dislike the cause; not to depend and hang upon the countenance and beck of others, not to be carried to and fro with the will, pleasure, and appetites of other men. As for the Tribune of the Commons here, he accordeth and taketh part with a choleric and telly Consul, and remembereth well what M. Emilius left him in him in privat charge; but forgetteth altogether that the Tribunship was committed unto him by the people of Rome: committed I say, and put into his hands for to assist privat persons, and to maintain their liberties, and not to uphold the Kinglike rule and a royalty of a Consul. Never seeth he thus much before him, that it will be written another day in the Annis and yeerly Chronicles, that of two Commoner Tribuns in the same fellowship and society, one for the love of the Common-weal renounced and gave over his own privat displeasure and enmity to a particular person, and the other took charge as it were by way of Commisison, to pursue the quarrell of another man. The Tribune could endure no longer these rebukes and checks, and therefore departed out of the temple: then the Pretor Ser. Sulpicius propounded the bill the second time; and so a triumph was granted to M. Fulvius. Who after he had rendered great thanks to the L.L. of the Senat, added moreover and said, that the very day wherein he forced the City Ambraclia, he had by vow promised, to the honor of Jupiter Opt. Max. for to exhibit the great and solemn Rom. games. And to that effect the Cities of Greece had contributed towards the charges, a hundred pound weight in gold: his petition was therefore, that the Senat would ordain that out of that mass of money which he was to carry and shew in triumph, and meant to bestow and lay up in the City Treasury, the forsaid sum of gold might be sequestred and reserved apart for the proper use abovesaid. The Senat commanded, that the Colledge of the Prelats and Priests in this case should be consulted with, and their advice demanded, whether they thought it necessary that so much gold should be spent and consumed in the charges of the said games? The Prelats made answer again, that it was not material to relegend and to the service of the gods, to bow great a reckoning lower the charges of the games should arise. Whereupon the Senat permitted Fulvius to defray what he would himself, so as it exceeded not the sum of 800000 [aurei]. He had proposed to triumph in the month of January, but hearing that Emilius the Consul (who was advertised by letters, that Ambraclia the Tribune of the Commons had renounced and left fall his opposition which he commended) was coming in proper person to Rome, only for to hinder the triumph, and flayed by the way sick; he prevented the day, for fear he should have had more anger and trouble in his triumph, then during his war. So upon the 22 day of December he triumphed over the Ætolians and Cephælians. Before his chariot there were born 100 crowns of gold, weighing 12 pound peece: of silver 83000 pound weight: of gold 43 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachms 128000: of Philip peecees of gold coin 12422: images of brass 889: of marble 230. Likewise of armor, as well defensive as offensive, and other spoil of the enemies, an huge dead besides Catapults, Balists, and other engines and peecees of battery. Moreover, there went before him 27 captives either Ætolians and Cephælians, or else under King Antiochus, left by him in those parts. The same day before that he entered into the City, he bestowed in the cirque Flaminius, many military gifts upon many colonels, captains, horsemen and centurions, as well Romans as allies. Generally to all the footmen he gave out of the pillage 25 Denarii peece: twice as much to the centurions, and threefold to horsemen.

Now

Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for the election of Consuls, and because M. Emilius whose lot it was to be president thereof, could not be present at the day, C. Flaminius was chosen of purpose to Rome. By whom were created Consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Marcus Philippus. After that were Pretors elected, to wit, T. Quinctius, P. Cornelius Sulla, C. Calpurnius Piso, M. Licinius Lucullus, C. Aurelius Scæurus, and L. Quinctius Crispinus. In the end of the said yeer, after the magistrates were thus created, Cn. Manlius Volsus, the third day before the Nones of March, triumphed over the Gauls who inhabit Asia. The cause why he triumphed so late, was this, for that he would avoid making his answer (according to the act of Pestum) whilst Q. Terrentius Culleus was Pretor, fearing he should burn in the flame of the same sentence and judgment whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, or lest the flame of another mans judgment, I mean the sentence whereby L. Scipio had been condemned, would have been too hot for him, and might hold of him likewise: considering that the jury and enquest were more incensed and provoked against him then Scipio; for that he succeeding after him, had spoiled and marred with all kind of licentious lobbies, the military discipline, which Scipio had observed most precisely and severely. Neither was he noted and touched in name for those things only which by bare hearsay were reported to have been done in the province, far remote from the view of men, but also of those particular instances to be seen daily in the demeanor of his souldiers. For verily the forth excess and strange superfluities took beginning from the Asian army, who brought all with them into the City. They were the first with in Rome that took up the use of brazen tables of rich counterpoints, carpets, cupbord-cloths, hangings and curtains of sundry kinds of yssue. Likewise of one footed standing tables, buffets and cupboards, which in those daies were counted magnificent and rarely moveables. Then came up the manner of having at bankets finging minstrelsy, and such as could play upon the dulcimers or other instruments of musick, with dances, jokers and other pastimes, and delightful pleasures and fits of mirth at the table. Then began the board to be furnished and set out with more exquisite & deinty viands, and of greater expence. Then Cooks, who in old time were reputed the most contemptible slaves, as well for calling as estimation, as for the use they were put unto, came to be in great request: and that which before time was a mechanical kind of manual service, grew now to be accounted a science of deep skill and understanding. And yet all these things that then bare so great a shew, were scarce so much as small fees and tips, to the excessive superfluities that were to ensue.

Wile Cn. Manlius carried in triumph two hundred crowns of massie beaten gold, weighing twelve pound a peece: of silver 220000 pound weight: of gold 2123 pound weight: of Attick Tetradrachms 129000: of Cistophors 250000: of Philip golden peecees 16320. Also much armor was and spoils of Gauls carried in shew upon wagons: and 52 captains of enemies were led before his own chariot. Amongst the souldiers he gave a donative of 42 denarii a peece, he doubled the same to every centurion, Alto to every footman he gave double pay, and to every horseman triple. Many there were of all States and degrees, whom he rewarded with military pretors for especial service, and those followed next after the chariot. The souldiers chanted such songs and sonnets as a man might easily see they were composed to feed the humor of a General desirous of glory, and one that made much of his souldiers especially; whereby his triumph was more honored with the affectionate favour of them, then otherwise recommended and celebrated with the hearty love of the people. Howbeit the friends of Manlius served him in good stead to win the good will of them also, through whose solliciting & earnest endeavour, there passed an act of the Senat, that out of the money which had been shewed in triumph, there should be repaid unto the people that subsidy which had been levied among them for souldiers pay, and not yet contented back again. So the Treasurers of the City made true and faithfull payment with all diligence of 25 asses and d. in every thousand [for the loan.]

About the same time two Colonels came out of both provinces of Spain, with letters from C. Cælius and L. Manlius the governors there: by which letters intelligence was given, that the Celtiberians and Lusitanians were in arms, waisting and spoiling the lands of the Rom. confederates. The Senat referred the entire consultation of this matter to the new Magistrates. During the time of the Roman games that yeer which P. Cornelius Cethegus, and Publius Posthumius Albinus represented, a certain malt or high pole which stood not fast in the shew place called Circus maximus, fell down upon the image of Pollux, and overthrew it to the ground. The L.L. hereupon made some temple in conscience, and ordeined, that the solemnity of those games should continue one day longer, and caused two images to be let up for that one, and that the new should be all gilt. Likewise the Plebeian plaies were renewed one day more, by the Ædiles, C. Sempronius Blaesus & M. Furius Lælius. The yeer following averted the Consuls Sp. Posthumius Albinus, & M. Marcus Philippus from the army, from the regard I say of wars and government of provinces abroad, to the punishment of a certain intestine conspiracy at home. The Pretors left costs for their province, T. Manlius had the jurisdiction of the citizens, and M. Licinius Lucullus between citizens & strangers. Unto C. Aurelius Scæurus fell the governance of Sardinia, and to P. Cornelius Sulla of Sicily. L. Quinctius Crispinus was assigned to the biher Spain, and P. Calpurnius Piso to the further. Both Consuls were enjoined to make inquisition into secret conspiracies within the City.

There was a certain Grecian of base degree and condition, who came first in Heunria; a man not endued with any of those arts, whereof the nation (of all others most learned) hath brought many unto us, as well for the erudition of our minds, as the trimming of our bodies; but sacrificing seeing priest he was, and a divining wizard withal. Neither was it one that made out-ward profession of reaching men, and thereby getting a living openly, and so by an open show of religion possessed their heads and minds with fear and horror; but the knowledge he had forsooth for certain hidden and secret sacrifices. These mysteries of his at first he taught but unto a few, howbeit afterwards they began to be communicated and divulged as well to men as women: and this religion were added pleasures and delights of wine and good cheer to the end that the more cupplers might be allured and enticed for to have a liking thereof. Now when wine had drowned and dulled the understanding: when the night season, when the intermingling of men and women together one with another (and namely, they of young and tender years, with those of elder age) had clean put out and extinguished all respect and regard of themselves honestly: they began first to be practised all sorts of corruption, for every one had all pleasures ready at commandment, and his choice of those whereto by nature he was more prone and given to lust after. Neither was there wickedness committed here, of one sort, namely, the abusing of mankind and promiscuous one with another without distinction: but out of this shop and workhouse proceeded all wickedness, forging of seals, depositions, and testimonies: and more then so, wrong, and untrue informations. From hence came the devilish craft of poisoning, and privy murders of the nearest of kindred in one house: and the same to secret, that otherwhiles the bodies would not be found to be committed to the earth. Many sinful parts were there played by way of fraud, guile, and cunning cozenage: but more by open force. As for violence, it was kept close and hid, by reason that with the hideous noises, with the sound of tymbrels, tabors and cymbals, there could no voice be heard of such as cried out, when either they were forced to villany and abuse, or beaten to death. The infection of this catching poison of Heteria, spread as far as Rome, like a contagious malediction. At the first the spacious capacity of the City, having been used to wink and bear with loose courtships, concealed all: at length revealed it was to the Col. Vestibulum, much after this manner.

The Bacchanals detected.

P. Eburus (whose father had served in the wars in quality of a gentleman of Rome with a Citizen's horse) left an orphan, after that his guardians were likewise deceased, became ward to his mother Duronia and his father in law (her second husband) T. Sympronius Rusticus, under whom he had his bringing up. Now as his mother was wholly devoted and obsequious unto her husband, so his father in law had so handled the matter in his guardianship, that he could make no good use, except thereof, and therefore his desire was, that either the infant his ward should be made sure, or else obliged and enthralled unto him. The only way to compass and bring this about, was the corruption and abuse of the Bacchanals. The mother therefore upon a time called her son unto her, and told him, that she had made a vow for him when he was sick, that so soon as ever he should recover and be well again, she would present him to the priests of Bacchus to be consecrated and professed in their mysteries: and now, quoth she, (seeing that by the goodness of the gods thou art amended, and I thereby obliged by the bond of that vow, I will acquit my self thereof, and perform it accordingly). She bare him in hand therefore, that he must for ten dayes live chaste, and not touch a woman, and at the ten dayes end after he had taken his supper, and was well washed and perfumed after the manner, she would bring him into the holy place of those sacred mysteries. Now there was a famous trumpet, by condition a bondwoman enfranchised, named Thyphala Fessera, too good, I wis, for that occupation, which she used while she was a young wench, and bond servant: but yet still after that she was manumitted and in frank state of a free citizen, she maintained her self by the same trade and manner of living. Grown she was into familiar acquaintance with the forsaid young Eburus, by reason they were near neighbours, and dwelt not far asunder: yet so, as the endangered not the youth one jot either in charging his words, or touching his credit. For the it was that first was inamored upon him, and him the pupil and for as much as he had but short allowance every way from his mother and father in law, and by men kept hardly, he was maintained well by the bounteous liberality of this loving harlot. Nay, more than that, in continuance of time she was so deeply engaged in him, that when her own patron was dead, and her self at the disposition of none, she sued unto the Tribunes and the Pretor for another tutor, because she meant to make her last will and testament, wherein she declared Eburus her only heir in remained, or to all that she had. There passing thus between them the legacies and pledges of love, and they using to impart the one unto the other the secrets of their hearts, the young youth by way of merriment and pleasant talk, would her one day not to marvell or think any thing in it, if for certain nights he lay away and parted beds with her: for that upon a religious zeal and devotion that he had, he was minded for to be professed and consecrated by the Priests of Bacchus, and all to be absolved from a vow made in regard of his health. The woman hearing him say so, and grow all in spirit, Mary god forsooth, (quoth she) and I would not that for all the good in the world. And heiter it were for me and you too to die both at once, then so to die and with that she threatened, the cursed and banded, wishing all mischief and plague to light upon them that had put such a thing into his head. The youth wondered much to hear her words, and to see her so to fare and taken on beyond all reason and order, beseeching her of all loves to be content, and to forbear those cursed speeches, and said it was his own mother, by the consent of his father in law, who had enjoined him so to do. And is it that father in law of yours, quoth she, (for peradventure I should not do well to blame your mother) that hathen you by this action of yours to make shipwreck of your honesty and chastity, of your credit and good name, your hope another day, and lastly, to hazard your very life? Hereat the young man marvelled much more then before

As soon, and desired earnestly to know the depth of all this matter. Then after she had prayed all gods and goddesses to pardon her, if for tender love and affection that she bare unto him, she could neither will nor chuse but reveal those secrets that indeed were to be concealed, she let tale on, and said (That she her self once entered into that chapel, when as she waited on her mistress, but because that she was made free and at her own liberty, she never set foot within the dore. And upon my knowledge (quoth she) it is the very shop and workhouse of all wickedness that can be devised. And now for certain these two years last past, there is not one professed and admitted to those mysteries there, who is above 20 years of age. So soon as any one is indicted and brought thither, she or he is delivered to the priests as a very sacrifice to be killed: for they lead them to a place which resoundeth with yelling and crying, with singing of divers conjoints, with jangling noise of cymbals, with thumping & beating of tabors, to the end that the voice of any one that cryeth and complaineth of force and violence done to the abuse of his or her body might not be heard. Now I beseech you therefore, and of all loves I pray you, that in any case by one means or other you avoid this: howsoever ye do: and plunge not your self headlong into this, when first you shall be sure to endure and suffer, and afterwards to perpetrate and commit all abominable wickedness not to be named. And never would she let the youth go from her, until he had made her faithfull promise to abstain and forbear such mysteries and ceremonies. When he was come home, and that his mother was in hand with him, telling him what he must do this day and that day, and so forth: he flatly denied and said plainly, he would do neither the one nor the other, and at one word, professed and consecrated he would not be, whatsoever came of it. His father in law was present and at one end of this resolute speech of his. His mother straightwies cried out and said, that he could not find in his heart to lie apart from Thyphala one ten dayes, and that he was so far bewitched and envenomed with the charms & poisoned allurements and bits of that false serpent and perilous Hydra, that he had no respect or regard either of his mother, or mothers husband, no, nor any reverent fear of the immortal gods. The mother raised him of one side, the father baited and cursed him on the other, till in the end they hunted him out of doors with 4 bondslaves besides. The young man betook himself to Eburia, an aunt that he had by his father's side, and shewed her the whole matter, why his mother had thrust him out of her house by the head and shoulders: which done, by her advice and counsell the next day he opened and declared, he same in great secret, without the hearing of any earthly creature, to the Consul Phellurus. The Consul commanded him to repair again unto him three dayes after, and for the time dismissed him. Then the Consul in the mean while enquired of his wives mother Salpisia, a brave and sober matron, whether she knew an old wife called Eburia dwelling in the Aventine? Yes that I do quoth she, and I know her to be an honest dame, and a woman of the old world, and few her like now a dayes. I must needs speak with her (quoth she) and therefore I would have you send a messenger unto her, for to will her to come hither. Eburia at the first sending came Salpisia, and the Consul within a while forced (as it were by chance) into their company, & began to find some talk of her brothers (son Eburus): with that the woman eyes stood full of water, and with tears she began to bewail the care and mishap of the young man; who being spoiled of his goods and patrimony (by those who of all others should least have done it) was now at home in her house, chased and driven out of doors by his own mother: for that the honest good youth (God bless us all and be mercifull unto us) was unwilling to be consecrated and admitted to certain filthy and detestable sacrifices (if all be true that is reported thereof.) The Consul had caught on, and was fully perwaded of Eburus, that he had told him no lie. Then he gave Eburia leave to go her ways home, and requested his mother in law Salpisia aforesaid, to send likewise for Thyphala from thence unto the Aventine to come unto her: a woman (quoth she) affianced and well enough known to all the neighbours of that street: for that I have somewhat also to say to her. Thyphala was somewhat disquieted at this message, to think that she should be sent for to a noble and honourable a dame, and knew no cause wherefore. But after that she saw the Lictors before the entry of the doore, the troop and train also belonging to the Consul, and with the Consul himself in person, she was allomted and (in manner) half dead. The Consul taking with him his wives mother, had the woman into an inward room of the house, and said unto her, that she need not to be afraid, if so be she could find in her heart to tell the truth: and for assurance thereof, she should have the faithfull word and promise either of Salpisia (a lady of so good credit and reputation) or of himself it need were. Only he would have her to utter and declare what was ordinarily done at the grove of Simula in the Bacchanals, where they used to sacrifice in the night season. The woman had no sooner heard that word, but she fell into such a fit, trembling and quaking all over her body, that for a good while she was not able to open her lips and speak a word: but after she was come to herself again out of this trance, and by them comforted and encouraged, she said, that when she was a very young wench and a bond-maid, she, together with her mistress, was there professed and consecrated: but for certain years of late, and namely since that she was enfranchised and made free, she was not acquainted with the place, nor with what work was there. I can ther thanks for this yet (quoth the Consul) that thou deniest not how thou wert there entered into that profession; but say on and tell out the rest as truly and faithfully. She answered again, that she knew no more then she had already disclosed. The Consul upon her and said, that in case she were taken away, & that another came forth to her place & reproved her, she should neither find the same pardon, nor have the like favour at his hand.

as otherwise she might if of her self she confessed the thing, forasmuch as he who had all from your own mouth, hath already discovered the whole. The woman knew where he was, and was perfwaded verily (as it is indeed) that Ebunius was a blab of the tongue, and had revealed this secret: whereupon she fell down at the feet of Sulpia; and first began in most humble manner to beseech her, that she would not suffer, that words of courtesie passed between her and an infamous woman and her paramour, should turn not only to earnest and importance, but also to a scurrilous matter, to touch her as much as her life was worth: for what I said (quoth she) was but to fright him, and not for that I knew any such thing. Posthumus heicet was chafed, and fell into a fit of choleric. What? (quoth he) thou thinkst belike, that thou art jelling and coggling with thy lover Ebunius; and forgettest how thou art in the house of a right worshipfull lady, and in communication with a Consul. But Sulpia on the other side, willed her to stand up, (sighing as she was) and withall, both exhorted her to be of good cheer, and also appeared the wish of her son in law. In the end after she had taken a better heart unto her, she greatly blamed & found fault with the disloyalty and falshood of Ebunius for serving her so, and requiring her full body again for so singular a good turn that she had done him, and then said, That she stood in great awe of the gods, whose secrets she should reveal and divulge; but in greater fear of men, who no doubt for bewraying their matters, would be ready to tear her in pieces with their very hands. And therefore she belougth Sulpia, and entreated the Consul to take some order for her, and to send her into some place out of Italy, where she might passe the rest of her daies in safety of her life. But of good cheer woman (quoth the Consul) let me alone for that, I will provide well enough, that thou shalt live at Rome, and that without all danger. Then declared Hispala the originall and first commencement of these sacrifices and solemnities. At the beginning (sd. she) it was privileged place & consecrated for women only; & they alone medled with those mysteries; neither was it the custome and manner, that a man should enter in among them: and three let holidays they had in the year, during which time the priests of Bacchus performed their ceremonies in the day time, and folk were admitted by them, to their religion and profession; and women they were all (and those matrons) who were created priests for that purpose, in their time & turn one after another. But Paucilla Minia (a Campanian woman) when she was the priest, chanced all, as being advertised and admonished by the gods to do so: for she was the first that lifted and admitted men, to wit, her own sons Minius and Mercurius the Cerrinians: she altered the solemnity from the day to the night; and for three daies in the whole year, she ordained first, every month, to serve for the attendance and ministry of these mysteries. Since which time the sacrifices & ceremonies were thus divulged, & men and women intermingled together, & the licentious liberty of the night time also to help all forward, there is no lack of wicked, no fid to filkly, nor there is committed: and more filkly & unnatural abuse there is, of mankind one with another, then there is of women. If any are either unwilling to suffer this foul filkiness, or belike themselves more dully in the beauly action and performance of that villany, such presently are to be killed and sacrificed as beasts. And this is upholded amongst them, the principall point and sum of their religion, to hold and believe that nothing is unlaful whatsoever. The men shaking and wagging their bodies to and fro after a fantastic fashion, as if they were distracted & out of their right wits, seem to divine and tell things to come. The women, attired like the priestesses of Bacchus, with their heads unbound and their hair hanging loose about their faces, and holding flaming torches to the river Tiber, where they dip their torches into the water, and take them out again light burning still, because they are made with sulphur vive and quick lime: and they say, that certain men are by the gods carried away from among them, no man knoweth whither: such as they bid fall to a certain engine or frame, and harry them out of sight into certain hidden caves: and those be such, as either would not swear to be of their conspiracy, or be partners with them in all their mischievous designments, or endure against kind to be abused. The number & multitude thereof, is not counted, is exceeding great, and grown now be another body of a people: & among them are some noble persons, as well men as women. But now for these two years last past, or N. denied it is. That one should be there professed and sacred above twenty years old; for such ages they say for to serve their turn, as are loonsly seduced and drawn to error, or most subject to be forced to suffer abuse and villany. Whence he had thus finished her information and discovered all, she fell down upon her knees again, and lay at their feet, and repeated her former supplication the second time, to wit, That she would lend her away out of the country. Then the Consul treated his mother in law to spate some void corner of her house, whereunto Hispala might retire her self, and there make her abode: So she allowed her an upper lodging in her house, and the and the stairs th led towards the street were stopped up, and the entrance turned into the back. Then presently were all the moveable goods and household stuff of Fessenia removed, and herself sent for thither, and there entertained. Likewise Ebunius was commanded to go and lodge with a tenant or client belonging to the Consul. Thus when both the informers were forthcoming, and under Posthumus his hand, he declared the whole matter to the Senat. And after he had laid every thing abroad in order, namely, what was reported unto him first, and what he had learned afterwards by enquiry, the Lords of the Senat were surprized with exceeding great fear, as well in regard generally of the common weal, lest those conspiracies, nightly meetings and conventicles, might import some secret, complot of mischief and danger: as also for doubt in particular, that some of their own friends or family should be accessory and culpable.

A The Senat yet were of this mind, that the Consul was highly to be praised and thanked, for that he had found out and brought to light such a matter as this, both with so singular care & diligence, and also without any tumult and uprore. Then they took order and ordained, Imprimis, That the Consul should have an extraordinary commission to make search and inquiry into these Bacchanals and night-facilities. Item, That Ebunius and Fessenia the informers thereof, should not be prejudged the eby, nor come to harm for it, yea; and that a recompence and reward should be propounded to others that could give light and reveal the same. Item, That the Priests belonging to their religions; be they men or women, should be sought out not only at Rome, but in all other markets towns, fairs and places of frequent resort, and conveyed before the Consul to be and remain at their disposition. Item, That proclamation be made at Rome, and edicts sent throughout of Bacchus, to call any more into assembly or conventicle for those facilities, nor yet do ought pertaining to such divine service. And above all things, that information and proclamation be made of all those that had frequented such meetings or conventicles, to commit whoredome or any such filkiness and wickedness. And these were the ordinances of the Senat. The Consul, then granted their warrants out to the Adiles Curule to make diligent search and enquiry for those Priests for to be examined: also to the Adiles of the Commons to look well, that no service of the gods be celebrated in secret. Moreover, the Triumvirs capital were straightly charged to let good watch be kept throughout the City, and see to meetings by night, for fear that no fire should hold of any place. To those three Commissaries or Triumvirs were five other Quinquervirs adjoined assistants, who every one should watch well and take charge of all the houses of his quarter with in Tyber. Then the Consul having let them about these their severall charges, mounted up the Rostres or place of publicke audience. And when the people were assembled together, then the Consul after he had pronounced the solemn prayer which Magistrates are wont to use as a preamble, before they make speech unto the people, began his Oration unto them in this wise, "Never in any of your assemblies, O Quirites, was this solemn prayer unto the gods, either for meet and convenient, or for solicit and needfull as in this, to advertise and put you in mind, that those be the true gods indeed whom your ancestors ordained, that you should honour, serve, worship, and pray unto, and not these here who prick & provoke (as it were) with goads of furies, your spirits and minds transported and carried away with false and strange religions to commit all wickedness, mischief, & filkly lust. Surely for mine own part I wot not either what I were best to counsel, or how far forth to speak out and utter my mind, if you know not all, I doubt I should give you occasion to be negligent; again, if I discover all, I fear me that I shall affright & terrify you too much. But what and how much soever I shall say, be ye sure it will be far less than the greatness and enormity of the thing requireth. Yet endeavour will we so much to deliver, as may suffice to give you a warning and watch-word to take heed, this am I well assured of, that you neither should not only by hearlay and bare report, but also by the ringing noises and yelling cries in the night season that the Bacchanals have been a long time kept over all Italy, yea, and in many places throughout the City of Rome, which resoundeth again there with. But what manner of thing it is, I am verily perfwaded there is not one of you that knoweth. Some believe that it is a certain worship and service of the gods; others suppose it is some foolery and wanton pastime tolerated and winked at. But be what it will be, they think there are but a few interested & employed therein. As touching the number and multitude of them, if I should tell you that they were many thousands, you cannot chule but suddenly be afraid, unless I also presently shew, who they be and of what quality. Know ye therefore first and foremost, that the most part of them are women; & from thence is sprung the source of all this mischief. / Then are there men indeed but such as for all the world seeme women, so counterfeit they are: such I say, as have abandoned themselves as well to be abused as to abuse others: fanatical persons and bereaved of their wits by reason of excessive watching, past fence & even stoned with bibbing of wine without measure, with shouting, hollowing & crying all night without intermission. This conventicle of conspirators is yet of no great force, howbeit it gathereth much strength, in regard that they multiply, & their number is every day more than other. Your ancestors in times past would in no wise admit that ye should assemble together at a venture and without important and just occasion, unless it were either by rearing a standard or banner upon the fortrels for to levy an army; or to gather the people together to give their voices in elections of Magistrates; or that the Triumvirs proclaimed a general congregation of the common people; or some of the Magistrates summoned them to an open audience for to hear an Oration; and wherefore a multitude were gathered together, there they ordained and thought meet to have a lawfull governour and overseer of them. But what kind of night conventicles think ye first they might be & namely, where men and women are met and thronged together pell mell one with another? In faith, if ye wist it, ye would be ashamed and dismised. Think ye my Masters Quirites, that young men thus professing, having taken this oath, are meet to make foulders of? and that ye are to put weapons into the hands of such as are taken out of that sinking and deefestable Chappel? Shall these, thus polluted, and overwhelmed with filthy uncleanness, as well of their own kind as of others, be right for the pure chastity, for the honesty (I say) of your wives and children? Lest harm should not thereby sustain discredit, or receive damage. Finally, that not only the Col. and Prætor in now in place, but also those hereafter to come, should provide and take order that no wrong be done to that woman, but secure her from all harm. This the Senat. judged meet and requisite to be done. All these things were likewise propounded unto the Com. and executed according to the opinion of the Senat. Finally, as touching both the impunity and also the recompence of the delinquents, it was referred to the discretion of the Comitum.

By this time Q. Marcius also having finished the inquisition in his circuit and quarters, made preparation to go into his Province of Liguria, after he had received for to supply and make up his legions 3000 footmen, and 150 horsemen Romans, besides 5000 footmen and 200 horse of Liguria. The same Province, with the like number as well of horse as foot, was decreed likewise to his companion in government. Those armies they took charge of within the former year (Tit. Minius) and M. Minius the Col. had; moreover, by an act of the Senat. enjoyed they were to enroll two new legions besides; and withall they levied of the Latine allies 20000 footmen, and 3000 horse 5000 footmen also, and 200 horsemen Romans. All these forces (letting as the legions) it was thought good to be led to furnish out the army in Spain. And therefore the Col. whyles they were themselves in person occupied about the forsaide inquisitions, gave commission to M. Minius to take the musters. And when those enquests were performed and done as is before said, Q. Marcius took his journey out of the twain towards the Apennines in Liguria. But whiles in expectation of them he engaged himself into the secret and blind passes, wherein at all times they had their lurking retreats and places of refuge: within those brights and passages which he took, he had desired before, he was environed by them in a place of great disadvantage: where he lost 4000 soldiers, with three ensignes of the Col. and legion, and eleven banners of the Latine allies which were all taken by the enemies. Also much armour and many weapons were thrown away: and there, by reason that they were encompassed therewith as they fled through the woody parts of the forest: neither did the Ligurians give over their chase, before that the Romans ended their flight. The Comiti so soon as they came of speed out of the enemies territory sent his army away into divers parts of the peaceable country: so the end, that it might not be seen, how much his losses were; empaired; yet could not be for all that suppers and smother the bruit that was blown abroad of his unfortunat journey. nor cancel the remembrance of the overthrow: for ever after, the forest out of which the Ligurians hunted him was called. The streights of Marcius. A little before the news of the affairs in Liguria, the letters out of Spain were read containing sorrow mixed with joy: to wit. That C. Cæsius, who two years before went as Prætor into that Province, fought a field with the Lusitanians in the territory of Alba, where 6000 enemies fell upon the sword: and the rest were discomfited, put to flight and driven out of their camp. Afterward, he conducted his legions to the assault of the town Alba, which he forced and won with no greater ado than before he gained their camp. But as he approached near the walls and took no good heed to himself, he was wounded, and of his hurt within few daies died. Upon the reading of these letters (importing the death of the Pro. Prætor) the Senat. was of advice to dispatch messengers (to overtake the Prætor C. Calphurnius) as far as the port of Luna, and give him to understand from the Senat. that their advice was he should make all the haste he could in his journey, to the end that the Province might not be without a governor there to command. The courier which was sent, within four daies arrived at Luna: and but few daies before, Calphurnius was departed and had put himself in his journey.

Morcover, L. Manlius Acidinus (who was gone into his Province at the same time that C. Cæsius went) struck a battell likewise with the Celiberians in the higher Province of Spain. But they departed on both sides out of the field with doubtful victory: save only that the Celiberians the next night following dislodged and removed from thence: whereby the Romans had liberty and time both to inter their dead, and to gather up the spoils of their enemies. And within few daies after, the same Celiberians having raised a more puissant army, of themselves gave the Romans battell near the City Calagurra. It is not set down in the history, what should be the cause why they were the weaker, considering their number was re-enforced: but foiled they were in fight and had the overthrow. Of the enemies there died upon 12000 and not so few as 20000 prisoners: and the Romans likewise were Masters of the camp. And had not Manlius been impeached and restrained in this train of victory (which he hotly followed) by the coming of Calphurnius his successor in government, the Celiberians had been utterly subdued. The new Prætor withdrew both armies to their wintering harbours.

At the same time that these news came out of Spain, the plaies called Taurilia were celebrated two daies together in honour of the gods. And after them, M. Fulvius set out (with great furniture in sumptuous manner for the space of ten daies) his plaies which he had vowed in the Ætolian war. And for to do him honour and grace this solemnity, many conning actors and players came out of Greece. This was the first time that there was represented at Rome the shew of champions and wrestlers: for the best game: then also was exhibited the pastime of hunting and baiting Lions and Panthers: and in one word, these sports were celebrated with as great magnificence and variety almost as the modern pastimes and games in these daies. After all this, was holden a Nones-day feast: during which, there was much sacrificing: and all by occasion that for three daies it rained stones in the Picene country: and because it was reported that the lightning in divers places, and in sundry forts, had blasted and lightly fired the garments especially of many folks.

To

A To the said feast, there was adjoynd a supplication of one day, ordained by a decree of the Pontifices, for that the Chappel of the goddess Opis (standing in the Capitol) was smitten with a thunderbolt. In regard of these prodigies, the Col. procured expiation by sacrificing greater beasts, and they purged and hallowed the City. At the same time word was brought out of Thracia, that there was an Hermaphrodite or Scyt found almost twelve years old. This was held for a detestable monster; and therefore order was given, that it should be kept out of the territory of Rome, and killed out of hand.

The same years certain Gauls from beyond the Alps passed into the territory of Venice, without foraging, spoiling, and using any hostility; and not far from the place where as now Aquileia standeth, they seized upon a plot of ground to build a City in. Certain Roman Embassadors were sent about this matter beyond the Alps: where they received this intelligence and answer from the inhabitants of the country, That neither those Gauls took that voyage and expedition by authority and warrant from the whole nation neither knew they what they did in Italy.

Scipio likewise about the same time, let out his plaies for ten daies together: for which he said that he had made a vow during the time of the war against Antiochus. He defund the charges thereof with the money contributed unto him by divers KK. and States for that purpose. Valerius Antius writeth, that after he was condemned, and his goods confiscated and sold he was sent in Embassage unto Asia, for to take up certain controversies and differences between the two KK. Antiochus and Eumenes: and then it was (saith he) that the said contribution was made, and many skilful artificers and plaiers gathered unto him out of all Asia: and in the end after this Embassage he moved the Senat. for these games, because he had made no mention nor words at all of them after the said war: by occasion whereof (by Valerius his saying) he vowed them.

The year being now at an end, Q. Marcius in his absence was to leave his Magistracy: & Q. Posthumus having late upon the inquisition afore said, and with all fidelity and careful diligence that might be brought it to an end, held the solemn assembly for election of Magistrates: wherein were chosen Col. Ap. Claudius Pulcher & M. Sempronius Tudianus. And the morrow after were elected for Prætors, P. Cornelius Cethegus, A. Posthumus Albinus, C. Silius Silla, C. Attilius Serranus, L. Posthumus Tappianus, & M. Claudius Marcellus. At the years end upon the relation of Sp. Posthumus the Col. that in his visitation about the enquests afore said, as he rode along the sea coasts of Italy on both sides, he found certain Colonies dispeopled and desolate, to wit, Sipontum upon the Adriatick sea, and Buxentum upon the Tuscan Sea, T. Manius the City Prætor by virtue of an act of the Senat. in that behalf created three Commissaries, called Triumvirs, for to enroll and plant new inhabitants there, namely, L. Scribonius Libo, M. Tullius, and Cn. Babius Tampilus.

The war against King Perseus and the Macedonians, which now was a breeding, arose not upon that cause & occasion which most men imagine, nor yet from Perseus himself: for the first groundwork thereof was laid by Philip, who if he had lived longer, would have been seen in open action. One thing there was above the rest which stung him, at what time as the Romans imposed conditions upon him after he was vanquished, to wit, That the Senat. laid a bar for to be revenged of those Macedonians who had revolted from him: which he depaired not but it had been possible to have obtained at their hands, considering that Quintus in the capitulations of peace referred that point entire and excepted not against it. Now afterwards, when Antiochus was defeated in the battell of Thermopyle, and that both Philip & the Col. entered upon the several exploits: Antiochus went in hand to assault Heraclea, and Philip at the same time the City of Lamia. Heraclea was sooner forced, but Philip had commandment to levy his siege before Lamia, and the town was yielded to the Romans: and this he took to the heart. Howbeit, the Col. appeared his challenger for the time, in that making halte in person to Nausipolus (unto which town the Ætolians after their rout were retired) he suffered Philip to war upon Atthamania and Aminander: to adjoyne also and lay unto his kingdom those Cities which the Ætolians had taken from the Thessalians. Now had Philip chased Aminander out of Atthamania, and won certain Cities without any great ado. Demetrius also (a strong City of great importance, and very commodious for all things) together with the nation of the Magnetes he brought under his obedience. After this he forced certain towns in Asia, which were troubled with the detestable variance of their principal and great personages: by reason that they knew not how to use their new liberty, wherewith they had not been acquainted: he won those Cities (I say) by taking part with those, who in this civil dissension were the weaker: and otherwise would have gone to the walls. By these means the wrath of the King against the Romans was well allayed for the present: nevertheless, he ceased not all the time of peace to bethink how he might gather more strength, and be able to war again, whensoever any good occasion should be presented unto him. He increased therefore the revenues of the Crown, not only by raising taxes out of all the fruits of the earth, and letting import and customs upon all merchandise brought into his Realm by sea from foreign parts: but also revived the KK. & issues of the old mines which had discontinued, yea, & in many places ordained new. Moreover, to replenish his country, which by many calamities following was dispeopled, he not only took order that his subjects should multiply by forcing them to get, breed, and bring up children, but also translated a great multitude of Thracians into Macedony: and for a good time wherein he was in repose and rest from the war, he bent his whole mind, and employed all his study how to make him self great, and augment the puissance of his kingdom. Then old matters and quarrels were renewed, which might whet his stomach, and kindle his anger against the Romans. For the complaints which the Thessalians and the Perrhæbians made for that their Cities were by him possessed, likewise those grievances which the Embassadors of King Antiochus laid abroad touching the Thracian Towns, which he seized and held by force, were heard by the Romans; so as it evidently appeared, that they neglected them not. But that which moved the Romans most, was this, that they had intelligence how he intended to be Lord of Ætolia and Acrota as for the Thessalians, they took less regard of them. Moreover, there came the Embassadors of Abthamania, who complained not for the loss of some part of their territory, nor that he encroached upon their frontiers, but that all Abthamania full and whole, was reduced under the subjection and jurisdiction of the King. The banished persons also of Maedonia, who had been expelled out of the City by the Kings garrison (for that they stood in defence and maintenance of liberty) made relation, that not only Maedonia was in the hands of Philip, but the City of Ænus like his wife there came Embassadors from Philip, to purge him of all these matters laid to their charge, who averred, That their King and Master had done nothing but by commission and warrant from the Roman General, They pleaded and alleged, that the case of the Thessalians, Perrhæbians, and Magestian Cities, yea, and the whole nation of Abthamania together with Amphidromus, was all one with the Ætolians: namely, That after Antiochus the King was chased and expelled, the Col, himself being employed and occupied in besieging the City of Ætolia, sent Philip to recover the States above named, which being vanquished in war, were now subject unto him. Hereupon the Senate, because they would not determine and let down any thing in the absence of the King, sent three Delegates or Commissioners, to decide these controversies, to wit, Q. Cæcilius Metellus, M. Bibulus, Tamphilus, and T. Sempronius. Upon whose arrival, there was published a general Diet of all those States that were at difference with the King to be holden at Tempe in Thessaly. When they were all set there in council, the Roman Legats, as umpires and judges, the Thessalians, Perrhæbians, and Abthamians as plaintiffs and accusers, and Philip as defendant to hear and receive the challenges and accusations against him; the chief Embassadors from the said Cities, pleaded against Philip bitterly or mildly more or less, according to the several disposition of their natures, and the proportion either of affectionate favour or malicious hatred which they bore to him. Now all the question and debate touching Philippopolis, Tricca, Phaloria, Emymene, and other towns about them was this: Whether those pieces, considering the Ætolians won and held them by force (as well known it was that Philip had taken them from the Ætolians) belonged in right to the Thessalians or appertained of old time to the Ætolians? for Ætolius had granted them to the K, upon these conditions, namely, if they were any of the appurtenances of the Ætolians, and if they combined and took part with the Ætolians willingly of their own accord, and not by constraint and force of arms. Upon like terms stood the controversy of the Perrhæbian and Magestian towns. For the Ætolians had brought a confusion in all their territories, by reason that they held and possessed those Cities, by taking their vantage upon divers occasions. Besides these substantial points properly to be decided, the Thessalians came in with their complaints also: For that those towns (in case they were out of hand delivered unto them, yet) he should render them spoiled, naked, and desolate. For over and besides those who miscarried by casualty of war, Philip had carried away into Macedony 500, even the principal flower of their youth, and abused them like slaves. In putting them to base ministries & servile drudgeries, and look whatsoever by compulsion he redelivered to the Thessalians, he had taken order afore that they should be good for nothing. As for example (say they) Thebes in Phthia, the only maritime City for much traffick and merchandise, was in times past gainful and commodious to the Thessalians, and brought them great revenues and profits, But Philip had turned the staple and all the trade and negotiation by sea from thence to Demetrias, and having got hulks and barks, cauled them to baulk and pass by Thebes, and direct their course for Demetrias. Nay, he could not so much as hold his hands from evil entreating their Embassadors, who by law of nations are inviolable. For he foreclosed them in ambush, as they were in their journey to T. Quintus. By which means the Thessalians all in general were so over-awed by him, and put in such fear, that there is not a man amongst them dare open his mouth, either in their own Cities, or in any of the Diets and Councils of the whole nation. For why? their patrons of whom they hold their liberty are far off, but an imperious Lord they have that sitteth ever on their skirts, and pricketh them continually in the sides, and will not suffer them to use and enjoy the benefits granted them by the people of Rome. For to take away from them the liberty of speech once, what freedom have they left? And even at this present, for all the assurance and confidence they have in the privilege of Embassadors, they rather sigh and groan out their words, than speak frankly, and partly with liberty. And unless the Romans provide better in some good sort, that both the Greeks remaining in Macedony, may be void of fear, and Philip also curbed and kept short for being so bold, it will be to no purpose at all, that either he was vanquished, or they enfranchised. He is therefore to be held in with a rougher and harder bit in his mouth, like an headstrong and unruly horse, that will not be ruled with a gentle snaffle. In this sharp and eager manner dealt the law, where, as the former had used fair language to appease and mollify his anger, beseeching his grace to pardon them in case they spoke their minds for their liberty, to lay down the rigor of a Lord and Master, to bear himself like a kind ally and loving friend, & to take example of the Romans, and them to imitate, who chose rather to gain associates by love, than constrain them by fear. After audience given to the Thessalians, the Perrhæbians came in place, and alleged that Commene that a City which Philip named Olympia belonged in right to Perrhæbia: & earnest they were, that it might be restored unto them. They demanded also to have Mallus and Erismum again. Then the Abthamians put in, and spoke for their liberty, and to have the forts of Athens and Patmos rendered unto them. Philip because he would seem more like a plaintiff than a defendant, to accuse rather than to be accused, began himself also with complaints. He found himself grieved, that the Thessalians had won by force of arms the City Mendus in Dolopia, part of the appurtenances belonging to his kingdom, Item, that the tame Thessalians and the Perrhæbians together had forced Petra in Pieria, as for Xynia (an Ætolian town without all question) they had indeed laid it unto his seignory, but Panachelus, which should be under Abthamania, by no right in the world was annexed to the Thessalians, & comprised within their charter. For as touching the matters (quoth he) charged upon me so odiously, namely, of laying wait for the Embassadors of frequenting those port-towns or abandoning those: the one is a meer mockery and ridiculous thing: namely, for me to give account what havens, merchants, and mariners sail, and another arrive, attine other is clean adveit & contrary to my nature & that which I never could abide to practice. For these many years (quod he) Embassadors have never ceased and given over, to inform grievous matters against me to the Roman Generals, and to the Senat at Rome: and which of them ever to this day hath had so much as a foul word given again unto him from me? Supposed & objected it is, that once they were tormented by the way as they were going to Quin, and that it is not laid withal what happened unto them. This manner of dealing & accusation, a vereth of quarrellers that vain would have somewhat to say, be it never so false, when they can find no matter of truth to charge a man withal. These Thessalians beyond all measure abuse the kindness & indulgence of the people of Rome, & taring as men who had endured a long drought, they drink over-greedily, pouring in their liberty & nothing else to it, and know not when to make an end, and to break their draught: Like, for all the world to bondslaves suddenly let at freedom beyond their hope and expectation, whose manner is to break out into broad terms and acrimonious language, and cannot contain but revile and rail at their very Masters. And at last, in a furious fit of choler he burst forth into these words. That the sun was not set and gone to bed for ever, but would one day rise again, this minatory speech of his not only the Thessalians took to themselves, but the Roman, also construed as a glance at them. Upon these words arose loud and murmuring in the assembly, but being in the end appeased & stilled, he answered the Agents for the Perrhæbians and Abthamians in this wise: That the case and condition of those Cities for which they stood, was one and the same, namely, that the Col, Ætolius and the Romans passed them unto him by a deed of gift, as having aforetime belonged to their enemies. Now if they who have given, will also take away the same, then (quod he) I must needs quill my hold, and lose them: but in so doing, they shall to gratify their fickle, inconstant, and vain allies, men of no regard, and good for nothing, do mere and manifest wrong to a far better and more faithful friend. For nothing is there in the world more thankless and less while accepted than liberty, especially with them who know not how to use it, & by abuse thereof will soon spill the grace of such a benefit. Then the Roman Delegates, having heard the reasons and allegations of both parties pronounced sentence, That the Macedonian garrisons should quit the Cities above said, and the Realm of Macedony be confined within the ancient bounds and limits. As touching the injuries which they complained to have been reciprocally offered from one to another, there was a time and course of law to be set down, which should contain a process and manner, how the matters between the Macedonians and the other nations might be reformed and composed. Hence the King was highly offended and displeased, but the Delegates went their waies toward Thebes, and likewise the Cities of Thrace, and to hear their causes; where the Embassadors of King Antiochus made a speech to this effect.

If the Republic of the Romans be, that the two Cities Ænus and Maedonia shall be free, it is not for us modestly to say any more, but advertise & admonish them to leave the same in real and not in verbal liberty, and not suffer a gift by them granted to be impeached or intercepted by another. But if they have less care and consideration of the Cities and States planted in Thrace, yet more direct and reason it is, that those places which sometimes were subject unto Antiochus, should fall to Romanus rather than to Philip; by way of recompence for war-service in regard, as well of the merits of his father Antiochus during the war against Philip, as of his own deeds, who during the war with Antiochus, was personally present in all travels & dangers both by sea and land. And to this effect, he hath besides an award of the ten Delegates passed already before, whereby in the grant and donation of Chersonesus & Lysimachia, have no doubt given Antiochus more to Ænus likewise to be as dependants of a greater gift, considering the near vicinity and neighbourhood of those other Cities: For, as concerning Philip, what hath he deserved at the hands of the people of Rome? What right of seignory can he pretend, why he should plant garrisons in these Cities so far remote & distant as they be from the frontiers of Macedony? I will not only and certainly in all respects of the whole state of these Cities. Then were the Embassadors of the Abthamians called in: who affirmed: That the King had a garrison not in one place only of their City (as he had in other Cities besides) but in many quarters thereof at one time: so as Maedonia was pestered full with Macedonians. And therefore (say they) the Kings favorites and flatterers are they that rule all and bear the sway: they and none but they, may be allowed to

of King Philp.

"speak both in Senat at the Council-table, and in general assemblies before the people; they go away with all honours & dignities, & either are invited therein themselves, or else conser them upon whom they please. The best men, who stand either for defence of freedom, or in maine-nance of the laws, either are driven their country and banished, or fit a cold & blow their stile, for any advancement they come unto; & being subject and thrall to persons of no worth, stand like cyphers and hold their peace. Somewhat they said moreover as touching the right of their limits, to wit, That Q. Fabius Labeo, at what time as he was in those parts, confined Philp within the bounds of the old Kings: frett or high way, which directly leadeth to Paroria in Thrace; and in no place declineth toward the sea: but Philp afterwards had made a new caufway, and drawn it with a compals about, within which he empaled and took in the Cities & territories all of the Maronites. To these challenges Philp began far otherwise, than he did of late the Thessalians and Perrhobians, and in this wise he spake: "I have, quoth he, no matter to debate either with the Maronites or Emmenes; but now at this present I am to contest even with you (my Masters of Rome) at whole hands I have seen thus long that I can obtain no reason and equity, I thought it meet and right, that the Macedonian Cities, which had revolted from me during the time of truce, should be rendered again unto me: not for any great encrease of feignory that thereby should have accrued unto my kingdom (for small towns they are god wot, and situate on the utmost frontiers) but because their precedent and example might have imported much, to retain the rest of the Macedonians in their duty and allegiance, in no wile it would be granted. During the Ætolian war, I was enjoyned by the Consul Acilius to besiege and assault the City Lama; and after I had been toiled out and wearied with maintaining skirmishes, raising King fabricks, planting ordnance and engines against it, even when I was at the very point to scale the walls and force the City, the Consul reclaimed and called me away, yea, and compelled me to levy the siege, and withdraw my forces from thence. And for to make me some part of amends for this wrong done, permitted I was to win again and conquer certain small piles and forts, rather than Cities of Thessaly, Perrhobia, and Athamania. And even those also, may I say unto you Q. Cælius, ye have taken from me within these few daies. And now forthwith of late, the Embassadors of Emmenes also (and God will) have presumed upon this as a thing granted and without all question, That more reason it is for Emmenes to have & enjoy that which belonged to Antiochus, than for me. But my judgment is far otherwise. And why? Emmenes could never have continued in his Realm, unless the Romans, I will not say, had vanquished K. Antiochus, but surely if they had not waged war against him. And therefore is he indebted unto you, and you no waies beholden unto him. As for my kingdom, so far was it off that any part or quarter of it should be in hazard and jeopardy: that when Antiochus of his own meer motion offered to buy my society with three thousand talents, and fifty covered ships of war, together with all those Cities in Greece which I held in possession aforesaid; I refused all, and disclaimed his alliance, yea, and I professed openly, even before that M. Attilius came over with his army into Greece, that I was his enemy, and together with that Consul, was employed in what part occasion, determined to lead his army by land to Hellspon, I not only gave him leave to pass peaceably through my Realm, but also called the high waies to be paved and gravelled, bridges to be made against his coming, yea, and furnished him with provision of victuals. And this did I, not in Macedony alone, but also throughout all Thrace, where among other matters, this was not of least importance and consequence, to restrain those barbarous nations there, from running upon them, and to keep them in peace and quietness. In consideration now of this kind affection of mine (If I may not call it a good desert) unto you, whether ought ye Romans in recompence give me somewhat that I have, to augment and encrease my dominion by your largesse and munificence, or to take from me (as you do) that which I have either in mine own right, or by gift from you? The Macedonian Cities, which you confess to have been parcels of my kingdom, are not restored unto me. Emmenes on the other side, he comes to make spoil of me, as if I were Antiochus, and mark I pray you the device of it, he pretendeth a decree of the Senate to colour his most shameless, impudent & cautious falsehood; even that by which himself may be most refuted and convicted. For in very expresse and plain terms it is thus written, That Cherfonesus & Lysimachia be given to Emmenes. Where I pray you, and in what corner of the instrument and patent stand Ænus, Maronea, and the Cities of Thrace? Shall he obtain that at your hands, and by your means, as given and granted from those ten Delegates, which he never durst so much as once demand and require of them? Tell me (if the thing be worth so much) in what place ye would range and reckon me? If your purpose be to persecute me as an enemy and mortal foe, spare not, but go on still as ye have begun: but if you respect me as a King, as your ally and friend, I beseech you, repune me not worthy of so notorious and manifest a wrong. This Oration of the King in some measure moved the Commissioners, and therefore by framing a mean and indifferent answer, they held the matter still in suspense undecided.
If (say they) the Cities in question were given to Emmenes, by virtue of a decree laid down by the ten Delegates, we will not change nor alter any thing therein. But in case Philp acquired them by Conquest and force of arms, he should have held them as the gerdon of his victory. If neither, we are of opinion, That the hearing and decision of this difference shall be referred over to the Senat: and to the end, that all may remain entire, the garrison in those whose Cities shall be withdrawn and depur it. These, I say, were the causes that principally estranged the affection of Philp from the Romans, and wrought discontentment in his heart: his information is evident it is, that the war was not enterprised by his Ion Perseus, upon any new quadrats and both occasion, but upon these motives Ier unto him by his father to be pursued.

Nouspition was there at Rome of a Macedonian war, Laeta in the Pro Conul was returned out of Spain: and when he demanded a triumph of the Senat assembled in the Temple of Bellona, the same in regard of his noble and worthy exploits might have been obtained; but for example sake it was not granted. For an order it was in Rome, by ancient custome of their forefathers, that no man might triumph, who brought not his army back with him, which he let unto his successor the Province fully subdued and settled in peace. Howbeit, Marius was allowed an indis-cuss honour, namely to enter into the City by way of Ovation. In which solemnity he had borne before him in a pompous pageant two and fifty coronets of gold. Moreover, in gold a hundred twenty pound weight, and in silverix thousand three hundred. Also he pronounced aloud in the Senat, that Q. Fabius the Queitor was coming, and brought with him ten thousand pound weight more of silver, and eighty of gold, which he meant likewise to bring into the Chamber of the City.

That year a great commotion and insurrection there was of bondslaves in Apulia, L. Postu-mian the Pretor had the government of Tarentum, and he sat in inquisition upon a damned crew of certain herdsmen and graziers, who had conspired together, and tied to rob by the high-way side, and in the common pastures belonging to the City: which Commission he followed with such severity and rigor, that he condemned 7000 of them. Many escaped and fled, but many were executed and suffered death. As for the Coss long were they kept in the City of Rome, about the levy of soldiers, but at length they went into their Provinces.

The same year, C. Calpurnius and L. Quinctius the Pretors in Spain, having in the beginning of the Spring led forth their armies out of their wintering holds, and joyned their forces together in Reus advanced forward into Carpetania, (where the enemies were encamped) with a resolution to manage and conduct the war with one joint mind and common counsell together. Not far from the Cities Hippon and Tolenum, there began a skirmish between the foragers of both parties, by means whereof, the whole armies of both sides by little and little, came forth into the field to fight a full battell. In this tumultuary skirmish, the enemies had the vantage, as well of the ground wherein they were embattelled as of the manner of fight and service. By reason whereof, both the Roman armies were discomfited and driven back into their camp: but the enemies pressed not upon them nor withstanding they were put in great fright and much discomfited. The Roman Prætor doubting lest their camp the morrow after should be assailed, dislodged in the night between in great secret and silence, without any sound of trumpet, and departed. In the morning by break of day the Spaniards in ordinance of battell approached the trench and rampier: and being entered within the camp (which they found void and empty beyond their hope and expectation) they rifled and ranfacked all that the Romans left behind them, whilst they made halfe away in the night season: from whence the enemies returned to their own camp, and there for certain daies abode in standing leaguer and stirred not. In that battell and in the chase together, there were slain of Romans and allies 5000: and with the spoiles of their bodies, the enemies armed themselves: from thence they marched to the river Tagus. The Roman Pretors in the mean season employed all that time to levy and assemble new forces out of the Confederate Cities of Spain, and in comforting and encourg the hearts of their own footsiders after their fright, upon this idle conflict and unlooky foil. Now when they had gathered (as they thought) a sufficient power, and took themselves strong enough, and that the soldiers also desired to be doing with the enemy, for to rate out and cancel the former ignomy and disgrace, they encamped twelve miles from the river Tagus aforesaid: and about the third watch of the night advanced their battels and marching in a four square battell, by day light they were come to the bank of the river (now were the enemies lodged upon a little mount beyond the water) and incontinently in two places (where the river shewed a ford) they waded through with their arms, Calpurnius on the right hand, and Quinctius on the left. All this while the enemies continued quiet and moved not: but in the mean time, while as they wondered at their sudden coming, and devised how to trouble and disorder the soldiers as they should make haste to pass the river, the Romans had timbered over themselves, and their bag and baggage also, yea, and brought all together into one place. And because they perceived by this time the enemy to stir and remove, and had no time to fortifie their camp, they put themselves in battell array. In the midst flood the river Calpurnius, and the eighth of Quinctius, which was the very flower and strength of the whole army. Now they had a fair open plain all the way between them and the enemies camp, so as there was no cause to fear any ambush. The Spaniards so soon as they espied two armes of their enemies upon that side of the bank which was next to them, all at once issued out of their camp and ran to battell: to the end that they might surpris and empeach them before they could joyn and range themselves together. The fight was sharp and hot in the beginning: for the Spaniards of the one side were pushed up with the covet and pride of their late victory: and the Romans of the other, were galled and incited for anger of a dishonour received, which they were not used unto. The battell in the midst (consisting of two most valiant and hardy legions) fought right courageously: which the enemies, seeing that they could not otherwise force to retreat and give ground, began to charge upon them with a battalion in confusion flock together; and still they pressed hard upon them in the midst more and more in number, and ever the less ranged. Calpurnius the Praetor seeing this battle difficult and in danger, sent with all speed L. Quinctius Varus, and L. Junius Tullus, two Lieutenants, to either of the legions severally, to encourage and exhort them to stick to it like men, and to make resolutions and relation. That in them alone consisted all the hope of conquering, and keeping some; if they never so little yielded back & left their ground, there was not one of the whole army that should ever see Italy again, nor so much as the farther bank of Tages. As for himself, he took with him the Cavalry of two Legions, and when he had wheeled a little about and seen things with them, he charged hotly upon the flank of the foreaid strong battalion of the enemies, which assailed and urged still the main battle. Quinctius also with his Cavalry flanked the enemies on the other side, but the horien of Calpurnius fought more fiercely by odds than the others, and the Praetor himself in person was foremost of them all: for he was the first that drew blood of the enemy, & so far engaged himself within them, that hardly a man could know of which side he fought by his singular valour, the horsemen were mightily animated; and by the valour of the Cavalry on horseback, the Infantry also were endeavored to fight on foot. The principal Captains were abashed and ashamed to see the Praetor in person among the pikes and swords of his enemies, and therefore every man for his part did his best, put forward the port-ensignes, willing them to advance their banners, to the end that the soldiers might follow hard after. Then began they on all hands to set up a fresh and lusty shout; they took their bier and charged upon them from the vanage of an higher ground: by reason whereof they disarrayed them first, and like a sea, the stream they bare them down before them, so as they could not stand upon their feet and resist this violence of theirs, but fell one upon another. As many as fled toward the camp, the horien pursued, and so intermingled themselves among the rout of the enemies, that they could not pell-mell with them into their hold: where, they that were left for the guard thereof, renewed the fight, so that the Roman horsemen were forced to fight from their horses: and whilst they maintained the conflict, the first Legion came to second them, and consequently more and more succours as they possibly could ran to them: down went the Spaniards, and were massacred in all parts of the camp; and not above 4000 of them all, fled away and saved themselves; of which number, about 3000 (who still kept their armour) seized upon a hill near adjoining to the other, and about being for the most part armed by the balls, were scattered all over the field. The enemies were at first above 35000, but after this battle few how few of them were left; and from them were won 33 ensignes. Of Romans and Allies, there died few above six hundred of auxiliary souldiers from out of the Province, about 150. Five martial Tribunes were lost, and certain Roman Gentlemen, whose death especially, made it seem a bloody victory. After which the army abode within the enemies camp for that themselves had no time to fortify their own. The next morrow Calpurnius in an open audience, highly praised the horien, and rewarded them with rich harness and trappings, declaring aloud, That by means of their good service principally the enemies were discomfited, and their camp forced. As for Quinctius the other Praetor, he bestowed upon his men of arms, small chains and burtons of gold. The Centurions likewise of both armies received gifts at their hands, and namely, those who fought in the main battle.
and

The Consuls having finished the levy of souldiers, and accomplished all things requisite to be done in Rome, led the army into their Province of Liguria. Sempronius departed from Rome, and made a journey against the Apan Ligurians; where, by waisting their territories and burning their towns and fortresses, he made way into the forest and opened the passages as far as to the river Macra and the port of Luna. The enemies took a certain mount (an ancient hold) where their ancestors sometimes had seated themselves: but from thence they were by force discomfited, in reason that the Romans overcame the difficulties of the avenues thereto. Ap. Claudius likewise for his part, was equal in valour and good fortune to his Colleague, as having fought certain prosperous battles with the Ligurian Inguines. He forced besides six towns of theirs, and took many thousands of prisoners within them. Of the chief authors of that rebellion, he caused three and forty to lose their heads.

Now approached the time of the solemn assembly for election of Magistrates at Rome; and albeit Sempronius his lot: it was to hold the said assembly, yet Claudius returned first to Rome, because P. Claudius his brother made suit to be Consul, He had for his competitors, L. Emilius Q. Fabius Laber, and Servius S. Iulius Galba, all four of the Nobility. Old suitors they were all, and because they had suffered the repulse aforesaid, they renewed the suit for this dignity, as being so the rather due. because it had been once denied them. And this was the cause that these four followed & pressed the harder for to obtain the same, because it was not lawful for any more person one of the Patritii at once to be created Col. There were also of the Commoners certain persons well beloved and of good reputation that stood in election for the place, to wit, L. Porcius Q. Terentius Culex, and Cn. Rabirius Tappulus: they also had taken repulse beforetime, and were put off still in hope one day yet to obtain that honourable dignity. Claudius of them all was only the new Competitor. Now men thought verily without any doubt & question, yet and destined in their councils, Q. Fabius Laber, and L. Porcius Licinius to be Consuls. But Claudius the Consul together together with his brother bestirred himself, and without his others attending upon him, travelled and laboured hard in all parts of the common place: notwithstanding the adversities, yet, and the most of the Senators cried out upon him, and said, That he ought to consider and remember rather that he was the Col. of the people of Rome, than brother to P. Claudius; why then let him not fill in the Tribunal either as president and judge of the court assembled, or else as a beholder and spectator only, without saying any word himself? Howbeit, he could not possibly be reclaimed from this diordinate affection of his which he shewed in labouring for his brother. This election was divers times also troubled with the great debates and contentions caused by the Tribunes of the Commons: whilst some of them spake against the Col. others again maintained his suit, and took part with him. But in the end, Fabius took the foil, and Appius went away with the game, for his brother. So P. Claudius Pulcher was created Col. beyond his own hope, and more than others looked for. L. Porcius Licinius held his own, and obtained the second place in his course: for that the Commoners went moderately to work, & shewed not so much affection and forcible means as Claudius did. After this, was holden the election of Praetors, and chosen there were, C. Decimius Flavinus, P. Sempronius Longus, P. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Navius Maibo, C. Sempronius Blaesus, and A. Terentius Varro. Thus much concerning the acts achieved both at home in the City, and abroad in the war that year wherein App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls.

In the beginning of the next year, in which P. Claudius and L. Porcius bare the Consulship, when as Q. Caecilius, M. Babius and T. Sempronius (who had been sent to hear and decide the controversies between the two Kings, Philip and Eumenes, and the States of Thessaly) had made report of their embassages: they permitted likewise the Embassadors of the said Princes and Cities, to come into the Senat. Who related the self-same things again, which had been alleged before in the presence of the foreaid Legats in Greece. After this, the LL. of the Senat addressed another new embassy into Macedonia and Greece, whereof App. Claudius was the chief for to visit and see, whether the Cities adjudged and assigned to the Rhodians, Thessalians, and Perrharians were delivered unto them accordingly. They also had in charge to cause the garisons to quit Enus and Macedonia, and to look that all the sea-coast of Thracia, were freed from the subjection of Philip and the Macedonians. They were enjoined moreover to go into Peloponnesus, from whence the former embassy was departed in more doubtful terms than if they had never gone thither. For over and besides other things they were sent away without any answer for their dispatch: and albeit they requested the Achaens for to assemble their general Diet, they might not obtain it. For which, when as Q. Caecilius found himself discontented and grievously complained, and the Lacedaemonians withal made piteous moan, that the walls of their City were demolished and razed, their common people lead away in captivity into Achaia, and there sold, and the laws of Lycurgus taken from them, under which their City and Common-wealth until that day had been maintained and governed: the Achaens excused themselves most of all for the imputation of refusing to hold a Council; and to that purpose they rehearsed a Law and Ordinance, whereby they were forbidden expressly to call and publish a Diet, unless it were in the case of levying war and contracting of peace, upon occasion that any embassadors came directly unto them from the Senat of Rome with letters, or commission in writing. But for that this manner of excuse should not serve them again afterwards, the Senat gave them plainly to understand, that they ought to take care and order that the Roman Embassadors might at all times have means of free access to their Councils, like as they also reciprocally should have a Senat held for their sakes, as often as they would themselves.

After these embassages were departed, Philip was advertised by his Embassadors, that there was no remedy but he must abandon those Cities, and withdraw his garisons: and herewith being mightily offended & angered against all, yet he discharged his choler only upon the Maronites. Uxo Onomastus, warden of the ports and sea-coasts, he gave commandment to kill the chief of the advice-part. And he by the means of Cassander, one of the Kings upstarts and favorites who a long time had dwelt in Macedonia, procured certain Thracians to be let into the town by night. & there he committed murder and massacre, as if it had been a City won by force of arms. And when the Roman embassadors made complaint to him, namely of such outrages committed so cruelly against the gentiles Maronites, and so proudly and insolently against the people of Rome: in that they should be killed and cut in pieces at enemies, unto whom the Senat had ordained restitution of their freedom he made answer and said, that neither himself, nor any of those who belonged unto him, could do withall: but it was long of themselves and their variance one with another; whilst some of the Citizens drew to him, and others inclined to King Eumenes. Which ye may (say he) soon know to be a truth, if ye will but ask the Maronites themselves: for this account he made, that whilst they were all terrified with so late and fresh a massacre, there durst not one of them open his mouth against him. Appius replied again, and said, That they were not to make enquiry in this so evident and notorious a fact, as if it were in any respect doubtful: but if he would discharge and clear himself as innocent of the action, he should send to Rome Onomastus and Cassander, who were named to have committed the outrage, that the Senat might examine them upon interrogatories. This word at the first so troubled and dashed the King, that his colour went and came in his face, & he knew not how to keep his countenance. But after he was come again to himself, he made answer, That if they needs would he cared not much to send Cassander, for that he had dwelt & continued in Macedonia; but as for Onomastus, who neither was at Macedonia, not so much as in any quarter near unto it, how possibly could he be charged or touched with that matter? Now as he is pained Onomachus the rather of the twain, and was loath to have him come in question, as being his more dear and honourable friend: so he feared him much more than the other, lest he should bewray and disclose the thing: for that himself had conferred with him thereabout: and besides, he had served his turn divers times as a Minister to execute, and been privy unto him as a complice to plot such like delinquencies. Cassander also, as it is verily thought, was poisoned and made away, by certain that were sent of purpose to accompany him through Epirus to the sea side: and all because the villany should not be detected and come to light. Thus the Legats departed from the parley and conference with Philip, as shewing in their countenance, that they were nothing well pleased: and Philip on the other side went his ways as before, to levy war again: but inasmuch as his forces as yet were not sufficient to do any exploit, and because he would delay the time between, he determined to send his younger son Demetrius to Rome, both to purge his father of those matters wherewith he was charged, and also by humble request to appease the anger of the Senat: supposing, that this young gentleman, who had been left as an hostage at Rome, and there had shewed a good testimony of a Princely nature and royal disposition, might much avail in the cause. In the mean while himself under colour of aiding the Bizantins, but in very truth to strike some terror into the Princes of Thrace, made an expedition against them: and when he had in one battell discomfited them, and taken prisoner their chief Captain Amatorus, he returned into Macedony, having sent certain messengers to solicit the barbarous nations, inhabiting near the river Ister, for to enter and invade Italy, in Peloponnesus also the coming of the Roman Legats was expected, who by this commission were enjoyned to pass out of Macedony into Achaia: against whom because the Achazans would not be to seek what to say, Lycurgus their Prator summoned a publicke Councill aforehand. In which there was parly as touching the Lacedemonians, namely, how that of enemies they were become informers and accusers, and danger it was, lest when they were vanquished they would be more to be feared, than all the time that they waged war. For during the wars, the Achazans found the Romans to be their good associates, but now the same Romans are more friendly to the Lacedemonians, than to the Achazans, seeing that Aratus and Alcibiades (banished persons both out of Lacedemony, and by the means of the Achazans restored again to their place) had undertaken to go in embassage to Rome, against the Achazan nation, which had so well deserved at their hands: and there gave to hard language against them, as if they had been chafed and driven out of their country, and not restored thereunto by them. Hereupon arose a great outcry from all parts of the assembly, for to put to question, what should be determined expressly of them by name, and in this fit where all went by choler, and nothing by counsel, condemned they were to die. Some few daies after came the Roman Embassadors, for whose sake a Councill was holden at Chiusus City: in Arcadia. But before any matter was treated on the Achazans were surprised with exceeding feare, considering and thinking how this deciding of matters was not like to be managed and carried with any indifferency for their behoof: forasmuch as they saw Aratus & Alcibiades (condemned by them in the last Councill) to be in the company of the said Embassadors, and no man durst open his lips and speak a word. Appian declared, That the Senat was much displeased at those matters whereof the Lacedemonians had made complaint, namely, That first in a tumultuary way and in conflict, they were murdered, who had been called forth by Philopomen, and came to speak in their own cause: Then, after they had exercised their cruelty thus against their persons, to the end, that in no part their inhumanity should be wanting, they had rased the walls of a right noble and famous City, abolished their most ancient laws, and put down the discipline and government of Lycurgus, so renowned throughout all nations. When Appian had made an end of his speech then Lycorides, both in regard that he was Prator, and also because he took part with the faction of Philopomen (who was the author of all that had been done at Lacedemon) made answer in this wise: "More hard it is for us now. O Appian, to speak before you, than of late it was in the presence of the Senat. For then we were to answer the Lacedemonians, who accused us: but at this present we have you to be our accusers, before whom, as competent judges we should be plead in our own defence. Howbeit, we have submitted our selves, and undergone this unequal and hard condition, presuming upon this hope, that you will lay aside that accusatory heat which not long since you used, and put upon you the penion of a Judge to hear with indifference and equity. For mine own part, considering that you ere while have but related those matters which the Lacedemonians both here in place before Q. Cassius of late, and also at Rome afterwards complained of, I would think that I am to answer therefore not unto you, but unto them in your hearing. You charge us with the murdering of them, who being called out by the Prator Philopomen to plead their cause, were killed. This crime I hold that it ought not to be objected against us by you Romans, no, nor so much by any other in your audience. And why so? because it was expressly specified in your own treaty and accord of covenants, that the Lacedemonians should have nothing to do with the maritime Cities. At what time as the Lacedemonians took arms, and leiled by force in the night those Cities, which they were precisely forbidden to meddle withall; T. Quintus, if the Roman army had been in Peloponnesus, as sometime no doubt we must needs think that being thus surprised and evil entreated, they would have had recourse thither for succour. But since ye were so far off, whether else should they have retired themselves, but to us your allies, whom they had been before to help and succour Gythium?"

"whom upon the like cause they knew to have assailed Lacedemon together with you? It was in your quarrell therefore that we entertained a just and lawfull war. Which being an act of ours, by others commended, and which ought not by the very Lacedemonians to be condemned, and considering that even the Gods themselves have approved thereof in that they gave us victory, how cometh it then to pass, that you bring those matters into question which are by right of law warranted? And yet a great part thereof in no respect toucheth and concerneth you. That we caused them to come forth to answer their cause, who had called a commotion of the multitude, who had forced the maritime Cities, who had ransacked them, who also had massacred the principal citizens, we are to answer therefore, and to us that properly appertaineth, but that they were murdered in the way as they came into our camp, was nothing to us, but you caused O Aratus and Alcibiades who now (forsooth) are become our accusers. The banished Lacedemonians (of which number those two also are, and who at that time were with us, for that they chose the best Towns to retire into for their habitations) supposing that their own death was sought, and that there would have been outrage committed upon them, they ran upon those by whose means they were driven out of their country: even upon an indignation; that they might not so much as pass their old age in banishment with safety. They were the Lacedemonians then and not the Achazans that slew the Lacedemonians whether justly or unjustly, that is not the question, neither yet how it is, but what lay ye to this O Achazans, how can ye deny that there are, uponable, inth it ye have abolished the Laws and the most ancient discipline of Lacedemon and withal rased the walls of Lacedemon? And how is it possible that both these things should be objected unto us by the same men? considering that those walls were never demolished by Lycurgus but contrary-wise (and not many years past) for to overthrow and annihil the discipline instituted by Lycurgus? For the tyrants of late daies built them to serve as a fortress and bulwark for themselves: and not for a defence unto the City. And if Lycurgus at this day should rise again from death to life, he would take joy in their ruins, and say that he acknowledged now his own native country and ancient Spuria indeed. You Lacedemonians should not have expected Philopomen nor the Achazans but yourselves ought with your own hands to have perished down and destroyed, all the tokens and memorials of tyranny. Those walls were the very marks and as a man would say the unemied and deformed scars of your thraldome and servitude. And you who without walls for the space almost of 800 years had lived in freedom, were yet for a certain time also had been matters of Greece became slaves during a hundred years, and enclosed and restrained within walls, as if ye had been fettered by the feet. Now as touching the laws, which ye pretend to have been taken away by us, I suppose verily that the tyrants they were, who deprived the Lacedemonians of their ancient laws: and that we have not taken from them theirs (for none they had of their own) but rather have given them ours: neither have we done otherwise than well by them, but regarded much the good of their City and Commonwealth: in that we have united them in our solemn court of Parliament, and incorporated them unto us to the end, that in all Peloponnesus, there should be but one body, one State, and one Councell. Then (I wot well) they might have justly complained to have been wronged: then they might have grieved and said they had not been well used, in case we our selves had lived under one kind of laws, and put them to be ruled by others. I know full well, O Appian, that all my speech hitherto is neither becomming allies to me unto their allies, nor decent and meet for a nation that is free, but rather (to speak more truly) fit for slaves debating before their masters. For if that found of the trumpet if that voice of the publick crier were not in vain, whereby ye ordained and declared, That we Achazans before all others should be free; if the confederation stand firm and stable; if our alliance and amity be entertained and observed equally and indifferently: why demand not I of you Romans what you did after the winning of Capua? Seeing you will have us Achazans to make account unto you, what we did to the Lacedemonians whom we conquered by war? Set safe that we caused some of them to be killed, What of that? Commanded not you (I pray) that the Senators of Capua should lose their heads? We have demolished the walls indeed, but ye have not only ruined their walls, but wholly turned them out of City and territory. But (you will say) the confederation in behalf of the Achazans is equal and indifferent in outward appearance, and in truth and effect their liberty dependeth upon the good will and pleasure of the Romans, who indeed have the pre-eminence of the feignory and dominion besides: I know it Appian, as well as you can tell me, yea, and (although it behoveth me to be so) I am not overmuch offended and discontented therewith. But this I beseech you let there be as great odds and difference as ye will between us Achazans and you Romans: provide this only, that your enemies and ours be not with you in as good regard and account, as they that they be not in a better degree and condition than we your allies and associates. For, that they should be equal to us, we have been the cause in that we granted them our own laws, and that we admitted them to be incorporated in the general Diet of the Achazan State and commonalty. But will ye have the truth? the conquered have not sufficient to content and satisfy the conquerors: enemies demand more than allies have and enjoy; and those things which are confirmed by oath, ratified and consecrated by monuments and instruments of writings, are never engraven in stone, for a perpetual memory to all posterity, they would force and wrest from us with our perjury. True it is, O Romans, we honour and reverence you: yea and if you will needs have it so, we dread and fear you also: but yet so, as we both honour and also fear the im-

"mortal Gods more than you. Audience he had with the accord and content of the greater part: H and all men judged, that he had spoken like a Magistrate indeed, and for the dignity and Majesty of his place: in such sort, as it was easily seen, that they were never able to hold their dignity and maintain their authority with the Romans, in case they went coldly to work and proceeded in mild terms with them. Then Appian answered and said, "That he would gladly advise and persuade them, al. that he possibly could, to be reconciled unto the Lacedæmonians, whies they might do it with full contentments: for fear lest soon after they should be constrained and forced to seek unto them against their wills and mangle their hearts. At this word they all lighted and groned again: but afraid they were and durst not refuse to do that which they were commanded. This petition on y they made unto the Romans, that as touching the Lacedæmonians they would change & alter what they thought good: and not force the Achæans to sin against their conscience, I in dissuading those things which they had established and ratified with a solemn oath. So the sentence of condemnation only (lately passed against Aratus and Alcibiades) was reversed.

In the beginning of this year (when at Rome they had sitten in consultation about the Provinces of Consuls and Pretors) Liguria was assigned unto the Consuls for their charge and government, because there was no war in any other place. Then the Pretors call lots for theirs. To C. Decimus Flavius fell the jurisdiction of the City: and to P. Cornelius Cethegus that other between citizens and forainers: C. Sempronius had the government of Sicily, and Q. Nevius Matro of Sardinia, with commission also to sit upon the inquisition in case of poisoning. A. Trecentius Varro was deputed L. Governor of high Spain, and P. Sempronius Longus of the low. Out of those 2 Provinces fell our fo, that there came much about the same time two Lieutenants, L. Juventius T. Iulius T. Quintilius Varus: who having related before the Senat how great a war was now dispatched and finished in Spain, required what, that there should be rendered praise and thanks to the immortal Gods for the happy success in the wars, and likewise that the Pretors might be permitted to bring away their armies. So there was a solemn procession ordained to be holden two dayes: but as touching the reducing of the armies, they gave order to refer it wholly to be debated at what time as there should be question about the armies of Consuls and Pretors together. Some few dayes after, it was ordained that the Consuls should have with them into Liguria two legions apiece, which J. P. Claudius and M. Sempronius had the conduct of. As touching the Spanish forces, great contention there was between the new Pretors and the friends of C. Appurmius and Q. intus in their absence. Both sides had 1 tribuns: and both had Consuls to take part with them. The Tribuns threatened to cross the act of the Senat: if they ordained that the armies should be brought home. The Consuls again protested, that if the Tribuns thus opposed their negative, they would not suffer any other decree and ordinance to pass. In conclusion, the respect of those that were absent, was of less importance: and an act of the Senat was entered. That the Pretors should enrol 4000 footmen of Romans, and 400 horsemen: likewise 5000 foot and as many horse of Latine alliance to conduct with them into Spain. And when they had thus enrolled these four full legions, look what superfluitie there remained over and above 5000 foot and 300 horse in a legion, they should give them their orgie and dismiss them of soldiery: first, as many as had served out their full time, and then those who had born themselves most valiantly in the war under Calpurnius and Quintus.

After this debate and variance was appeased, there arose another in the neck of it, occasioned by the death of P. Decimus the Pretor. Cn. Licinius and L. Poppius (who had been Ediles the last year before) likewise M. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus, laboured to bein his room late deceased. As for the last of these requested (because he was Edile Curule) he shewed not himself in his white robe: but he made more means and laboured above all the rest, having to his adversary and concurrent the Flamin above said. At the first he seemed equally unto him in the suit, but afterwards, when he began to have the better of him, certain Tribuns of the Commons stood upon this point, and alleged. That his name was not to be accepted as eligible: for that one and the self same person might neither take nor exercise at one time, the function of two Magistracies: and namely, both Curule or of State. Others again said, that was not meet and reason that he were dispensed with and exempt from the Laws in that behalf to the end, that the people might be at liberty to elect whom they would for Pretor. L. Porcius the Consul was first of this resolution, not to admit his name: and afterwards, because he would seem to do by warrant and authority of the Senat, he assembled the LL. together and said, that he propounded and put to question before them, That forasmuch as an Edile elect, sued to be Pretor without all right, or any precedent tolerable in a free state: for his own part he was minded (unless they were of a contrary opinion) to hold the general assembly for the election according to law. Then the LL. gave their advice that L. Porcius the Consul should commune and treat with Q. Fulvius, that he would be no hindrance, but that the assembly for the substitution of a Pretor in the room of C. Decimus departed, might be holden by order of law. As the Consul was thus in hand with him according to the act of the Senat, Flaccus made answer that he would do nothing unbecoming his own person. By this doubtful and indifferent answer of his he kept those ingred sore (who expounded and confirmed as they would have it) that he would accommodate and rely himself to the authority of the LL. of the Senat: but at the time of the election he feel more earnestly than before: complaining of the Consul and Senat that they wronged and wrested out of his hands the benefit of the people of Rome intended unto him: and to bring him into ill will and obloquy

A obloquy of the people, they made much ado about two offices and a double dignity: as if all the world saw not, that after he were declared and pronounced Pretor, he would incontinently resign up the Edilship. The Consul perceiving both him fully resolved and set upon a pitch in the suit, and also the favor and affection of the people inclined more and more toward him, he kept the assembly as before said, and called a Senat: where, in a frequent lesson of Senators it was ordained, That for as much as Flaccus was little or nothing moved with the authority of the LL. of that honorable court, he was to be dealt withal in a general assembly before the body of the people. When the people were met together at the summons of the Consul, he proposed the matter unto him before them. Flaccus rejected never a jot, but persisted still in his opinion, and gave the people of Rome thanks for their favour, in that they shewed themselves willing to elect him Pretor, as often as they had time and place wherein they might testify and declare their love to him: which affectionate kindness of his fellow citizens, he never meant to reject and abandon. This constant and resolute speech of his, kindled and inflamed so great love and affection in them toward him, that past all peradventure he had been chosen Pretor out of hand, in case the Consul would have received his name. Much strife and debate there was amongst the Tribuns, one against another: and between them and the Consul, until at length the Consul held a Senat, and there a decree passed in this wise, That forasmuch as the willful stubborns of Q. Flaccus of one side, and the inordinat affection of men on another side, was such, as the solemn assembly for subelecting of a Pretor in the place of the deceased, could not be holden according to the laws, the Senat agreed and resolved, that there were already Pretors enough, and P. Cornelius should administer and execute both jurisdictions in the City, and exhibit the plays and games in the honour of Apollin.

After this troublesome debate about the election, was by the sage wisdom and valorous courage of the Senat suppressed, there arose another far greater, by how much the thing was of weightier importance, and the persons agents therein more in number, and for quality and place mightier. There stood in election to be Censors (and that with earnest endeavour and exceeding heat of contention) L. Valerius Flaccus, P. and L. both Scipios, Cn. Manlius Follo, and L. Furius Purpureo, all Patris, And of commoners, M. Porcius Cato, M. Fulvius Nobilior, T. and Marcus both Sempronii, the one turnamed Longus, the other Tudicianus. But M. Porcius over-went them all by many degrees, as well those of the Patricians as also of the commons, notwithstanding they were some of most noble families. This man carried with him so vigorous a spirit and pregnant wit, that however he were born and defended, it seemed he was able to make way of himself to advancement and honour. He wanted no Art and skill meet and requisite for the managing either of private busines of his own, or publick affairs of state: cunning he was in country husbandry, as well as in civil policy. Some are advanced to the highest dignities and most honourable places, by their deep knowledge in the law: others attain to promotion by eloquence: and there be again, who have risen and become great through martial prowells and feats of arms. But this man was by nature so trainable and pliant to all alike, that whatsoever he addicted and gave himself unto, a man would have said, he had been born and framed even from his mothers womb to it and to nothing else. In war, a most hardy and valiant soldier: and in many foughten fields highly renowned. Being mounted once to high places of honorable calling, a first excellent commander beyond and General of an army. In peace again, for found conllet in the civil law, passing well learned: for pleading at the bar and making orations, most eloquent. Neither carried he himself so, that his tongue flourished only while he lived, as leaving no monument behind him of his singular eloquence: but it liveth, nay, it flourisheth still, immortalized as it were and recommended to posterity in all kind of writing. Orations of his there be extant many, which he penned and pronounced as well in his own cause as for the defence of his friends yez, and invectives also against others: for albe he was to put down and weary his adversaries, not only by declaiming and accusing them, but also by pleading his own cause. Factions quarrels and enmities there were exceeding many that tormented him: and he plagued others with as many: and hard it is to say or set down, whether he were urged and pressed upon by the nobility, or himself coursed and baited them more. Doubtless, by nature he was austere and rigorous, his speech was sharp biting and beyond measure plain and true: but he carried a mind with him that stooped to no desires and lusts whatsoever: his life so severe and precise, as it was untouched and without all spot of blame: despising all fawning favours, and contemning earthly riches. In thrift and frugality, in sobriety, in patience, in sufferance of travail and danger, his body was steel to the very back. And as for his mind and courage, it was such, as very age and time (which abateh and consumeth all things else) was not able to break and daunt: when he was fourscore years old and fix, he pleaded at the bar for others: he made orations for his own defence, and wrote books: and in the ninetieth year of his age he convinced Sergius Galba: before the people to receive his judgment by them. As all his life time before the nobility was set against him so when he stood now to be Censor they pressed hard upon him: in so much as all his competitors (excepting L. Flaccus, who had been his colleague in the Consulship) conspired together, how they might give him the repulse and put him besides the Consulship: not only for that their own teeth watered, and they were desirous themselves of that honor: nor because they repined to see a new risen Gentleman, and one of the first head to be a Censor: but also because they looked for no other but that his Censorship would be rigorous and prejudicial to the name and reputation of divers men: considering how he had been crossed and hurt by very many, and was desirous himself to wait them a shrewd turn, and to meet with them again. For even then, while he laboured and sued for the place, he used minority speeches, and gave out, that they only were opposed against him, who feared they should have Censorship sharply exercised without partiality and respect of persons. And herewith he maintained and upheld the suit of L. Valerius with him, saying that if he had but him of all others to be his colleague, he should be able to repress the wicked enormities newly come up and rise in the City, and to bring in request against the ancient manners and fashions of the old world. Men were much moved in these respects and considerations; and so mangle the heads of the nobility, they now only created him Censor, but also adjoyined unto him L. Valerius for his companion in that government.

After the election of Censors was ended, the Consuls and Pretors took their journeys into their several Provinces. all save Q. Naevius; who before that he could go into Sardinia, was staid behind no less than four months, about certain inquisitions of poisoning; whereof, he late upon many without the City of Rome, in incorporate burroughs, market Towns and places of great resort, for that he thought that manner of proceeding more convenient. And if we list to believe P. Atrius, he condemned two thousand persons.

Seemably, L. Posthumius the Pretor, (unto whom the government of Tarentum by lot fell) did good justice upon great conspiracies made by certain gratiers; and with great care and diligence followed the enquiry of the Bacchanals, and dispatched the reliques thereof quite and clean. Many of them who were adjourned and made not appearance, but gave the slip and left in the lurch their fireties bound body and goods for them, and lurked in that quarter of Italy he either judged and condemned as guilty and convicted, or caused them to be apprehended and sent to Rome unto the Senat; who were all cast in prison by P. Cornelius.

In the latter part of Spain all was quiet, by reason that the Lusitans were in the last war subdued; but in the hither part, A. Terentius took Corbio a Town of the Suetians, which he assaulted with mantlets and other tabicks of war, and sold all the prisoners; which done, he passed the winter peaceably in that higher part of Spain also.

The old Pretors, C. Calpurnius Piso and L. Quintius returned to Rome; and both of them were with great accord and consent of the LL. of the Senat allowed to triumph, And first C. Calpurnius triumphed over the Portugals and Celtiberians. In which triumph, he carried in these 83 coronets of gold, and 12000 pound of silver. Within few days after, L. Quintius triumphed over the same Portugals and Celtiberians. In which solemnity, there was represented in show, as much gold and silver as in the former.

The Censors, M. Porcius and L. Valerius, while men hung in suspense between fear and hope what they would do, he'd a review and a new choice of the Senat. Seven Senators they displaced and deposed from that dignity: amongst whom, there was one of mark, for his nobility of birth and honorable offices which he had born, namely, L. Quintius Flaminius who had been Consul. An ancient order (they say) it was in time of our fore-fathers, That when the Censors had put any out of the Senat, they should note them directly for those faults which they had committed: and at this day, extant there be divers sharp orations of Cato, against them whom either he called and displaced out of Senat, or from whom he took away honours of service: but of all others, the fourest and bitterest is that of his against this L. Quintius; which if he had pronounced as an accuser before he had noted him with that disgrace, and not as Censor after the said note, his very own brother T. Quintius (if he had been then Censor) could not possibly have kept L. Quintius in the state of a Senator. Among other grievous matters he articulated against him, That he had trained with him from Rome into his Province of France (in hope of many great rewards) one Philipus Pannus, a notorious and costly Gamedye. This boy, as he was fooling and playing, the wanton with the said Quintius then Consul, used to upbraid him with this, That he was bid away from Rome, against the very time that the show of sword-players at utterance was to be exhibited: and this he said, to show how ready he was to satisfy the pleasure of him his lover. Now it chanced as they were making good cheer together, and having taken their wine liberally were well heat therewith, news came and reported it was in the banquet time, That a certain noble man of the Boians was arrived, with his children, as a renegat in the adverse part; and was desirous to speak with the Consul, for to have assurance from his mouth of safe conduct; who being brought into the pavilion began to pry with the Consul by a trunk man and interpreter. And in the midst of his speech: How fallest thou (quoth Quintius) to that wandonciety, his Caramie, because thou hast mistled and lost the sight of those sword-players at Rome, wilt thou lose presently here this Frenchman die in the place before? He made not any great semblance unto him his great earnest of his desire that way: but the Consul at the first beck of that beastly fish and baggage, caught the naked sword which hung over his head, and fust gave the poor Gaul a wound in his scone as he was speaking unto him, and afterwards as he made shift to flee from him, and called upon the protection of the people of Rome, and the assistance of those that were present, Quintius ran him quite through the sides. Valerius Atrius, who never had read the oration of Cato, but gave credit to a flying tale only, without any head or author, telleth the tale with some other circumstance howbeit much like in substance of matter, as touching his lecherous lust and bloody cruelty. He writeth, that Quintius while he abode at Plaisance, lent for a famous courtesan (upon whom he was enamored) to a banquet; and as he courted and made love to this strumpet, wanting himself unto unto her, among other discourses he recounted with what rigor he had followed certain inquisitions; what a number of prisoners he had in irons condemned to death; and how many of their heads he minded to chop off. Then this harloty sitting next beneath him, said, That she had never in all her life seen any man to cut ones head off, and it was a fight that of all other the most faint he. Whereupon, this kind amorous knight, to gratify the queen, caused one of those poor souls condemned to die, to be set out of prison into the banquetting room, and presently to be beheaded before her face. A cruel fact it was & inhuman, whether it were committed as Cato hath objected in his Oration, or as Valerius hath written in his story, that any human creature should be thus mistreated like a sacrifice, and the table besprinkled with his blood, amid the cups standing full of wine and the dishes furnished with viands, where and when the manner and custom was to raise and take the first essay in the honor of the Gods; and that devoutly with grace and good prayers; and all to content and feed the eye of a wanton and shameless Harlot, lying in the bosome of the Consul. In the end of Cato his Oration, this condition was offered unto Quintius. That if he would plead unguilty, and deny this fact and others which he charged him with, then he should put in a real caution, and stand to his defence and trial; but if he confessed himself guilty, then he would him to consider whether he thought any man would grieve and be sorry at the ignominy which he was to receive, who being transported beside his understanding with wine and women, made but a sport and pastime to shed mens blood at a very banquet. In taking a review of the Cavalry or Gentlemen of Rome, L. Scipio Africanus had his great horie of service taken from him. This Censorship was likewise executed with severity and rigor to all sorts and degrees, and namely, in the pricing and valuation of their goods. For Cato commanded the Sergeants to take a note of all the ornaments, jewels, and apparel of women, also of their chariots and coaches; if they amounted to the sum of 5000 asses, and to enrol the same in the Censors book. Item all bondslaves under twenty years of age, sold after the last tax or assessment for 10000 Asses or upward; that they should be valued at a higher price by ten fold than they were esteemed worth; and that for all these things they should pay and contribute to the City chamber after three in the thousand. These Censors cut off all water either running out of any common stream into a private house, or derived into particular fields and grounds. And all houses either built by private persons upon common ground, or any wayes encroaching and leaning to publick places they caused to be demolished and pulled down within thirty days. After this, they set out divers peeces of work to be wrought at a price, of that money which was ordained to that purpose, namely, to pave certain pools with stone, to scoure the draughts and links where need was: and in the mount Aventum and other parts where none were already to make new. And particularly of themselves Falerio caused the cauley or wharf to be made against the waters called Nepesina, that the people might pass to and fro that way: and also a street-way through Formianum, And Cato for his part built two galleries, Manianum and Titium, in the Mineries; and bought four shops for the City: he built there also the stately Hall or Palace called Portia. As for the City revenues, they did let and let them forth to farmers at an exceeding raked rent; but all the City works they put out to undertakers by the great, at as low a reckoning as they could. These leases and bargains store laid to be renewed by order from the Senat and new made at the important suit and that with Bounties and rears of the Publicans, as well farmers as undertakers: then the Censors by proclamation commanded those to avoid far from the substation, who had dismantled the former leases and bargains, and with some little abatement and easing of the former rents, they demised the same profits and revenues again to others. This was a censorship of great note, full of rapine, ill will, and heart-burning, which troubled and molested M. Porcius as long as he had a day to live, for that he was reputed and held to be the author of that severity and rigor exercised therein.

The same year two Colonies were erected and inhabitants sent from Rome, to wit, Pollentia into the Picene territory, and Psavianum into the Gauls country. Six acres of land were assigned to every one of the colonists. And the same Triumvirs, namely, Q. Fabius Labeo, M. Fulvius Fl. Crus, and Q. Fabius Nabilior, were they that both parted the said lands, and also had the leading and planning of the foresaid Colonies.

The Consul that year achieved no memorable exploit at all, neither at home in City, nor abroad in war. Against the year following they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius, who upon the fifteenth of March, on which day they entered into their government, put to question as concerning the Provinces as well their own as the Pretors. For there had been chosen Pretors C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter (who also the year before was in election for the place) Sp. Posthumius Albinus and P. Cornelius Sisenna, also L. Pappius, L. Iulius, and Cn. Scinius. Then the Consuls was assigned the province Liguria, together with the charge of the same armies, which P. Claudius and M. Porcius had conducted. As for both the Provinces in Spain [as we] bepeared as on this side Iberus] they were referred with their ordinary forces, for the Pretors of the former year by special commission without calling any lots at all therefore. The new Pretors were enjoined for to dispose and part their governments, that C. Valerius the Flamin of Jupiter might exercise one of the jurisdictions of Rome. So he was L. chief justice for the forainers, and Sisenna Cornelius over the citizens. Unto Sp. Posthumius fell Sicily, to L. Pappius Apulia to L. Iulius Gallia unto Cn. Scinius Sardinia. As for L. Iulius he was enjoined to make halt and set forward on his journey for the Transalpin Gauls (beyond the mountains) had passed over by the strength of the Gauls and waies unknown before time, into Italy, as hath been before said, and were building them, a Town in that territory, which at this day is called Aquilensis. This Pretor had in charge to apprehend them in that enterprise, so far forth as he might possibly without war and force of arms: and if there were no other remedy but that they must of necessity use violence, then to certify the Consuls thereof: for agreed it was that one of them should lead the Legions against the Gauls. In the end of the former year there was a general assembly holden for the choosing of an Angurum: in Sp. Posthumius Albinus was created in the room of Cn. Cornelius Lentulus late deceased. But in the beginning of this present year P. Licinius Crassus the arch-Pontif departed out of this world, in whole place M. Sempronius Tuditanus was invited for the Bishop, But C. Servilius Geminus was created the arch-pontif or high-priest aforaid. In the honor of P. Licinius at his funerals, there was given a dole of flesh: and a show exhibited of 120 sword-fencers fighting at sharp: likewise there were represented funeral plaies and games, which continued three dayes: and after that solemnity, I a feast was holden during which, when the tables were set & spread accordingly all over the grand-place of the City, suddenly there arose a tempest with great storms, which forced most men to erect tents and booths there: but after a while when the weather was fair again, they were taken down and had away: and men commonly gave out and said, That whereas the Prophets & wizards had foretold among other their fatal prelates, that they should be forced to quarter & pitch tents in the market place of Rome: now that prophesie was fulfilled, and they were freed and excused from farther danger. And no sooner were they eated and delivered of that scruple, but they were troubled with another; for that it had rained blood two dayes in the court-yard of Vulcan: and the Decemvirs published a solemn supplication for the expiation of that prodigious sign.

Before that the Consuls departed into their provinces, they brought into the Senat for to have audience, the embassages come from beyond Sea. And never before that day were so many men of those foreign parts seen at Rome. For from the time that the bruit was blown abroad amongst the nations bordering upon Macedony, that the Romans gave no deaf ear to the complaints and accusations committed against Philip, and that many had sped well by complaining; every City and State in their own behalf, yea, and many privat persons in particular (for a small neighbour he was to them all) repaired to Rome, in hope either to be righted and eased of their wrongs, or to discharge their stomachs and be morned and comforted for their miseries. Likewise from King Demetrius there arrived an embassage accompanied with his own brother Athenaus to make complaint, as finding themselves grieved that the garriouns were not withdrawn out of Thrace: as also to inform that Philip had sent certain aids into Bithynia to Prusias who made war upon Epirus. Now Demetrius (Philip his son) at that time a very young Gentleman, was to answer all these challenges: and an easy peece of work it was not, either to bear in mind all the matters objected, or to think upon the points of every answer accordingly. For over and besides, that the articles were many in number, most of them were of very small consequence and importance: principally strife about limits and land-marks, about carrying away men and ravishing women; or driving of cattle of misimilring justice partially and with affection, or else of none misimilred at all: of sentences given and judgments passed in causes either by force or for favour. The Senat perceiving that neither Demetrius could speak to these points and give them good evidence, nor themselves be well informed and clearly instructed by him; being moved also and grieved to see the youth so raw a choler in the affairs, and therewith much troubled in spirit, gave order to enquire and demand of him. Whether he had received any notes in writing from his father, as touching the premises? And when he answered and said, Yea, they thought the first and principal thing for them to do was to see and hear what were the answers of the King to every speciality and particular. And thereupon they presently called for that book of his fathers, and then permitted him to read the contents thereof. Now therein were set down certain brief abstracts of pleas and defenses, to each severall point shewing Inprimis, that some things he had done according to the decrees & awards of the Roman Delegates and commissioners. Item, Whereas he had left some what undone, the default was not in him but in the very parties that accused him. He had interlaced between certain grievances and complaints, as touching the iniquity and hard penning of those decrees: and how matters were not scanned and debated before Cacilius with that indifferency and equity as was meet: and requir'd; and namely that without desert of his part, all men were set against him and insisted over him. The Senat collected hereby good arguments, how the heart of Philip was wounded and galled against the Romans. But when the young Prince exalied some of these matters, and for the rest premised and underrook, that all should be done to the uttermost as it pleased the Senat to order and set down: then it was thought good to deliver this answer unto him. That his father had in nothing done better nor more to the contentment of the Senat than that he seemed willing (howsoever matters were passed already) to make satisfaction to the Romans by the means of his son Demetrius. As for the Senat, they could dissemble, forget, put up and endure many things done and past: yea and were perswaded verily in their hearts, that they might believe and trust Demetrius as knowing assuredly, that although they sent his body again to his father Philip, yet they had his heart and affection with them still, as a sure pledge and hostage: and that he was a friend to the people of Rome, so far forth as his reverent duty to his father would permit and give him leave: letting him withal to understand, that for to do him honor, they would send Embassadors unto Macedony: to the end that if ought had not been so fully equated as it should have been, it might be done yet in good time, without imputation of fault and blame, or pœnal satisfaction to be made for any thing hitherto omitted yea, and desirous they were, that Philip should understand, that by the

the mediation of Demetrius and for his sake, he stood yet in good terms of peace and friendship with the people of Rome. These things intended and done for the increafe of credit and reputation, presently turned to the displeasure of the young Gentleman, and in the end to his utter ruin and overthrow.

When were the Lacedæmonians admitted to audience in the Senat. They moved many petty matters and trifling controversies: but those that principally touched the main point were these: to wit, Whether they should be restored again whom the Achæans had condemned, or no? Item, Whether they were justly or unjustly killed, whom they murdered: Moreover they put to question, Whether the Lacedæmonians were to be comprised within the general assembly and Communion of the Achæans: or, that this State (as before-time) should have their rights and franchises apart by themselves from all others in Peloponnesus: The Senat ordained and awarded Inprimis, That they should be restored. Item, That the sentences pronounced against them, should be reversed. Item, That Lacedæmon should do service to that high court and public Diet of Achæa: and finally that this accord and award should be engrossed, subscribed, and signed as well by the Lacedæmonians as Achæans.

Q. Marcius was sent Embassador into Macedony: who also had direction and order given him by the same commission, to visit the state of the allies in Peloponnesus: for there also remained many troubles after the old quarrels and variance, yea, and the Messenians refused to appear at the general council of Achæa. Now if I would set in hand to record the causes and circumstances of that war, I should forget my purpose in the beginning of my work, wherein I resolved not to touch at all any discourse of foreign histories, no farther than they were linked to the Roman affairs, howbeit one memorable occurrence there hapned, which I cannot pass by, namely, that albeit the Achæans had the better hand in war, yet it chanced that Philopœmen their Pretor was taken prisoner by the Messenians, as he made an expedition to seize upon Corone by prevention, which the enemies were desirous to be matters of. Surprised he was in a valley of great disadvantage, and some few horsemen with him. It is reported, that by the help of the Thracians and Candiotis, he might have fled and escaped: but for very shame to abandon whole men of arms, which were the noblest Gentlemen of that nation, & whom he lately had made choice of, he had not the power to do otherwise, but stay to see the last. For whilst he came himself behind in the reterward, because he was desirous to make means for their evasion through the frights of that pass, and to that purpose valiantly received the charge of the enemies, his horse fell and cast him at once: so as with his own fall and his horse lying upon him he had like to have gone away in a swoon: a man now threecore years old and ten: and withal, newly crept abroad and recovered of a long and lingering disease, which might rightly waite and consumed the strength of his body. Well, thus lay he along, and the enemies ran over him: and so soon as they knew who he was, they reared him upon his feet from under his horse, no less respective than if he had been their own General in regard of a reverence they bare unto the man, and in remembrance of his noble exploits: they brought him again to himself, and forth of that by-valley standing out of the pass, they carried him into the high way: and were so far possessed and overcome with joy & unexpected, that they could not well believe their own eyes that they had gotten him. Some dispatched away courtiers to Messene with the news thereof: namely, that the war was brought to an end, considering that Philopœmen was taken and was their prisoner. At first the tidings seemed so incredible, that the foremost messenger was held not only for a vain liar, but also for one not well in his wits: but after that there came one after another, and all with one voice verified and affirmed the same at length it was believed. And then, see what they did! before they knew for certain that he approached near unto the City: they all ran forth of the gates by heaps to see the man: all (I say) bond as well as free, women and children one with another. In so much, as the gates were choaked up with the thrust and throng of the press: for no man could believe assuredly it was true, the thing was so strange, unless he might see him with his own eyes. They that had the charge of bringing him, found much ado to put by the multitude whom they encountered, and to enter in at the gate: and so thick they stood in the press, that they took up all the wayes besides, so as he could not be brought forth to be seen. Now became the most part of the people might not possibly have a sight of him. They gat up all at once into the Theatre, which stood near unto the way, and pelted it full and with one voice they cried aloud, That he might be brought thither and presented unto the view of the whole people. The Magistrates and principal citizens, fearing lest the compassion that might arise in mens hearts upon the beholding of so worthy a personage, would raise some trouble and commotion: whiles some comparing the reverence of his former authority and Majesty, with his present condition and calamity: and others calling to remembrance his manifold dejects and passing good turns, might haply be touched with pity: let him a far off in the open sight of them all, and then at once took him hastily out of their view: for their Pretor Demetrius gave out openly and said, That the Magistrates were to enquire and demand certain points of him as touching the main issue of the civil war. Then he was brought into their Council-Chamber, where their Senat assembled and began to consult about him. It was now well toward evening; and so far off they were from resolving in other matters, that they could not bethink themselves and agree, in what place they might keep him that one night in safeguard. Astonied they were and amazed, to consider and think upon the greatness of his estate past, and of his noble virtue and valour: and no man durst receive the charge and custody of him in his own house, nor trust any one besides with his keeping. At length some there were, that put them in mind of the publick treasury of the City, vaulted under the ground like a dungeon, and walled all about with strong square stone. Into it was he let down bound as he was, and a mighty huge stone (being the cover of the vault) was by an engine laid over, to enclose him sure. Thus reposing more truit for his safe custody in that place than in any person, they waited and attended the next morning. When morning day was come, the whole entire multitude in general, recommending the benefits and good turns done of old by him to their City, were of mind to pardon and spare him, and by his means and mediation, to seek for remedies and redress of their present distresses and calamities. But those persons by whose motive and inducement the Messenians had revolted (and such were they as ruled all the common-weal) consulted apart in secret, and concluded with one consent to punish to death: only the doubt and question was, whether they should do the thing with speed, or by delay. But those prevailed in the end, who were more greedy of present revenge, and so they let one unto him with a draught of poison. When he had taken the cup in his hand (by report) he gave not a word, but only asked, whether Lycortas (the other General of the Achæans) were called alive, and the foresaid horrid fate? When answer was made, that they were in safety: This he happy, (quoth he) and therewith drunk off every drop in the cup right heartily, and a while after yielded up his vital breath. But long joyed they not of his death who were the bloody authors of this cruelty: for the City of Messene being conquered by force of arms, among other captivities, delivered these malefactors into the hands of the Achæans, who demanded presently to have them. The bones and reliques of Philopomen were likewise rendred unto them, and interred he was by the general Council of all Achæa, in such solemn wife, that in heaping upon him all honours that could be devised for an earthly man, they forbore not also to adore him as a God-immortal. The Historiographers as well Greek as Latine, attribute so much unto this man, that some of them have recommended to posterity (as a memorable thing of all others that hapned this year) to wit, that in this one year there died three renowned Captains, Philopomen, Antibal, and P. Scipio. See how they have matched him in equality with the greatest warriors and nobilit Generals of the two most puissant nations in the whole world!

Then came T. Quintius Flaminius in enbassage to King Prusias, whom the Romans had in suspicion and jealousy, both for that he had received Antibal after the flight of Antiochus, and also because he made war upon Eumenes. Now were it that among other matters Flaminius charged Prusias, that he entertained in his court the most implacable enemy of all men living, unto the people of Rome: who first followed his own native country to take arms against the Romans, and after the force and power thereof was abated and defeated, persuaded King Antiochus to do the like: or rather that Prusias of his own accord to gratify Flaminius there present, and to do the Romans a pleasure, had a meaning and intent either to kill Antibal, or to deliver him alive into their hands. I wot not how it came about, but upon the first communication and conference between them, there were souldiers sent incontinently to beset and guard his house. Antibal evermore forsaith in mind some such issue and end of his life, seeing the deadly and insupportable hatred that the Romans bare unto him: reposing besides no confidence at all in the fidelity of these Kings, and having withal some experience already of the inconstancy and levity of King Prusias. Moreover, he had in horroir this coming of Flaminius, as fatal unto him, and as mean to M work his final destruction. To the end therefore he might be ever provided aforehand against those inconveniences and dangers, wherewith on all sides he was encumbered, and have a ready way of evasion to save himself, he had devised and caused to be made seven dores for egress out of his house: whereof some were very privy and secret vaults, because they should not be environed with guards. But Kings commandments are of that force, that whatsoever they would have to be searched out and discovered, cannot lie long hidden. For the guards so compassed and enclosed the whole circuit of the house, that it was impossible for any to get forth and make an escape. Antibal being advertised that the Kings souldiers were at the gate, assailed to steal away at a postern, which stood furthest out of the way, and wherof the conveyance was most secret; but perceiving that the souldiers had beted it too, and lay for to encounter and receive him that way. N and that every place was invellied with a set guard, he called for the poison which he had of long time before ready prepared for all such occurrent occasions, and uttered these words withal, "Let us rid these Romans of this their continual fear and pain wherein they have been all this while, since that they think it so long to stay for the death of one of man. Flaminius shall obtain no great nor memorable victory of me, disarmed thus as I am, and betrayed into his hands. But this very day shall prove and testify, how far the people of Rome are degenerate and changed from their ancient manners. Their forefathers (quoth he) advertised King Pyrrhus their enemy armed in field, and lying with an host of men against them in Italy, they gave him warning I lay to take heed of poison: but these living at this day, have sent their Embassadors, even one that hath born the dignity of a Consul, to advise and counsel Prusias wickedly to take the life away of his own guest. Then after he had cursed the person of Prusias and his whole realm, and called upon the Gods protectors of the law of hospitality, to bear witness how he had violated his faith and broken promise with him, he fer the cup of poison to his mouth, and drank it off. This was the end of Antibal, Polibius and Rutilius write that Scipio also died this year. But I accord neither with them nor with Valerius. From them I square, because I find that when M. Porcius and L. Valerius were Censors, the same L. Valerius being Censor, was elected President of the Senate, where-

Antibal.

As Africanus had been President for ten years space together, during the time of two reviews by Censors next before: And so long as the said Africanus lived, there would have been no other chosen President in his room, unless himself were to have been called and deprived of the Senatorial dignity, of which disgrace and loss of infamy, there is not one that maketh any mention. And as for Valerius Maximus, he is sufficiently rebuted by M. Navius a Tribune of the Commons, against whom there is an Oration extant, and the same penned by P. Africanus, and bearing his name. This Navius is recorded in the rolls and registers of Magistrates, by the title of Tribune of the Commons in that year when P. Claudius and L. Porcius were Consuls, but he entered into his office during the Consulship of App. Claudius and M. Sempronius, the tenth of December. From which time unto the fifteenth of March are three months, upon which day Pub. Claudius and L. Porcius began their Consulship: So it seemeth that he was living during the Tribuneship of Navius, and that he might well commit an action against him, and call him to his answer, but he departed this life before that L. Cato and M. Porcius were Censors. But in my conceit the death of these three (the most renowned personages each one of their own nation) are not to be compared one with another in this regard, that they hapned all just at one time more than for this, that none of them all had an end correspondent and answerable to the poorly fate and glorious liture of his life. For first and foremost in this they all jumped together, that they neither died nor were entered in their native country. Again, Antibal and Philopomen were both poisoned. Antibal was banished and betrayed by his own friend and host, Philopomen was taken prisoner and left his life in prison and iron. As for Scipio, although he was neither exiled nor condemned, yet making default of appearance at the day assigned unto him and being cited to his answer in his absence, willingly banished himself only for his life time, but his corps and unerals also after his death.

Whiles those affairs passed in Peloponnesus (from whence our pen hath a little diverted and digressed) the return of Demetrius and the Embassadors into Macedon, diversly wrought in mens minds, and amuled them some in one thing, and some in another. The common people of Macedon, who were mightily afraid that the Romans would make war upon them, highly affected Demetrius, and cast a favourable aspect upon him as the author of peace, and withal they delighted him without all doubt to the Kingdom after the decease of his father. For albeit he were younger than his brother Perseus, yet men thought and spake, that he was begotten in matrimony by Philip of his lawful wife: whereas he had Perseus by a concubine, who carried no token and mark of a certain father, as having to his mother a woman that was nought of her body and common. Whereas Demetrius resembled his father Philip, and was as like him as might be. Moreover, men said, that the Romans would place and establish Demetrius in the Royal throne of his father, but Perseus was in no credit and reputation among them. Thus folk stuck not to give out abroad in their common talk. Whereupon not only Perseus was in care and doubt, that the preeminence of age only would little boot and advantage him, considering in all respects else he was inferior to his brother, but Philip also himself, supposing verily that it would hardly lie in his power to leave the inheritance of the crown to whom he pleased, thought that his younger son was a more in hisue, and troubled him more than was for his ease. Offered otherwhiles he was, that the Macedonians resorted unto him so much as they did, and highly displeased that there should be any more royal courts than one in his realm, during his life. And to speak a truth, the young Prince himself returned from Rome more puffed up, no doubt with pride than was becoming: as who presumed and grounded much upon the opinion that the Senat had of him, perceiving that they had granted those things to him which had been denied unto his father before: but look how much a haiver and honor (in respect of the Romans) he won among the rest of the Macedonians, so much envy and ill will he procured himself thereby not only with his brother, but with his father also: and especially after that other Roman Embassadors were arrived, and that Philip was forced to part with Thracia and withdraw his garisons, and to do other things either by vertue of the old award of the first commissioners, or by a new ordinance of the Senat. Well he performed all but with an heavy heart and many a deep sigh and groan, and so much the rather, because he observed and saw how his son Demetrius converted more with the Embassadors, and frequented their company oftner than his. Howbeit he obeyed, and did whatsoever was enjoined him by the Romans; because he would minuter unto them no occasion of levying war against him out of hand. And supposing it was good policy to avert their minds from all suspicion that he minded any such designs tending that way, he led his army into the midst of Thracia against the Odryans, Damabets, and Bessians. He won the City Philippopolis abandoned by the inhabitants who were fled, and had retired themselves with their whole families to the high mountains next adjoining: and after he had wasted the Lands and territories of the Barbarians that inhabited the champaign country, he received them under his subjection by composition. Afterwards, having left a garison at Philippopolis, which soon after was chased and expelled by the Odryans, he determined to build a Town in Deuriopis, a region of Pannonia near the river Erissonus, which issueth out of Nitricum, and keeping his course through Pannonia discharged it itself, and falleth into the river Alpeus. Not far from Scoba the old City, he built a new and caused it to be called Perseus thereby to honour to his eldest son Perseus.

During the train of these affairs in Macedon, the Consuls took their journey into their several Provinces. Marcellus sent a messenger before him to L. Porcius the Pro-consul, to give him to understand that he should present his legions before the new Town of the Gauls. But at the first approach approach of the Consul, the Frenchmen yielded the place. Twelve thousand they were that were arms, and most of them had by force gotten their surname out of their country villages, which were taken from them among their hearts, with all things else, that either they had gotten out of the country by pillaging and robbing, or brought with them of their own. Whereupon they added their Embassadors to Rome, to make complaints of these abuses and wrongs: And when audience was given in the Senat by C. Valerius the Pretor, declared, how by escalation that Gaul was charged with a multitude of people, they were constrained as well for want of ground and possessions, as also for need and poverty, to pass over the Alps and seek themselves some place of habitation. And where they saw any quarters forsaken, desolate, and unpeopled, there they had planted themselves, without offering injury to any person: where also they had begun to build towns, which might be a good proof and argument, that they came not to do violence upon any City or Country Village. And now of late M. Claudius had sent unto them a message, that unless they submitted and yielded, he would war upon them: whereupon they preferring certain peace (although it were less honorable) before the doubtful hazard & adventures of war, surrendered rather to be in the protection and safeguard, than under the subjection of the people of Rome. But a few daies after, they were commanded to quit both City and Country. And thereupon resolved in their mind to depart in silence and saying never a word, into what place soever they could, there to seek their fortune: but then they were disarmed, yea, and spoiled and stripped of all that in they had, and nothing left, that either they drove before them, or carried about them. In regard whereof, they were humble suppliants to the Senat and people of Rome, that they would not proceed in more rigour and cruelty against them, harmless persons as they were, and submitting themselves unto them, than against professed enemies. To this Oration of complaint the Senat caused this answer to be returned: That neither they had done well in coming into Italy, and promising to build them a City upon other mens territories, without permission of the sovereign Roman Magistrat, who had the government of those parts: nor yet the Senat was well pleased, that they should be thus depouled, considering they had yielded. And therefore minded they were to lead with them their Embassadors to the Consuls, to command them in their name, to see that all their own goods should be restored again unto them, so that they made return thither from whence they came: who also should go forward immediately over the Alps, to give the States of France warning to keep in their people with them, and hold them in their native country: for although the Alps were the frontier limits standing in the midst to confine between them, and therefore those mountains neither ought nor might be passed of one side or the other: and to make account of this, that they should speed no better now in transgressing their bounds, than at what time they first made a way and passage over them into Italy. The Embassadors employed about this business, were L. Furius Purpureus, Q. Minutius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. Thus the French Ambassadors made unto them of all that was their own by good right, and without wrong of others, departed out of Italy. Now when these Roman Legats were come they had good words and courteous answer from the Transalpine Romans. And those amongst them that were more ancient than the rest, blamed the people of Rome for their overmuch lenity, in that they let those persons go, who without warrant from the whole State, durst be so bold as to take a voyage to leave upon any lands belonging to the Signory of Rome, and were so hardy as thereon to build a Town, surely they deserved not less than to abide grievous smart for their rash demeanor. Moreover and besides, whereas the Romans have given them their own goods again, they feared much that so great indulgency of theirs, would induce and encourage others to enterprise the like. So they friendly entertained and as kindly accompanied the Embassadors yea, and liberally presented them with rewards.

M. Claudius the Consul having thus expelled the Gauls out of his Province, began to lay the ground of the Ithrick war, and for this purpose wrote his letters unto the Senat, for a warrant and commission to pass with his legions into Isfria. The Senat was therewith contented. But whereas they were in question and consultation about conducting a Colony to inhabit Aquileia, they could not agree whom to send, whether Latins or Roman citizens. But in conclusion the Senat thought it better to plant there a Colony of Latins. The Triumphs for to effect this, were created P. Scipio Nasica C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus.

The same year were two Colonies of Roman citizens created at Mutina and Parma: and two thousand persons were to either place translated out of the territory which lately was occupied by the Boians, and before time had been in the tenure of the Tuscan. They of Parma were endowed with eight acres of land, and those of Mutina with five a peece. The Triumphal Commissioners who had the disposing and managing of the business, were M. Emilius Lepidus, T. Elicius Carus, and L. Quintus Crispinus. Likewise the colony Saevina consisting of Roman citizens, was brought into the territory of Calabria, by the conduct of Q. Fabius Laber, C. Afranius Stabius, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, deputed Triumphs theretore: who set out for every man ten acres of ground.

The same year A. Terentius the Pro-pretor, nor far from the River Iberus in the Aulestian country, fought fortunately against the Celiberians, and forced certain Towns which they had fortified. By Spain beyond Iberus was quiet this year, because both P. Sempronius the Propretor by sick of a long disease, and also the Lusitanians (as good hap was) rested still and quiet, as being nor man provoked to stir. Neither was there any memorable exploit achieved in Liguria by Q. Fabius the Consul, M. Marcellus was called home out of Isfria: and after he had discharged his army, returned to Rome for to hold the election of the Magistrats. For Consuls he created Cn. Balbus Tampilus and L. Emilius Paulus. This man had been Adile Curule together with M. Fulvius Lepidus, who was Consul five years before: and yet the late Lepidus suffered the repulse twice ere he was created Consul. Then were Pretors chosen, to wit, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, M. Valerius Maximus, L. Manlius the second time, M. Ogninus Gaius, L. Caelius Dentus, & C. Terentius Istra. In the very end of the year there was a solemn supplication holden by occasion of certain prodiges for men believed very that in the court yard of the goddess Concordia it rained blood for the space of two daies: and reported it was not far from Sicily, that a new Land was discovered out of the Sea, where never any was before seen. Valerius Antias writeth that Amulius died this year: and that to compass and work his death, there were sent in embassage to Prusias, L. Scipio Asiaticus, and P. Scipio N. fides, besides T. Quintus Flaminius, who in that action is named moit.

The fortieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fortieth Book.

When Philip had given commandment to make straight search for the children of those whom he kept in prison, and personages they were of most noble birth, for to put them to death: Theoxena being the King's most malicious intent, and wicked lust, in the behalf as well of her own children, as of her illegitimate ones (God not) and very young infants, brought forth and offered unto the said children naked by her death, which after she had obtained and seen effected, she likewise placed her own pare, and slew herself. Moreover in this book are related the debate and variance between Pericles and Demetrius, the two sons of Philip King of Macedony: and how Demetrius came to his death by poison, through the misfortune of his brother Pericles, who devised false crimes and raised slanders against him: and accepted among the vessels, which he intended to kill his own father, and meant to usurp the Kingdom & list of all, because he was a friend to the people of Rome: by which means after the death of Pericles obtained the crown. Also it containeth the happy exploits achieved by many and diverse commanders in Liguria, and in Spain against the Celiberians. The books of Numa Pompilius were by certain husbandmen as they laboured in the ground of L. Petilius a Notary, under the Janiculum, found out of a with a coffer of stone, and written both in Latine and Greek. And when the Pretor of the City whom the books were brought, had perused them, and found therein many points tending to overthrow religion and the divine services of the Gods, he swore before the Senat, that it was dangerous for the State and common wealth, that they should be read and preserved: in such sort, that by an Act of the Statutes were burned within the Comitium or Hall of public assemblies. The Colony Aquileia was created. Philip exceedingly displeased with himself, and pricked with remorse of conscience for that he had caused his son Demetrius to be poisoned, upon the self-suggested slanders and accusations of his other son, and against him, devised to punish Pericles, and rather to confer the Kingdom upon Antigonus his friend, than that his son should succeed him: but in this designment and purpose of his he suddenly died: and so Pericles took the crown and Kingdom upon him.

In the beginning of the year next ensuing, the Consuls and Pretors cast lots for their several governments. As for the Consuls, there was no other Province to employ them in but Liguria. The civil jurisdiction among citizens, fell to M. Ogninus Gallus, and the foreign over strangers to P. Lollius. L. Caelius Dentus had the governance of Sicily, and C. Terentius Istra of Sardinia. The Consuls were employed to take mutters: for Q. Fulvius had written out of Liguria, that the Aconians in lined to rebellion, and early to be feared it was, that they would break out and make noise into the territory of Pisa. And well they knew already, that of the two Provinces of Spain, the higher parts were in arms, and the war with the Celiberians was still in trimme, and as for the lower the military discipline there was clean corrupt and gone, by reason of riotous pleasures and idles were upon the son diers were wholly given, by occasion that the Pretors lay long in Isfria. For this cause thought good it was that new armies should be levied and enlisted to wir four legions for Legatus, and every one of them to contain 5200 foot and 300 horse: unto which there was an addition of 15000 footmen, and 900 men of arm from out of the Latine allies. And these two armies were to serve the Consuls. But over and besides, they were commanded to enrol 7000 foot, and 600 horse men of Latine allies, and them to send into Francia to M. Marcellus, who was to continue still in pace of command, after the term of his Confin this expired. Likewise they had in charge to levy of Roman Citizens 4000 footmen and 200 horse, and of allies 7000 of the one and 300 of the other to be conducted into both Provinces of Spain. And Q. Fabius the Consul had his commission of government renewed for one year longer, with the charge of the army which he had in Liguria.

The

"gainst me so as you do, for discovering the ambush set for me, and complaining thereof; but I
 "gainst him rather that laid in wait to surprise me: neither would you set so light and make "small account of my life, as to be moved neither for the danger past wherein I was, nor at the "peril to come, if such wait-layers may escape unpunished. Now if there be no remedy, but that we "must die and say nothing, let us hold our tongue and be mute: let us only pray to the Gods be"fore that this intended mischief begun in me, may also take an end in me alone, and that you be "not he, who is to be wounded and pierced through my body. But in case (like as by the very in"stinct and suggestion of nature, they that are allied and set upon in a desert wilderness, be "taught to implore and call for help and succour, although they neither saw nor knew of "any before) in case (I say) it be lawful for me likewise to open my mouth and speak, when I see
 "the naked sword drawn upon me: then I beseech you for your own love, even for the love of I
 "your good self, and the name of a father (which whether of us twain have more esteemed and "regarded, you have full well known long ago) to give me audience, and to hear me as if you had "been awakened at my cry and pitiful lamentation in the last nights riot, and came in the way
 "where I was forced to call, help, help: and as if you had taken Demetrius in the manner, with-
 "in my gate, in the very entry of my door, accompanied with armed men, at an undecent and un"due hour of this night past. Those plaints and moans which then I would have uttered by way "of disordered and confused cries, in that sudden fright of mine upon the deed doing the same
 "I now make the morrow alter. Ah brother, we have lived now a good while, not (I wot) as "brethren that should banquet and make merry one with another. It is the crown that you look
 "alter, that is certain and past peradventure: but your hope to attain unto it, is crossed divers
 "waies. My birthright and mine eldership is a block in your way, between you and the law of "nations is against it: the ancient custom of the Macedonians, lotheth it: and finally, the will,
 "pleasure, and judgment of our father is opposite unto it. Mount you cannot possibly to high, but "by the effusion of my heart blood. You go to work, you assay all means, you leave no stone un-
 "rolled, and nothing unattempted to effect that: but to this day, either mine own way diligence "or happy fortune, hath guarded me and withheld your wicked parricide. Even yesterday, du"ring the time of the solemn review and purging of the army, during the time of running at tilt
 "and jousting, in time of the shew and pastime resembling a skirmish, you mislaid very little of a "king a bloody battail of it and a deadly conflict indeed: and nothing else saved me from death,
 "but this, that I suffered my self and my men to go by the worke and be overcome. From this mar-
 "tiall combat, as if it had been no more but a game and sport among brethren, you would needs "have trained and drawn me to a supper. Why? think you father, that I should have supped a"mong those guests unarmed, who came in arms to banquet with me? Do you believe, that I should "have been in no danger of their naked swords of steel at night when in the day time and within "your sight, laid on such load with wooden swords and batons, that they had like to have kil"led me? To what end else came you brother, at that time of the night? why came you as an ene"my, considering I was in choler and my blood was up: wherefore came you accompanied with "tall fellows privily armed and with short swords under their garments? I durst not venture to sit "at supper with you: should I have received you then, coming as you did with armed men to ban"quet with me? Father, if the door had been opened: whereas you hear me now to make my com"plaints, you should have been by this time busied about my winding-sheet, heere, and funeral.
 "I lay not forth and urge matters in slanderous manner, alter the fashion of these accusers at the "forum: neither collect I bare conjectural presumptions to enforce & conclude any doubtful points:
 "for what need I so to do? Denieth he that he approached my door with a troop of men: that he "had in his train a company, such as wore weapons covertly under their apparel? Do not feed "for them whom I shall name. But in faith, what will not they dare to do, that can do this? and "yet I trow, they will never be so hardy and shameless as to deny it. If I had taken them in "manner with their weapons about them within mine entry, and so brought them before you,
 "then you would say, it were a plain case and out of all doubt. If then, they confess as much with "their mouth, hold them as culpable as if they had been surprised in the act doing. Now come
 "and spare not: the greedy appetite and thirst after a Kingdom: now fall to raise and call up the "furies out of hell to set brethren together by the ears: but, good father, let not your cries and
 "exclamations thus flie at blind random: make some distinction yet and difference, between him "that lyeth in await, and the party who is foreslaid. Let him be holden guilty, that sought to kill "his brother, let him feel withal the gods of his father to be his enemies and angry against him.
 "But as for him who was in danger to lose his life through his brothers mischievous practice, let "him have his release and recourse to the mercy and justice of his father. For alas, whether else "should I flie for succour? seeing that neither the solemn review and purging of your army, nor the "running and jousting of the men at arms, neither mine own house nor my table, nor yet the very "night season (which nature hath given to mankind for covert & repose) affordeth me safety and "security? If I go to my brother (being hidden to supper) did I shall: if I receive my brother with-
 "in my doors (coming to banquet) did I must. So that whether I go or I stay all is one: I cannot a"void but fall into trains and ambushes, laid for to take away my life. To what place shall I retire "and bethke my self? None have I regarded, nothing have I relied upon, but the gods & your good "self, father. As for the Romans, I stand in no such terms with them of grace and favour as to trust "upon their succour: nay, they all with me charged, because I take the wrongs done unto you by "them;

"them, to the heart; because I shew my self discontented and touched with the indignity that to
 "many Cities, so many nations are plucked from you and namely, that of late they have deploied
 "and bereaved you of all their maritime parts and coasts of Thrace: and so long as either you or
 "I live, they never look to enjoy Maccedony. But it by the mischievous practice of my brother, I "might once be rid out of the way: and whilst it old age had made an end of you, yeas, and perad-
 "venture before that day came, (which they would never stay to long for) then they know well
 "and make full account, that both the King and Kingdom of Maccedony will be theirs ere long,
 "I dede if the Romans had spared any piece at all without Maccedony, I should have thought and "made reckoning, that it had been a place of retreat and refuge left for me. But what need that, so "long as I have strength enough among the very Macedonians. You saw your self yesterday how "violently the soldiers charged upon me: what wanted they but the sharp sword and edged
 "weapons, with which they failed and mislaid of in the day time my brothers banqueters met "with in the night. For what should I speak of the greater part of the nobility? they have groun"ded and built all their hopes of dignity, promotion, and advancement, in the Romans, and na"mely in him who now can do all in all with them and is of greatest reputation. And surely, to "speak a truth, him they prefer not only before me his elder brother, but also they go within a "very little to let him before your self, his liege King and natural father. For this is he, for whose "love and in favour of whom, the Senat hath remitted and pardoned you that penalty which you "had incurred, this is he, who now protecteth you from the force of Roman armies: who de-
 "meth it meet and reason that your old age should be obliged and beholden to his youth. For him "stand all the Romans with him take part all those Cities which are delivered and free from your "subjection: of him hold the Macedonians that wish for peace with the Romans, and take con"tentment therein. Now for me, father, what hope or help can I have elsewhere but in you alone?
 "Wherein think you tend those letters of Quintus lately unto you? wherein he writeth, That "you did passing well for your own estate, in sending Demetrius to Rome: and exhorter you with-
 "all to send him again the second time, accompanied with more Embassadors, and thole the very "principal and best of all the Macedonians? This T. Quintus (if you will needs know the reason) "is the man, who leadeth, induceth, and directeth him at this present in all things: he is his coun"sellor and school-master. And Demetrius hath rejected and cast you off his own father, & hath "put him in your stead. There it is, where all these privy plots have heretofore been fitted contrived
 "and set a hatching: and at this present in willing you to send more in embassy, and thole the "chief persons of the Macedonians: with him, he seeketh nought else but helpers and assistants "to put those designs in execution. As many as go forth hence to Rome, be they never so bound & "unconcerned at their setting out, be they loyal subjects and acknowledging no other but Philip for "their King, return from thence tainted and infected with the alluring enticements of the Ro"mans. Demetrius alone is altogether in their books. They are all for him, and pass for none else.
 "Him they call their King, during the life of his own father. Now if I seem to be touched, offend"ed and grieved herewith, by and by I am sure to have it charged reproachfully on both sides of "mine ears, not only from others, but also from your mouth father, that I aspire and seek to be "King. For mine own part, I would both they and you knew, that if the diadem and crown were "here let between us both, I would none offer. For who is he, that I should need to undermine & "uproot, for to step into his place and succeed? None there is at all but my father before me, and "long may he so be. I pray God, and I wish to survive him no otherwise, but if I be worthy and "deserve that he should likewise desire the same. If my father will make me his heir and inheritor
 "of the Kingdom, I will accept thereof. He indeed coveteth to be a King, yeas, and ungraciously co-
 "veteth it, who hath need to make pace forward, and to step before the course of nature, the order "of age, the custom of the Macedonians, and the law of nations. But what imagineth Demetrius, "suppose yet Mine elder brother (thinketh he) stands in my way between me and home; to him
 "appertaineth the Kingdom by right and by my fathers will: Let us rid him out of the World;
 "What! am not the first that fought to be a King by murder of a brother. As for my father he is "aged, he is desolat, and bereaved of a son: he will have more care to look to his own person, than "to revenge the death of his son. The Romans, they will rejoice, they will approve and "maintain my fact. These be nice points, and these be ticklish and doubtful hopes, but believe me
 "rather, they are not altogether vain and frivolous. For thus stands the case, and this is the sum of "all: Well may you preserve me out of danger, now whilst I am alive, by inflicting punishment "upon thole who take warning in hand to kill me: but let their enterprise speed once, and take ef"fect, you shall never be able to pursue them to the purpose and revenge my death.
 "When Perseus had made an end of his speech, they that were present in place cast their eyes wil-
 "ly upon Demetrius: as if he would have made answer immediately, and so were all silent a long time,
 "and did not a word: for they perceived evidently that he could not for weeping open his mouth: a
 "bow in the end he was urged by them to speak, and then after that necessity had furnished his "Grief, thus he began, "My father, all thole means of help which were ever wont to serve the defend"ers in good stead, I am prevented and disappointed of, by the plaintiff my accuser. By thole fail"ed and failed tears of his, wrong out and shed to work the ruin and undoing of another, he hath "made my true tears (supposed, which gnishing out of mine eyes, proceed from a melting & wound"ed heart within. And whereas himself hath not ceased, (ever since that I returned from Rome) to
 "to trouble secretly with his comforts and complices both night and day to lay wait for my life,

The Oration
 of Demetrius in his own defence, before his father.

"now he begins first with me, and will needs put upon me the visor, and have the world believe that I play the part not only of a secret and cunning wait-lair, but of an open thief and a notorious murderer and cut-throat. He seemeth to fright you with his own danger, that he might make even you the very means and instrument to hasten forward the death of his innocent brother. He saith that he hath no place of refuge in the whole world: to the end that I might have no parcel at all of hope left, so much as in you. Thus circumvented as I am, left alone, forsaken, destitute and void of all succour, he chargeth me with being in favour and grace with foreign strangers: a thing I wis, that doth me more harm than good. Moreover, see how he procedeth like a practised and cunning barrister, in that he interteth and minglith the last nights work together with the blame of my former life: to the end that he might make more suspicious by the course of mine other years passed, this criminous matter also (the simple truth whereof you shall know anon) and withal confirm and maintain this vain surmise and slander, of my hopes, my will, and intended designs, by this subtle invention of his, by the fained & forged fable I say of that which was pretended the night that was. He hath not failed moreover to make you believe that this accusation of his was not premeditated and studied upon beforehand, but framed extempore, and occasioned only upon the suddain fright and trouble overnight. But in good faith, Perseus I have been a traitor to the King my father & the realm, if I had comploted with the Romans and other of my fathers enemies, me thinks you should not have waited for this nights devised tale, but you ought to have accused me before this time, of treason. And if that imputation were vain and frivolous without this surmise, and served to discovey and bewray your envy & spite which you bear against me, more than it doth detect any crime which is in me; yet you should have clearly seen whether of us twain laid wait for the other, you or I, upon a strange & extraordinary manner of hatred. As for me (so far forth as I possible can, in this suddain trouble of my spirit) I will endeavour to speak severally of each point, which you have heaped up together so disorderly, and reveal I will the ambushes and trains of this night, yours or mine, fall out as it shall. He would have it thought that I practised to kill him, for this intent forsooth, that when mine elder brother were once made away, unto whom the inheritance of the crown appertained by the law of nations, by the custom of the Macedonians, and also, as he saith, by your judgment: I the younger might step into his place, and succeed him whom I had killed. What meaneth then, and wherto serveth that other part of his Oration, wherein he saith, that I have been so respectful to the Romans, and that upon the assurance that I have in them, I hoped to be King? For if I were persuaded thus of the Romans, that they could set up whom they pleased to be King of Macedonia: & if withal I presumed of what of their good grace and favor to me-ward, what need had I then to commit a parricide? Was it because I had a mind to wear a diadem embued with my brothers blood by me murdered: and was I desirous to make my self odious & execrable among them, with whom either for mine honesty indeed, or at least waies for a countenance I then desired of I have won some credit, such as it is, if haply it be any at all? Unless perhaps, you think that T. Quintus (by whose virtue and counsel, you reproach me that I am ruled) advised me to kill my brother Quintus, I say, who is so kind unto his own brother, and liveth with him so lovingly. This plaintive & accuse of mine hath collected not only the affection of the Romans which they bear unto me, but also the opinion which the Macedonians have of me, yea, and in manner the consent of all Gods and men in my behalf: in which regards all he took himself the same to match me in this quarrel and difference about the Kingdom: and yet see, how the faine man saith to my charge, that as if I were in all other respects, inferior unto him, I was faine to have recourse to this last shift of practising mischief and wickedness. Will you have this to be the case? Will you be content to join issue in this point? That whether of us twain feared the other to be reputed worthier of the Kingdom, he should be judged & condemned to have sought and contrived the death of his brother? But let us discuss and examine in some sort or other, the order and manner of this pretended and devised crime. He hath burdened me, that I have laid him many and sundry waies; yet hath he knit up all these means and conched them together in one daies work. I purposed to kill him (saith he) in the open day-light, after the solemn review and allotting of the army even when we jousted together, and seemed to charge one another in battle: yea upon the very day (God he knoweth) of the said solemnity. I intended thus (believe him) you will) when I invited him to supper, to make him away with a cup of poison. I would have stabbed him (what else?) or run him through with my sword, when I came to banquet with him & was accompanied with some of my train armed and having weapons about them. You see, father, what proper and choice opportunities I had picked out to commit this pretended murder: namely the very day of disports, the time of supper, of banquet and collation. As for the day, let us examine it and the manner thereof: was it any other than that, wherein the army was surveied and solemnly purged? when between a sacrifice cut in twain, the royal coats of all the arms of Macedonian Kings that ever had been, were carried aloft in a stately show; and we alone your two sons (father) marched on either side of you before the rest, and the whole Macedonian army followed after. When I was thus cleansed and purified by this expiatory sacrifice (if haply I had committed any sin before that deserved expiation) and especially at the very same instant when I beheld before mine eyes (on either side of the way) the parcels of the beast sacrificed: entertained I then in my thoughts the practise of poison, & the handling of swords pre-

"pared aforehand against the banker, to perform a parricide? that afterwards I might with some other sacrifice expiate and cleanse my conscience thus stained & defiled with all kind of wickedness? A likely matter truly. But a spirit corrupt & blinded with the humour of slandering another, upon a desire to gather matter and make all suspicious, careth not to huddle one thing upon another confusedly. For if I meant to have poisoned you at supper, what was there more unfit to let forward that design, than to provoke you to anger, by running so eagerly upon you & fighting with you so roughly, that thereby you might take good and just occasion to refuse being requested, for to come to supper? And when in your choler you had once denied to sup with me, was it not the next way for me then, to endeavour how to appease you, and seek some other opportunity, since I had prepared the poison for that present only? But I must leap from that design, to segment to another, even to the killing of you by the sword, and that upon the very same day, under a pretence of banquetting with you? If I thought that for fear of death you forbore my table at supper time, how comes it that I imagined not sensibly, that for the laid tear you would avoid my company at banquet after supper? There is no cause why I should be ashamed, Father, if upon such a festival day as it was I drank wine liberally, and took perhaps a cup too much among my companions. Nay, I would it might please your majesty to enquire with what mirth, and merriment I feasted yesterday at home in my house, and this joy let us the farther out, because that that warlike pastime of lusty youths, our side went not by the worse. But this misery & unhappiness fear upon that our mirth, hath well delayed and cooled the wine; I spent it at the strength thereof summing up into our heads: which if it had not come between, we as great laiers await as we were, had to this hour lien sound asleep in our beds. Well, if I had minded to assail and disperse your house, and that done to murder you the master thereof, would I not think you, have I born for my part one day to bib and quaff wine, to freely and likewise kept my soldiers from drinking drunk? But because I should not alone plead my simplicity and make my excuse thereby, this my good brother also, who God wot is none of these naughty and suspicious creatures, comes in with his vie and faith, I know nothing, I charge nobody, neither wot I what to say, but that they came armed to banquet with me. If I might be so bold as to ask how you came to that knowledge, you cannot chuse but confess that either my house was full of your spies, or those armed men of my train took their weapons so openly, that every one law them. And because he would have you believe, that neither himself made any enquiry before, nor at this time pursueth the matter with any accusatory spirit, he willed you to demand of them whom he named, whether they had not their swords about them? to the end that after you had sought into it a matter doubtful, and found them to confess it, they might thereby be held convicted. But why rather will you not, that examination should be taken in this manner: whether they took their swords with them to kill you or no? And whether they did so by your warrant, directly, or indirectly? For this is it that you (brother) would make the world believe, this is it which you would have to appear, and not that which my men confess. But the case is plain, yea, & they will be known no other, than that they were armed in their own defence. Whether they were well or ill done, they are of age to make account and render a reason of their doings. Do not you mingle my cause with that action of theirs, which interteth it nothing at all. But rather declare, whether we meant to assail you openly or secretly? If openly, why were we not all armed? why was there none of us besides those persons that did bear your spite? If secretly, what was the train and order of the execution of that design? After the banker ended, and I the fester of the banker retired from thence, should those four have staid behind to fall upon you when you were asleep? How could they have carried it so close as not to be spied, for that a little before, they had been in a brawl? And say, they had killed you: by what means could they escape themselves? Was it possible that your house should be forced and kept with four swords? Fie, fie at the heart, which kindly your envy and setteth you on fire, How cometh it to pass, O Demetrius, that men speak abroad that you shall be King? why should you be deemed of some more worthy than my self, to succeed the royal estate of my father? How is it that I am in doubt of my hope, which but for you, were sure & certain? These are the secret thoughts of Perseus, although he saith nothing: these make him of a brother to become an enemy: these cause him to be mine accuser: these conceits be that fill your palace your court and your realm, with surmises, slanders, and suspicions. But for mine own part, father, like as I ought neither to hope for your royal crown, nor at any time peradventure, to make words and dispute about it; because I am the younger, and because it is your will and pleasure, that I should give place unto mine elder brother, for so it became me not heretofore, neither doth it become me yet, to demean my self (to in any action that I should seem unworthy to have you for my father, but to be capable of all dignities whatsoever. The one point I should attain unto by indirect courtes and wicked vices, in not yielding unto him, as right and reason would: but the other, by my good carriage and sober behaviour. You reproach me with the Romans, brothers and those things which in right ought to be unto my praise and glory, you blame and reprove me for. It was no feeling of mine, that I was delivered to the Romans as an hostage, or sent to Rome as Ambassador: but when I was appointed by you, father I refused not to go. At both times, such was my demeanor, that I had an eye full and good regard, not to discredit either your highness, or your Kingdom, or the Macedonian nation. And therefore you were the cause, father, of that friendship which I have with the

"Romans, As long as you and they are at peace, I shall be well affected to them: begin war once, I that was an hostage and Ambassador among them, and (though I say it) not unprofitable for you my father, even I, will become a most spiteful and mortal enemy unto them. Neither do I see this day require, that the favour I have among the Romans might lead me any way to like speech you that it may not prejudice and harm me. It began not by occasion of war, neither is relieved for the time of war. For assurance of peace, I was a pledge and hostage: for maintenance of peace I was employed in embassy. Content will I be, by the one and the other, in case I neither pur. have fame nor incur blame. If I have committed any impiety against you fathers, I have done or designed any wicked part against my brother, I refuse no punishment. I crave no pardon or favor. If I be innocent, I desire only and humbly beseech your grace, that I be not overweighed with the heavy load of envy and ill will, since I can be overthrown by no crime justly I objected unto me. This is not the first day, that my brother hath accused me: but this is the first day, that he is seen to be my accuser: and full little have I deserved it at his hands. If my father had been displeased and angry with me, I would have thought that you of all others being the elder brother, should have been a mediator and intercessor for me (the younger) to my father, and means to purchase a pardon for my folly and the error of tender youth: but see! where my succour and refuge should have been, there contrary-wile is my ruin and overthrow. From my feasting and banqueting, from my mirth and good cheer, by his means have I been haled hither not halt waked, but with mine eyes full of sleep, to answer in the case of parricide: and forced I am to plead mine own cause without my counsel, without my proctor or advocate. If I had been to speak in the defence of another, I would have taken time to study, premeditate and time to make an oration. And yet, what was I to hazard there, but the reputation of wit and learning. Instead thereof I, not knowing for what cause I was sent for, heard your Majesty first (wroth and angry as you were) to command us to plead our causes: and then my brother, who hath stood up to accuse me. As for him, he hath pronounced an Oration (studied for, and devised long before hand): but I was allowed no longer time (than whilst I heard my self accused) to be think me what to plead: or to examine and take knowledge of the matter that he hath laid forth against me. In that present moment of time, could I, think you (so suddenly taken as I was) either give ear to my accuser, or consider and think duly of mine own plea? (I was, with that sudden trouble and unexpected occurrence, that much ado I had to understand what I was charged with: so far was I from devising what to speak in mine own defence. What hope should I have now in that what case were I, if I had not my father for my judge at whose hands (albeit I am not so well beloved as mine elder brother is, yet since I am the party defendant, I ought at leastwise to find as much pity and compassion. For I beseech you (O father) to save me, in regard of my self and you: but he requirerth you to take away any life, only for his own assurance and better security. And what will he do against me think you, after you have made over the crown and scepter into his hands: who now already thinketh it meet and reason, to dispose of my blood at his good pleasure? In uttering of these words the tears gushed forth so abundantly, that they stopped his mouth so, that he could neither speak or draw his breath. Then Philip after he had commended them to go apart, and communed a while with his friends, spake and said: That he would not decide their cause upon these words of theirs, nor upon one hours debating, but by enquiry into both their lives, and observing their behaviour in deed and word, as well in great matters as in small. Herewith they all saw well enough, that the accusation of the precedent nights act, was sufficiently refuted and evicted: and the only thing in Demetrius to be suspected, was the over-great favour that the Romans bare toward him. This was the very seed of the Macedonian war, as was one would say, during the life of Philip, but the war was after to be waged most of all against Pereus.

The two Consuls took their journey into Liguria, the sole consular Province of them both: and because they had achieved their exploits fortunately there, ordained there was a solemn procession on one day. It fortuned that there came two thousand Ligurians or thereabout to the utmost frontier of the Province of Gaul, where Marcellus lay in leaguers, requesting to be received under his protection. Marcellus after he had commanded the said Ligurians to give attendance upon him in the same place, required by his letters the advice of the Senat. The Senat gave order to M. Opimius the Lord chief Justice of the City, to write back again unto Marcellus to this effect. That it was more meet that the Consuls, unto whom that government appertained, should give order and determine (as touching the Ligurians who yielded and submitted) what was expedient for the common-weal in that behalf, than the Senat. As for them, if they were to give their opinion, they thought it not good to accept of the Ligurians (surrender: and being once received then to be diamled: but they were of this mind and advice, that it was requisite they should be sent and referred over to the Consuls.

The Pretors at the same time arrived in their Provinces, to wit P. Manlius in baile Spain, where O he had been Governor before during his former Pretorship; and Q. Fulvius Flaccus in the higher: where he received the army of Terentius; for that other side of Spain beyond Iberus, had been left without a Lord Deputy by occasion of the death of P. Sempronius the Pro-pretor. Whiles Fulvius Flaccus assaulted a Town in Spain named U-bicula, the Celtiberians made head and came upon him; where many and sundry hot skirmishes passed and wherein many Roman soldiers were both hurt and slain. Howbeit Fulvius held still his resolution, and by no forcible cible means whatsoever, could be brought to levy the siege. The Celtiberians toiled out of heart with divers combats, retired and departed. The City then seeing their favours dislodged and gone, within few daies was forced and ransacked; and the Pretor gave the pillage thereof to his soldiers. Thus Fulvius after he had gained this Town, and P. Manlius, when he had retired and raised his forces into one place, which had been dispeired, without any other memorable act performed, brought their armies within the wintering harbours. And there were the exploits in Spain, during that summer season. Terentius who was departed out of that Provin before, entered the City of Rome in a petty triumph. by way of ovation. He carried before him in shew, eight thousand three hundred and twenty pound weight of silver, and four score of gold: besides two golden coronets weighing 67 pound.

The same year the Romans were choien Arbitrators between the people of Carthage and King Masaniassa as touching their territories: and came personally to see the place in controversy. And thus stood the case: Gala the father of this Masaniassa, had won the ground in question from the Carthaginians. Syphax afterward disfeized Gala thereof: and consequently to gratify Africulus, his wives father, freely gave the same to the Carthaginians, and let them in possession again. Now last of all, even this very year, Masaniassa had dispossessed the Carthaginians of the same. This matter was debated by the parties of both sides in the prelen, e of the Romans, with no less courage and fervency of spirit, than at other times when they tried the issue by dint of sword in open field. The Carthaginians laid claim and put in their plea. For that first it appertained to their ancestors in right of inheritance, and afterwards was conveyed to them by their free gift and donation of Syphax. Masaniassa, counterpleaded again and alleged, that he had both recovered the said territory, as parcel of his fathers realm, and also held it by the law of nations: and that the case was clear on his side, in regard as well of the just title as also of the present possession where-in he was; saying, that in his cause he doubted nothing else but that the modesty of the Romans should prejudice him, for fear lest they might be thought to be partial in the cause and respective to him. A King their ally and good friend, and in favour of him to give up their award against the common enemies both to him and them. The Commissioners and arbitrators would not infringe and alienate the right of possession, but left all as they found it, and referred the entire decision of the matter to the Senat of Rome.

Nothing was there done after this in Liguria: for first, the enemies were retired for safety into D their wilds and forests out of the way: and afterwards they called their army, and dip away every gun to their own villages and castles. The Consuls likewise were willing to break up and dismiss their forces: and thereupon sent to the LL. of the Senat to know their pleasure at that point; who advised the one of them to discharge his own regiments, and repair to Rome; for the election of Magistrates the next year: and the other, with his legions, to winter at Pisa. At tumour there ran, that the Transalpine French put their youth and serviceable men in arms: but it was not known what quarter of Italy this multitude thus levied, would invade. But the Consuls thus agreed together, that Cn. Babius should be present at the general assembly at Rome, for the election aforesaid, because M. Babius his brother lived to be Consul. Then was the assembly holden for the creation of Consuls, and elected there were, P. Cornelius Lentulus, and M. Babius Tampilus. This done, the Pretors also were choien, namely, the two Quintii Fabii, the one Maximus, and the other Titus Claudius Nero. Q. Petilius Spathinus, M. Pinarius Posca and L. Duronius. When they were entered into their magistracy, the Provinces were by lot after this manner disposed. The Ligurians fell to the Consuls: as for the Pretors, Q. Petilius was Lord chief Justice for the citizens pleas, and Q. Fabius Maximus for the strangers: Q. Fabius Buteo had the government of Gaul, T. Claudius Nero of Sicilia, M. Pinarius of Sardinia, L. Duronius of Apulia together with the Illyrians; for that the Tarentines and Brundisins had given intelligence, that the sea-coasts were much troubled and annoyed by the robberies of pirates and men of war from beyond Sea: and the like complaints were made by the Messinians, of the Ligurian navy. For these causes order was given, and warrants were sent out to levy armies: that the Consuls should have four legions between them, containing in every one 5200 Roman footmen and 300 horse: also to enrol 15000 footmen and 800 horsemen of Latine allies. In the Provinces of Spain (both the one and the other) the old Pretors compassed still in their government, with the charge of whole armies which they had already: and for a supplement to reinforce and make up their broken companies, there were appointed 3000 foot and 300 horse of Roman citizens together with 6000 of the one and 300 of the other, from one of the Latine nation. All this while they forgot not their navy at Sea: and the Consuls had in charge to shoule for that purpose, two wardens called Duumvirs, who after they had out of the Aegean shipped into the Sea twenty ships, and set them afloat, should furnish them with mariners, and whole Roman citizens, such as had been slaves and were enfranchised: and that natural Romans free born, should only be Captains and have the conduct of the said vessels. These two Duumvirs so parted and ordered betwix them the defence of the maritime coasts, with ten ships apiece, that the Cape of Minerva should be as it were the middle point and mark between them: so as the one should guard that part on the right hand as far as to Majilla: and the other the left side even to Barium.

This year were seen at Rome and reported from forraign parts many uncouth and strange prodigies: in the Church-yards belonging to Vulcan and Ceres, it rained sheer blood: and the Bishops made relation, that the Spears [of Mars] stood and moved of their own accord. Also Alto at L. Marcius the image of Juno Sospita shed tears. Moreover, the plague reigned to hot in the country villages market Towns and places of frequent resort, yet, and within the City of Rome that they were not able to furnish the funerals accordingly and inter the dead. The LL. of the Senat. being in great anguish and trouble, in regard of those fearful tokens and the loss of their people, ordained, That as well the Consul should kill greater beasts for sacrifice unto what Gods they thought good as also the Decemvirs should visit and peruse the propheticall books of Sylla. And by virtue of their decree there was publick supplication proclaimed at Rome for one whole day, at all the altars and shrines of the gods and goddesses. By their counsell also and direction both the Senat advised and the Comis also published throughout all Italy for three daies space, solemn litanies and devout holy-daies. The rage of this pestilence was to great, that whereas there passed an act by the Senate to enrol 8000 footmen and three hundred horse from out of the Latins (in regard that the Islanders of Corfica were revolted and the Iolians upon some within Sardinia) with which power M. Reginus the Pretor was to fall out into Sardinia: the Comis made report again unto them, that such numbers of people were dead already, and so many lay in that it was not possible to levy that proportion of fighting men. So the Pretor had commission to furnish out that defect of souldiers, with a supply which he was to receive of Cn. Rabius the Pro-consul, who then wintered at Pisa: and from them directly to take the seas and pass over into Sardinia.

* Leo de am-bia.

L. Duranius the Pretor (unto whom the Province of Apulia was allotted) had a commission besides to make inquisition for the Bacchanals: for there remained yet some seeds of the same ceremonies, which began a ready the former year to sprout and bud forth. But L. Pappus the Pretor last before had entered into the enquiry and search of the matter. rather than affected ought and brought it to a final end: and therefore the LL. gave order to this new Pretor to unscrew this mischief in the spring and breeding thereof, before it gat more head and second time, and upon growth spread it there. Moreover the Consuls by the advice and authority of the Senat, preferred certain laws unto the people, as touching the inordinant and ambitious seeking after offices of government. After all this they brought into the Senat the fourteen embassages: and gave audience first to them that came from the KK. to wit Emmetus, Ardo (the Cappadocians) and Pharnaces of Parthia. But no other dispute and answer they had than this. That they would send unto the Delegates and commissioners to hear, decide, and determine their controversies. After them, the Ambassadors of the Lacedemonians came, and of the Achaïans, were admitted into the Senat house. The banished persons also were put in some good hope, that the Senat would write their letters to the Achaïans for their restitution. The Achaïans declared as touching the recovery of Messene and the pacification of all troubles there, with the great contentment of the LL. the Senat. There arrived moreover two Ambassadors from Philip King of the Macedonians, namely Philetes and peribolus no little that they had to the Senat, but least rather as spies to understand and learn somewhat as touching those points that Perseus had charged Demetrius with, and namely of certain speeches that he should have with the Romans, and especially with T. Quinctius, against his brother about succession in the Kingdom. These twain were chosen by the King as indifferent persons, and nothing affected either to the one brother or the other: howbeit they were the ministers, comforters, and compliers of Perseus. In his intended malicious plot against his brother, Demetrius (as one ignorant of all designments against him, but only of the wicked prank of Perseus which last brake out) at the first was neither in great hope, nor yet in utter despair to be reconciled unto his father. But afterwards, he had less confidence every day than other in the good affection of his father toward him, seeing his brother continually to burst into his ear many matters, and possess his head with tales against him. And therefore he looked circumpectly about him that he trode not awry and namely, that he let no words fall or did any thing that might be offensive and breed more jealousy: and above all, he wholly forbore conference and commerce with the Romans: in which sort that he would not have them to know him to write any letters unto him: knowing full well, that his fathers heart would be exasperated against him by his imputations and informations especially.

Philip because he would provide that his souldiers and men of action should not degenerate and wax worse through idleness and disuse of arms and that under one he might arise from himself all inspiration that he intended any war against the Romans, appointed the City Sykia for the Arctogone of his army and marched into the quarters of Madira. A great desire he had to mount the crest & top of the hill Amus be cause there was an opinion commonly received & which he had given credit unto that from thence a man might discover within one yeere & the Penin of Adriatick seas, the river  Istro* also and the Alpion as he thought that the view of these places would stand him in no small stead in projecting & plotting the war against the Romans. When after diligent inquiry of them that knew those quarters well, as touching the ascent of that mountain, he had learned and found it clear and certain, that there was no way at all for to conduct an army thither and that a few men & those of the nimble and lightly appointed should find enough to do and exceeding much difficulty to pass the steep hills his younger son Apollonius whom he was resolved to have with him in that expedition: and because he would come to duce and m. His first difficulty was to find some familiar and private speech that he demanded of him, considering the great difficulty of the journey presented unto them, whether he were better to hold on the way still and follow his design or give over? But if I should go forward (qd. he) I cannot forget that which be fell to Antigonus in the like case, who being upon a time much tossed at Sea in a boisterous tempest, and having with him in the same ship all those that were of his blood, is reported to have given this good advertisement and lesson to his children, that they should always remember, and also give their posterity warning, never to venture all their goods in one bottom, nor to engage themselves together with their whorlacre and off-spring in any peril and danger. Remembering therefore (qd. he) this good precept and counsel of his, I will not hazard both my sons at once in this present jeopardy which I see before mine eyes: but for almost, as I propose to take mine elder son with me, I will send my younger back into Macedony, for to uphold and maintain the hope of my posterity, and for the defence of my Kingdom in the mean while. Demetrius found him (straight, and wit well enough that he was sent away for no other intent but that he should not be present in council, when upon the view of those places abroad, he was to deliberate and consult in what coast lay the neerest and shortest way to the Adriatick Sea and to Italy, and what course they should pursue for the management of the war. But there was no remedy he must not only then obey his father, but also soothe him up and seem to approve and like well of that which he said, for fear lest it might be thought, that it went against his stomach to yield obedience unto him and to be held in more jealousy and suspicion than before. Howbeit, to the end that he might pass into Macedony with safety, Didas one of the Kings Deputies and L. Governor under him of Pennis, was commanded to accompany and conduct him with a mean guard and company. Now was this Didas one of those conspirators that had sworn the death of Demetrius, whom Perseus had made sure to his part, like as he had many other of his fathers friends, even since that men began to make no doubt, unto whom Philip in affection was inclined, and whom he meant to make the heir apparent of the crown. And at this very instant Perseus had charged him and given him instructions, by all obsequious services to insinuate and wind himself into most familiar talk, and to come to near within him, that he might draw from him all his secrets, & discover the very inward and hidden thoughts of his heart. Thus departed Demetrius attended with a train about him more dangerous to his person, than if he had travelled alone without any company. Philip first passed through Medica, and then forward over the dearely lying between Medica and Edmonia and at the seventh daies march was come as far as to the foot of the mountain. Where after he had rested and staid one day to make choice of those whom he minded to take up with him tomorrow after he set forth & put himself in his way. At the first the labour was not great, for they advanced the more wild and woody still they found every place; yea, and they met with many that had no passage at all. At length they were mounted to a pass or way so shadowed and dark, that for the trees standing so thick together, and their boughs plaited and interlaced one within another, scarcely or hardly could a man see the skie through them. But when they approached once the pitch and crest of the mountain, behold (a thing not lightly seen in other parts) they light upon to grofs and thick a mist, which overspread and covered all, that they had as much ado to march forward as they had travelled in the dark & mid-night. At last by the third daies end, they gauged the very top of the mountain. Now when they were come down from thence again, they made no less report thereof than the common opinion was that went of it: which I believe easily they did of purpose, because they would not be mocked and scorned for their foolish and vain voyage, rather than for that they could indeed within the same prospect and from one place view seas, mountains, and rivers, situate and distant so far asunder. Much moiled they were all, and foretold in this untoward way; but the King above the rest, for reason that he was farthest in age and unwieldy of body. Well, after he had done sacrifice there upon two altars consecrated to Jupiter and the Sun, he descended in two daies, whereas he had made three of it in ascending: and that which he feared most, was the cold nights, which there in the beginning of the dog-daies were like those of midwinter in other places. Many difficulties he wrestled and strove with during those daies, and being returned into his camp he found no better. Nothing was there but extreme want & penury, as being pitched in a place compassed about on every side with defarts and wildernesses. And therefore when he had staid there but one only day to rest and repose his men, whom he had taken with him in that journey, he hastened away, and in a running march, as if he had been routed out of the country of the Dentcheles. These Dentcheles were his own confederates, the Macedonians (such was their need and necessity) pillaged and spoiled their confines, no less as if they had been professed enemies. For first they waited & destroyed their hols, granges and farm houses, afterwards certain wicks and villages also, robbing and rifling as they went, to the great dishonor of the King: who could not chuse but hear the piteous complaints & moans of his subjects, crying to the Gods, Patrons of alliances, and calling upon his name for help, but could have no redress and remedy. When he was purveyed of corn from thence, and returned into the country Medica he began so to assail a City which they call Perra. Himself in person lay encamped in the avenue and ready way upon the plains, but he sent his son Perseus with a small company to beset the compass and give the assault from the higher places that commanded the Town. The Townsmen thus hard beset with terror on every side for the present yielded upon composition, and gave hostages: but after the army was retired, they forgetting their pledges, abandoned the City and fled for refuge into certain forts, fenced places, and high mountains. Philip having wearied his souldiers with all manner of travel to no effect, and withal entertained more jealousy and suspicion of his son Demetrius, by the lewd practise and false suggestions of Didas (the Governor of Paonia) returned into Macedony. This Didas (as hath been said before) sent to conduct Didas home, abused the simplicity of the young Gentleman, who was nothing given to suspect, but seemed discontented and complained to him, as good cause he had for those things, were done in nature and blood unto him; he, I say, by flatterings, by soothing him up, and flustering him to be offended and grieved for his part at such hard usage, laid inares and guises, and set on him; and in conclusion, by his double diligence and offering his voluntary service, he made sure, pretending also to be true and fast unto him, yes, and to keep his counsel, he made him the very secrets of his heart. Now had Demetrius a purpose with himself to be revenged on the effeminate deignment of his, he was persuaded, that of a special grace and favour, he should have sent and offered unto him this Didas the Pretor of Paonia to be his helper and aid, through his Province he conceived some hope to pass and escape with security. This Didas pilot of his was both immediately disclosed to his brother Perseus, and also by him declared to his father. And first were letters herof brought unto him, while he lay at the siege of Perseus towards Herodorus (the principal friend that Demetrius had) was committed to ward and custody, order was taken to watch and observe Demetrius; that he should not slyly shew any unkind and close, without remembrance of any such matter. These occurrences above all others, caused the King to have a dolorous and heavy return into Macedony. These new accusations thus presented troubled him much; howbeit he thought good to expect the return of those whom he had sent to Paonia spies to hear all and find out the truth. In the anguish and agony of these cares and perplexities, when the King had continued certain months, in the end those Embassadors came home; who at first ere they set foot out of Macedony, had devised and framed before hand what report they would make from Rome. These messengers, to make up the full measure of all their wicked and devilish practices, delivered also into the Kings hand a false and forged letter, sealed with a counterfeit signet of T. Quintus. The said letter was indited to this tenor and effect. That Quintus should seem for his own excuse to say, that albeit young Demetrius, carried away with an insatiable desire to be King, had slipped a little, and treated with him about some such matter, yet would he do nothing to prejudice any one about K. Philip, neither would he be thought, or looked a horse give any ungodly and ungracious counsel. These letters struck it dead fore, and made the King believe, that all the former imputations fastened upon Demetrius were true and past all peradventure. Whereupon Herodorus presently was put to the rack and examined, but after he had endured so tolerable pains a long time, and confessed nothing, he died in the end under the torturous hands. Perseus accused Demetrius again before his father, for that he intended and provided to shew flight through Paonia. And there came forth certain to testify against him, saying, that he had corrupted, inveigled, and induced them to accompany him in that journey. But that which made most of all against him, was that some devised letter of T. Quintus. Howbeit there was no sign of sentence pronounced openly against him; to the end, that rather by some covert and cunningous practice, he might come to his death; and this, not for any fear that he had of him, but doubtless left some open punishment executed upon him, might reveal and discover his secret deignment, of making war upon the Romans.

murdered.

Philip himself taking his journey from Thessalonica to come to Demetrius, sent Demetrius into Assemon, a City in Paonia, and the same Didas still to accompany him; but Didas being addressed to Amphipolis, for to receive the hostages of the Thracians. Now it is reported, that when Didas took his leave of him and departed, the King gave him in charge to kill his son Demetrius. Didas then, either purposing indeed or making semblance to sacrifice, invited Demetrius to the celebration and feast thereof, whereupon he came from Assemon to Heraclea. And (as men say) at this supper he met with a cup of poison. He had no sooner drunk it, but immediately he felt that he was tipped; for within a while it began to work extremely, and for very dolorous pain, he was forced to rise from the Table and retire into his bed-chamber: where he piteously complained of the hard heart and cruelty of his father, of the murderous mind of the parricide his brother, and of the treacherous villany of Didas; and all this while endured deadly wrings and torments in his belly. But afterwards there were sent into the chamber, one Thyphis a Suberene, and Alexander of Berthea, who entwined his head and throat with the bed-cloaths, carpets and counterpoises of capistris, and held them so hard, that they throttled and smothered him, and in the end stopped his breath that he died. Thus was this poor innocent young man piteously made away; whose enemies one single kind of death could not content and satisfy, but needs they must kill and murder them twice.

While these things hapned in Macedony, L. Emilius Paulus, who continued still in government after his Consulship expired, marched with his army against the Ligurians Ingresses in the beginning of the spring. So soon as he was entered into the confines of his enemies country, and there encamped, there came Embassadors unto him under colour of seeking peace, but indeed only to escourt and spy. Paulus made them answer, That he could construe no accord with them, unless they yielded first: which they seemed not so much to refuse, but said, That they needed some time to persuade their nation unto it, being a rude and uncivil kind of people. And when they had ten daies truce allowed to effect this, they requested moreover, that the Roman soldiers might not pass over the next hills adjoining, either for service or forage, forasmuch as those lands were the only tilled and well measured grounds of their appertenance and territory. When they had obtained so much, they assembled all their forces on that side of the hills, from whence they had overtopped the enemies, and suddenly with a mighty multitude charged upon the Roman camp, and assaulted all the avenues and gates thereof at once. With all forcible means they continued the assault in such sort, as the Romans had not so much as either time enough to set forth and shew their engines, or room sufficient to put their army in order of battle; but were compelled to leave their camp more by standing thick thronged together against the enemies in the very gates, than otherwise by hardy fighting. But about the going down of the sun, when the enemies were weary, Paulus dispatched two light horsemen with letters to M. Babius the Consul, as far as he could, that he should come away with all speed to succour him; being in time of truce besieged. Paulus had delivered up his army before to M. Pannius, the Pretor, as he went into Sardinia. He both certified the Senat by his letters, that L. Emilius was invaded by the Ligurians, and he wrote also to M. C. Marcellus, whose province was next adjoining, to bring off his forces (if he thought so good) out of Gaul in to Liguria, and deliver L. Emilius from siege. But this, these succours should have come all too late; for the Ligurians the very next day returned, and advanced against the camp. Emilius, albeit he not only knew that they would come, but also how he brought his power forth into the field and ranged them in array, yet he kept him self to the strength of his rampart, minding to hold off and not to fight, until Babius might with his army come from Pisa. Now the letters of Babius caused great fear at Rome; and to move the more, for that Marcellus being returned to the City, some few daies after he had made over his army unto Emilius, put them out of all hope, that the army which was in France could not possibly pass into Liguria, by reason of the war with the Istrians, who imposed the planting of the colony at Aquilia; against whom Babius was gone; and might not possibly retire from thence, now that the war was once begun. The only hope they had therefore of aiding Emilius was this, (and yet the same seemed to be with the latest, considering the urgent necessity of the time) to ease the Consul made halt to go into their provinces: which to do all the LL. of the Senat called aloud and earnestly unto them. But the Consuls denied hard to stir one foot before the levy of soldiers was fully finished; alleging that it was not their lackness, but the violence of the people, which caused it to be so late ere it were returned. Yet for all this, such was the general accord and consent of the Senat, that they could neither will nor could bar go forth of the City in their rich coats of arms, and by proclamation to assigne a certain day, upon which all the soldiers whom they had enrolled should shew at Pisa; and do mission they had to take up sickly soldiers, all the country over as they went, to press them forth presently and have them levy. Moreover, the Pretors, Q. Petilius and Q. Fabius were both of them commanded, the one, Petilius, to enrol in half two tumultuary legions of Roman citizens, and tender the military oath to all that were not above fiftie years old: and Fabius, to levy of the Latine allies fifteen thousand foot, and eight hundred horsemen. The two Dumvirs or Wardens for the navy and the ports were created, namely, C. Matienus and C. Lucetius, who were soon provided of ships ready rigged, trimmed and furnished to their hands. And Matienus, who had the charge of the coast upon the gulf of Gaul, was commanded to bring his fleet with all speed possible along, to the track of the Ligurians, if haply he might any way head L. Emilius and his army. Emilius after he perceived that no aid appeared from any place, supposing verily that the two horse men were intercepted and failed by the way, thought good to put off no longer, but alone with his own forces to trie the fortune of a fight. And thereupon before the enemies came (who now already began more coldly and heavily to assault them therefore) he put his men in battell array at the four gates of the camp, to the end that upon the signal given, they should at once from all parts fall forth. To the four extraordinary cohorts, he adjoined two other, under the conduct of M. Valerius a Lieutenant, and commanded them to break forth at the false postern gate called Extravallinaria: within the gate Principalis on the right hand, he embattelled the Hastate or javelins of the first legion, and the principes of the same legion in the rear guard to second them, commanded both by M. Servilius and L. Sulpicius, Kn marshals, or Tribunes military. The third legion he marshalled full against the other gate Principis on the left hand. This change only was here, for that the Principles were set in the front, and the Hastate behind in the tail of the legion. Sex. Julius Caesar and L. Aurelius Cotta, two military Tribunes had the leading of this legion. Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Lieutenant, having the conduct of the right wing, was placed at the gate Quintifera. Two cohorts and the Triarii of two legions had commandment to stay behind for the defence of the camp. The General himself in person rode all about from gate to gate, exhorting and encouraging his men: using all the forcible means he possibly could devise, to provoke and whet the stomachs of his soldiers, and to give a point edge to their courage and colour: one while reproaching his enemies for their fallshood and treachery, who having craved peace and obtained truce: during the time of the said truce, against all law of nations were come to assault the camp: another while shewing and declaring unto them what shame and indignity it was for the Roman army to be besieged by the Ligurians, who more truly may be accounted thieves and robbers, than good for warlike enemies. If (quoth he) you should escape from hence, not by your own vertue and valour, but through the help and succour of others, with what face shall any of you be able to meet, I say, not those soldiers who have vanquished and defeated Philip, and subdued Antiochus, the mightiest King, and greatest commanders of our age: but even them who many a time have hunted and chased the very same Ligurians like brute beasts, over the wilds and forests as they fled, and hewed them in peeces in the end.

"That which the Spaniards, that which the Gauls, that which the Macedonians and Carthaginians dare not enterprise, namely, to approach and enter upon the rampier of the Roman camp; shall a Ligurian enemy adventure to do? shall he of his own accord presume to besiege and assail our camp, whom heretofore when we best all the blind bushes, by woods and thickets, to start him out, we had much ado to find, he lay to close and lurked so covertly? At these words the soldiers set up a consonant cry in token of applause, and answered him with general cheer, saying, there was no fault on their part, (seeing that no man had given them the signal to set forth and make a rally. For let him but once lay the word to sound the trumpet, he should see and find, that both Romans and Ligurians were the same still as before-time. Now the Ligurians kept two camps on the near side of the mountains affront the Roman leaguer, from whence (for the first daies so soon as the sun was up) they used to advance their engines, and march forward well armed, and ranked in battell array; but then they put no armor upon their backs, nor took weapon in hand, before they had filled their bellies well with meat and their heads with wine: they came forth (I say) dispersed and out of order; as who hoped and trusted assuredly, that the enemies would not march under their engines without their rampier. Against them (coming thus in disorder) the Romans issued forth at once, out of all the gates in one instant with a mighty shout, which not only they who were within the camp set up, but also the lances, callions, leaders, and other drudges that follow the camp redoubled. This was such an unlooked for occurrence to the Ligurians, that they were set in as great an affright therewith, as it they had been impetred & beset all about with invidious ambushments. For a small while there was some show of conflict, such as it was; but anon they took their heels and fled for life; but as they fled, they left their lives behind them in every place. Then the men of arms had the signal given to mount on horseback, to pursue them & not suffer one to escape alive & so in this fearful rout they were driven to take their camp for safety: but in the end were dizzied and turned out of it also. That day were slain of the Ligurians not so few as fifteen thousand, and 2000 taken prisoners. Within three daies after, the whole nation of the Ligurian Inguagues, yielded absolutely, and put in their hostages. A search was made for all the pilots and mariners, who had exercised piracy on the seas, and they were all laid up fast in prison. Sembrably C. Marius one of the Decemvirs or wardens of the navy met with two and thirty ships of that sort, belonging to men of war upon the coast of Liguria, and boarded them. To carry these news to Rome, and letters to the Senate, L. Lucius Cotta, and C. Sulpicius Cotta were to Rome: who also were to require that L. Scipio (whom his time was expired) might depart out of his province, and bring his soldiers from the Sines, with solemn procession besides was ordered in all churches and chappels, and at every house and altar for three daies space. The Pretors also were commanded, Peritius, to call and dismiss the legions of the City, and Fabius, to remit the Latine allies the levying and murthering of their soldiers. Also there was order given to the Pretor of the City, for to writ unto the Consuls and give them to understand, that he Senat thought it meet and reason, that the subary soldiers (who were enrolled in batt for the suddain tumult and alarm) should with all speed be licensed to depart.

The same year the colony of Gravies was planted in the territory of Tuscan, which in times past was conquered from the Tarquinians, and five acres of land was set out to every man. The Triumvirs who had the charge thereof to distribute these lands, were C. Calpurnius Piso, C. Claudius Pulcher, and C. Terentius Ibra. A yeer it was of note, in regard of the drought that hapned, and the death of corn and all other fruits of the earth. For recorded it is, that in six month space it never rained one drop.

The same year it fortun'd, that certain plow-men and labourers plowed and digged somewhat deep within the ground, in the lands of L. Peritius a secretary, (which lands lay under the hill Janiculum) there were found two coffers of stone, each of them about eight foot long and four foot broad, the lids and covers whereof were bound and lodered with lead. Both these chests had a superscription upon them in Greek and Latine letters to this effect, That in the one of them lay buried Nama Pompeius the son of Pompe, sometime King of Rome; and in the other, were belov'd the books of the said Nama. The owner of this ground opened these coffers by the advice and counsell of his friends: and that which carried the title and inscription of the Kings sepulture, was found empty, without any shew or token of the reliques of a mans body or any thing else, by reason the bones and all were rotten and consumed, in continuance of time after to many yeers past. In the other were found two fardels, wrapped within wax candles (or ear-cloths) containing either of them seven books: which were not only whole and sound, but also seemed very fresh and new. One eleven of them were written in Latin, as touching the Pontificall law: the other eleven in Greek, intituled, The discipline or doctrine of Philosophy, such as thole daies might afford. Valerius Antias faith moreover, That they were the books of Pythagoras: according to the common received opinion of Nama, that he was the disciple of Pythagoras: herein giving credit to a probable, resembling truth. These books were first read by thole friends of his who were present at the place where the chests were opened; but afterwards as they came into more mens hands to be read, it chanced that Q. Peritius the lord chief justice of the City, desirous to peruse thole books, borrowed them of L. Peritius, with whom he was familiarly acquainted, by reason that thole overcame Quintus Peritius had chosen the foretold Nama into the decury of the Scribes and secretaries. Who after he had read the titles with the immortals and contents of every chapter, and finding thole most part of them, tending directly to abolish the state of the religion then established, said unto L. Peritius, that he purposed to burn thole books that first; before he did so, he would permit him to take what means he thought by order of his law: wherewith he would serve, his turn to recover the said books out of his hands, and good laye the thole have to take that course without his displeasure, or any breach of friendship between them. The Scribe or notary infore said, goeth to the Tribunes for their assistance, the Tribunes put the matter over to the Senate, before whom the Pretor said plainly, that he was ready to take his corporal oath, if it were to put to it, that thole books ought neither to be read nor kept. Whereupon the Senat judged, that for such a matter the only of the Pretors oath was sufficient, and that the thole (should be burned with all speed possible in the open place of assemblies called Comitia & that thirty awarded withall that they should be paid unto Q. Peritius the right owner of each among for the books, as the Pretor and the more part of the Tribunes of the Commons offered them worth. The Scribe would touch none of money, but his books were burnt in the field place before all the people in a light fire, made by the ordinary servants attending upon the officers.

The same summer there arose suddainly a great war in the higher Spain. The Celtiberians had gathered a power of five & thirty thousand men, a number more then lightly at any time before they had levied. Now was Q. Fulvius Flaccus lord Deputy of that province. He for his part, because he was advertised that the Celtiberians put their youth in arms, had raised and assembled a great side of the confederates, as he could, but nothing came he near to the entinie in numbers of soldiers. In the beginning of the Spring he led his army into Capertania, and encamped before the town Eburac, after he had planted a mean garrison within it. A few daies after the Celtiberians pitched their tents within two miles from thence, under a little hill. When the Roman Pretor perceived they were come, he sent his brother Marcus Fulvius with two companies of the best men of allies in espial, to view the enemies camp, willing him to approach as near to the trench and rampier as he could, and to see what course the camp took, but to forbear skirmish, and in any hand to retire, in case he perceived the Cavalry of their enemies made out against him. According to this direction, in did in every respect. And so for certain daies together, there was nothing done, but only these two companies of horsemen shewing fight, and afterwards retiring backe soon as the Cavalry of the enemies issued out of their camp. At length the Celtiberians who came forth and advanced forward withall their power, as well horse as foot, and having set them in readiness of battell, staid as it were in the midst between. The whole ground was a smooth and even plain, fit to join a battell in. There stood the Spaniards (I say) together their enemies: but the Roman Pretor kept his men within the rampier four daies together, and they likewise of the other side held the same place still in battell array. The Romans as that while staid on a foot. The Celtiberians then seeing the enemies refused fight, held the rest of the day quiet as within their camp: only the horsemen did forth; and they kept a corps de guard, to be in readiness if peradventure the enemies should be bold and come abroad. Both on the one side and other, they went out of the back side of their camp to purvey forage and fuel, and dispatched not one another. The Roman Pretor, supposing now that after to many daies rest, the enemies were bene in hand and hoped fully, that he would never begin first, commanded L. Acilius to take with him the left wing of the Cavalry, and six thousand of the provincial auxiliaries, not to fetch a compass about the hill which stood behind the enemies; and from thence to come as they heard a cry, to run down again and charge upon their camp. And because they might not be discovered, in the night time they departed. Flaccus the next morning by peep of day, sent out C. Scipio (a colonel of the allies) against the enemies camp, with the extraordinary horsemen of the left wing, whom when the Celtiberians beheld both approaching near toward them & also more in order then usually they had been, they put forth all their Cavalry at once out of the gates: Scipio gave the signal to the Infantry also to come a close, Scipio run, according to the direction, as he had heard the first noise and shout of the horsemen tamed the head of his horse and returned back full upon the camp: there with the enemies followed more freely a full the battell, and within a while the footmen also, making full account to be made of the Roman leaguer that day, and verily now were they put quite out of a mine. When Flaccus supposed that they were trained far enough from their camp, for succuring it, he issued forth at once in thole places, with his army arranged before in order of battell within, and caused them to let up a mighty cry, not only to annuit the soldiers to the combat, but also that their fellows behind the hill might hear it. Who made no stay, but presently ran down and set upon the enemies camp as they had in charge, where there were left in guard not above five hundred armed men. By reason therfore, that they within were so few, the enemies without so many, and also because they were so sudden and unlooked for, they were mightily terrified, and so in manner with one cry, without and resistance at all, their hold was forced and won. Acilius let on fire that part of the hill which might easily be seen of them that they were fighting in the plain. Now the Celtiberians which stood behind in the rearguard, were the first that discovered the flame; but afterwards it was kindled and went current through the main battell, that their camp were lost and all on a night. The enemies were greatly amazed, but the Romans much more animated. For now they might hear the shout of their fellows, having the upper hand, now might they see the smoke of their enemies burning with bright flames. The Celtiberians for a while stood in suspense, and doubtfull what to do; but afterwards, perceiving they had no place of safety, upon their discretion they should fall to running away. They flew no other way but in fighting now, and they began to renew the skirmish, with more resolution than before. Directly they were encountered and charged in the midst of their battell by the first legion; but again the first and wing, where they saw theouldiers of their own nation ranged (who came to aid the Romans) they made head, and advanced their engines with more boldness and confidence. And truly that left wing of the Romans was at the point to have retreated; but that the second legion re-joined and scattered them, and withall they that were left within their intrenchments, were in the very midst and heart of the conflict; and Asinius from another post pushed on their backs. Down went the Celtiberians along time, and were set in pieces before them. As many as remained, made shift to flee and escape on all hands into every quarter. The Consul was sent out after them two waies in several bands; who also committed a great slaughter and execution. That day were slain of the enemies about 25000, 4800 taken prisoners, with fine hundred horse and above; besides 88 military engines gotten from them and carried away. A great victory this was, but not without bloodshed of the Romans part: for of two legions there stood some more than two hundred, but of Latine allies 830, of forreine aids, much about 2400 lost their lives in the field. The Pretor then retired with his victorious army into his own camp. Asinius was commanded to abide still in that of their enemies, which he had forced and won. The next morrow they fell to gather up the spoils of their enemies: and those who had born themselves valiantly in that service among the rest, were rewarded with gifts in a full and frequent assembly of the whole army. After this, when the hurt and maimed were brought back into the town, the legions were led through the country Carpetania, towards Contrebia. This City when it was once besieged sent the Celtiberians for succour; but they came not in time: nor for any slackness of their part, but because after they were departed from home, &c had entered on their journey, the foul waies hindered and staid them, which they were not able to pass for the continual rain that fell: over and besides, the waters were out and the rivers swelled to high, that possibly they could not come forward: whereupon the besieged inhabitants being in despair of help, their friends, rendered the town. Flaccus likewise was forced by the storm and tempestuous weather to put his army into the same City. Now the Celtiberians, who were on foot in their journey, and not aware that their friends had surrendered, at length having passed over the river (when the rain gave over and the weather took up) came to Contrebia; but seeing no camp without the walls, and supposing that it was either removed to the other side, or the enemies dilapidated and gone, they approached the town, and marched loofely and restlessly forward in disorder. The Romans sallied out upon them at two gates, fell upon them (disbanded as they were) and put them to the rout. But ere what hapned: that thing which hindered them that they could not make head, resist, and settle themselves to begin fight (namely, because they came not together in one entire band, nor yet by great companies at their colours) the same flood then in good stead to save many of their lives that fled. For they ran so scattering, and were so spread all over the plains, that in no place could the enemy meet with them in any number thick together, to compass them about on every side. Howbeit 2000 of them were killed, & above 5000 taken prisoners, besides 400 horse, 60 engines of war won from them. Those who after their struggling fight retired home ward, met with another troop of Celtiberians coming forward, unto whom they recounted the yielding up of Contrebia and their own misfortune: by which means they caused them to turn and goe back againe, who immediately flit away in their villages and forts. Then Flaccus departed from Contrebia, and conducted his legions through Calahorra writing and spoiling as he went: where he forced many castles until the greater part of this country was reduced under his obedience. These affairs passed in high Spain that year. As for the lower province, Marius the Pretor fought fortunately in certain battells against the Pontals.

The same year a Colony of Latins was planted in Aquilina, within the territory of the Senis and thither were conducted three thousand footmen, and every one of them were endowed with fifty acres of land. The Centurions besides had a hundred, and the horsemen a hundred and forty acres apiece given unto them. And the Commissioners for this conduct and distribution were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Flaminius, and L. Manlius Acidinus. In which year also two Temples were dedicated, the one to Venus Erycina near the gate Collina (which L. Porcius Licinus the son of Lutius dedicated, being a Duumvir deputed for that purpose, and had been vowed before by L. Porcius the Consul in the Ligurian war) the other to the goddess Pax, in the herb market: and of this chappell M. Atilius Glabrio the other Duumvir, had the dedication; where, he erected and set up in the honor of his father Glabrio, a gilt statue, which was the first gilt image that ever was made in Italy. This Glabrio the father was he, who had vowed to erect the said Temple that very day on which he fought the battell against K. Antisthenes at Therompele, and by warrant from the Senat, had bargained for the building thereof at a price. In those daies wherein these holy houses were consecrated, L. Emilius Paulus the Proconsul, triumphed over the Ligurians Irgures. He had born before him in these five and twenty golden Corones, and besides them there was no gold or silver else carried in that triumph. But many principal Ligurians, men of mark, whom he took captive, were led before his chair. He dealt among hisouldiers, 300 Ales apiece. The same of this triumph of his, was much more rewarded by the occasion that the Ligurian Embassadors craved to have a perpetual peace with the Romans. Answering that their whole nation were resolved never to take arms again, but by commandment and licence of the people of Rome, Q. Fulvius the Pretor, returned this answer unto them by the licence of the Senat. That it was no news to hear this language from the Ligurians; but it stood them upon and was becoming rather, to carry a new mind, and the same agreeable to their speech; and therefore they should go to the Consuls, and do by them which they were enjoined; forasmuch as the Senat would believe none but the word only of the Consuls in the behalf of the Ligurians: as touching their true and sincere meaning to observe peace. Thus was peace concluded with the Ligurians: but there was a battell fought in Corfica with the Islanders there; in which M. Plautius the Pretor slew 2000 of them in the field: which defeat compelled them to give hostages, and besides 100000 pound weight of wax. From thence the army was conducted into Sardinia, where passed some fortune battles against the Ilans, a nation at this day not fully subdued: & appeared in this very year also were the hundred hostages rendered back again to the Carthaginians; with whom the people of Rome made and maintained peace, as well for their own part, as in the behalf of K. Masinissa, who at that time with an armed garison, held the possession of that territory which had been in question. The Consuls in their province sat still and had nothing to do. M. Baebius was sent for to Rome, against the general assembly for the election of magistrates; who created Consuls, A. Posthumius Albinus Lucius and C. Calpurnius Piso. After this, were created Pretors Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, A. Posthumius Albinus, P. Cornel. Mamercus, T. Manlius Mallianus, A. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Marius; and they all entered into their consularty upon the 15 day of March.

In the beginning of that year wherein A. Posthumius Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso were Consuls: A. Posthumius the Consul brought into the Senat those persons who were come from Q. Fulvius Flaccus out of the hither province of Spain; to wit L. Minutius his Lieutenant general, and the two colonels, T. Manius and L. Maffalio. These men after they had made report of two battles fortunately fought against the Celtiberians, of their country yielded and brought under their subjection; and that the term of government in that province was expired, and no more left to be done there; so as there was no need either of the ordinary money which was wont to be sent for soldiers pay, or of corn to be carried unto the army for that year: requested of the Senat first in regard of their happy success, to yield honor and praise to the immortal gods: and then that Q. Fulvius might depart and come his waies out of the province, and bring with him the army of his from thence, whose valiant service, both himself and also many Pretors before him had used: which (say they) was not only meet and convenient, but also requisite and needfull in manner to be done: forasmuch as theouldiers were so stiffnecked and obdurate, that it seemed impossible to hold them any longer in that province, but that they would be gone and depart without licence, if they were not dismissed: or else break out into some dangerous fire of a mutiny, if a man should go about to keep and hold them back by strong hand. The Senat gave order that Liguria should be the province for both Consuls: which done, the Pretors also cast lots for theirs. To A. Hostilius fell the civill jurisdiction over the citizens: and to Minutius over the forrainers. P. Cornelius had the government of Sicily: C. Marius of Sardinia. Unto L. Posthumius was allotted the farther part of Spain, and to Tib. Sempronius the hither. This Sempronius (because he was to succeed Q. Fulvius) fearing his province should be left naked and destitute of the oldouldiers, "I demand of you, O L. Minutius, since you bring word that there is no more trouble behind of that province, whether you think that the Celtiberians will continue fast in their allegiance for ever, so as that province may be protected and held in obedience without any army at all? And if you cannot undertake to a flure us of the faith and loyalty of these Barbarians: do advise us in any hand to maintain an army in those parts, whether you will give counsell to the Senat, for to send a supply into Spain, that they only should be called and discharged, who have served out their full years required by law, and so that new and rawouldiers be mingled with the rest of the old: or that the old legions should full and whole be removed out of the province, and new legions enrolled, and sent thither in their stead: considering that the small account that usually is made of such fresh and untrainedouldiers, were enough to induce and move even the more quiet and peaceable sort of Barbarians to rebel and make war again? Soon said it is, but not so easily done, to have made an end of all troubles in such a province, especially where the people are naturally inclined to war, and prone ever and anon to make insurrections. Some few Cities, as far as I can hear, and namely, those which be nearest unto theouldiers lying in winter garison, were by them held in awe and kept down, have yielded and are become subject: but they that were farther off, be in arms still and have weapons in hand. Which being so, I tell you (my LL) even now before hand, that I will perforce by my service to the Commonwealth, with the help of that army which is there already at this present, be in case Flaccus bring away those legions with him: I will chuse those quarters which are in peace, to winter in, and not hazard my young and newouldiers among them, to be pressed to the devotion and mercy of most fierce and warlike enemies. The Lieutenant answered to these demands in this manner, That neither himself nor any man else was able for his life, to divine and foretell what was in the heart of the Celtiberians now, and what they would mind and intend to do hereafter: and therefore he could not deny, but the better policy it was to lead an army among those Barbarians (peaceable though they seemed to be at this present) be"cause as yet they are inured to government, and cannot well skill of being subjects. But whether it be more expedient to employ new forces, as the old, it is for him to speak and sit down, who upon his knowledge can say, how loudly the Celtiberians will carry themselves in time of peace, and is withal assured, that the soldiers will hold them content and quiet, if they be detained any longer in the province. But if a man may conjecture and give a queſtie what they think in their heart, either by their grumbling words ſecretly one to another; or their ſpeeches uttered in the preſence and hearing of their General, when he maketh orations to them in publick manner: I tell you truly they have eyed out with open mouth, that either they will keep their General with them in the province, or home they will with him into Italy. This debate between the Pretor and the Lieutenant, was interrupted and broken off, by a new matter preſented before the Senat by the Conſuls, who thought it meet and reaſonable, that order ſhould be taken for their own furniture and ſettling forth with men, money, and munition to their provinces, before any thing were ſpoken or treat of as touching the Pretor's army. So, ordained it was, that the Conſul ſhould have their entire army of new ſouldiers, to wit, each of them two legions of Roman citizens with their cavalry, together with the ſmall and ſcattered number at all other places of Latine allies, namely, 15000 foot and 800 horſe. And with this power they had in charge to make war againſt the Ligurian Apuans. As for P. Cornelius and M. Baſilius, they continued ſtill in place of command: and were willing to hold their provinces, untill the Conſuls were thence come. Then they were commanded to diſcharge the army which they had, and to journey to Rome. After this, ſpeech there was concerning the army of Tib. Sempronius; and the Conſul had warrant to enroll over new legion, conſiſting of five thouſand and two hundred foot and 400 horſe: over and beſides, 1000 footmen, and 50 horſe of Roman citizens. Likewise the Latine nation was charged with a levy of 7000 foot and 300 horſe. With which army it was thought good, that Tib. Sempronius ſhould go into the higher province of Spain. As for Q. Fulvius, he was permitted to bring back with him (if he thought well thereof) all thoſe ſouldiers, as well Roman as allies, which had been tranſported over into Spain before the Conſulſhip of Sp. Poſthumus and Q. Marcius: and more then that (after a new ſupply was come) the ſurplusage in two legions above 1400 foot, and 600 horſe, and the over-plus of 12000 footmen of Latine, and fix hundred horſemen; and namely, thoſe whoſe valorous ſervice C. Fulvius had tried and found in two battles againſt the Celtiberians. Moreover, ſolemn proceſſions and thankſgiving were by authority ordained for his happy managing of the affairs of the Common-weal: & then the reſt of the Pretors were ſent into their provinces. Q. Fabius Buteo had his commiſſion renewed to govern Gallia. Thus it was agreed in the Senat, that there ſhould be eight legions maintained and kept in pay the year over and above the old army in Liguria, which was in good hope ſhortly to be diſmiſſed. Howbeit even thoſe forces (being no greater then they were) hardly could be made full and conſent by reaſon of the peſtilence which now three years had raged, and diſpeopled the City of Rome and all Italy. During which plague the Pretor T. Minutius, and not long after him, the Conſul C. Calpurnius died: with many other brave and famous perſons of each degree and quality. So, as at length theſe men began to hold this depopulation and calamity for a prodigious token and ſtrange wonder. Whereupon C. Servilius the Arch-biſhop was charged, to ſearch out means for to appeaſe the wrath and anger of the gods; and the Decemvirs likewiſe to perſuade the books of Sibylla: the Coſ, to vow certain preſents and oblations, to Jan Apollo, Eſculapius and Lady * Salus, and to ſet up their images garniſhed with gold: which he vowed and executed accordingly. The Decemvirs proclaimed ſupplications & prayers two daies together for the health of the people, throughout the City, and in all market towns and places of frequent resort and aſſembly. Above twelve years of age, wore chaplets & garlands of flours upon their heads; and bare branches of lawrel in their hands, whileſt they were at their prayers & devotion. Moreover, there was crept into mens heads a ſuſpicion that ſome devilish and wicked hand might be the cauſe of all this. Whereupon by an act of the Senat, a commiſſion was granted out unto C. Claudius the Pretor (who was ſubſtituted and choſen in the room of T. Minutius) to make ſearch and diligent inquiſition after all confeſſions of poiſon, & the practices thereof within the City, & for the compaſſion of two miles about it every way. In like manner, to C. Manius, for to ſit in the enquiry thereof before he croſſed over into his province of Sardinia) in all the mart-towns and places of aſſembly which were more then ten miles off from Rome. Of all others, the Conſul's death was moſt ſuſpected. For given out it was, that Quarta Heſperia his wife, had murdered him: but when he was ſeen once, that her own ſon Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was declared Conſul in place of his father in law and mother's husband, the death of Piſo the Conſul began to be more infamous and ſuſpicious a great deal then before. And witneſſes there came forth ready to depole, that after Minus and Piſo were pronounced Conſuls (in which election the ſaid Flaccus was rejected and ſuffered repulſe) his mother reproached him therewith, and laid it in his diſh, that this was the third time that he ſued for the Conſulſhip and gone without: adding moreover, and willing him to be ſo ready to ſtand for it again, for that he would work and bring it about, that within two months he ſhould be Conſul. Among other teſtimonies and depoſitions making for the cauſe and tending to the ſame: that ſpeech of hers alſo, taking effect too truly and to juſt within the time, was thought ſufficient to condemn Heſperia.

In the beginning of this ſpring, whileſt the levy of ſouldiers ſtaied the new Conſul at Rome, whileſt the death of the one and the chooſing of the other into their place, cauſed all thing there to go more ſlowly forward; in the mean time P. Cornelius and M. Baſilius who had done nothing worthy of the remembrance during the Conſulſhip, led their armies againſt the Ligurian Apuans. Theſe Ligurians, who before the coming of the Conſuls had the province looked for no war, were ſuddenly at unawares, and to the number of 12000 of them yielded: whom Cornelius and Baſilius ſupplied upon ſhips had ſent with the Senat by letters to tranſport from the mountains, into plains and champaign country from their own homes; to the end they ſhould have no more hope of ſuccour, for otherwiſe they ſuppoſed the Ligurian war would never have an end. Now there was in the Samitis country a certain territory belonging in common to the people of Rome, which ſometimes had been in the tenure and poſſeſſion of the Taurians. In which place they began to plant the Ligurian Apuans; published an edict, That they ſhould defend down the mountains Aſidos, together with their wives and children, and bring away with them all that they had. But the Ligurians ſent their Embaſſadors oftentimes to intreat, that they might not be forced to abandon their domeſtick gods, the place of their nativity, and the ſepulchres of their ancestors; and therewith promiſed to deliver up their armor, and to put in hoſtages, being they could not prevail upon having ſtrength and power enough to wage war againſt the edict and proclamation. So there was tranſlated from thence at the publick charges of the City, to the number of four thouſand perſons free born, together with their wives and children: and unto them was allowance made of 150000 Seltences, toward the building of new houſes. And for to diſtribute and divide land among them, the ſame men (to wit, Cornelius and Baſilius) had commiſſion, who alſo removed them into thoſe parts. Howbeit at the request of theſe twain, there were Quinquagies or five commiſſioners aſſiſtants granted unto them by the Senat, by whoſe advice they might manage all. Theſe affairs being finiſhed, after they had brought with them to Rome their old army, they obtained of the Senat a grant to triumph. And ſo were the firſt that ever triumphed & made no war before. Only the enemies were led in their before their chariot; for nothing had they gained and won for to be carried or led in pomp; neither was there ought to be ſeen in their triumphs, which might be dealt and given among the ſouldiers.

The ſame year Fulvius Flaccus the Pretor in Spain, by occaſion that his ſucceſſor ſtaied long ere he came into the province, brought forth his army into the field out of his wintering camp, and began to waite and ſpoil the farther parts and territories of Celtiberia: from whence the inhabitants came not in to ſubmit and do their homage and fealty. By which deed of his, he rather provoked and angered the barbarous people, then terrified them: for when they had ſecretly gathered together certain forces and companies, they beſet and barred the paſſage Meduſianum, by which they were aſſured that the Roman army would paſſe. As L. Poſthumus Albinus was upon his journey into the nether province of Spain, Gracchus his colleague charged him to advertiſe Quintus Fulvius for to bring his army to Tarracen, for that he propoſed there to diſcharge his old ſouldiers to diſtribute the ſupply which he brought, & to range in order all his army by companies. Notice was given to Flaccus of the very day (which was neerer at hand) upon which his ſucceſſor would come. This new occurrent cauſed Flaccus to lay aſide thoſe enterpriſes which he intended, and inſtead to withdraw his forces out of Celtiberia. The barbarous people knowing not the cauſe hereof, but ſuppoſing that he had ſome inkling of their revolt, and how they had in ſecret taken arms, and that thereupon he was fore ſtaied, gauged and ſtopped the paſſage ſo much more frequently. Now ſo ſoon as the Roman army was entered into the paſſe one morning betimes at the break of day, the enemies aroſe ſuddenly at once out of two parts, and charged the Romans: which when Flaccus perceived, he gave commandment by the miniſtery of the Ceterions, that every man ſhould keep his place and ſtand his ground, to have his arms and weapons in readineſs; by which means he appeaſed the tumult and aſſright in his hoſt. Then after he had brought all his labouring beaſts with the baggage, unto one place, he embattelled and put in array all his bands and companies, partly by himſelf in perſon, and partly by his Lieutenants and colonels, according as the ground and the time required, ſhewing no ſign at all of fear, but putting in his own mind of the enemies, in theſe terms: "Ye have (quoth he) to do with thoſe that twice already yielded have yielded unto us, who are inured and practiſed ſtill in wickedneſs & perjury, not bettered in virtue and courage: thoſe (I ſay) who are like to make our return home horrible and glorious, which otherwiſe would have been obſcure and nothing memorable: ſo as we ſhall carry to Rome for a triumph, our ſwords all bloody and newly bathed in the green wounds and freſh miſſere of our enemies; and bear away the ſpoils of other bodies, all embowed and ſtill dropping with their blood. Time would not permit him to ſay any more, for now the enemies advanced forward, and the charge was already given in the utmoſt ſkirts of the army, and ſoon the main battels encountered and joyned conflict. The fight was hot and cruell alike in all parts, but the ſortune divers: for the Roman legions in the main battell fought valiantly, and the two wings of either hand did their devoir as bravely. The auxiliary ſtrangers had to deal with enemies armed in deed at all points like to themſelves, but better ſouldiers by odds then they were, in ſuch fort, as they were over-charged by them, and could not make good their ground. The Celtiberians perceiving they were not able to match the legions in ranged battell and cloſe hand-fight, caſt their companies into a pointed and coin-formed battalion, for to pierce perforce and enter upon their enemies in which manner of fight they are ſo ſtrong, that it is not poſſible to withſtand them, whereſoever they give their violent charge. And then the legions alſo were put in diſarray, and and the whole main battle after a long, was disbanding and broken. Which disorder and fear-full confusion when Flaccus perceived, he rode a gallop to the legion which of arms was best, and he up to them) is there no help at all on any side, this army here he has directed wisely and come to nought? Whereat they cryed on all hands to him, to give direction and speak only the word what he would have done, so he should see how they would best themselves in the execution of his commandment. "Marry (quoth he,) double your ranks, you that are the northernmost of the ene-

"legions, and run your bodies with full carrier against that, which is the front battail of the ene-
"gies, wherewith they press upon our men; and thus shall you proceed with the brave violence of your bodies, if you disbande them and let them have full heads, and let their arms and legions
"among them: which we have reason to think, that the Romans many a time have done, and "their great praise and honour. No longer said, but downe it was pluckt, were they thrust their hostile heads; twice they ran through the midst of them to and fro, from one side to the other, broke all their lances upon the enemy, overthrew them, and made foul work and slaughter among them. When this pointed battail of the Cæliberians was once broken, (even as he had and only hope they had;) then they began to fear and tremble, when were they at the point to quit the fight, and to look about them which way to take their flight. The chief ordinarie Genery in the out-wings (seeing to brave a service performed by the Roman horsem) were and incited by their valorous example, and of their own accord without attendance of any commandment, charged upon their enemies, but disordered and in dismay already. Then the Cæliberians ran away and fled on all hands. The Roman General, seeing them once thus back and shew their big parts, vowed to build a chappell to Fortuna equitum, and to reward in the honor of Imp. Opt. Max. The Cæliberians, thus disbanding and scattered in the all over the length of the streight passage, were killed and cut in peeces. It is recorded that that day seventeen thousand enemies, and were taken prisoners alive more then three thousand, together with 27 field ensignes, and well near eleven hundred horses. For that day, the victorious army lodged within no camp at all: yet not this victory to gleet, but it kept the solle of some fouldiers: for of the Romans were slain four hundred seventy and two; of namely of Latins 1019; and together with them, aid fouldiers three thousand. Thus the having by this good hand recovered their ancient honor and glory, was conducted to Tarentum.
Tib. Sempronius the Pretor, (who was arrived two daies before) went out to meet Fulvius in the way as he came, and shewed how he rejoiced on his behalf. For this good man, and happy achieving the affairs of the commonweal, which done, they agreed together with accord as touching the fouldiers, namely, whom to caule and send away, and whom to still in service. Then Fulvius having shipped the fouldiers that were discharged, took his journey Rome; and Sempronius conducted the legions into Ciliciana.

Both the Consuls led their forces into Liguria, and entered the countrey in two divers quarters.
Posthumius with the full legion and the third, beiet and invetled the two mountains, Alpe and Suismonium, and so freighly he kept the narrow passes of those parts with his garrisons, that he cut them off from all vicuals, and rained them with extreame scarcity and want of all things.
Fulvius with the second legion and the fourth, after he had assailed the Apuan Liguria from the coast of Pisa, received submission and homage of as many of them as inhabited about the river Macra; and when he had embarked upon seven thousand of them, he sent them over to Nepes, coasting along the Tuscan sea. From whence they were brought into the Samniti countrey, and a certain territory assigned them to inhabit amongst the rest of their countrymen. As for Posthu- mus, he cut down the vineyards, and burnt the corn of the Ligurian mountayners, so long until they were driven by all manner of calamities following war, to come in and submit, yet not to deliver up their armor and weapons. From thence Posthumius departed and took the sea, because he would visit the coasts of the Ligurian Inguanes and Intemelians. Now, before that the Consuls came to the army which was appointed to meet at Pisa, it chanced A. Posthumius & M.
Fulvius Nobilior, the brother of Q. Fulvius, were the commanders, and had the conduct thereof.
This Fulvius was a Colonel of the second legion, who during the time of those months, wherein by turn he had the command and charge thereof, dismissed that legion, having bound the Contributors by an oath, that they should make payment back of their wage-mony well and truly to the Quæstors in the chamber and treasury of Rome. Notice hereof being given to A. Posthumius at Placentia, (for thither it hapned that he was gone) he rode after those called fouldiers, and pursued them with a company of light horsemen. As many of them as he could overtake, after he had checked and rebuked them for their fault, he brought to Pisa; of the rest he gave information to the Consul. Who put the matter to question; and after it had been debated in council, an ad of the Senat passed against the said M. Fulvius, that he should be confined and sent into Spain beyond new Carthage. And letters he gave him to carry from the Consul to P. Manlius into the forer province of Spain. As for the fouldiers, they were commanded to return again to their colours, and for an ignominious disgrace of that legion, ordained it was, that for a full years pay they should be content and take up with six months wages. And look what fouldiers repined not to the army accordingly, the Consul had warrant and commission to make sale of him and all that he had.

The same year L. Dronius, who was returned with ten ships to Brundisium from out of Illy- rium (where he sat as Pretor the former year) leaving his ships there in the rode, came to Rome where wherein discoursing of the acts by him done, he laid the whole fault of all the recovery and piracy at (as upon) Geminus the King of the Illyrians, saying, that all the ships which had lien upon the coast of the Adriatick sea, came out of his realm. For which he had sent Embassadors to complain, but they could never find means to speak with the King about it. Now they were Em-bassadors arrived at Rome from Geminus, who avouched, that when the Romans came for to parle with the King, he hapned to be sick in the most remote parts of his kingdom; and therefore Gemi- nus the King and master requested the Senat, not to give credit to those false accusations and forged slanders which his enemies had raised and informed against him. But Dronius alleged moreover, that divers and sundry persons, as well citizens of Rome as Latine allies within his dominion, had received many wrongs: yea, and by report certain Roman citizens were slain and deprived at Corcyra. Whereupon it was in council thought good that they should be brought to Rome, and that C. Claudius the Pretor should have the hearing of the matter, before (each time no answer would be given unto King Geminus or his Embassadors).

Among many others that the plague this year consumed, certain priests and prelats also died, and namely, L. Valerius Flaccus, a bishop, in whole room was chosen Q. Fabius Labeo. Also P.
Manlius one of three Triumvirs for the celebration of the holy feasts. In whole stead Q. Fulvius the son of Marcius was elected Triumvir. He was at that time very young, and not out of his embrodered Prætoratus. But as touching the King of sacrificers, who was to be chosen in place of C.
Cornelius Dolabella, there was debate between C. Servilius the Archibishop, and Cornelius Do- labella one of the Duumvirs for the navy. For when the bishop would have had him to resign that office, that he might consecrate and inaugurate him the King sacrificer, he refused to do so. For which cause the bishop let a round fine on the Duumvir his head. Then Dolabella appealed to the people; and before them it was to be tried, whether the said fine should be taken off or paid. Now when most of the tribes called into the rails for to give their voices, advised the Duumvir to obey the bishop, and awarded the fine to be pardoned and remitted, in case he would give over that office which he had, beheld it lightened at the very instant from heaven, which is the only ominous sign that interrupteth the assemblies of the people. Whereupon the Colledge of the bishops made trophe of conscience to inaugurate Dolabella, but he contrived P. Clodius Scævola, who had been sacred in the second place. In the end of the year C. Servilius Geminus likewise the Archbishop himself departed this world, who also was one of thæten Decemvirs deputed for the holy ceremonies. And Q. Fulvius Flaccus, was by the colledge of the bishops, elected bishop in his room, but M. Aemilius Lepidus was created the forever Pontifex, notwithstanding many noble persons made suit therfore. Likewise Q. Martius Philip a Decemvir for the holy mysteries, who chosen in his place. Moreover, there deceased Sp. Posthumius an Augur. In whole stead P.
Scipio the son of Africanius was elected by the Augurs. The same year granted it was to the inhabitants of Coma, at their own request and petition, that they might commonly speak Latine: as also to the publick critics, to make portale of goods in the Latine tongue. The Senat gave thanks to the Pits for the offer they made of lands, wherein to plant a Colony of Latins. And three Triumvirs or Commissioners for that business were created, namely, Q. Fabius Emericus, Marcius and Fabius, both named Popilius, and both surnamed Lenax. Letters were brought from M. Manlius the Pretor (who having the government allotted unto him of Sardinia, had commission also to expiate the practice of poisoning in all places, not within ten miles of the City of Rome) importing that much, that he had condemned already 3000 persons, and that the informations and preliments multiplied daily, by reason of new matters discovered still, and therefore either he was to give over that inquisition, or to resign up his province Sardinia.

Q. Fulvius Flaccus returned out of Spain to Rome with great honour for his acts there atchiev-
ed. Who remaining yet without the City, because of his triumph, was created Consul with L.
Manius Acidinus, and within few daies after, rode triumphant into Rome, accompanied with his soldiers, whom he had brought home with him. He carried in triumph a 150 * golden comones. Moreover in gold 31 pound weight, besides 17300 peeces of coin in Oscan silver. He died to his soldiers fifty Denarii peeces out of the booty and pillage which he had gotten. To every Centurion he gave it double, and to the gentlemen of Rome that served on horseback, triple.
The like he did by the Latin allies, and to all in general he paid double wages. This year was the law first proposed by L. Julius a Trib. of the Com. as touching the year of the age requit, and need for to sue for any publick office, or to exercise the same. And hereupon it came, that the whole race of that family was turnamed * Annalis. Many years after there were created four Priests according to the law Febria, which provided that there should be each other year four chosen.
And these were they who were first elected, namely, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, L. Valerius Lavinius, and Alboth named Muri, and both surnamed Scævola.

Unto the Consuls Q. Fulvius and L. Manlius the government of the same provinces was ordained, that to those of the former years, with like numbers of horse and foot, as well citizens as allies. In both provinces of Spain, Tib. Sempronius and L. Posthumius continued still to have the command and conduct of the same armies which they had. And for to furnish them out, the Consuls were enjoined to enroll three thousand footmen, and three hundred horsemen of Roman citizens five thousand and foot of Latin allies and four hundred horse. P. Manlius Scævola by lot had the conduct jurisdiction within the City of Rome, and commission to enquire into the devilish art of poisoning both within the City, and within the compass of ten miles. Cn. Cornelius Scipio was lord chief justice in forrain pleas and causes, Q. Minius Scævola was lord deputy of Sicily and C. Valerius in Sardinia. Q. Fulvius the Consul, before that he went in hand with any of his affairs of State, said he would both discharge himself and also the City of the duty to God and men, in performing the vows which he had made. He declared that on that very day when he fought his last battell with the Celtiberians, he had made a vow to exhibit games to the honour of that most mighty and gracious god Jupiter, and likewise to build a temple to Fortuna Augustina; and how thereto the Spaniards had contributed certain sums of money. So a decree passed, that the plaies should be set forth: and two Duumvirs chosen, to give order and direction to the celebration of the same temple. Likewise there was set down a certain sum of money to be distributed for the defraying of the charges: to wit, not exceeding that sum in the solemnity of the plaies, which was allowed unto Fulvius Nobilior, when he exhibited the like sports after the end of the Numid war. Item, that for these games he should not seek or lend for: garb and attire, neither do any thing, contrary to the Act of the Senat, which in the time of L. Emilius and Cn. Domitius Consuls was made as touching such palliages. This decree the Senat likewise, by consent of the superfluous and excessive expenses employed about the plaies of T. Sempronius the Aedile, which were very chargeable not only to Italy and the Latine allies, but also to foreign provinces. The winter this year was very sharp, by reason of snow, and all manner of tempestuous weather. The trees that were tender and subject to frost and cold, were all blasted and killed: besides the winter season continued much longer then ordinary in other years. And thereupon the solemnity of the Latine holidays were so troubled and disordered by a sudden and insupportable storm and tempest upon the hill [Alva] that by an ordinance of the Bishops, it was celebrated again the second time. The same tempest call down certain images in the Capitol, and disfigured many very many places with thunderbolts and flashes of lightning. It overthrew the temple of Jupiter in Tarracina, the white temple at Capua: Item, the gate there called Rimana, and the ornaments of the walls in divers places. Among these wondrous prodigies it was reported also from Reate, that an ale was foaled with three feet. For this cause the Decemvirs were commanded to go to the books of Sibylla: and out of that learning, they shewed to what gods honours should be made, & what number of beasts was to be killed. And because many places were with lightning defaced, they ordained that a solemn supplication should be holden one whole day in the temple of Jupiter. This done, the forelaid games and plaies which Q. Fulvius the Consul had vowed, were with great magnificence exhibited for ten daies together. After this followed the election of the Censors, wherein M. Emilius Lepidus the Arch-bishop, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, who had triumphed over the Stolians, were created. Now between these two men there had been notorious enmity, oftentimes testified and shewed in many sharp and bitter debates, both the Senat, and also before the people. When this election was ended, the two Censors according to the ancient use and custome, sat upon their ivory chairs of estate in Marble, near the altar of Mars. To whom there soon repaired thither, the principal Senators, accompanied with a troop besides of citizens: and among the rest, Q. Caelius Murellus made a speech to this effect. My matters, you that are Censors, we have not forgotten that you ere-while were chosen by the universal body of the people of Rome, to be superintendents and wardens over us of our manners and behavior: and that it becometh us to be taught, admonished, & directed by you, and not by us. Howbeit we ought to tell and declare, what there is in you, that either is offensive to all good men, or at least will which they wish were amended. When we behold indeed you severally part, either you O. M. Emilius, or you M. Fulvius, we have not this day in the City of Rome any men, whom if we were called to a new solemnity for to pacify our voices again, we would prefer before you to this office and place of dignity. But when we see you both together, we cannot chide but much doubt and fear that ye are very badly matched and coupled companions in government: & that the common-weal shall not receive so much good by this. That ye please and like us all to well, as to sustain harm in this, that you dispute and dislike one another. These many years together, there hath been great heat-burning and much malice between you and the same must needs be grievous and hurtfull unto you selves: but now it is decreed that from this day forward, that rancor will be more prejudicial to us & the common-weal, then unto you. Upon what motives and cause we are thus fearful, much we could say: but that peradventure your irreconcilable anger is such, as hath inured and possessed wholly your spirits and minds already. These quarrels, jars, and grudges of yours, we all in general would request you heartily to end this day, and in this very temple wherein we are assembled: and since the people of Rome by their voices have conjoined you in one office, suffer you selves by us to be linked & reconciled in perfect agreement. With one mind and accord, with one heart & counsel chuse the Senat; review the Cavalry and Knights of Rome; number the citizens; suffice their goods; purge and cleanse the City: & finally, continue unto the solemnity of the temple with a sacrifice. And whereas in all your prayers well-well, ye shall cite this ordinary form of words: That this thing, or that, may fall out in the end well and happily, so my self and my colleagues. See that you with the same truly, sincerely and from the very heart, that whosoever we shall pray unto the gods for, we may believe and all the world see, that you desire the same to be effected indeed. T. Tullius & Romulus in this very City reigned together with great unity & concord, in the midst whereof even in the very market place, they had encountered and joined battell together as mortal enemies with their cruel armies. What? not enemies only have an end, but wars also. And many a time most venomous and spiteful foes become faithful allies,

The Oration
to the Censors.

A Yes, and otherwhiles neer neighbors and fellow citizens. The Albans after their subversion and utter ruin of their City, were brought over to inhabit Rome. The Latins & Sabins both, were encodemized Romans. An old saying it is, and not so old as true, and for the truth become a common proverb, that enemies ought to be transitory and soon die, whereas friendship should continue & live for ever. At these words, there arose a confused bruit among them there assembled, in token of their content and approbation: and anon were heard the distinct voices of them all in general, craving and requesting of the Censors the same: which making one entire sound, brake off the speech of Ad. Tullius. Then Emilius among other matters complained, that M. Fulvius had twice put him besides the Consulship, which otherwise he was sure of. And Fulvius on the other side found himself grieved, that he evermore by Emilius had been provoked, and that he had waged law by stipulation against him to his dishonor and disgrace. Yet both of them made fair and shewed, that if the one were as willing as the other, they would relent and be over-ruled by so many honorable personages of the City. So, at the instant request of all them that were present, they took hands and thereby assured one another to forgive and forget all matters past, and truly to make an end of malice, and be perfect friends again: whereupon they were much commended by the whole assembly, and conducted by them into the Capitoll. Where the Senat approved and highly praised, as well the careful industry of the principal citizens, in effecting this so weighty matter, as also the good nature and flexibility of the two Censors. Who afterwards when they required to have a certain sum of money assigned unto them for to employ in the public edifices and other works of the City, were allowed by their decree, the full rent and revenues of one whole year.

C The same year L. Posthumius and Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Pretors in Spain agreed to together that Albanus should make an expedition against the Vaccii through Lusitania, and to return from thence into Celiberia. But Gracchus went as far as the utmost quarter of Celiberia, for that in those parts there was the greater war. And still he forced the City Munda, which he surprised suddenly in the night at unawares. Then, after he had received hostages, and put a garison there, he went forward assailing forts and burning the villages, until he came to another City of exceeding strength, which the Celtiberians call Cerrintha: where, as he was about to approach the wall with his engines of battery, there came unto him orators out of the City, who like good plain men of the old world, made a speech unto him, nothing dissembling but that they would war and be revenged, if their strength and forces were sufficient. For they requested leave to pass to the Celtiberian camp, there to receive aid and succour: but if they could not speed, then they would confide: part by themselves what to do. Good leave they had of Gracchus: and some few daies after, they brought with them ten Orators more. About noone-tide it was of the day, and the first thing that they craved at the Pretor his hand was this, That he would make them to drink before they parted. When they had once quaffed and carrowied round, they called again for more: whereat, all that were present and stood about them, laughed heartily, to see them so rude and uncivil, and altogether without good manners. But afterwards, the eldest man of the company began in this wise: We are sent (quoth he) unto you from our nation, to know what assurance hath induced you to levy war against us? To this demand Gracchus answered, That because with the confidence that he had in a brave and valiant army: which (if they were so deficient) he would do them the favour to see, that they might be able to make more certain report to their countrymen upon their own knowledge. And with that, he commanded the colonels and high marshals, to put in arms and embattell all the bands and companies, as well foot as horse; and then armed as they were to charge one upon another in manner of a battell. These Embassadors as they had once seen this sight, were sent away: who went directly to the Celtiberians their neighbors, and frightened them for sending any succour to the City besieged. The townsmen within hung in vain at fire-lights in the night time aloft upon their towers, which was the signal agreed upon between them) and seeing themselves destitute of the only hope they had of aid, yielded by compulsion. So they were enjoined to make payment of four and twenty hundred thousand Solennes; and to deliver forty of their noblest gentlemen and best men of arms: not by way of hostages (for commanded they were to serve in the wars); and yet in truth, they stood for a piece of assurance for their fealty. From thence anon he marched to the City Alva, where the Celtiberians lay encamped and from whom of late the Embassadors aforelaid came: whom, for certain daies he provoked to fight, making small skirmishes; by sending out against their corps de guard his light-armed vanguarders, to the end that shuffling together every day more then other he might train them all forth of their camp at length. And when he perceived once that his design had taken effect, he commanded the captains of the auxiliary souldiers, that after some short skirmish, they should make semblant as if they were overcharged with numbers, and so at once turn their backs, and flee as fast as they could to their own camp: himself in the mean while got his men in battell array within the rampier at every gate. Long it was not, but he might see his own bands and companies retiring back on set purpose, and running away, and after them the barbarous enemies following as hard as they could in chase. Now had his army embattelled for the purpose, and ready to receive them: and therefore he made no longer stay then only to suffer his friends and allies to enter at liberty into the camp, but he set up a loud cry, and at one instant issued forth at all the gates. The enemies were not able to endure this unexpected charge: and so they that were come to assail the camp of others, could not so much as defend send their own: for presently they were discomfited and put to flight; and within a while driven for very fear into their hold, and in the end turned out of it also. That day 9000 of the enemies left their carriages in the field: 320 were taken prisoners, together with 120 kites, & 750 dead ensigns. Of the Roman army, there died not above 100. Presently after this battle, Gracchus marched with his legions to wait and spoil the country of Celiberia: and so he made havoc in all places as he went, with driving booties, & with harrying & carrying all that ever he could come by: the Cities and States of the country, some submitted willingly of their own accord; others for constraint & fear received the yoke of subjection: so as in few daies space he became master of an 103 towns that yielded unto him. A mighty rich pillage he gat in this expedition. After this he marched back again towards the City Alia from whence he came, and began to besiege and assault the town. The inhabitants endured the first assault of the enemies, but afterwards seeing their town not only assailed by force of arms, but also shaken with engines and instruments of battery, diffulting the strength of the City, they retired all within their fortress: from whence also to the end, (having sent their Orators before-hand) they & all that ever they had, were at the devotion of the Romans. A great booty there was gotten, and many noble gentlemen taken prisoners amongst whom were two sons and one daughter of Thurinus. This Thurinus was a prince and great lord of those parts, and simply the mightiest potentat of all the Spaniards by many degrees, who being advertised of the hard hap and calamity fallen upon his children, sent unto Gracchus into the camp for a safe-conduct, and thither he came himself in person. And first he demanded, Whether he could grant unto him and his their lives? The Pretor answered, That they should live. Then he demanded again, if he might bear arms and serve under the Romans? and when Gracchus permitted that also; Then will I follow you (quoth he) against mine old friends and allies, since they disdain to respect & regard me. From this time forward he took part with the Romans: and in many journeys he bare himself loyally and valiantly in their wars, and much advanced the Roman State. After this, Ergavica (a noble, rich and mighty City) affrighted at the calamities of other neighbor towns and States about them, let the gates open for to receive the Romans. Some Authors have written, that their towns and Cities yielded not bona fide and in sincerity of heart: but that so soon as he had withdrawn the legions out of any quarter, suddenly from that part they revolted: also, that afterwards, he fought a cruell battle near the mountain Canis with the Celiberians, from the break of day until noon: in which conflict there were many slain both of the one side and the others: neither did the Romans any other great deed (as they suppose) at Ergavica that day to tellifie their victory, but kept the field, and challenged them out of their camp to fight. Moreover, that the next morrow all the day long, they gathered up the spoils of the dead: & on the third day strooke a second battle, which was greater than the other: & both at length, the Celiberians without all doubt lost the field clear; inasmuch as their camp was ransacked. Furthermore, that there died of the enemies that day 22000, and not so few as 300 taken prisoners, and well-near as many horse, besides the winning of 72 military ensigns: and for the war came to a final end, the Celiberians made peace indeed, continued fast and firm therein with all loyalty, and were not so fickle & unconstant as before. They write moreover, that the same summer L. Posthumus fought a brave battle with the Asses in the father province of Spain, where he put to the sword 35000 enemies, & forced their camp. But it soundeth more like a truth, that he came not timely enough into that province, for to perform any such exploits during that summer season.

The Censors made a review and new choice of Senators in good concord and faithful unity: for the president of the Senat was cl. Julo, M. Aemilius Lepidus the Censor himself, who also was the high priest or Arch-bishop. Three Senators were exiled and deprived their places: but Lepidus held some in, whom the colleague over-passed and left out. Of that portion of money, which out of the main allowance was divided between them, they caused these pillars following to be made. Lepidus for his part raised the great cauley or wharf at Tarracina, which was a piece of work nothing acceptable to the people, for that he had himself lands and possessions there of his own, and seemed to ease his privat expenses, under colour of doing a publick work with the Cities money. He built a Theatre, a store-house or a vane-scaffold near the temple of Apollo. He bargained with the Publicans or Undertakers for the polishing, blanching and whitening of the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol, and likewise of the pillars about it. From these pillars he removed the Images and Statues, which seemed to have been unhandfomly set one against another, and out of all order. Likewise he took from thence, the targets and field-ensigns of all forts, that were there set up and fastned. But M. Fulvius put forth to making more works in number, & those of better and greater use; To wit, a peer, and certain main piles within the river Tiberus: upon which piles, cert. in years after P. Scipio Africanus and L. Mummius being Censors, took order for arches to be founded and erected. Item, a stately hall or palace behind the new shops of the Banquers. Item, a fish market, with others shops round about him, which he sold to particular persons. Item, a market place, and a porch or gallery without the gate Tergemina, and another behind the arsenal, and near the temple of Hercules. Item, near Tyber, and behind the church of the goddess Hope, he caused to be built the chappell of Apollo the Physitian. Now they had besides another flock of money in common, which they employed in taking order for water to be conveyed into the City, and certain vaults to be made. But this work was impeached by M. Licinius Crassus, who would not suffer the water to passe through his ground. Over and besides these (saie Censors, inflicted certain rents for postage, & pondage, & divers other imposts. Many chappells & public

pl. cells

A places in the tenure and occupation of privat persons, they took order to be reduced to the use of the people in common, and to be let open for all comers. They changed the order of giving voices, and caused to enroll the tribes according to sundry quarters and divisions, having regard withal of the degrees of men, of their trades, myteries and occupations. Altho the one of the Censors M. Aemilius tied unto the Senat, that allowance should be made unto him of money for the games and plaies at the dedication of the Temples of Queen Juno and Diana, which in the Ligurian war he had vowed eight years before; and assigned there was unto him twenty thousand Allies. So he dedicated both those Temples within the cirque or show-place of Flaminius. Also he exhibited Stage plaies three daies together after the dedication of the Temple of Juno, and two daies after the other of Diana: and every of those daies within the cirque Flaminius. The time Censor dedicated in Mars field a Chappell to the sea-gods, vowed by L. Aemilius Regillus eleven years before, in a navall battell at sea against the Captains of K. Antiochus. Over the gates of which Chappell there was fixed a table with this title, [For the appeasing and composing of a quarrel between two Kings, "the head," to subdue, "for to make peace." This conflict, when L. Aemilius Regillus the Praetor, the son of M. Under the charge, command, and government, happily fought, and conducted of him between Epheus, Samos, and Chios, the fleet of King Antiochus the second, thereupon the Kalends of February was vanquished, discomfited, broken, battered, and put to flight, thereupon the same day two and forty Gallies were taken, with all the mariners and servants within them. After which fight King Antiochus and his Realm, "... In consideration hereof vowed a Temple to the Sea-gods, assisting unto him in achieving the navall victory.] Another table likewise, with the very lame inscription, was set up and fastned over the gates of the Temple of Jupiter in the Capitol. Within two daies after that the Censors had chosen a new Senat, Q. Fulvius the Cof, made an expedition against the Ligurians: and after he had passed with his army over wilds and mountains, where no tracks led them, through straits and passes of forrests, he fought a pitched battell with the enemies, and not only won the field, but also in one and the self-same day forced their camp. Whereupon three thousand and two hundred of the enemies, and all that quarter of Liguria yielded unto him. Then the Consul placed these that had surrendered, in the plains and champaign country, and planned garrisons upon the mountains. Letters hereof with great speed came to Rome: whereupon there were ordained processions for three daies. During which time of procession, the Pretors celebrated sacrifices, and killed forty greater beasts. But the other Consul D. A. Manlius did not exploit worth remembrance in Liguria. Three thousand Transalpine Frenchmen pulled over the Alps into Italy, in peaceable manner marching without any hostility or harm done, and requested of the Consul and the Senat a territory to inhabit, where they might remain quietly under the feignory of the Romans. But the Senat commanded them to avoid out of Italy: and gave the Consul Q. Fulvius in charge to make search and enquiry into this matter, yea, and to proceed against them who had been the captains and counsellors to periwade them to pass over the Alps.

This very year died Philip King of the Macedonians, worn away to nothing, partly, for age, and partly with grief of heart after the death of his son Demetrius. It befell that he kept his winter in Demetrius, tormented with anguish of mind for the loss and misis of his son, disquieted with remorse and repentance for his cruelty against him, which hung and pricked his guilty conscience. Besides, he saw his other son (who now was the undoubted heir apparent of the Crown, as well in his own opinion as in the conceit of others) how all men turned their eyes and courted to him: he considered withal, how his old age was despitied and forlorn; while some expected his death others did not so much as look for it; which was the greatest grief and trouble of all other. And together with him, there was Antigonus the son of Echeateris, bearing the name of his uncle Antony by the fathers side, who had been guardian to Philip. This Antigonus the elder had been a man of princely port and regal majesty; renowned also for a brave conflict and noble battell against the enemies of the Lacedaemonian. And him the Greeks for distinction sake from other KK. of that name, furnished T. Tor or his nephew or brothers son I. Iay. Antigonus, of all the honourable friends that Philip had, was the only man that continued fast and firm unto him without all corruption. But this his loyall fidelity and truth caused Perseus to be no friend of his, but rather the unworkmortal enemy that he had in the world. This said Antigonus forecalking in his spirit, in what dangerous terms he should stand, when the inheritance of the kingdom were devolved upon Perseus moaning his first time and opportunity: when he perceived that the Kings mind was troubled, and that now and then he fetched deep sighs for sorrow that his son was dead; one while would give ear only to the Kings words, otherwhiles also would find some talk and minister occasion to break in the self so rashly and unadvisedly committed. Oftentimes he followed and seconded him in his moans and complaints, and would be thought to lament with him for company. And (as Trachetes alwayes to give many signs and tokens of her self coming to light) he would encourage and help forward every small thing what he could, to the end that all might the sooner be disclosed and break forth. The chief ministers and instruments of this villanous fact, were Apellus and Philotes, who were the Embassadors sent to Rome, and had brought thither pernicious letters, under the name of Fl. Minius, which wrought the death of Demetrius. For commonly it was given out through all the Kings Court, that those were falsified letters, forged by his Secretary, and sealed with a counterfeit signet. But the thing being rather deeply suspected, than apparently detected, it chanced that Antigonus upon a time met with Xyebus, and laying hold upon him, arrested

* Guardian or Protector.

* This seemed to be the Secretary.

arrested his body, and brought him into the Kings house; and when he had left him in the custody of certain persons he went himself directly to Philip. "It should seem to me, & if it please your grace (quoth he) by many words which I have observed, that you would perceive a great deal to know the whole truth as touching your two sons, and be relieved whether of them twain it was that laid wait to take away the life of the other. Now the only man of all those that can undo the knot and clear this doubt, is in your hands forth coming, and that is Axybus. Herewith he advised the King to call before him the said party, since that (as it fell out) he was already brought into the Court. Sent for he was and presented before the King; and being asked the question he denied every thing at the first; but with such inconsistency, as it appeared evidently, that upon some little fear of torture offered unto him, he would be ready to betray all for the very light of the tormentor and the scourges, he relented. Then he disclosed and shewed in order the whole proceeding and manner of this wicked practice and villany, how it was wrought as well as by the ambassadors as also by his own self their minister. Immediately there were some of purpose sent to apprehend the said ambassadors, And Philotes who was present in the way they surprised and took of a sudden for Apelles (who had been sent to pursue one Chereas) being advertised how that Axybus had bewrayed & told all, failed over into Italy. As concerning Philotes, there is no certainty known. Some report, that at the beginning he denied the matter stoutly; but after that Axybus was brought to his face and confronted him, he stood no longer in. Others say again, that being put to torture he endured the pains, and continued still in the denial. Philip sorrow and grief was by this means renewed and redoubled, reputing himself more unhappy in his sons, and his misery the greater, in that one of them was now dead and gone. Perseus being certified that all was discovered, took himself for a greater and mightier person, than to fear and think it needfull for him to flie upon it. And therefore he fought only to keep far enough out of the way, purposing to stand upon his guard all the while that his father lived, and avoid the burning fire (as it were) of his burning choler. Philip seeing that he could not possibly come by his person (so to execute justice, thought upon that which only remained to be done, and studied how Perseus besides impunity, should not be recompensed and rewarded also for that his wickedness. He called therefore Antigonus before him. unto whom he was bounden and beholden already, for bringing to light the unnatural murder committed upon Demetrius his son; and of whom he conceived this opinion, in regard of the fresh and late glory of his uncle. Antigonus that the Macedonians should have no cause to be ashamed or repent, if they had him for to be their King. And in this wise he brake with him: "Since my unhappy fortune is such (quoth he) O Antigonus, that I ought (contrary to all other fathers) to wish my self childless, I have a mind and purpose to make over unto you that kingdom, which I received at the hands of your uncle, whither he preterred and kept you, and augmented for my behoof during the time of my nourse, & wherein (whiles I was under his guardianship) he bare himself not only valiant, but also true and faithful unto me. No man I have but you, whom I can esteem worthy to wear the Crown; and if I knew of none at all, yet had I rather that both it and the Realm perished and were extinct, than ever that Perseus should enjoy it as the gerdon of his ungracious & devilish fact. I shall imagine yet that Demetrius is risen from death to life, I shall think that I have the fruition of him again if I leave you in this place, you, I say, the only man of all others that wept for the death of the poor innocent young man, and lamented for my unhappy error and unfortunate trespass. After this speech with Antigonus, he never ceased to entertain and grace him in the face of the world with all kind of honour that he could devise. For seeing that Perseus was in Thrace, Philip went in progress to every City of Macedony, and recommended Antigonus to all the Princes and States thereof. And without all doubt, if God had given him longer life but a little, he would have entailed him in full possession of the kingdom. Well, to return again unto Demetrius, where he wintered (as before is said) he departed from thence, and sojournd a long time in Thessaly. From thence after he was come to Amphipolis, he was surprised with a grievous malady. Howbeit, certain it was and very apparent that he was more sick in mind than body; and that ever and anon the remembrance and object, the apparition and ghost of his son, whom he called (innocent as he was) to be put to death, followed and haunted him so continually with care and grief, that he was out of all sleep, and could not lay his eyes together: yea, it drove him into raving, cursing, and execration of Perseus his other son; and so he ended his daies. But although Philip died somewhat with the soonest for Antigonus, yet he would have gone very near to have slept into his throne, if either the Kings death had immediately been divulged abroad, or that Antigonus had then been about the Court that he might have had intelligence thereof. For Calpurnus the Kings Physician, who had the cure of him, staid not untill the breath was fully out of the Kings body; but so soon as he perceived that his state was desperate, upon the first deadly signs that he observed, sent messengers post to Perseus, who were set of purpose in places convenient, according as it was compassed between them twain; so he concealed the Kings death from all them that were not of the household, until he was come. By which means Perseus surprised them all before they looked for him, or knew abroad that the King was departed; and thus he took the Crown upon him by policy, which he had purchased with mischief.

The death of Philip fell out very well to give some delay and respite, and to gather more forces for the waging of war: for the nation of the Balkan having been a long time solicited thereto, departed out of their own country, and with a great power as well of foot as horse, came on this

A side the river * Ister. Now there were arrived before to advertise the King hereof, Antigonus and Cato. This Cato was a nobleman among the Balkanians, And Antigonus was full against his will joyned in embassage & sent with Cato to raise the Balkanians. Howbeit, not far from Amphipolis they met with news (but very uncertain) of the Kings death: which occurrence troubled the whole court of their designs. For thus it was compassed, that Philip should give the Balkanians a safe passage through Thrace and find them victuals: to the effecting and performing whereof, he had entertained the peers and principall States of those quarters with presents, and allied them upon his fidelity, that the Balkanians should pass through their country peaceably without any harm-doing. Now his intent and full purpose was, to extinguish utterly the nation of the Dardaniens, and to plant the Balkanians in their country. Hereby he aimed at a twofold commodity: the one was this; that the Dardaniens (a people most malicious ever to the Macedonians, and who alwaies in time of troubles and adversities of the KK. took their vantage to annoy them) might be rooted out: the other, that the said Balkanians leaving their wives and children in Dardania, might be sent to wait and spoil Italy. Now were they to pass to the Adriaticke and so to Italy by the way of the Scordicians (for other way there was none to lead an army) and so forth would they thought he grant passage unto the Balkanians: for they differed not at all, either in language, or manners & fashions: and more than that, they were like enough to joyn with them in the expedition, seeing they went to the conquest and pillage of a most rich and wealthy nation. These designments were accommodated and fitted to what events forever should happen. For in case the Balkanians should happen to be defeated by the Romans and put all to the sword: yet this would be a comfort again; that the Dardaniens were confumed from the face of the earth, that he should meet with a booty of that which the Balkanians left behind them; and finally, bare the possession free and entire to himself of all Dardania. But in case their fortune were to have the upper hand, then whiles the Romans were averted from him and amused upon the war with the Balkanians, he should be able to recover whatsoever he had lost in Greece. These had been the designs projected by K. Philip. So they entred peaceably, and marched without hostility, under the word and promise of Cato & Antigonus. But shortly after that news came of the death of Philip: neither were the Thracians so tractable and easie to be dealt withall in commerce and traffick: nor the Balkanians could be content with that which they bought with their money, or be kept in order as they marched, but that they would break their ranks & turn out of the direct way. Hereupon they began to do wrong & injury on both sides one unto another, which encreasing daily more & more to outrages, kindled the fire of an open war. In the end, the Thracians were able to endure the violence & multitudes of these enemies, leaving their villages in the plains beneath, retired to an exceeding high mountain, called Dymae. To which place, when the Balkanians would have gone: behold notwithstanding they approached to the tops and ridge of the hills, they were surprised with a storm, much like to that wherewith the Gauls (as it is reported) perished at what time as they were a spoiling and pilling the Temple at Delphi. For they were not only drenched first with showers of rain pouring upon them, pelted afterwards with thick flocks of hailstones (struck with great cracks of thunder and blasted with gleams of lightning that dazzled their eye-sight; but also the lightning flashed fire upon them on every side, that it seemed they were charged and shot directly against their bodies: so as not only the common soldiers, but also the principall leaders and captains themselves were smitten down therewith and overthrowen. Whereupon when they were scattered & would have fled down the hill, from the exceeding steep rocks they tumbled down they knew not how with their heads forward. And albeit the Thracians pursued them thus scared and affrighted, yet they had nothing in their mouth, but that the gods forced them to run away, and that the sky fell upon them. Being thus dispirited with this tempestuous storm, and returned as it were out of a shipwreck into the camp from whence they set forth & most of them but half armed, they began to debate in council what to do. Hereupon arose some dissension among them: whiles part were of opinion to return back into their own country, and part advised to follow the way still and pierce forward into Dardania. About 30000 Perseus went through under the conduct of Clodius: the rest of the multitude returned the same way they came into the parts beyond * Duminius. Perseus being possessed of the kingdom, commanded Antigonus to be put to death: and whiles he was setting the States in order, and establishing himself in his own seat, he sent ambassadors to Rome, as well to renew the amity that his father had with the Romans, as also to request that he might be styled with the name of King by the Senate of Rome. And these were the affairs in Macedony that year.

* Quadratus the other Consul triumphed over the Ligurians; and known it was for certain, that this triumph was granted unto him more for favour, than for any great exploit of his that might deserve such honour. He carried in shew a mighty deal of the enemies arms: but little or none more all. Howbeit he dealt among his soldiers thirty Asses apiece: to every Centurie he gave twice as much, and to each Gentleman serving on horseback, the same threefold. There was nothing in this triumph more memorable and worthy the noting, than this, that as it fell out, he triumphed now the very same day that he had the year before upon his Pratorship. After his triumph, he published the general assembly for the election of Magistrates: whereto were created * Coff. M. Annus Brutus, and A. Manlius Velle. This done, when there had been three of the Prator elected a sudden tempest brake up and dissolved the assembly. The morrow after which was * four daies full before the Ides of March, the other three were chosen, namely, Marcus Titinius of March, Curvius, and Antiquarius of March.

Curios, Titus Claudius Nero, and T. Fonteius Capito. The Roman games were exhibited again the second time, by the two Adles of the Chair, Cn. Servilius Capito, and Ap. Claudius Censor, by occasion of certain prodigies that hapned: for there was an earthquake; and in the publick pavilions and tabernacles, where the sacred beds of the gods were solemnly spread, the heads of the gods which were laid in those beds, turned away of their own accord, and the wooll together with the other coverlets which were laid before Jupiter fell down. It was taken also for a prodigious wonder, that the mice and rats had gnawn and talted before of the olives upon the table, of Jupiter: for the satisfaction and expiation of which prodigies, nothing else was done, but the solemnizing of those games and plaies again, as is afore said.

The one and fortieth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and fortieth Book.

THe five in the Temple of Vesta went out. Tib. Sempronius Gracchus The Pro-Consul, overcame the Celtiberians, and received their submission, and for a memoriall of the worthy deeds by him achieved, he built a town in Spain called Gracchus. Posthumus Albinus the Pro-Consul, (whom the Poaceans and Lusitanians, and both of them triumphed, Antio. husshe son of King Antiochus, whom his father had given in host-age to the Romans, after the death of his brother Seleucus, who succeeded his father late deceased, was sent from Rome into the Realm of Syria. The Censors held a review, and numbering of the Citizens, and solemnly purged the City. There were enrolled in their books, of Roman Citizens 273244. Q. Voconius Saxa, a Tribune of the Commons, published a Law, That no man should make a woman to be his full heir, M. Cato was the man that perswaded and spoke for this Law, and his Oration is extant. Moreover, this book containeth the wars and exploits of many Captains against the Ligurians, Istrians, Sordanians, and Celtiberians; also the occasions and causes of the Macedonian war, which Pericles the son of Philip began: for he had sent an embassage to the Carthaginians, whereby gave audience unto in the night season. Other States also and Cities of Greece he followed. This Peloponnesus setting religion aside (for many stately and magnificent Temples he built in divers places, and namely, at Athens, at Jupiter Olympians; and at Antiochia, to Jup. Capitolinus) was otherwise a King of most boiste demourant and carrying.

THe beginning of this book, and the greater part thereof immediately ensuing, is lost. Imprimis, As touching the disposition of the Provinces by lot, as well of Consuls as Prætors; and namely, how the government of Gaul fell to A. Manlius, and of Liguria to M. Junius; and how of the Provinces of M. Titinius was assigned to the latter Province of Spain, and T. Fonteius to the farther: Nero to Etruria, T. Eburus to Sardinia, Itepa, as concerning the first of Vesta, the exploits of T. G. acclius and L. Albinus in Bistia, and Portugal: the survey and taxing of the City of Rome divided by the Censors; the Law Voconia, as touching the inheritance of women, mentioned in Cicero in S. Jugurthine de Civitate Dei; and others: finally, of the sedition achieved by M. Junius about Gracchus. And thus it sheweth a prærupt and broken front as yet.

To have armed the same whil hein peace he had received of his father; and for that cause it is said. That he was passing well beloved of the youth and lusty gallants, who desired nothing more than to spoil and raie booties.

Now when the Consul was in deliberation with his counsellors, as touching war in Istria, some were of opinion, to proceed thereunto incontinently: before that the enemies could assemble their forces; others advised to consult first with the Senat: but their counsel importured, who were for speedy expedition. So the Consul dislodged from Aquila, and encamped near the Lake Timavus, which lieth hard by the sea. A thither came Gaius Furius (one of the navall Duumvirs) with ten ships: for two such Duumvirs or wardens had been choien, to make head against the Illyrian fleet: who with twenty ships in all, keeping the upper sea, were to guard the sea-coasts so, as they had Ancora (as it were) the middle center between: for L. Cornelius took the charge of all that lay on the right hand thereof as far as to Tarentum; and C. Furius of the left, unto Aquila. These ten vessels (1 say) were sent to the next port, against the marches of Istria, with other ships of burden fraught with store of victuals and provision. The Consul followed after with his legions, and pitched his camp five miles from the sea. And within a short time there was a good and frequent market kept in the port, from whence there was conveyed all manner of provision into the camp. And to the end that this might hold in more security, good guards were set about the camp

An on every side. Toward * Istria there was one standing frontier garrison, consisting of a cohort of * Salavina. Placentians, levied on a sudden, opposed and lodged between the sea and the camp. And to the end the same might serve for a guard to defend them that watered at the river, M. Eburus (a Colonel of the two legions) was commanded to adjoin two squadrons of fouldiers out of the second legion. T. and C. both Alti, (Colonels likewise) had led the third legion, by the way that goeth to Aquila, which should guard the forragers and jewellers. From which quarter about a mile distant was the camp of the French. And a certain petty King there was among them, one Carmelus; having the conduct of three thousand armed fouldiers, or somewhat more. So soon as the Romans were approached, the lake Timavus with their camp, the Illyrians set them down secretly in a close place behind a little hill; and from thence followed the Roman army as it marched, by crooks and crooked waies, eysing and lying for all advantages that might be presented: for intelligence they had of all that was done either at sea, or by land. And when they perceived upon a time the corps de guard before the campeable and weak, and that there was a great number of unarmed Merchants between the camp and the sea, without any defence at all either from land or water, they ran at once upon the forlaid guards, to wit, the Placentine cohort, and also the squadrons of the second legion. Now their enterprise at the beginning was covered and hidden by occasion of a morning mist, which at the first warmth of the sun brake and scattered away, and then began somewhat to appear through it: but the light was not yet clear and come to the full; by reason whereof everything (as commonly in such a case) shewed far bigger than it was. And thus at that time mightily deceived the Romans, causing the army of the enemies to seem the greater by many degrees. At which sight, the fouldiers of the one guard as well as the other being affrighted, fled into the camp with a great tumult and alarm, and there caused far more fear than they brought with them: for neither were they able to tell why they fled thus as they did, nor give a ready answer to those that asked them the question. Over and besides, a great noise they heard from the camp gates, as where there was no sufficient guard to sustain the first assault. Besides, their running thus in a throng together in the dark, while one tumbled upon another, made such a confusion, that they knew not whether the enemy was within the rampier or no. No other cry was heard but this: To sea, To sea. For by occasion that one fouldier at adventure began to cry that note, all the camp presently rung again therewith, from one end to the other. Whereupon at first, (as if they had been commanded to do so) to the sea they ran, some few armed but the most part without any armor or weapons: afterwards more, and consequently at last in manner all yea, and the Consul himself, seeing that he laboured in vain to reclaim them, backe fled, and could prevail neither by command nor authority, nor yet with prayers in the end: only M. Licinius Strabo (a Tribune or Colonel of the third legion, abandoned of his own legion) remained behind with three ensigns and no more. The Illyrians finding him alone (for no man else was seen in arms to make resistance) centred joyntly into the camp ran upon him (as he was embattailing his fouldiers and encouraging them in the quarter about the Prætor his lodging) surprised, and with numbers over-charged him. The skirmish and fight was more cruel, than for proportion of so few defendants; and not ended, before that the Tribune himself and those about him, were slain every man. The General his pavilion and all about it, was overthrowen: which

Even when the enemy had ransacked and rifled of all that was there, they went as far as the treasurers lodgings, the market place, and to the gate Quintana: where they found abundance of all things (as out ready for their hands, and within the treasurers pavilion the tables spread and covered with good viands and meat upon them. Then their chief Lord & Leader (the petty King afore said) made no more ado but fate him down, fell to his victuals and made good cheer; and anon all the rest following his example, did so likewise, and never once thought of arms, or of enemies; and lieto those who were not wont to fare so well and feed liberally, they greedily overcharged their bellies with wine and viands: but the Romans all the while stood in far other terms: They trembled, they went hastily to their business both on land and sea. Down went the shipmen and sailors with their tiits and booties; and look what provision of victuals or other things were left forth to sale upon the strand and shore, they harried and hurried a shipboard: the fouldiers all affrighted ran amain to the sea-side, for to be embarked. The mariners fearing lest their vessels should be overcharged, some put back the prels and withstood them for coming in, others shore off from the wharfs, and lanchd into the deep. Hereupon began a braul and broil, and from that they fell together by the ears, fouldiers and mariners, one with another: some were away with knocks and wounds, and others left their lives behind them; untill at length, by the Consul his commandment the fleet was retired far from the land. Which done, he began to set the armed and unarmed apart. And hardly were there (of so great a multitude) twelve hundreded found with armor about them, and very few horsemen that had brought their horses with them. All the rest were a confused and disordered company, resembling the rascall sort of camp-followers, as victuallers, launders, scullions, and lackies: who had been a ready booty to have preyed upon in case the enemies could have thought upon any fears of arms. Then at last came a messenger to recall the third legion and to surprise the guard of the Gauls: and with that, from all parts they began to return again toward their own camp, for to recover it, and wipe away and blot out the shameful stain and dishonour which they had received. The Colonels of the third legion commanded the fouldiers to throw down upon the ground their forrage and fewell, they charged the Centurions to set the elder and unwieldy fouldiers two and two upon the horses and labouring.

* By that gate was the market served, and it led directly to it.

labouring beasts which they had discharged of their load; and willed the horsemen to raise up behind them every one a young lusty footman; shewing what an honour it would be to the third legion, for to regain by their valour the camp, which had been lost by the cowardice and fear of those in the second: and easily (say they) may it be won again, if the Barbarians, while they are encumbered with the pillage, might be surprised at unawares, and be taken themselves like as they overtook others before. This exhortation was received with great alacrity and contentment of the soldiers. Aloft were the ensigns born and advanced apace, neither staid the port-ensigns one whit for the soldiers. Howbeit the Coh, and those companies which were brought from the sea, came first to the rampier. L. Arua a principall Centurion of the second legion, not only encouraged the soldiers, but made remonstrance unto them, That if the Ilians their victories, had ever meant to guard and keep the camp with the same force of arms by which they had won it, they would at the first have pursued the enemies to the sea, so soon as they had turned them out of their tents: and afterwards have set a good corps de guard, at leastwise before the rampier and the avenues thereof: but like enough it is (saith he) that with guzzling wine they were dead asleepe like beasts. And herewith he commanded As Baculus his own ensign-bearer, a man of approved valour and singular prowess, to advance his banner forward. Mary, that I shall (quoth he) kill soon, if you will follow me alone that the thing may be done more quickly. With that he forced his whole strength, and having flung the ensign over the trench into the camp, he was the first himself that entered at the campgate. On another part likewise T. and C. both Alti, and Colonels of the third legion, were come with their Cavalry: then presently followed those also whom they had horled two by two upon the labouring jades and wagons of carriage, and after them the Coh, with his whole army. But of the Ilians few were there (such as were not stark drunk) whose wits and memory served them to run away: the rest were dead asleepe indeed, and never awoke again. So the Romans recovered all their goods, save only the wine and victuals which was devoured and consumed. The Roman soldiers who were crazy and sick and had been knit in the camp, after they perceived their own fellows within the rampier, found their hands again caught up weapons, and made a great slaughter and execution. But above all others C. Popilius, furnished Sabellus a Gentleman and Cavalier of Rome, bare himself most bravely that day, who being left in the camp (because he was hurt and maimed in one of his feet) slew the greatest number of the enemies by far. Eight thousand Ilians fell upon the edge of the sword, and not one taken prisoner alive: for the choleric and despicable indignation of the soldiers was such, as they had no mind at all of prizes and booties. Howbeit, the Coh, of the Ilians, drunk as he was had no good fortune as to be taken from the very boord where he sat, and hastily mounted on horseback by his men, and so fled a way and escaped. Of the winners there perished in all two hundred thirty seven soldiers: and of them, more died in their morning flight than in the recovery of their camp. Now it chanced so, that C. and L. both named Gaulus, new Colonels and inhabitants of Agintia, as they came with victuals, had like to have tumbled ignorantly upon the camp, when it was taken & possessed by the Ilians. They being retired back in great haste to Aquileia, leaving their carriage behind them, let all on a fright & uproar not only at Aquileia, but also at Rome within few daies after: for thither was the rumour run, That not only the camp was forced by the enemies, and (which was true indeed) the Romans put to flight, but that all was lost, and thereby utterly defeated. Whereupon, as the manner was in all sudden tumults and alarms, writs went forth for musters and levies of soldiers extraordinarily, not in the City only but also throughout all Italy. Two legions of Roman Citizens were enrolled, and the Latine allies were commanded to let out 10000 foot with 300 horse. M. Junius the Coh, had commandment to pass over into Greece, and to levy of the Cities and States of that Province, as many as they were able to make and furnish. It was ordained withall, that T. Claudius the Prætor should make proclamation, that the soldiers of the fourth legion, and of the Latine allies five thousand foot and two hundred and fifty horse, should meet together at Pise, and that in the absence of the Coh, he should defend that Province: also that M. Titinius the Prætor should appoint the Rendezvous at Ariminum: that the first legion and the like number of allies, as well foot as horse, should there assemble. Then Nepos took his journey, clad in his rich coat of arms, toward Pise his Province. And Titinius having to Ariminum Cassius a Colonel, to take the conduct of the legion there, took musters at Rome. M. Junius the Coh, passed out of Liguria into Gaul, and arrived at Aquileia, having levied aid-soldiers as he went of all the Cities of Gaul and the Colonies, to be in readinesse out of hand. There he was certified that the army was safe and found: whereupon he dispatched his letters to Rome to advertise them that they should not trouble themselves any more in this false alarm, and himself after he had discharged the Gauls of those aids which he had imposed upon them, went to his companion in government. Great was the joy at Rome, coming thus as it did unlooked for. The musters were laid aside, the soldiers discharged who were enrolled and had taken their military oath, and the army visited with the plague at Ariminum was dismissed and sent home. The Ilians albeit they were encamped with a great strength of armed men, not far from the Coh, his camp after they heard once that the Consul was come with a new army, disbanded and slipped every man away on all sides to their several Cities, and the Consuls retired with their legions to Aquileia there to winter.

When their troubles of Isfria were thus at length appeased, there went forth an act of the Senate, That the Coh, should agree between themselves, whether of them twain was to return to Rome for

As for to hold the assembly for election of Magistrates, As what time as A. Licinius Nervus, and C. Papirius Turdus, two Tribunes of the Commons, in all their Orations to the people, inveighed bitterly against M. Manlius in his absence, and promulged a Law to this effect, That after the Ides of March (for the Coh, had their governments already prolonged for one whole year) he should continue no longer in place, so the end that so soon as he was out of his office, he might presently be called to his answer judicially. Quintus Albius, one of their Collegues, withold this bill by them propoied, and after much debate and contention prevailed so much, that it passed not.

About the same time Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Posthumius Albinus, being returned out of Spain to Rome, had audience given them by the Prætor M. Titinius in the Temple of Bellona, that to discourse of the acts by them achieved, to demand their deserved honours, to the end that praise and thanksgiving also should be rendered to the immortal gods. Moreover, at the very same time intelligence was given by letters from T. Eburnus the Prætor, which his son brought and showed to the Senat, of great troubles in Sardinia: Namely, that the Ilians, joining unto them the strength of the Batari, had invaded the province (standing in peaceable terms: neither was he able to make head against them with so feeble an army as he had); the same wasted and consumed much with the pestilence. The same news related the Embassadors likewise of the Sardinians, making humble suit to the Senat, to relieve and succour their Cities at leastwise, for that their villages and country towns were already past help. This embassage, with all other matters concerning Sardinia, was put over to the new Magistrates: as pitiful an embassage also was presented unto them from the Lycians, who complained grievously of the Rhodians, unto whom they had been annexed and made subjects by L. Cornelius Scipio: Indeed, (say they) we lived sometime under the feignory of K. Antiochus, but that servitude of ours under the K., compared to this present state and condition wherein we now are, seemeth unto us an excellent liberty: for not only are we now yoked and kept under public authority in generally, by taxes, levies, and impositions, but every one in particular endureth meer bondage and slavery. Our selves are abused, yea, and our wives and children suffer villanies before our eyes: upon our bodies, our backs and sides they work upon and discharge their humour of cruelty: in our good name (an indignity unreportable) we are detained, depraved, and defamed: yea openly in the face of the world, they cease not to commit outrages against us, even to usurp and extend their authority over us, and to try matters upon us with extremity: to the end that we Lycians might be put of all doubt, that there is no difference between us and slaves bought and sold for silver in open market. The Senat moved with these remonstrances by the Lycians, addressed their letters to the Rhodians to this effect, that it was no part of their meaning and intent, that the Lycians should be slaves to the Rhodians: or that any other born free, should be enthralled by any person: but their will was, that the Lycians should in such terms live under the government and protection of the Rhodians, that both States, the one as well as the other, might range and frame themselves like good associates under the Dominion and Empire of Rome.

After this followed two triumphs over Spain, one immediately upon another: first, Sempronius Gracchus over the Celtiberians: and the morrow after, P. Posthumius Albinus [over the Lusitanians and other Spaniards of those parts. Tib. Gracchus carried in the new 4000 pound weight of silver: and Albinus twenty thousand. Both of them divided amongst their soldiers twenty five Denarii apiece, to each Centurion the same double, and trebble to every horseman. Thus did they satisfy allies as well as by Romans.

It turned about that time, that M. Junius the Consul, came out of Isfria to Rome, by occasion of the election which was to be holden: and when the two Tribunes of the Commons, Papirius and Licinius, had in the presence of the Senat baited and wearied him with interrogatories, as touching the affairs passed in Isfria, they brought him forth also before the body of the people. To which questions, after that the Consul had answered, how he had not been above 21 daies in the Province: and as for the things that hapned in his absence, he knew no otherwise than they did, only by the common bruit and report: then they went on urging him still, and asking how it came to pass, that A. Manlius rather came not to Rome, to give account unto the State, why he passed out of Gaul (which was his allotted Province) into Isfria? and to shew, when it was that either the Senat decreed, or the people of Rome granted by their voices to interfere in the war? But haply it may be said (quod he) that albeit the war was undertaken only upon his own head alone: yet no doubt, executed it was right worthily with policy and valour. Nay, I wis, but for counterwailies and hard it is to say, whether it were begun more lawfully than managed inconsequently. Two entire corps de guards were on a sudden at unawares surprized by the Ilians: the Roman camp was forced & taken with all the strength of horse and foot that was therein: the Coh scattered with our arms, and the Coh, himself was the foremost man that ran away to the sea (beside the ships: and surely he should render an account of all these matters, when he is a private person again since that he should not do to being Coh. This storm past the general assembly for the Magistrates election was holden: wherein were created Coff. C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. The next day following were the Prætors chosen: to wit, P. Albius Tullus the second time, C. Quintus Iunius, C. Nummius C. Mummius, Cn. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Valerius Levis. The civil jurisdiction of the City fell to Tullus, the sortain to Quintus. The government of Sicily was allotted to Nummius: of Sardinia to Mummius. Howbeit, this Province by reason of the great war therein became the charge of the Coh, And by lot it fell to Gracchus: but but Istria to Claudius his Collegue, Gaul was divided into two Provinces; whereof Scipio by lot obtained one, and Levinus the other.

Upon the Ides of March, on which day Sempronius and Claudius entered their Consulship, moved it was only in the Senat, as touching Sardinia and Istria, and the enemies to both those Provinces, who there had levied war. But the morrow after, the Embassadors of the Sardinians being referred over to the new Magistrates, and L. Manlius Thermanus who had been Lieutenant to the Consul Manlius in Istria, entered into the Senat-house. By them the Senat was informed how dangerous the wars were in those Provinces. Moved likewise were the Senators by the embassies of the Latine allies, who in the end were admitted into the Senat, after they had importuned the Censors and Consuls of the former year: the sum of their complaint was this, That their own Citizens being once enrolled at Rome, were most of them departed and removed thither to dwell: which if it might be suffered, within few reviews and cessings it would come to pass, that their Cities should be despoiled and desolat, their villages and fields desart and waste, and able to set out no fouldiers for the wars. Semblably the Samnites and Pelignians complained, that four thousand households were gone from them, and retired to Fregelle; and yet neither the one nation or the other, were set at a less proportion of fouldiers in all their levies. Two cautious means and devices there were brought up, whereby men changed thus their Cities at pleasure. The Law granted this indulgence to the allies of the Latine nation, as many as left issue of their race behind them in their house, that they should be reputed Citizens of Rome. By abusing this Law, much did injury to their allies, other wronged the people of Rome: for both they that were to leave such issue at home, gave their children as it were, in villenage to some Roman Citizen or other whom they liked of; with condition to manumit and make them free, that they might be Tribes or enfranchised Citizens, and they also who wanted issue to leave behind them, were held as Citizens of Rome. But in process of time without any of these colourable pretences of right, without regard of law and respect of issue, they crept in and had the benefit of the Bourgeoisie and freedom of Rome, by their transmigration thither to inhabit, by enrolment in the reviews. To meet with these practices, the embassadors craved a remedy for the time to come: as also that they would peremptorily command all their allies to repair again to their own Cities: with an expresse inhibition, that no man should receive any other to be his vassal and villain, and to tolerate him, with intention by that means to change the City wherein he lived: and that who so ever became Citizens of Rome after that manner, should not be counted for a Citizen. These petitions were granted by the Senat. Then were decrees passed for those provinces of Istria and Sardinia which were in arms, to wit, for the enrolling of two legions into Sardinia, having either of them five thousand and two hundred foot, and three hundred horse, besides twelve thousand footmen, and 600 horsemen of the Latine allies; and ten quinquiremes or gallees, with five banks of oars, in case the Generall would warp them out of the arsenal. The like numbers well of the Infantry as Cavalry, was assigned for Istria. The Consuls also were enjoined to send to M. Titinius in Spain, one legion with three hundred horse, besides 5000 footmen of allies, and 200 horsemen.

Before that the Consuls cast lots for their Provinces, certain prodigies were reported. Namely, that in the territory of Cruentum, there fell from heaven a stone in the lake of Alas: That in the territory of Rome there was an infant born like a very stump, without head, feet, or hands: and a snake or serpent seen four-footed. That in the market-place of Capua, many houses were smitten with thunderbolts and lightning. Also at Puteoli two ships were set on fire by lightning, and burnt. Whiles these prodigious wonders were by others related, there was seen a wolf also in the day time at Rome, which having entered at the gate Collina, after much coursing and hunting, with much ado and noise of them that followed the chace, escaped away from them all, and passed through the Esquiline gate. In regard of these strange tokens, the Coss. killed greater beasts for sacrifice: and for one whole day, a solemn supplication and prayers were made at all the shrines and altars of the gods. These sacrifices done and past, accordingly as it appeared, the Coss. cast lots for their provinces: and to Claudius, befall Istria, to Sempronius, Sardinia.

After this, C. Claudius published a Law by virtue of an ordinance of the Senat, in favour of allies; and proclaimed, That those allies, and namely, of the Latine nation, who either themselves or their ancestors, had been enrolled among the Latine allies, during the Censorship of Manius Claudius, and Titus Quintus, or any time afterwards, should make return every man into his own City, before the first day of November next ensuing. And Lucius Mummius the Praetor had in commission to enquire and search for those that returned not accordingly. To this Law and Edict above said of the Consul, an act also of the Senat was adjoynd, That the Dictator, Consul, Interregent, Censor, and Lord chief Justice in the Common Pleas for the time being, should endeavour and take order, that who so ever were manumit and made free, should take an oath, That he who manumit or enfranchised him, did it not with an intent, for to change the City wherein he was: and look who would not thus swear, him they thought not worthy to be manumit. But his charge and jurisdiction was afterwards committed to C. Claudius the Consul.

Whiles these affairs passed at Rome, M. Junius and A. Manlius, who had been Consuls the year before, having wintered in Aguileia, in the beginning of the Spring entered with an army into the frontiers of Istria. Where as they made waste and spoil far and near as they went, the

A. Ilians entered into a commotion and took arms, rather upon grief of heart and indignation to see their goods thus pillaged and ransacked, than for any assured hope they had of their insufficiency to make head against two armies. Having therefore raised a concourse of their able youth from all their Cities and States, they assembled in haste a sudden and tumultuary army, which at the first gave battell, and fought more in heat of courage, than with persistance of resolution. In conflict there were slain of them to the number of four thousand: the rest abandoned all war, and fled here and there into their Cities. From thence they sent embassadors first into the Roman camp to crave peace, and then the hostages which were demanded. After intelligence given at Rome of these news by the letters of the Pro-Consuls, C. Claudius the Consul fearing lest this occurrence might put him by the government of his Province and the conduct of the army, without solemn prayers and vows made, without his Lictors clad in their coats of arms, departed suddenly in great haste (all of the head) by night towards his Province, and made no man privy thereto, but only his Collegue. His voyage thither was not so rash and inconsiderate, but his carriage there was more foolish and undiscern: for being thither come, he assembled a general audience; where after he had very unseasonably reproached Manlius for his running away out of the camp, (to the great discontentment of the fouldiers, who were the first that fled): and with approbrious terms shaken up M. Junius also for taking part in this dishonour with his companion: in the end he commanded them both to avoid out of the Province. Whereupon the fouldiers made answer again and said, That they would then obey the Consuls commandment when (according to the ancient custom of their fore-fathers) he had made his solemn vows within the Capitol, and then taken his leave and departed out of the City, accompanied with his Lictors in their rich coats of arms, warlike. Hereat he was so far enraged with anger, that he called upon the treasures deputy belonging to Manlius for chains and gyves, and menaced to send Junius and Manlius both bound to Rome. But the deputy likewise made as little reckoning of the Consuls commandment: and the more animated he was to disobey the Consul, by reason that he was backed by the whole host round about him; who as they supported the cause of their Captains and Leaders, they hated the Consul at the heart. In conclusion, the Consul being laden and wearied with the contentious and railing behaviour of every one in particular, and with the hums and raves of the multitude in general (for they flunk not over and besides to mock him and make a laughing stock of him) he went his waies again to Aguileia, in the same ship wherein he came. D From thence he wrote unto his Collegue by an Edict, to charge those new fouldiers who were enrolled for Istria, to meet at Aguileia: to the end that no business should keep him at Rome, but that with all speed he might depart from the City in his coat of arms, and after he had conceived and pronounced his vows accordingly. His companion in office was well content, and did all these things requisite full willingly: and a short day was assigned for the assembling of the fouldiers at the Rediculus above named. But Claudius was at Rome well-near as soon as his letters; where, as his first coming, he made an Oration in the public audience of the people as touching the demeritor of Manlius and Junius: and having staid no longer than three daies at Rome, he set out with his Lictors formally in their coat-armour, when he had made his vows solemnly in the Capitol, and so departed into his Province again with as much celerity and haste (if not more) as he came into thence.

Some few daies before, Junius and Manlius began to assault by all forcible means the town Nesimium, into which the principal persons of the Ilians, and Aspulo their King, were retired. Claudius, with his two new legions, precluded himself before the town: and after he had discharged the old armies and their commanders, laid siege unto it, and intended to force it with maniles and engines of battery. The onse also of the river which ran along beside the walls, and not only encompassed the assailants but yielded water unto the besieged, he diverted into another new channell and bestowed many daies work thereabout. This mightily affrighted the barbarous people, to see how they were cut off from water. Howbeit they never thought of peace for all this, but fell in hand to kill their wives and children: and when they had so done (because they would prevent the view of their enemies, so horrible a sight and fearful spectacle) they massacred them upon the walls openly in their fight, and then threw them headlong down. Whiles the silly women and poor infants (amidst their piteous and lamentable cries) were thus cruelly murdered, the Roman fouldiers mounted over their walls and entered into the City. Their King when he once perceived (by the fearful outcries of those who fled) that the town was lost: for fear he should be taken alive, stabbed himself with his dagger to the heart. All the rest were either taken prisoners or killed. After this two other towns, Mutila and Enneria, were won by assault and rased. The pillage was greater than a man would have looked for in so poor a nation: which was bestowed every whit upon the fouldiers. Five thousand six hundred and two and thirty persons were sold out-right in port-sale under the sun. The Captains of this war were first scourged with rods and then hanged. Thus Istria by the ruin of three towns and the death of their King, was appeased: and all the Cities and States thereof from every quarter, came in with their hostages, made submission, and did fealty and homage to the Romans.

The Ilians war was no sooner ended but the Ligurians began to complot for to take arms and enter into rebellion. T. Claudius the Pro-Coss. (who the former year had been Praetor) was governor and commander at that time of Pise with a garrison of one legion. The Senat being advertised thereof by his letters, thought good to send the very same letters to C. Claudius (for the other Consul Consul was already passed over into Sardinia: and withall, a decree was granted out of this effect, That considering he had performed his commission in Africa, so as there remained no more for him to do there, he should (if he thought it good) transport his army into Liguria. Moreover, upon the Consul his letters, wherein he wrote what exploits he had achieved in Africa, there was ordained a solemn procession for two daies together. Semblably, the other Consul T. Sempronius, managed his affairs as happily in Sardinia: he entered with an army into the country of the Sardinian Ilans. Great aids were come from the Balarans to relieve and succour those Ilans: with both these nations he fought a battell in pitched field. The enemies were discomfited and put to flight, turned out of their camp, and 12000 armed men slain. The morrow after, the Consul commanded all their armor and weapons to be gathered together and laid on an heap: and this he burned as a sacrifice to the honour of Vulcan. Which done, he retired with his victorious army into the allied Cities, there to pass the winter.

C. Claudius likewise, upon receipt of the letters of T. Claudius, and the commission directed from the Senat, marched with his legions out of Africa into Liguria: where, the enemies were come down into the plains, and lay encamped near the river Scutenna. In which place there was a battell fought: 15000 of them were put to the sword, and not so few as 7000 taken prisoners, either in the conflict, or within the Camp: for that also was forced and won: besides, 51 ensigns they lost. The Ligurians, as many as escaped the execution, fled on all sides to the mountains for refuge: and notwithstanding that the Consul spoiled and wasted their champaign country, there was not one man made shew of arms. Thus Claudius having in one year vanquished and subdued two nations, and in one Consulship (a rare felicity in any other man) reduced other two Provinces into quietness and peace, returned to Rome.

Certain prodigious and monstrous sights were that year reported, to wit, in the territory of Craffnum, a certain foul, called Sangualis, with her bill pierced into a sacred stone. In Campan a Beel spake: at Syracusa a bull that strayed out of the fields from the herd, leapt the brazen cow there in the City, and did his kind. In the territory of Craffnum, there was a supplication and procession holden one day long in the very place of the foresaid prodigious sign. In Campan, the beef or cow store laid, was put out to be kept and fed at the charges of the City. Last of all, the prodigy of Syracusa, was expiated by a purgatory sacrifice, by direction from the soothsayers to what gods, applications & sacrifice should be made. That year died M. Claudius Marcellus the Bishop, who had been Consul and Censor. In his stead M. Marcellus his son was consecrated Bishop. Likewise in the same year, there was a Colony of 3000 Citizens of Rome planted at Luca. The Triumvirs or the Commissioners who had the conduct and placing of them, were P. Atilius, L. Egilius, and Cn. Sestius: one and fifty acres of land and an half was let out for them apiece to occupy out of the territory late conquered from the Ligurians, and which had been sometime the possession of the Tuscans before it was holden by the Ligurians.

Then came the Consul C. Claudius to the City of Rome, where after he had discoursed before the Senat, as touching the prosperous execution of his affairs, as well in Africa as Liguria: & thereupon demanded a triumph, he soon obtained that honour: and during his Magistracy triumphed at once over those two nations. In which solemnity of his triumph, he carried in shew 307000 Deniers and 85702 Victoriats. He gave to every common [Roman] souldier fifteen Denarii apiece, a double proportion to the Centurions, and thrice as much to every horseman. But upon the allies he bestowed less by the one moiety than to natural Citizens: and therefore as they followed his chariots, they were silent and said never a word: a man that had seen them would have said they were malecontent.

During the time of this triumph, the Ligurians perceiving that not only the Consul his army was brought home to Rome, but the legions also at Pisa discharged by T. Claudius: thinking now all fear past and overblown, secretly leaved a power: and having passed over the crofs frontiers, by traversing the wies through the mountains, descended into the downs, and waited the demise of Modena: and by sudden assault surprised the very Colony. The news hereof was no sooner arrived at Rome, but the Senat commanded C. Claudius the Consul to hold the high Court for the solemn election, with all convenient speed: that so soon as new annual Magistrates were created, he might return into his Province, and perforce recover this Colony out of their hands. So according to the advice and ordinance of the Senat the said assembly was holden: wherein were elected Consul Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spathinus. Then were the Prætors afterwards chosen, to wit, M. Popilius Lenax, P. Licinius Craffus, M. Cornelius Scipio, L. Papius M. so M. Alburnius, and L. Aquilius Gallus. The Consul C. Claudius had his Patent leaved again for one year longer, to continue in command of the army, and government of the Province Gallia. And for fear lest the Ilurians likewise should follow the example of the Ligurians, he had commission to lend those allies of the Latine nation, whom he had brought out of his Province for to solemnize his triumph.

Upon that very day, on which the Consuls, Cneus Cornelius and Quintus Petilius entered their Magistracy, and sacrificed each of them an ox as the manner was, in the honour of Jupiter: in that beast which Q. Petilius caused to be slain, the liver was found headless. When he had reported this accident unto the Senat, he was enjoined to sacrifice another beef, for to appeale the wrath of the gods. Moved then it was in the Senat house as concerning the Provinces, and a decree passed, that both Consuls should be sent to Pisa, and against the Ligurians: but order was given, that that whether of them had the charge of Pisa allotted unto him, he should (when the time came) repair to Rome against the election of yearly Magistrates. Moreover, there was another branch of this decree: that either of them should enroll two new legions, and three hundred horsemen and levy of the Latine allies ten thousand four apiece, and six hundred horse. And T. Claudius continued still in full command, untill such time as the Consul was arrived in his Province. Whiles these matters were thus debated and passed in the Council House, Cn. Cornelius was called forth by a bailiff or usher. And within a while after he was gone out of the Temple, he returned thither again with an heavy and dismaied countenance, and declared unto the L.L. of the Senat, that the liver of that ox which he also had killed for sacrifice, a beast of six years old and well liking, was consumed and come to nothing: and when he hardly beleived the Minister attending upon the sacrifice, who told him hereof, that himself caused the water to be poured forth of the pot where in the tripes and inwards were sodden, where he saw the rest of the tripes and entrails full and whole, but all the liver wasted away, after a wonderful and miraculous manner, not to be spoken. The L.L. were much terrified and amazed at this prodigious object: and the more perplexed were they, for that the other Consul likewise related unto them, how in regard that in his sacrifice the liver wanted an head, he had killed three oxen more, one after another and yet could not procure the favour and grace of the gods. Hereupon the Senat commanded him still to sacrifice these greater beasts, untill such time as he had his desire, and the gods were pleased again. Now it is said, that all the other gods were well enough contented, and their ire mitigated and appeased; only the goddess Saturnus could not be reconciled unto for all that ever he might do. Then the Consul, and Prætors committed the disposition of their Provinces to the arbitrement of the lot. Pisa fell to Cornelius, and Liguria to Petilius. As for the Prætors, L. Papius M. so was Lord chief justice by lot appointed, within the City of all Citizens pleas, and M. Alburnius had the jurisdiction over strangers. M. Cornelius Scipio M. Ligenius had the charge to govern the lower Spain, and L. Aquilius Gallus, Sicily. The two Prætors behind, requested earnestly that they might not be sent into their Provinces, and namely, M. Popilius into Sardinia: alleging, that Gracchus was able to quiet that island; and the rather, for that T. Eburnius the Prætor was by the Senat adjoined to him for assistance: neither was it good to interrupt courses begun, the continuity whereof is the most effectual means to exploit any great important affairs. For what with delivering up the sword by the old L. Deputy, and receiving it by the new successor (whom it were no more meet first to be trained up in knowledge of the State, than to be put to the managing of State matters) oftentimes the good opportunities of achieving brave enterprises pass by and are lost. This excuse of Popilius was held for good, and so approved. Then comes P. Licinius Craffus, and before his part made allegations why he might not go into his Province: namely, by occasion of the solemn sacrifice, that he was to give his attendance upon. Now the higher part of Spain was allotted unto him. But commanded was he either to go into his Province, or else to take oath in a frequent and full assembly of the people, that the solemn sacrifice (as he pretended) was nothing that hindered him, and nothing else. This order being first done and thus passed in the behalf of P. Licinius: then steps me up M. Cornelius, and required them to take an oath of him likewise, that he might not go into the nether Province of Spain: So both these Prætors were commanded according to one and the same form of oath. Whereupon M. Titinius and T. Fonteius were commanded to remain in quality and place of Pro. Consuls within Spain, and retain still the same authority and power of command: and order was granted, that for to supply their forces, there should be sent unto them three thousand Citizens of Rome with two hundred horse, and also five thousand Latine allies, and three hundred horsemen.

The solemnity of the Latine holidays began the 3rd day before the Nones of May: where, in, because at the sacrificing of one beast the Magistrate of Lanuvium in his prayer left out these words: Populi Romani Quiritum: and prayed not for the good estate of the people of Rome, and the Quiritis bred a scruple. The matter was moved in the Senat, and the Senat referred it over to the Colledge of the Bishops and Prelats of the Church. And they pronounced this award, That forasmuch as those Latine feasts were not solemnized as they ought, they should begin again anew: and that the Citizens of Lanuvium, by whose default they were thus to be renewed should be at the charges of all the beasts for sacrifice. Moreover, to breed more careful scrupulosity in mens minds, it fortune that Cneus Cornelius the Consul as he returned from that solemnity out of the Alban mountain fell down in a fit of Apoplexy: which turned into an Hemiplegia or dead palse all the one side of his body, and so he was conveyed to the bath and hot waters at Cumes: where by occasion that his disease grew upon him still, he departed this life: from whence he was brought to Rome, and there carried forth in all magnificence of funeral obsequies, and right honourably interred. He had been Bishop also as well as Consul. Q. Petilius the other Consul, being commanded to hold an assembly for the surrogation of a Colledge unto him, (so soon as possible) he might be warranted by the auspices and approbation of the sacred birds: and withall, to proclaim and publish the Latine feasts and holidays aforesaid: summoned the election against the 3rd day before the Nones of Sextilis: and the Latine solemnity, the third day likewise before the Ides of the same month.

Whiles mens minds were much possessed already with religion, and set upon their devotion, word was brought moreover of certain fearful prodigies: to wit, that at Tusculum there was a burning flame in the sky: that at Gabers, the Temple of Apollo, and many private mens houses: likewise at Graviscæ the town wall and one of the gates were smitten with thunderbolts. For the procurator whereof, the LL. of the Senat ordained that the Bishops should give order according to their discretion.

Whiles the Consuls were thus staid, first both by their own scrupulous holiness, then one of them by the death of the other; and afterwards by occasion of the new election and the renewing of the Latine festival solemnity: C. Claudius in the mean time approached with his army to Modena, which the Ligurians the year before had won. He had not continued the siege full three daies, but he forced the Colony: and having thus recovered it from the enemies, he returned it again to the former inhabitants. Eight thousand Ligurians died there within the walls upon the sword: and immediately he dispatched his letters to Rome, wherein he not only declared the simple news, but glorified him and made his boast. That through his fortitude and fortune, both the Romans had not an enemy that durst then his head on this side the Alps; and that he had conquered so much land as might serve for to be divided by the poll, among many thousands. Tib. Sempronius likewise at the same time, fought many fortunate battles in Sardinia, and utterly ramed and subdued the Islanders: 15000 enemies he there slew: all the States of that nation which had revolted, were reduced to obedience under the people of Rome: the old tributaries had an imposition and exaction laid upon them of a double tribute, which they surely paid: the rest were put to a contribution of corn. After he had set the Province in quietness, and received out of the whole Island two hundred and thirty hostages, he sent certain Lieutenants as messengers to make report at Rome of all his proceedings: who also in his behalf should make suit unto the Senat. That in regard of the happy success in those exploits under the charge, conduct, and fortune of Tib. Sempronius, first, due honour, praise, and thanksgiving might be rendered to the immortal gods; and then, that himself might be allowed at his departure out of the Province, to bring away his army with him. The Senat gave audience to the messengers above said within the Temple of Apollo: and upon their relation ordained a general profection for two daies: commanding the Consuls to sacrifice 40 head of greater beasts: and withall, enjoyed Tib. Sempronius the Pro-Consul to continue that year with his army in that Province. Then the election which had been published against the third day before the Nones of Septimber for the substitution of one of the Consuls was the same day accomplished. And Q. Petilius the Cof, created for his Colleague, M. Valerius Lavinius, for to enter immediately into his Magistracy. This Lavinus had been a long time desirous to be employed in some Province or other: and fully it fell out for his longing desire, that when it came importing how the Ligurians rebelled and were gone out again in arms. So after he once heard the contents of these letters, he made no longer stay, but upon the very Nones of Septimber all goodly to be seen in his warriors coat of arms, he commanded the third legion (by occasion of this alarm) to go into France, to C. Claudius the Pro-Consul: also the Drummers or two wardens for the ports and navy, to go to sea, and with a fleet to make sail for Pisa, and from thence to coast about all Liguria and thus by hovering upon the seas, to terrify the enemies that way also. Q. Petilius likewise the Cof, had appointed a day for his army to meet in the same place. Moreover, C. Claudius the Pro-Consul, advertised of the Ligurians revolt, over and besides those forces which he had about him at Parma, levied in haste a strength of more soldiers: and to with his complete army approached the borders of the Ligurians. The enemies upon the arrival of C. Claudius by whose conduct they well remembered how late they had been discomfited and put to flight near the river Scutenna, minding to seek for defence rather by the strength of advantageous places than force of arms, against that power of his which to their cost they had before tried, seized the two hills, Letur and Balsia, about which they raised a mure also for their better safety. But such as lagged behind and quit the champaign plains and lower grounds with the helmet, were hurried and cut short, to the number of fifteen hundred. The rest kept within the mountains: who albeit they were in fear and danger of their own parts, yet forgot not their inbred cruelty: but ran upon the booties and prizes which they had taken at Modena, their poor prisoners whom they held captive, they pitiously mangled, and killed most villainously: as for the beasts in the Temples every where, they rather hacked, hewed, and cut in peeces butcher-like, than sacrificed in decent, seemly, and religious manner. Thus being satisfied with the blood and massacre of living creatures, they took all their breathless things they had, and reared and stuck them upon the walls; and namely, implements of all forces, made rather for use and necessity than ornament and show. Q. Petilius the Consul, for fear lest the war would be ended in his absence, dispatched his letters to M. Claudius, to haste away with his army into France, for he would attend his coming upon the plains called Macri. Upon the receipt of which letters, Claudius dislodged out of Liguria, and delivered unto the Consul his army at the said plains called Macri. Few daies after came Cornelius Valerius the other Consul thither also. There they divided their forces, and before they departed one from the other, they both together made a survey and review of their several armies. This done, they cast lots into what quarters they should either of them go, for that they held it not good policy to charge the enemy both of them joyfully in one part. Now certain it is, that Valerius received his lot according to the auspices, in that he was within the precinct of the Temple or prospect by the Augur assigned. But Petilius herein made default (as the Augurs pronounced afterwards) and namely, the error was herein, because he being himself without the compass afore said, had put the lot into the casket, which was carried afterwards within the circuit of the said Temple. This done, they went into divers quarters: Petilius encamped aforesaid that

A bank and rising of the hill between Balsia and Letur, which by a continuall ridge uniteth and joyneth the one mountain to the other. There, as he was exhorting his souldiers in open audience, he let fall (by report) an ominous word, prefiging his own death never thinking of the ambiguity and double construction thereof, saying that he would that very day capere Letum. In two several places at once he began to mount up the hills. That regiment wherein he was himself advanced forward courageously: but the other was repulsed and beaten back by the enemies: whereupon the Consul rode full gallop to help that side which went down: and in very truth reclaimed his men he did from running away; but whiles without regard of his own person he kept before the enemies in the forefront, he chanced to be shot through with a dart, and so fell down dead in the place. The enemies were not aware of the Generals death: but some few of his own men who saw him fall, made halt (as knowing well that in it consisted now the main victory) to cover his body. So the rest of the multitude, as well cavalry as infantry, captainless as they were, disfiled the enemies and were masters of the mountains. Of Ligurians there were slain 3000: of the Roman army not above two and fifty. Now besides this evident issue and event, which fell out upon so heavy and deadly a prefige by the women aforesaid, the pulcrick also was heard to say, that all was not well in the auspices of the birds; neither was the Consul himself ignorant thereof.

This done at his (which I commonly interpret [Ole] scipitum vocis fallax) When a man calleth forth a word at a venture, and speaketh more truly than he is aware. For want of a proper term to express the Latine [Omen] all translators hitherto, French, Italian, and English, have been put to their trials, and helped themselves with [Prazege] Which in mine opinion is not appropriate to the thing, but common: as comprising other tokens; of birds, whether they be augur or auspex; of beasts inwards of lightning and the rest: or rather implying equivocation, the first denoting by those that are, and extending to the future; wing of the mind. Whereas in other words [Ole] is very significant, and in analogy equivalent to [Quies] I marked much the story, why it is thought either strange and new (seeing it is English, used no doubt commonly in times past, and at this day current in the North parts, where the people happily are more observant of such prodiges) rather than many other foreign words, brought into our language, and ranged under the English or why it should be condemned as abstruse and not pleasing to the ear, more than foresay or ominare, which commonly bewitcheth (a voice) and more properly in Plato (as Baderus hath well observed) is taken for [Omen] (i.e. as foresay or ominare), and amongst [divines] as Euclitides useth upon Homer, Iliad, l. From whence, who leeth not that [Ole] and [Omen] both are denoted? The word then being not barely born, but descended from the mother of all learning, the Greek tongue, and entranced in the illud time, out of Asia (howsoever it hath been confined into the North) would not be exiled clean, but rather reduced and retained to a free denizen, quasi possiminius.

C. Valerius having heard [The great clerks and deep divines, those also were profoundly seen in the common law, gave forth. That (seeing the two ordinary Consuls (Cn. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and Q. Petilius Spurrinus) of that year, were both dead, the one by sickness, the other by the sword, it was not lawful for the other Consul (C. Valerius Levinus) subrogated in the place of the deceased, to hold the assembly general for the election of new Magistrates.]

On this side the Apennine were the Garuls, Lapirins, and Hercatians. Beyond the Apennine were the Brinnians. Against them that had pillaged and ransacked Pisa and Luna, Q. Manius made war within the compass of the River Ardena: and when he had brought them in subjection, he took from them their arms. For which exploits achieved in France and Liguria, under the conduct and happy fortune of the two Consuls, the Senat ordained that there should be published profection for three daies, and commanded to sacrifice forty greater beasts. And thus veily the triumphs wars of the French and the Ligurians, which arose in the beginning of the year, were in short time and without any great malice dissolved and appeased.

But now in lieu thereof great care was taken for the Macedonian war by occasion that Perseus bowed the seeds of debate and quarrel between the Dardanians and the Bastarnians. Besides, the Roman Embassadors who were sent into Macedony, to see in what terms things there stood, were now returned to Rome, and had brought word, that in Dardania they were up in arms. With them there came also from King Perseus certain Orators to make excuse in his behalf, and to clear him in the action, namely, that the Bastarnians neither were by him sent for nor entered into any execution by his motive. The Senat would neither acquit the King as unguilty, nor yet directly accuse him as culpable in that point. Only they required that he should be advertised and admonished, to be very well advised and careful to keep that League and accord inviolable, which he would seem to entertain with the Romans.

The Dardanians seeing that the Bastarnæ were so far off from departing out of their country (as they well hoped they would) that they endangered and endangered them still every day more than other, as bearing themselves bold upon the succours of the Thracians near neighbours, and the Scordisci thought it their best course in policy, to adventure upon some hardy enterprise, although it were rash and inconsiderate: whereupon they assembled all in arms, and from every quarter of their country shewed and advanced before the next Town, to the camp of the Bastarnæ. Winter time it was, a season of the year, which they made choice of, that the Thracians and the Scordisci might be retired home into their own countries: which when they were advertised of, and that there remained none but the Bastarnæ alone, they divided their forces in two parts: with the one, to march directly forward and openly to make head against them affront; with the other, to fetch a compass through by-ways and blind forrests, and so to charge upon their backs. But before they could wheel about the enemies camp, the battail was begun: wherein the Dardanians had the overthrow, and were driven to put themselves within their City, which was a most remote miles distant from the camp of the Bastarnæ. The conquerors followed the train of victory,

* Capere Letum, thus written with a capital L, signifies, To gain the hill Letur: but with the little L, which the ear cannot distinguish, To take his death. * Valerius Maximus reporting the same story, calleth of them, the hearts of some among us might be solicited and tempted to novelty and alteration: on we now are content to hear the King, although absent in person, preaching in some sort to us, yea, and more than that (God send us good luck) approve and applaud his Oration. And whereas the very wild beasts refuse (for the most part) the meat which is laid out for a bait to deceive and hunt them; yea, and have the wit to shun and avoid the same; we, blind beetles that we are, suffer our selves to be caught and fed with the vain appearance and colorable shew of a little kindness, and for hope to recover some poor slaves (a matter of small worth & reckoning) suffer our own freedom to be undermined, and in danger of subversion. For who teach not, that the overture is made, and the way laid open for entrance into confederacy with the King, only to violate and break out association with the Romans, wherein standeth all our weal and welfare? Unless some man peradventure will make a question, whether the Romans mult levy war against Perseus: & no doubt thereof now after Philip is dead, which in his life time was expected, and of his death only interrupted? Two sons y know full well, K. Phil had, Demetrius and Perseus: For nobleness of parentage by the mothers side, for virtue, for wit, for the love and affection of the Macedonians, Demetrius far surpassed his brother. But for that the father intended else & meant, that whether of his two sons he should have the crown after him for recompence he caused Demetrius to be murdered: for no other crime in the world that could be laid to his charge, save only that he was entered into amity with the Romans: but Perseus he made the King, whom he knew that the people of Rome judged more worthy to suffer punishment than to inherit a Kingdom. And this Perseus, what other thing hath he done else since his fathers decease but made preparation for war: First and foremost, he procured the Balamians, & the terror of all the world, for to invade Dardanius: who if they had letted there, Greece should have had more troublesome neighbors other than Asia hath of the Galatians. And albeit he was disappointed of this hope yet he gave not up to design and plot for arms; yea, if we will speak a truth he hath already begun the war, Dolopia he hath subdued by force of arms; & could not abide to hear that the determination of certain provinces which were debatable and litigious, should be referred to the award of the people of Rome. From thence having passed over the mountain Orta, that upon a sudden he might shew himself in the very centre of Greece, he ascended up to Delphi. And to what end, think ye, hath he taken this disordered voyage and unaccustomed expedition? After this he made his progress all over Thessaly: And what he announced and hurt more of them all, whom he hated in his heart? I fear me to much the more this manner of dealing, and that it is a bait to catch them withal. Then, forsooth, he sendeth his letters unto us, with a goodly shew of a bon-prent, and willet us to think evilitions how to prevent (from henceforth, that we never had need again of the like bounty of his. What is that, but to snail and repeal that edict of ours wherein the Macedonians are debarred from suing too with in Peloponnesus and to bring about, that we may have again the Kings Embassadors to come unto us, that we may entertain mutual hospitality between their Princes and ours? And anon alter, see the Macedonian armies yea, and the King also in person to cross from Delphi (for a small arm of the Sea lieth between) straight over into Peloponnesus and finally, that we hard and combine with the Macedonians, when they shall take arms against the Romans? As for me, this is mine advice, to make no new ordinance, but to let all alone in their entire order, as they now stand until such time as we are come to some certain terms. Whether we have cause to be afraid, or fear only our own shadows? If the league shall continue firm and sure between the Romans & the Macedonians, then may we have entrance out of friendship, of commerce and traffick with them. But for this present to think & consider hereof in my temple judgement is a nice and ticklish point & besides, out of season untimely and somewhat with the season. When he had thus said, Arce brother to Xenocrates the Pretor discoursed in this manner following. Callicrates (as he) hath caused both me and all of us besides, who are of contrary opinion to him, for to find the more difficultie in speaking our minds to the cause in question. For whiles in maintenance of the association which we have with the Romans, he saith that it is disturbed and troubled (albeit there be no man about either to disturb or trouble it) he hath wrought cunningly and contrived, that whosoever seemeth to gain say him may be thought to oppose and set himself against the Romans. In the first place, as if he had been a man, not converting here amongst us, but one come from the Senat of Rome, or some inward secretary and of the privy council to the KK. he knoweth forsooth and uttereth all that in great secrecy hath been done. Nay, he foretelleth like a wife man what would have ensued, in case Philip had lived longer: & namely, how it came about that Perseus thus inherited the crown: what the Macedonian designs are: and what the Romans intend to do. But we, who know neither for what cause, nor in what manner Demetrius came by his death, nor yet what Philip meant to have done if he had lived still, must accommodate & frame our counsel to those occurrences which have openly passed in the view of the world. We take knowledge, that Perseus, after he was invested in his throne and crowned King, repaired to the Roman Embassadors; and we know likewise that he was intreated by the people of Rome with the style of (King Perseus). We hear besides, that Roman Embassadors came to the King, and were by him well received and graciously entertained. If I have any judgement, these be all signs of peace and not of war: neither can the Romans take offence, if, as we followed them when they bare arms to we follow them now likewise, as the authors of peace. And verily I see no reason why we alone of all other Greeks, should make so mortal and inextinguishable war against the fealtie of Macedony. What! is it because we are so near unto the Macedonians, and by that vicinity exposed to all dangers from thence? or that we are the weakest of all the rell, and like to the Dolopians, whom Perseus of late hath subdued? Nay I wis, it is far otherwise and clean contrary. Sure enough we are for any harm they can do us, in regard either of our own forces (which the Gods of their goodnes have vouchsafed us) or of the distance of place so far remote. But for case we be as much subject as the Thessalians and Etolians: Say we are of no more credit and authority amongst the Romans (albeit we have been always their associates and friends) than the Etolians be, who were their open enemies both the other day: Then, what right, what privilege, and commerce, the Etolians, the Thessalians, the Epitrots, and in one word, all Greece besides, have and we with the Macedonians, we also may have and hold the same. How is it then, that we alone like cuffed and damned creatures, should thus practise to abandon the common law of men, and (as it were) renounce all human society. Be it, that Philip (when time was) did somewhat, and gave us just cause, armed as he was and ever warring upon us, to pass this decree and edict against him: what hath Perseus deserved? Perseus (I say) the new King, a harmless Prince that seeketh out no injury: nay, who is willing and seeketh by courteous and good turns to cancel and put out all former quarrels and enmities of his latter? why are we the only enemies that he hath in the world? And yet, I might full well, & only say that from the former Kings of Macedony we have received so great favors and benefits, that in regard thereof, we should put up and forgive the wrongs of Philip alone (if happily he have done us any) at least wile now after he is dead, and his head laid, indeed, at what time as the Roman fleet rid in the harbor of Cenchrea, and the Consul lay encamped with his army before Elatis. We far in counsel three daies together, debating and devising, Whether we should band with the Romans or side with Philip? And albeit the present fear of the Romans before our eyes, might have made us in our opinions to incline somewhat and lean toward them: yet there was something in it doublets, that it was so long ere we could resolve: and to say a truth, it was the ancient acquaintance and amity that we had with the Macedonians, and the great benefits which in old time we had received from their Kings. Why then he thinks, those self same regards should be of some force and efficacy to move us, if not to be their special and best friends, yet at least wile not to be their principal and greatest enemies. Let us not, Callicrates, make semblance and shew of that which we are not in hand with, and is no point of this present question. There is no motive made of a new society: there is no petition about to draw any capitulations of a new alliance, wherein we should rashly enwrap and entangle our selves, and be tied to any inconvenience. Only let there be a mutual commerce between us, and an alternative intercourse of yeelding and demanding right to and fro, as apertaineth to us not by interdicting and forbidding them to enter and traffick within our country, debar our selves likewise from all negotiation and dealing with them in their Kingdom: that by this means our slaves may have no place of retreat and refuge to flee unto. And what pretence is this to the Roman confederacy? Wherefore make we thus of a small thing and event, to decree a matter and suspitions? Wherefore raise we such troubles of nothing? Wherefore seek we to draw others into jealousy and hatred with the Romans, and all this to find means of hurting & flustering them? If there will be war, Perseus (ye may be sure) maketh no doubt, but that we altogether will follow the Romans: yet to long as the peace holdeth, let us cease and suspend we in some sort our malice and hatred for the while: if ended for ever may not be. When the same men who had consented to the Kings letters before, gave their accord now also to this propose, the chief and principal persons among them took great indignation and disdained that Perseus should need to demand and obtain that by a few lines in writing, which he deemed was not worth the sending an embassy. Whereupon the time was deferred and no date passed at this Session. Afterwards were Embassadors adressed unto them from the King, at what time as a Diet was holden in Megalopolis: but the side which was for the Romans, and feared to give them occasion of displeasure and offence, did what they could to debar them of access and entrance into the Council. And much about this time, by reason of these jars the Etolians grew enraged among themselves, and by discharging their mutual fury in killing one another, had like to have brought the state to a final ruin and desolation. But being weary thereof, they in the end as well of the one side as the other, sent their Embassadors to Rome, and also laboured at home to have the quarrel taken up and to be made friends and reconciled together. Howbeit this was troubled by a new mischief that came between which also rubbed the former galls and fretted the old sores. For whereas certain Hypataens, exiled persons, and being of the faction of Proxenus, were promised liberty to return home again into their country, with safe conduct all granted by Eupolemus one of the chief & principall men of the City: so it was, that fourscore of their men, men of mark and quality (whom to meet upon the way as they returned, Eupolemus himself went out with the multitude) after they had been friendly received with courteous greetings, salutations, and shaking of hands, had no sooner entered within the gate of the City, but they were massacred notwithstanding they pleaded the sacred promise of protection, and called the Gods to witness, but all in vain. By this occasion the civil war between them waxed much hotter than before, and turned in the end to a sight fire. Now there arrived C. Valerius, Levinus, Ap. Claudius, Pulcher, C. Memmius, M. Popilius, and L. Caninius, as sent from the Senat of Rome. Before these commissioners, the Embassadors from both factions appeared at Delphi, and debated the matter with great earnestness and vehemency, where Proxenus seemed to have the better hand as well in right of the cause, as through his eloquent tongue

Proculus (1 say) who within few daies after, drank a cup of poison of his wives tempering, wherof he died: & he condemned therfore, departed into exile. The like madnes heayned the Candians also & distracted them with intestine disention, but upon the coming of Q. Mucius, the Lieutenant General, who was sent accompanied with a fleet of ten sail, to appeale their debates, they fell to some terms of peace and atonement. There had been a truce also before of six months, but afterwards the war flamed out much more terrible. The Lycians, likewise at the same time, were incited & plagued with war by the Rhodiars. But my meaning is not neither is it any part of my purpose, to describe the wars of forraign nations, nor to discusse the circumstances how to proceede for enough I have to do, & more than I can well discharge to write the acts only of the people of Rome.

The Celiberians in Spain, who being tamed by force of arms had submitted, Ag. Agracius, remained quiet all the time that M. Titinius the Pretor continued there in government. But immediately in the arrival of Ap. Claudius they revolted and began to shew themselves in open disention of rebellion, by giving a suddain assault upon the Roman camp. It was about the break of day, when the sentinels upon the rampier and Corps de guard about the gates, might discover enemies coming a far off and so they gave the alarm. Ap. Claudius having put out the signal of battail, & in few words exhorted his souldiers to fight and play the men led them forth at three gates at once. The Celiberians made head and opposed their forces as they issued forth. At the first the skirmish was equal on both parts: for that by reason of the streights of the passage, all the Romans could not fight: but after that one had put forward another, and followed till space, they were all at length gotten without the trench: so as they were able now to display their battailions & to confront their enemies from one point of their battail to the other wherewith before they were environed: and then they made lo terrible a fall upon them, that the Celiberians were not able to endure their violence. For before the second hour of the day they were all omitted: and 3000 of them either died in the place, or yielded their bodies prisoners: 32 military ensignes they looll, and were turned out of the camp the same day and here is an end of that war. For as many as escaped the conflict gat them home to their own towns & quietly afterwards bare the yoke of subjection.

That year were created Censors, Q. Fulvius Flaccus & A. Posthumius Albinus: who made a review of Senators and chose new, For President of the Senat they elected M. Emilius Lepidus the Archbishop. Nine they put out of the Senat-house. The principal persons noted and disgraced, were these, M. Corn. Mucianensis, who two years before had been Pretor in Spain; L. Corn. Scipio, Pretor for the time being, and L. Clodius Justice of the common pleas, as well among citizens as aliens; and L. Fulvius, who was whole brother to the Censor himself, & as V. Antius reporteth, equal in degree of calling, and his fellow every way. The Consuls also after they had made their vows within the Capitol, went forth to their Provinces. The one of them, (to wit, M. Emilius) had in charge given him by the Senat to appeale the sedition of the Padoans in Vence, who as their Embassadors made report, by factious siding and part-taking, were all on a fire with civil war.

The Embassadors who were gone into Aeolia to pacify the like troubles, brought word back, That it was not possible to bridle and refrain the furious rage of that nation. But the coming of the Consul made all whole among the Padoans and cured the malady: who having nothing else to do in the province, returned to Rome.

These Censors were the first that caused the streets of Rome to be paved with hard flint and pebble stone within the City; and the high waies and causeys without to be raised with gravel: & the sides thereof to be wel banked and kept in reparations; also bridges to be made in divers places: a scaffold besides for the Ediles and Pretors to behold the games & plaies. Moreover the barriers in the race, from whence the horses begin to run, and the Ouales to mark and score up the number of courses. * * * Over and besides the gales, beyond * * * the iron gates and cages * * * and at the seats in the mount Albane for the Consuls. They took order besides all this for the paving with flint of the cliff or descent from the Capitol, and from the gallery or porch before the temple of Serapis looking toward the Capitol, unto the place called Seneculum, and the count Hofitia above it. Also the merchants Hall or burse without the gate Tergemina they paved with stone, and fenced it about with strong flakes and posts of wood. The gallery also Emilia they caused to be repaired: and made an ascent by stairs from the Thyber to the burse or merchants Hall aforesaid. Without the same gate also, they paved with pebble stone the gallery or walking place into the Aecentine * * * from the Temple of Venus. The same Censors bargained for the making of walls about Calatia and Oxyrum: and having made sale of some publick edifices there, they employed the money raised thereof in making of shops & stalls round about both the market places. The one of them, that is to say, M. Fulvius, (for P. Posthumius said plainly, that unless it were by vertue either of an act of the Senat, or grant of the people of Rome, he would put forth no works to be made with dispende of their money) agreed upon price for the building of a Temple to Jupiter at Pisistrum & at Fuad: also make a conduit, for water to be conveyed to Pollentia and at Pisistrum into a way to be paved, and Sinistra * * * In these colonies, he caused also a sink or vault to be made about them, to carry away all filthiness into the river: also the market place to be enclosed with porches, galleries, and shops; and three stately halls called Iani, with quartermen or four thoroughfares, and as many fronts. For these works one of the Consuls disbursed the money, and bargained with the Publicans and undertakers. In which regard, the inhabitants of those colonies above named, gave him great thanks. These Censors were likewise severe and precise in exercising their office for the redressing and reformation of mens manners: for many Gentlemen had their bottles of service taken from them, which were allowed them by the City.

A little before the years end, there was a solemn procession holden one whole day for the happy achievement of the affairs in Spain, under the conduct and good fortune of Appius Claudius the Pro-consul: and twenty head of great beasts were killed in sacrifice. And the morrow after they went in another procession with supplications, at the Temples of Ceres, Liber, and Libera: for that there was reported from the Sabines country, a mighty earthquake, which over-turned many houses.

After that App. Claudius was returned out of Spain to Rome, the Senat ordained, that he should enter the City with the pomp of an Ovation. And now approached the time for the election of new Consuls. Much ado there was and hard hold at this assembly, by reason of the multitude of competitors: but in the end, L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus, were elected Consuls: which done, the Pretors also were created, to wit, Cn. Fabius Duxes, M. Matienus, C. Cicereus, M. Fur. Crassipes, A. Atilius Serranus, & C. Cluvius Saxula, these three last held the second time. This business and solemnity finished, Ap. Claudius Censor entering with Ovation pomp into the City for his victory of the Celiberians, brought into the common treasury 10000 pound weight of silver, and 3000 of gold. Cn. Cornelius was consecrated the Flamin of Jupiter.

The same year there was set up a painted Table in the Temple of the goddess Minerva with this inscription, Under the conduct and happy government of Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, Consul the legion and army of the people of Rome, subdued Sardinia. In which Province, there were slain and taken prisoners 80000 enemies, which Gracchus (after he had managed the affairs of state most fortunately, delivered many captives out of bondage, and recovered the tributes and conquests to the Common-weal) brought home with him his army safe and sound, charged with an exceeding rich booty, and recovered the City of Rome, in a second triumph. In memorial of which exploits, he caused this table to be set up as a present in the honour of Jupiter.

Now this table contained the portraiture of the Island Sardinia, and the picture also and resemblance of sundry battails. Moreover, in this year were represented to the people certain patimes and shews of sword-players, wherof some were small and of no account: but one above the rest, exhibited by T. Flaminius, surpassed. And this he did in honour of his father deceased: with a dole of flesh among the people, a great publick feast besides, and stage-plays for four dayes together. But the principal matter in this festival solemnity was this, That in three daies space there fought at interance with unrebated swords, thre score and fourteen champions, Fulvius Flaccus the Censor uncovered the roof of the Church of Juno Lacinia, which was slated with marble, and also to cover a Temple which he had dedicated. But by an act of the Senat he was forced to besow the slates there again. Eumenes the King of Asia complained in the Senat, of Pericles King of Macedony. His injuries done to the people of Rome are here reported: for the which, defiance was sent, and war proclaimed against him. P. Licinius Crassus the Consul, unto whom the Province of Macedony was assigned, passed over thither, and in certain light expeditions, fought sundry battails with Pericles in Thessaly, all by horse-service, but with bad success. The Senat appointed a day of bearing between Malania and the Carthaginians, touching the territory in question. Embassadors were sent to the affected Cities and States, and to the confederate Kings, to request them to continue loyal and fall in friendship; reason that the Rhodiars stood in doubtful arms. The Censors took a review and numbered the citizens of Rome, wherein were enrolled in the subsidy book 257231. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate exploits against the Islanders of Corfica and the Ligurians.

The two and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

After that L. Posthumius Albinus and M. Popilius Lanus the Consuls had before all other things propoled unto the Senat as touching the government of the Provinces & conduct of the armies, ordained it was, that Liguria should be the charge as well of the one of them as the other. Also that both of them should levy new legions, (and two a peece they were allowed to have) therewith to defend the said province and keep it in obedience. Besides 6000 footmen and 600 horse of Latine allies. Moreover to enrol 3000 foot, and 200 horsemen of Romans for a supply in Spain. Last of all, commanded they were to press 1500 footmen and 200 horse of Roman citizens: with which strength, that Pretor unto whom Sardinia fell, should pass over into Corsica, there to war, and M. Atilius the old Pretor, in mean time to see unto the government of Sardinia. This done, the Pretors went to call lost for their provinces. A. Atilius had the place of Lord chief justice within the City, and C. Cluvius Saxula the jurisdiction between between citizens and forrainers. Unto Cn. Fabius Bute fell the Higher Spm; to M. Manlius the Lower. M. Furius Crassipes was to govern Sicity, and C. Cicerinus Sardinia.

In the beginning of this year, the Embassadors who had been sent into Arsenia and Macedonia, made report; that he might not come to the speech of K. Petrus, for that some said he was absent; others, that he was sick; and the one as false, as the other was untrue: Howbeit, they might evidently perceive and see, that preparation was made for war; and that he would delay no longer, but enter into arms. In like fort they related, that in Arsenia the civil dissention and sedition grew daily more and more, neither could the captains of these factious discords be repressed and held in awe by their countenance and authority.

in awe by their countenance and authority. As the City of Rome was summed up on the continual expectancy of the Macedonian war before any enterprise thereof begun, thought good it was and requisite, that order first should be taken for the expiation of prodigies, and the pacification of the Gods by way of humbly praises, such as were represented and delivered unto them out of the fatal books of Sibylla, For at Lanuvium were kept, as the common voice went, certain shows and resemblances of a mighty great navy. Item, At Præneum there grew black wool out of the earth. Also in the Venetian territory, near a Town called Remens, it rained fishes. Moreover, all the country Pompinum was overlaid with clouds of Locusts, and within the Land of Galila, there were seen certain fishes to leap from under the clots of earth, that were turned with the plow as it took flitch and made furrow. For the strange and fearful sights, the foresaid books were looked into and perused, and out of them the Decemvirs declared and pronounced both unto what Gods sacrifice should be offered, and what healts were to be slain thereto; moreover, that the one supplication should be holden, as propitiary for those prodigious tokens; as also the other, which the year before had been vowed for the health of the people, should now be performed, and holidays kept therefore. So the sacrifices were accomplished according to the order and form set down in writing by the Decemvirs.

were accomplished according to the order and form set down in writing by the Excellency Q. Felicio
 The very same year was the Church of Junio Lacinia uncovered upon this occasion: Q. Felicio Flaccus the Cenfor was building of a temple to Fortuna eques, which he had vowed during the N war against the Celtiberians, when he was Lord Protor in Spain. His desire and earnest endeavor was to strain himself, that there might not be in Rome a temple of more late and magnificence than this. And supposing that it would be a great beauty and ornament unto it, in case the roof were covered with tiles of marble he went into the Britains country, and there he was so bold with the Church abbot of Junio Lacinia, as to untile the one half thereof, making full account, that so much would serve for to cover that temple which he was building. Boats and Barges he had ready for to receive and carry away the said tiles or slates, without being impeached or controlled for this sacrilege by the allies, whom he held in awe and terrified by his Cenforian authority. Now after the Cenfor was returned to Rome, who's marble slates were disbarbed out of the said vessels and conveyed to the temple, And albeit no words were made at Rome whence they came, yet oncealed it could not be. And thereupon rose much muttering in the Senate, and from all parts whereto they called hard upon the Consuls, to have the matter put to question and debated of. The Cenfor was sent for, who was no sooner entered into the Senate but both all in general, and every one in particular had a fling at him, and much more sharply reproached him to his face in these terms, that he could not be content to abuse and violate the most holy and sacred Church's holy parts, which neither Pylorus nor Ambros ever offered violence unto; and thus he uncovered it also in soul

with civil war. And when he saw that they contended and strove much to surpass one another in harsh courses and audacious; he would by his decree neither charge nor discharge the one party more than the other: but he requested them indifferently on both sides to abstain from war, to make an end of discord and dissension, and bury all that was past in perpetual oblivion. Whereupon they were reconciled: and this their atonement was ratified with the assurance of pledges interchangeably given: and accorded it was, they should meet at Corinth; there to bestow their hostages. From Delphi and that general diet of Aetolia, Mythes crossed the Seas into Phrygia, where he had appointed and published a solemn assembly and council of the Achaean. Wherein he highly praised and commended the whole nation, for observing so steadfastly their old decree, whereby they debarred and excluded the Macedonian Kings out of their confines, he declared evidently and presented to the view of all the world, what malice and hatred the Romans bare to Perseus. And that it might break out the sooner into open wars, King Emmelus came to Rome, and brought with him a note or abstract of all the preparations for the war, which with diligent search and enquiry into particulars, he had gathered.

Much about the same time, the five Embassadors sent unto K. Perseus for to see into the affairs of Macedony were commanded to take a voyage as far as Alexandria, for to renew the old amity with King Ptolemaeus. The names of them were these, C. Valerius, Cn. Livinius, Cerco, Q. Balbus, Sulca, M. Cornelius Mamula, and M. Caelius Dentor. And even then or not much after, there came Embassadors from King Antiochus: and the chief and principal person among them, one Apollonius, was admitted to come into the Senat, where he excused the King his matter for many good and just reasons, in that he had not sent his tribute & made payment so soon as he ought by the day appointed: but now (he said) that he had brought it all, to the end that the King should be to them beholden for nothing but the respite of time only. And besides, that they were come with a present of certain plate of gold, weighing 300 pound. That the King his petition was, That the society and friendship which had been contracted between his father and them, might be renewed also with him: promising, that if the people of Rome would impose any thing upon him to be done, which were meet to be laid upon a good and faithful ally, he would not fail in his devoir to perform all offices whatsoever. For why, the Senat had so well deserved of him, at what time as he sojournd in Rome, and lived courteously he found among the flour of the Roman young Gentlemen, that of all degrees and sorts of men, he was reputed and used more like a King indeed, than an hostage for the time. These Embassadors received a gracious answer: and withal, A. Antius the Pretor of the City was enjoined to renew the league with Antiochus, which had been concluded with his father. As for the tribute, the treasurers of the City received it: and the Censors took all the golden vessels aforesaid, who had the charge to bestow the same in what Temples they thought good. Unto the chief Embassador was sent a present in money, amounting to the sum of one 100000 Aesses: who also was allowed an house to lodge in at his pleasure of free cost: and all his charges were defrayed by the City, during the time that he made abode in Italy. The Embassadors who had been in Syria, gave this report of him, That he was a man in great favour and highly honoured with the King: and besides, singularly well affected to the people of Rome. Now concerning the affairs of the provinces for that year, thus much as followeth.

C. Cicerinus the Pretor fought in ranged battail with the enemies in Corfica, wherein 7000 of the Islanders were slain: and 1700 and better taken prisoners. In that conflict the Pretor had vowed to build the Chappel of Juno Moneta. After this was being granted to the Corsians at their own suit and seeking; but they were compelled two pay to hundred thousand weight of wax, Cicerinus having thus subdued Corfica, passed from thence over into Sardinia. A field also was fought in Liguria, within the territory of the Strelatens, near the Town Crispulus: for thither assembled a great army of the Ligurians. At first upon the arrival of M. Popilius the Consul they kept close within the walls: but afterwards seeing the Romans at the point to give assault and to lay battery to the walls, they issued forth of the gates and embattailed themselves. The Consul for his part followed not to come to hand-fight, the only thing he sought for in threatening to give assault. The conflict continued above 3 hours, and the hope of victory hung in equal balance: N which when the Cos perceived, namely, how the Ligurian ensigns removed not and gave no ground: he commanded his Cavalry to mount on horseback, and to charge with all their force and violence upon their enemies in three several places: many of these horsemen pierced quick through the midst of the battail, and passed so far, that they charged the enemies upon the back as they fought. Whereupon the Ligurians were much terrified and began to flee from all parts: very few retired back into the City, by reason that the horsemen made head against them that way most: besides, many of the Ligurians were left dead in the place; such as their resolute persistence in fight: killed also they were every where as they fled. Ten thousand (by report) fell upon the edge of the sword, above seven hundred taken prisoners in one place or other, and 82 military ensigns were carried away. And yet was not this victory without effusion of Roman blood: for there died of them not so few as three thousand soldiers, by reason that the foremost of both sides fought so manfully in the forefront, and while they would not give ground one to the other, were stricken down and slain without mercy. After this battail, the Ligurians rallied themselves into one place, out of all parts where they were scattered in the rout: and seeing that more of their men were lost than left behind (for in all they were not above ten thousand) they yielded simply without any composition: howbeit in good hope they were, that the Consul

A Consul would not deal worse by them nor in more rigorous manner than other Generals before him. But he disarmed them all, raised their Towns, sold their bodies & all that they had, and sent letters to the Senat of their exploits of his. Which when A. Antius the Pretor had read in the Senat, (for the other Consul Posthumius was absent, by occasion that he was employed in the survey and visiting of the Lands in Campania) they thought it a very hard and cruel course, that the Strelatens, who only of all the Ligurians had not born arms against the Romans, who were then assailed first, when as they began not of their own accord to make war, who also put themselves into the protection of the Romans, should be thus rigorously intreated, torn, dismembered and continued in most cruel manner: that so many thousands of frank condition, innocent persons, and imploring the mercy of the Romans, should be thus sold out-right, (a most dangerous example, that never hereafter any one will venture to submit himself again) and finally, that they should be distressed and carried away into all parts, to live in slavery under them, who having been sometimes professed enemies of the Romans, now enjoy peace and repose. In regard hereof, there passed an arrest or act of the Senat that M. Popilius the Consul should pay back the price unto the buyers, and restore the Ligurians to their former liberty: to take order also that their goods (as much as possibly might be recovered) should be rendered unto them: also that armour should be made in that nation with all speed possible, and that the Consul so soon as he had reestablished the Ligurians (upon their submission) in their former estate, should depart out of the Province: forasmuch as the honour of victory consisted not in exercising cruelty upon the poor and afflicted, but in vanquishing the obstinate. But the Consul as he bare himself proud and cruel against the Ligurians, so he shewed as great forwardness and disobedience to the Senat. And having sent away the legions to winter in Pisa, he returned to Rome, carrying a full and angry stomach against the LL. and as spiteful and malicious a mind to the Pretor: where immediately he assembled the Senat in the Temple of Belona, and rattled up the Pretor in broad and gross terms. For that he, whose part it had been to have moved the Senat for thanksgiving to the immortal Gods, in regard of the happy achievement of the wars, in stead thereof passed an act of the Senat against him and in favor of the enemies, for to put him by his victory and to give it away from him to the Ligurians; and finally being no better than a Pretor, would have had the Consul yielded in manner up into their hands. Whereupon he said that he would beseech as far as in his head: and withal, he required the LL. of the Senat to command and ordain, That the arrest devised against him might be reversed: and to give order, that the processions which in his absence they ought to have decreed (upon his letters sent of his good success) might now be holden: in consideration first of the honour due to the immortal Gods, and then respectively in some measure for his own desert. But after he was checked by some of the Senators to his face, and that in no milder terms than he had been rebuked in his absence, he went his waies into his Province again, and obtained neither the one fruit nor the other.

The other Consul Posthumius having spent the whole summer in surveying the Lands only, and never so much as seen his own Province, returned to Rome against the general assembly for election, and created Consuls C. Popilius and Cn. Sicius, and C. Menmius, the second Crassus, M. Iunius Pennus, Sp. Lucretius, Sp. Cluvius, and C. Menmius, the second time. In that year was holden a review of the City and the number taken of citizens, (when as Quintus Flaccus and L. Posthumius Albinus were Censors) wherein were found and enrolled of Roman citizens 269015. The number was somewhat the less, by reason that L. Posthumius the Consul had proclaimed in a publick audience, That no person of those Latine allies, who were to return into their own Cities (by virtue of an edict made when C. Claudius was Consul) should be enrolled into the subsidy book at Rome, but every man in his several City. This Censorship was administered with concord and unity, yea and to the good and profit of the common-weal. What Senators soever they depoted from their place and dignity, and so many Gentlemen of Rome as they took their Horses from, they made them all no better than contributors to pay all foot and hor, yea, and displaced them out of their tribes. And look whomsoever the one of them noted with disgrace and ignominy, he was not relieved nor allowed again by the other. This Fulvius dedicated the Temple of Fortuna equestris, now six years after he had vowed the same in a battail which he fought with the Celtiberians, at what time as he was Pro-consul in Spain: likewise he exhibited the stage-plays for four daies together, and one day in the cirque or show-place. Corn. Lentulus (a Decemvir for the holy rites and sacrifices) that year died: in whose room was substituted A. Posthumius Albinus. There were such mighty dights and clouds as it were of locusts, brought suddenly at once by a wind from the Sea into Apulia, that with their swarms they overspread all the fields far and near. For the riddance of which noisome vermine consuming the fruits of the earth, Cn. Sicius, Pretor elect, was sent with his full commission of command into Apulia: who assembled a mighty number of people for to gather them up, and employed much time thereabout.

In the beginning of the year ensuing, wherein C. Popilius and P. Aelius were Consuls, the remnant of the debates which arose the year before, was set on foot again. The LL. of the Senat would have had the matter propoed & debated again as touching the Ligurians, and the ordinance of the Senat in that behalf renewed. But as Aelius the one Consul put up a bill therof, so Popilius the other was an earnest suiter, & besought both his colleague & also the Senat in the behalf of his brother: may, he proceeded so far, that he gave the house to understand, in case they went about any such decree decree prejudicial unto him, he would cross and revoke the same by which countenance of his he affrighted his colleagues; but the LL. were offended so much the more and stormed against both the Consuls, yea, and perished still in their enterprise. And therefore when it was debated in council as concerning the Provinces, albeit the Coll. made means to be sent into Macedony (because the war of Perseus was no nearer at hand) yet Laguria was assigned to both of them; for the LL. protested and said, That they would not pass a decree for the government of Macedony; and is the case of Papilius were p. compounded, and an act thereof entered. Afterwards when they demanded a warrant to enrol new armies, or at least leave to levy a supply for making up the old, both the one motion and the other was denied. The Pretors also, who required to have a supplement with them into Spain, had a nay; and namely, M. Junius into the hither province, and P. Lucretius into the further. As for C. Licinius Crassus, to him there fell by lot the jurisdiction within the City over citizens, and C. Sestius that over foreigners. C. Memmius was allotted to Sicily, and Sp. Cicerio to Sardinia. The Consuls for these causes being highly offended and angry with the Senat, called the Latine seats and holidays to be published against the very first day that possibly they might, with an intimation that they would go straight into their province, and not attend the managing of any affairs touching the State, but only that which directly pertained to their government.

The Oration
of Emilius.

Valerius Antias writeth, that in these Consuls year, Attius the brother of K. Eumenius came in embassy to Rome, to inform criminous matter against Perseus, and to give the particulars of the preparation that he made for war. But the Annals of many other writers (more worthy of credit than he) deliver unto us, that K. Eumenius presented himself in proper person: where he was received with such honors, as the people of Rome thought not only meet & agreeable for his deserts, but also fit and furable to their own favours and benefits, which they had in ample manner conferred and in great number heaped upon him. And then he had audience given him in the Senate, where he shewed the cause of his coming to Rome what it was, namely, " (besides a secret desire that he had to see those gods and men by whose grace favour he enjoyed so good estate, as better he durst not wish) because he gladly would advertise the Senat by word of mouth, to prevent and withstand the designs of Perseus. And beginning his speech with the plaudiments & enterprises of Philip, he recounted withal, how it cost his son Demetrius his life, for that he stood against the war with the Romans; moreover, how he had caused the whole nation of the Balkanians to quit their own country where they were born and bred, to the end that by they did he might pass over into Italy; but while (qd. he) these matters he projected and said in his head, his time was come, and arrested he was by death: but he left his Kingdom to him, whom he knew to be the most spiteful enemy that the Romans had. And therefore Perseus, having received this war (as a man would say) by way of inheritance left him by his father eye together with the crown and scepter, from the very first day of his reign, doth mightily enlarge, enlarge, and promote the same by all the means and devices that possibly he can, mightily and puissant he is besides in number of young, lusty, and able men for service, who during the time of long peace have sprung up and multiplied exceedingly. In wealth and riches a great potentate he is, and besides in his flourishing years and the best time of his age, which as it is accompanied with the very strength and vigor of his body, so his spirit and mind is inured and hardened with skillfull experience and long practise of martial fears. For from his very infancy nuzled hath he been in the field and camp, conversing ordinarily within the royal tent and pavilion of his father, acquainted with the wars, not only waged against neighbour nations, but also against the Romans; and that which more is, employed by his father in many and sundry expeditions and executions of service. But since that he himself entered upon the Kingdom, and swayed the regal scepter in his own hand, he hath explored & accomplished many things with marvellous facility and success, which his father Philip before him could never compass and effect, notwithstanding he had tried and assayed all means as well of open force as secret fraud, To augment this greatness of his, he hath purchased already that authority and reputation in the world, which others hadly in continuance of long time, and by many favors and ample benefits attain unto: and namely, throughout the States of Greece and Asia, all men reverence his majesty. For what good turns, for what pleasures done, for what bounty of his they should thus do and honour him so much, neither feel I, neither can I say for certainty; whether it happen by a special gift and fortune that he hath of his own, or that (which I am myself afraid to speak) it be the deep malice and hatred which he hath conceived against the Romans, which is the cause that he is of such countenance and so gracious among them. Nay, with the very Kings and Princes of other nations he is highly esteemed and of passing authority. The daughter of Selucus he hath taken to wife, without any suit of his own, but being earnestly wooed and requested thereunto. And to Prusias he hath given his own sister in marriage, after much seeking and instant intreaty. These two weddings were solemnized with the exceeding joy and innumerable presents of infinite embassages: and who should be present to celebrat the auspices and complements, yea, and give those pious benedictions, marriage, but the noblest and most renowned States that were? The Breotian nation had been much solicited by Philip, yet could never be induced to draw or open any covenants of accord and amity with him: but now there is to be seen a league engrossed, yea, and engraven in three several conspicuous places, the one in Theraps, the second at Siderum, within a most holy, sacred and renowned Temple, and the third at Delphi. What should I speak of the general Council of the Achaeans? wherein, had not the design been dashed by some there in place, who, injured and alleged hard the signory and empire of the Romans, it would have gone very hard, but that he should have set forth even within Achaia. But contrariwise I assure you my due and deferred honors (unto whom it is hard to say, whether they be more bounden and obliged for private pleasures or public benefits) are either forlorn through reticible diftate and diligence, or else annulled and abolished of wilfull malice and hostile hatred. As for the Aetolians, who knoweth not, that in his civil broils, and seditions they fought to Perseus for to relieve and succour, and not to the Romans? Being thus upheld with societies and amities, he hath provided such furniture of his own, and made that preparation for war at home, as he needs none from abroad. Of himself he is thirty thousand strong in foot & 9000 in horse. For ten years he is stored with corn abroad, so as for that kind of purveyance he may spare his own territories, and also forbear his enemies. As for money in ready coin, he hath such abundance, that over and above the forces of natural Macedonians, he wudgeth 10000 mercenary soldiers, and hath wherewith to make pay for as many years, besides the yearly customs & profits that arise out of their Kings mines. Now for armour, he hath gathered together into his arsenals and armories, sufficient to furnish three such armies. What should I speak of the youth and serviceable men of war? Set the case that Macedony failed him and were not able to find enough; as Thrace is subject unto him, from whence he may serve his turn as out of his ever running fountain and living spring. The rest of his speech he knit up with an exhortation in this manner. " I relate not these things (qd. he) my self of Rome, as blown abroad and vented by headless heartsy and doubtful rumors; neither have I been so ready to believe them, as a man desirous that such criminous imputations should be verified upon my enemy, but as undoubted and certain reports upon my own knowledge, as if I had been sent by you of special purpose to be a spie; and declared that and no more, which I had seen with mine eyes and not otherwise. Neither would I have left mine own realm wherein (by your means and goodnes) in glorious and magnificent State I sit warm enough, to go (ail over) so large a sea as I have done and to carry vain rates and untruths to you, thereby to crack my credit with you for ever hereafter. But I tell you these chies of mine have seen the most renowned and noblest Cities of Asia and Greece discovering more and more from day to day; what they intend and what their meaning is: who if they be let alone and permitted to run on as they begun, would be engaged to far, as they might not possibly return again & save themselves by any repentance. Behold I have Perseus (I say) how he containeth not within the realm of Macedony, but one while seizeth upon this by force of arms, another while gaineth and getteth what by favour and good will, which with violence he could never have conquered. I perceived and considered well how unequal the match and condition is, whiles he upon you prevaileth, and you again perform to him security of peace. Although in my conceit, and so far as I could see into it, he made no more any preparation thereof, but was already upon action and execution. For he chased Abdulus, a confederate prince and friend of yours, lord of his Kingdom. And Artaxerxes the Illyrian, another of your associates and allies, he killed outright, because he found that he had written some letters unto us. As for Everges & Callistratus, both Thebanes, & two principal States of that City, for no other reason, but because in a Parliament of the Balkanians, they had spoken their mind against him too frankly, and avowed that they would repeat unto you what things had passed, he caused to be murdered. The Bizantines he persecuted against the order taken in the accord: upon Dolopia he levied war: Thessaly and Doris both he invaded and overrun with his army, to the end, that in some intestine and civil war, by the help of spoils he might afflict and plague the better. He shuffled all together, and made a very confusion of the State in Thessaly and Perrhabia, upon the hope and cancelling all bonds and coining out all debt books; that thus by a power and multitude of bankrupts, such as were over deeply engaged, and whom he had obliged and bound to himself, he might deprende and oppress the great men and principal personages. Having wrought these practices uncontrolled, whiles you sit still looking on and suffering all, he being you to let him do with Greece, what he list, making full account, that no man will put him on arms and make head against him, before he be passed over into Italy. How safe this may be to you, nay, how this can stand with credit, see you to that and be advised. For my self, I assure you, I thought it meer theme and very villany, that Perseus your enemy should enter into Italy to make war upon you, before that I your friend and ally, came to give your warning for to take heed and stand upon your guard. Now since I have in this matter performed my duty, done that office which I was bound upon necessity, and in some measure requit my self and discharged my bounden duty and obligation of fidelity; what remaineth behind for me to do, but to be your beadsman to all the gods & goddesses, so vouchsafe you that grace, that you may provide for your own Commonwealth, and also for us your friends and allies, who depend wholly upon you? In this last speech he came near unto the LL. of the Senat, but for the present no man might know any thing, but only that the K. had been in the Senat, so that were they all, & kept the council-house close shut with secrecy. But after the war was brought to end, then came abroad, both what the K. spake, and what answer was returned to him again. Some few daies after, the Senat bet to give audience unto the Embassadors of King Perseus: he having their minds and ears both, poisoned abroad by King Eumenius, all the defence that the Roman Embassadors made, and all the entreaty they used, was rejected. Besides, the stoutness of Harpanax (the principal person of the embassy) moved their patience and exasperated their bloods. For he said, that indeed the K. desire & endeavour was, to be credited and believed in his

Apology and defence, that he neither had said nor done any thing founding to hostility : many H in case he perceived and saw, that they came upon him thus, and would needs pick quarrels and give occasion of war, he would stand upon his guard, and defend himself with a resolute and vehement course. For the hazard of the field was common, and the issue of war uncertain. Now, all the Cities of Greece and Asia both, would rather then their lives have known what the Em-bassadors of Persus, and what Eumenes had done in the Senat : for in regard of his coming, most of the states (supposing verily that he would stir cooles and make some work) had sent their Em-bassadors to Rome, pretending colourably other matters in semblance, but indeed to listen after news : and among the rest, was the Embassy of the Rhodians, and the chief thereof was one Satyrus, who made no question nor doubt, but that Eumenes had done their errand, and put their City and Persus together in all their criminal matters laid to his charge. And therefore he made all the means that possibly he could by the mediation of patrons, friends, and acquaintance, to debate the matter with King Eumenes before the body of the Senat : which when he had obtained, his tongue walked at large, and overbore him w. s. and too round with the King, in broad invectives and imprecator terms : namely, that he had solicited and stirred up the nation of the Lycians against the Rhodians, and was a heavier friend unto Asia then Antiochus had been. Which speech of his, as it was plausible enough and pleasing to the States of Asia (for they likewise by this time inclined to affect and favour Persus) so it was unsavoury altogether and odious to the Senat, and nothing profitable to themselves and their City. But contrariwise, this banding and conspiracy against Eumenes, was him the more grace and favor among the Romans, so as they did him all they honour they could, gave him molt rich and costly presents, and endowed him with a carule of estate, and a staffe or scepter, both of ivory.

After these embassages had their dispatch and were dismissed, Harpalus returned into Macedonia in all speed and hast possible, relating unto the King, how he had left the Romans not preparing as yet for war ; but so far out with him and so highly offended, that it appeared evidently it would not be long ere they began. And Persus again for his part, besides that he looked for no other, was well enough pleased therewith, presuming upon the flour and strength of his forces. But above all other he unloosed Eumenes most : with whose blood he laid the first foundation of the war : for he laboured one Evander a Candiot and captain under him of certain auxiliary soldiers, and three Macedonians besides (whose service and ministry he had used in the like feats) to murder the King. He gave them letters addressed to one Praxo an hostesse of his, a jolly dame in Delphi, and of great credit and wealth among them. For assured he was, that Eumenes minded to go up to Delphi, there to sacrifice unto Apollin. These traitors together with Evander set forward ; and to execute this their designed enterprise, they looked all about and sought for nothing but the opportunity of some place or other. Now, as men ascend from Cirra to the temple, before they come to any place much peopled and frequented with houses, there stood a mound or mud wall on the left hand of the path or way, rising somewhat higher than the foundations ground-work ; along which wall there was passage for one by one and no more ; for on the right hand the earth was broken down and fallen, and breach made of some a good depth. Behind the mound aforesaid, these traitors had hidden themselves, and raised some steps like stairs ; to the end that from above, as from the top of a wall, they might discharge their shot upon K. Eumenes as he passed by. Before him there marched from the sea, at the first a sort of his friends and followers, together with his guard intermingled one with another ; but afterwards as the way grew more straight and narrow, the train waxed thinner. But when they were one come to the place where they could not go but by one at once, Panaleus one of the States and princes of Asia, with whom the King had begun some communication, entered first into the narrow path aforesaid :
whom the King had begun some communication, entered first into the narrow path aforesaid :
with that, the knives that lay in wait behind, rose up and tolled down two huge stones, wherof the one smote the King upon the head, the other astonished his shoulder. And verily all the rest of his friends and followers, seeing him fall with the blow, fled some one way, some another : only Panaleus stood behind all, fearless to protect and guard the King. The murderous villainies might have fetched a short compass about the wall, and soon run to the King to make sure work and dispatch him quiet by their insupposing they had done the deed already, fled to the pith of the mound Panaleus, and made such halt, that when one of the companie hindred and staid their running, because he dragged behind and could not keep pace and follow them hard at heels through those steep and blind waies, they made no more ado but killed him out-right, for fear lest if he were taken, he should bewray and disclose the whole treason. The body of the King lay along on the ground : and first his friends came running about him, then his guard and household servants. When they reared him up, they found him stoned with the stroke and altogether senseless in a trance :
howbeit, by some heat remaining, and the beating of his heart, they perceived there was some life, but little or no hope that he could escape and live. Some there were of his guard and followers who had made pursuit after these murderers by their tracks : and when they had held on their chase as far as unto the crest of Panaleus, wearying themselves to no purpose, they gave over and returned as wile as they went. The Macedonians as they had begun an audacious enterprise inconsiderately, so they left it undone as fearfully and without advice. Now by this time was the King come again to himself. And the morrow after, his friends conveyed him to his ships from thence to Corinth : & from Corinth along the freights Isthmus they brought their vessels, & crossed over to Aegina : where his cure was carried to close & secret, without admitting any

A person to come unto him, that the rumor run into Asia how he was dead. And Antiochus his brother (by your leave) gave good ear thereto, & believed the newes faster then was becoming brithly love and unity. For he entered into such talk both with his brothers wife, and also with the principal of the call, as if he had been the undoubted heir and assured inheritor of the crown. Antiochus himself knew full well afterwards : who albeit he purpoed to dissemble the newes, and to get it up as least wile with silence ; at their first encounter and meeting together, he could not hold, but reproved and reproached his brother, for being so forward and over-hally to court and wooe his wife. The fruit also was blown to Rome, and a report there was of the death of K. Eumenes.

About the same time C. Valerius was returned out of Greece : who had been sent thither as Em-bassador to look into the state of the country ; to mark all and observe the plots and proceedings of Persus. He reported all things suitable and agreeable to the intelligences given by King Eumenes, and withall, brought with him from D. Iphi dome Proxus, in whose house those villainous crystall were lodged and harboured : also one L. Raminus a Brundisian, who informed inbreve and gave evidence as followeth. This Raminus was one of the principall citizens of Brundisium, and used to lodge and entertain in his house, not only of the Roman captains when they came to town, but also the Embassadors of forreign nations, such as were of greatest name and principally those that were sent from any Kings. By this means, acquainted he grew with Persus, albeit they never had seen one another face. And being invited by the King his letters, wherein he was promised great hope of some near and inward friendship above others, and consequently of great preferences thereby, he made a journey unto him : Within a short time he was wound into very familiar acquaintance with the King, and drawn into priv. conference and discourse of secrets.
Further, I wis, then himself was willing or liked of. For the King dealt with him, yea, and imported him with infant. prayers and large behests of rich rewards, that forasmuch as the Roman captains and Embassadors used to take his house for their Inne, he would cause as many of their as he wist for, to be poisoned. Now forthat he knew it was a right difficult and dangerous matter to come by such a poison and compass this project, especially if many were party and privy to him : and besides, the even uncertainty, either in the effect of the drug it self to be strong, quick and forcible enough to do the feat : or in the secret working thereof, lest it should be found and spied ; he would therefore put into his hands such a poison, as neither in the giving, nor after it was given, might be known by any sign whatsoever. Raminus hearing lest if he refused & denied, he should be the first man to make assay and make experiment of the poison, promised to do so, & then departed. But return to Brundisium he would not before he had spoken with C. Fabius, the Embassador, who then sojourned (as he heard say) about Chalcis. First unto him he revealed this plot, and by his commandment came along with him to Rome : where being brought into the Senat, after audience given, he laid abroad in every point all that had passed. This new matter, over and besides those which Eumenes had reported, was the cause that Persus was the sooner taken for an enemy, and so declared : the rather because they saw him not only about to make open war of a princely and roysall mind, but also to practise and execute the kingdome of mischief, by way of covert brigandage, theivish stealth, and secret poison. The managing of this war was put off and referred to the new Consuls : howbeit for the present ordained it was, that C. Cicinius the Pretor who had the jurisdiction between citizens and strangers, should levy and enroll soldiers who being conducted to Brundisium should with all convenient speed commit to sea, and sail over to Apollonia in Epirus, for toleiz upon the maritime Cities, to the end that the Consul unto whom the Province of Macedonia should be allotted, might arrive there with his vessels in safety, and let his forces on land with ease.

Eumenes, after he had been kept a long while at Aegina, during the time of his hard and dangerous cure, so soon as ever he might go safely abroad, went to Pergamum ; where, over and besides the old hatred settled in his breast, being pricked also with this fresh and bleeding villany perpetrated by Persus, he prepared war with all his power to the uttermost : and thither repaired unto him Embassadors from Rome, to tellifie their joy for his evasion and escape out of to near and great a danger.

When the Macedonian war was delayed and put off for one year, and the rest of the Pretors were already into their provinces, M. Junius and Sp. Lucretius (unto whom befell the government of Spain) after that they had importuned and wearied the Senat, in suing so long for one thing, obtained at the length a commission for a supply of soldiers to make up the army ; by venue whereof they enrolled 3000 foot, and 500 horse for the legions ; and levied 5000 foot and three hundred horse for the army of the allies. These forces were transported into Spain with the new Pretors.

The same year, after that a great part of the Campain territory, which private persons here and there held in occupation without regard of lawful title & tenure, was (upon diligent survey made by Publius the Consul) recovered again for the publick use of the City of Rome ; M. Lucretius a Tribune of the Com. preferred a law, that the Censors should let out to farm, the Campain lands to tenants for yearly rent. A thing that had not been done for many years after the winning of Capua, namely, that particular men should be so greedy as to encroach thus beyond their bounds upon the common walt.

The Macedonian war being now concluded, but not as yet published and proclaimed, whiloe the Senat was in doubtfull expectation what K. K. would friend them, & who would side with Persus ;

there came to Rome Embassadors from Ariminum, bringing with them the Kings son, a very child. The speech they made was to this purpose, that the King their master had sent him for to Rome, thereto have his education, to the end that living there brought up, might from his infancy be acquainted with their fashions, and converse with the people of Rome. His father & brother were them was, that they would vouchsafe to him not only the ordinary entertainment and protection that private persons afford to their guests, but also to take the charge of a public education, and as it were the guardianship of him. This embassy of the K. was well taken of the Senat & pleased them highly. Whereupon they ordained Lucius Licinius the Pretor, should sit out a mansion house with all the furniture, wherein the young prince and his train might keep their abode.

The Thracian Embassadors likewise presented themselves before the Senat, to debate their own controversies in their hearing, and withall desired their friendship and amity. They desired their suit, and besides there was sent unto them by way of present, the sum of 2000 Altas a piece. Glad were the LL. of the Senat that those States were received into their society, by reason Thracia lyeth hard on the back side of Macedonia; but to the end that they might have perfect intelligence and notice how all things went in Asia and the Islands, they sent thither C. Claudius Nero, and M. Decimus in embassy: whom they now commanded also to visit Cerret and Rhodes; and withall, both to renew the amity, and also to see and observe whether the hearts of those allies had been solicited and tempted by C. Perseus.

As the City was thus in doubtfull suspense and expectation of the event of this new war, behold in a tempest that rose in the night, a certain column or pillar garlanded and set out with the beak-heads of war ships (which had been erected in the Capitoll during the first publick war by M. Aemilius the Consul, who had for his companion in government Serg. Fulvius) was by a clap of thunder and lightning rent and cloven from the very base to the chapter. This was taken for a prodigious token, and report thereof was made to the Senat. The LL. gave order, that the Atruspices should be conferred with about it, and their advice taken: likewise they commanded the Decemvirs to look into their books of Sibylla. The Decemvirs for their part declared, that the City should be purged and hallowed, publick supplications and prayers made to the gods, and great heats killed for sacrifice, as well at Rome in the Capitoll, as in Campania near the promontory of Munerva. Also that with all convenient speed, there should be plaies solemnly exhibited for ten daies together, in the honour of most gracious Jupiter. All this was done with diligence accordingly: but the Atruspices aforesaid, made answer out of their learning, that this prodigy portended good and signified the advancement of their own territories: together with the destruction of their enemies; for that those beak heads which the storm overthrew, had been the spoils of ships won from the enemies. There hapned other occurrences besides to encrease the ferocious religion & devotion of men: for reported it was, how at Sabinia within the town, it rained blood threedayes together. Item, at Calatia an affe was bolt with three feet: and a bull together with five kine were stricken stark dead with one thunderbolt and flash of lightning: last of all at Orimum there was a shower of very earth and nothing else. In regard of these wonders also, sacrifices were celebrated, supplications made, and one day kept holiday and all shop-window shut.

Yet were not the Consuls departed into their provinces, because they neither would obey and condescend unto the Senat in proposing the matter as touching Popilius at the council-table, and the LL. were as resolute for their parts to let no decree passe, before that were done. The spite and heart-burning they bare against M. Popilius, grew the more by occasion of his own letters, wherein he wrote and gave them to understand, that being Proconsul, he had now a second time fought with the Statellats in Liguria, and put ten thousand of them to the sword, by reason of which hard courses and extremities of war, the other nations likewise of the Ligurians were entered into arms. At which news not only Popilius was blamed behind his back of making war against all law and equity upon them that had yielded, and thereby provoking those who before were quiet, to go out and put themselves in action of rebellion: but the Consuls also were checked to the faces in the Senat, because they let not forward to their charge and government. M. Marcius Sermo and Quintus Marcius Scipio, two Tribunes of the Commons, seeing the LL. of the Senat thus drawing all in a line, took heart unto them, and both menaced the Consuls to fine them, unless they made more halt unto their province: and also recited in the Senat a law which they had drawn and framed, and were upon the point to promulge, as touching the forsaide Ligurians who had submitted. The tenor whereof ran in this form, That what person soever of Statellat had yielded himself and was not restored to liberty and freedom before the calends of Sextilis next ensuing, the Senat upon their oath should ordaine one special commissioner to make inquisition by what means covin, and service he was in villenage and punish the party accordingly. Then by authority and approbation of the Senat they published this for a law. Now before that the Consuls took their journey, the Senat assembled in the Temple of Bellona in regard and favour of C. Claudius the Pretor of the former year. Where audience was given him: and after he had declared what exploits he had performed in Cerretia, thereupon demanded triumph: which when he could not obtain, he made no more ado, but rode triumphant in the Alban hill, for now it was taken up and grown for a custome to do so, and aske the authority and the State no leave.

The forsaide law propoed by the Martii the commons with a generall consent by their voices granted.

A question in the Senat, Whom they would have sit upon their inquisition according to the form of the said law. And the LL. ordained himself to be the inquisitor. Then at length and moreover, the Consuls put themselves in their way toward their province, and received the charge of the army from M. Popilius. This Popilius durst not yet return to Rome, for fear he should be called in question and put to his answer before that Pretor and supreme judge, who had required the advice of the Senat as touching that enquest framed and drawn of purpose against him: knowing full well how the Senat was not well affected to him, and the people much more maliciously bent and set against him. But the Tribunes of the Commons thought they would prevent and meet with this finching of his and absenting himself, by intimation of another act and law provided in that behalf, namely, that if he entered not into the City of Rome before the * Ides of November immediately following, it should be lawful for C. Licinius to proceed in judgment, and give sentence against him in his absence. This cord towed and haled him to Rome with a wittelle: and when he was returned and entered into the Senat, they were upon his top, and gave him such a welcome thither, as testified their displeasure and hard conceit of him. After he had been well bairied and shaken up among them, an act of Senat was entered in this wise, that so many of the Liginians as had not been enemies, after the time that Q. Fulvius and L. Marcius were Consuls, those the Pretors, C. Licinius and Cn. Scinius, should restore and establish in their former state of freedom; and that the Consul C. Popilius should let them out land to occupy and possess beyond the Po. By virtue of this arrest, many a too were set free and enfranchised, who being transported over the river Po, had land assigned unto them accordingly. Now M. Popilius upon the law Martia (promulged by the two Martii, Tribunes of the Com.) answered for himself judicially twice before C. Licinius. At the third time, the Pretor overcome with a respective grace and favour to the Consul, absent, and the earnest prayers of the whole name and house of the Poppii, adjourned the defendant to make appearance into the court upon the * Ides of March: on which day the new magistrates were to enter into their offices: and this he did, because himself by that time should be a private person again: & therefore not to sit upon the bench as judge to hear pleas and to determine. Thus the aforesaid act as touching the Ligurians, finely shifted and cunningly avoided, came to nothing.

At that time the Carthaginian Embassadors were at Rome, with Gulussa, the son of M. Annibals; between whom hard hold and much debating there was in the Senat. The Carthaginians complained, that over and besides the lands (about which there had been sent commissioners from Rome before time, to view the place and to enquire into the cause) M. Annibals within the last two years and by force and arms possessed himself of more then threecore and ten towns and castles within the Carthaginian dominion and territory, and an eagle matter was it for him also to do, who made reckoning of nothing, nor had regard of any person; whereas the Carthaginians were so tied and obliged by their capitulations to the good-accoring, that they held their peace: for, inhibited they were to bear arms, without their own country. And albeit they knew assuredly, that they should war within their own confines, if they disliced the Numidians of those peeces, yet feared they that one expels article of the accord, where they were debarred in plain terms to wage against the associates of the people of Rome. Howbeit the Carthaginians could no longer endure this pride, chumky, and avarice. Sent therefore they were unto the Senat as humble orators that it might please them to grant one of these three requests: to wit, That either they might debate with indifferent audience before them (being allies to both alike) as touching the right of the one and the other: or that they would permit the Carthaginians to defend themselves by just and lawful means, against unjust and ungodly force: or else finally (if partial favour laywed more with them then the truth of the cause) to let down at once what their pleasure was should be given away out of their own to M. Annibals. For they yet, would have some rage of their hands, and know what they gave; whereas he himself had no stay, nor would ever see to make an end, so unsatisfiable was his lust and appetite. But in case they might obtain none of these points, and that there could be found any fault or trespass of theirs, committed since the peace granted unto them by Scipio; then, that they rather then any other would chastise them. For rather they had to live in servitude under the signory of Romans with safety, then enjoy such a liberty as should be expoled to the injuries of M. Annibals. And better it were for them to perish and die once for all, then to live and languish under the yoke of a most cruel and bloody butcher. At which words the tears tickled down their cheeks, and down they fell at their feet. Lying thus prostrate upon the ground, as they moved pity and compassion to themselves, to they procured delight and merriment against the King. Then thought good it was to demand of Gulussa, what he had to answer as touching these matters? or else (if he had no rather himself) to declare before, for what cause and upon what occasion he was come to Rome. Gulussa made answer, that neither it was easier for him to deal in those points, whereof he had no commission from his father: nor for his father to give him any such charge, considering that the Carthaginians, shewed not unto him of whose benefits they would treat, nor yet made him so much as privy of their coming to Rome. This only was known, that there was a close council holden for certain nights, by the principal States of Carthage within the Temple of Esculapinus, from whence Embassadors were dispatched to Rome, with hidden messages. And this was the cause that his father had sent him to Rome, to detect the Senat not to give credit to the slanderous accusations that should be preferred against him by those that were common enemies as well to them as him; who hated him for no other cause but

The Senate, to the end that they might know out of hand, what captains and commanders the commonwealth was to employ, thought good to write unto the Cōf, that the one or other of them (who first might) should repair to Rome for the creation of new magistrates. And no great matter to speak of, as concerning the state, was that year done by the Cōf. But more expedient it was thought for the commonwealth, to suppress and appease the Ligurians, whose blood was up and ebbed against him, considering that the Macedonian war was in daily expectation.

Moreover, the Embassadors of Iffe gave occasion, that Germanus also King of Hybernia washed in jealousy: who at one time both complained of him, that now twice he had walked to their Likewise those Ambassadors, whose commission was visit the associar Kings, returned out of Africa, and reported that in the said Africa they had communication with Eumenes, in Syria with Antiochus, and in Alexandria with Prolemenus: who all of them had been solicited by sundry embassies of Perseus, howbeit they perswaded firm and fast in their professed fealty, and promised to perform whatsoever the people of Rome would command them. Also that they went to the confederates, whom they found true and loiall enough, excepting the Rhodians only, whom they perceived to be flogging & wavering, as altogether infected & poisoned with the counsel of Perseus.

Now were the Rhodian Ambassadors consero answer those things which they knew were commonly bruited abroad touching their City: howbeit the Senat w^s not of mind to give them audience, before the new Consuls entered into their office. But they were all of advice to delay no longer the preparation for war. C. Licinius the Pretor had incharge, out of the old Quinquevires which were laid up in the docks and harbors, to repair as many as might serve at sea; to dig alle and prepare a fleet of 50 sail. But if he could not come to make up that full number, then to write unto his colleague C. Memmius in Sicily, for to repair, calk and trim those ships which were in Sicily, that with all speed possible they might be sent to Brundisium. The said Pretor C. Licinius was commanded to enroll of Roman citizens (and thole, Libertins, (such as of bondmen born, had been enfranchised) for mariners and sailors, as many as might serve 25 ships: and Cn. Scipinius had commission to levy as many of Latine allies for the like number of ships; also the Pretor was enjoined to charge the Latine allies with 8000 foot, and 400 horse. A. Attilius Serranus, who had been Pretor the year before, was chosen to receive these forces at Brundisium, and to conduct them over into Macedony: and Cn. Scipinius the Pretor was appointed to have the army in readines for to be transported. As for C. Licinius the Pretor, he by authority from the Senat, wrote to C. Popilius the Consul that he should command the second legion, which had been longt employed in Liguria, and consisted of the most experienced souldiers, together with four thousand footmen and two hundred horse of the Latine allies, to be ready at Brundisium upon the 1st of February. With this fleet of ships and forces of souldiers, Cn. Scipinius was commanded to keep Macedony, untill one were appointed to succeed him; and for this purpose his charge of command was continued for a year longer. All these directions of the Senat were put in execution with great diligence and expedition. Eight and forty Quinqueremes were laid aloft out of their docks: and L. Porcius Licinius was ordained to conduct them to Brundisium: the other 13 were sent out of Sicily. Three Ambassadors were dispatched into Apulia and Calabria, to wit, Decimus, T. Inventius and M. Caecilius, for to buy corn to serve the fleet and the army. Now when all things were provided and in readines, C. Scipinius the Pretor departed from the City in his warlike coat of arms, and arrived at Brundisium. About the end of the year C. Popilius the Consul returned to Rome, somewhat latter then the Senat had ordained; who was commanded to take the first time, and withall leave to create new magistrats, considering that so great a war approached to neer. And therefore when the Consuls discoursed in the temple of Bellona as touching his exploits in Liguria, the LL. of the Senat were nothing well pleased to hear him: but in stead thereof, they muttered every where, and asked him oftentimes, Why he had not restored to liberty those Ligurians, who were oppressed through the wicked proceedings of his father? The election of the Consuls was holden upon the twelfth day before the Calends of March according to the writs that went out: wherein were created Consuls, Pub. Licinius Crassus and Caius Cassius Longinus. The morrow following, the Pretors were elected, to wit, Caius Sulpicius Galba, L. Furius Philus, L. Caninius Dives, C. Lucretius Gallus, C. Cninius Rebilus, and L. Villus Annalis. To these Pretors the provinces were assigned in this manner: that two of them should sit as LL. chief justices in Rome for civil jurisdictions: three other to have the government of Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia: so as the first only should remain not aloited to any place; for to be employed wheresoever the Senat would think good and ordaine. The Consuls elect were commanded by the Senate, upon the solemn day when they were to enter into their magistracy, after they had sacrificed greater beasts, as it appertained, to pray in this form, that the gods would vouchsafe the war which the people of Rome intended now to enter upon. Consul thought well and came to happy issue. The same day the Senate decreed, that C. Popilius the Consul should set out plumes for ten daies together in the house of Sup. Opt. Max. and the offerings should be made at all the shrines and altars, it to be commonwealth continued for ten years in the same good estate as now it stood. And as the Senate ordained, the Consul vowed into the Capitol, that the said plumes should be exhibited, so long as were presented of as great value as it pleased them to let down. This vow was pronounced by the Consul in the presence of no fewer than 150 Senators, and according to that form of words which Lepidus the high-priest or sovereign Bishop indited. That year died certain Prelats of State, to wit, L. L. Aemilius Pappus one of the Decemvirs or superintendents over the holy rites, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus a Bishop, who the year before had been Censor. This man had a ill end. It fortuned that news came unto him of his two foot, who then served in the wars of Thyrricum, how they were departed out of this life, and the other lay sick of a grievous and dangerous malady. The sorrow for the one, and the fear for the other, happening to just at one time, brake his heart and oppressed his spirits: inasmuch as the next morning, when his servants entered betimes into his bed-chamber, they found him hanged by a cord, and strangled. It was thought abroad, that he had never been his own man, since he was Censor, and commonly it was spoken, that Juno Lucina in wrathful displeasure against him for spoiling her temple, bereft him of his right wits. In the room of Aemilius, M. Valerius Malleus was substituted. Decemvir a year and in head of Fulvius there was elected Archibishop, Cicero Domitius K. Enobarbus, who to say the truth was very young to be made a priest.

In the year wherein P. Licinius and C. Cassius were Consuls, not only the City of Rome, and the whole land of Italy, but all the Princes and States of Europe & Asia, were smitten respectively upon the war between the Macedonians and Romans. Eumenes (King of Asia) not only carried an old cankered malice against Philip, but also was pricked forward with new despite and anger upon a fresh occasion, in that by the wicked practice of Perseus, he had like to have been sacrificed at Delphi. Prusias King of Bithynia, was resolved not to enter into arms, but attend the issue of the war. For he thought it not reason and seemly for him to take arms in the defence of the Romans against his wives brother; and this account was made, that if Perseus hapned to have the better, he might soon obtain pardon at his hands by the mediation of his sister. Ariaranes King of the Cappadocians, over and besides that he had promised aid to the Romans in his own name, ever since that he had linked in affinity to Eumenes, drew the same way which he went, and joyined with him in all his counsels both of war and peace. As for Antiochus [King of Syria] his teeth watered verily at the Kingdom of Egypt, as he, who do despise as well the childhood of the young King in his nonage, as the weakness and negligence of his guardians: and considering there was some controversy about the title of Celestia, he supposed that he should have good occasion to levy war, to manage all and exploit the same without emperment, while the Romans were busied in the Macedonian war; howbeit was well by his own Embassadors sent unto the Senat, as also unto theirs addressed unto him, he promised stoutly to be to them. Ptolemy [the young King of Egypt] being yet under age, was at the disposition of others: his tutors and protectors, as they prepared to wage war against Antiochus for the recovery of Celestia (so they promised the Romans withal to do their devoir in the Macedonian war: Masaniissa [King of the Numidians] was altogether for the Romans; he furnished them with coin, and intended to send his son Mithogenes with aids both of men and elephants in that service. Howbeit he to dispoled of his designs, as might serve his turn which way (soever the world went) for it the victory fell to the Romans, he ordered that his affairs should remain still in the same state, and better he was not to look for, because the Romans would not suffer any violence to be offered unto the Carthaginians; but in case the Romans went down and had the overthrow (who then protected the Carthaginians) then he made full reckoning of Asiatic to be his own. Gentius [King of Thyrricum] had so demeaned himself, that he was suspected of the Romans; yet was he not fully resolved which side to take unto; and it seemed he would joy to one or the other, more upon relation it took him in the head, than with any discretion or advice. Cotys the Thracian, King of the Odrisians, took part evidently with the Macedonians. In these terms (I say) stood the KK. as touching this present war. As for the free Cities and States besides, the common people every where (as at wales lightly it is seen) inclined to the worse part, and ran with the KK. as the Macedonians: but the principal persons and men of quality, a man might perceive affected diversly. Some went with the Romans all upon the head, inasmuch as they greatly empaired their authority in excessive favour to them: few of them were induced by the just and upright government of the Romans, but the most part were carried away with the strong conceit, that the more they employed themselves for them, the greater men they should be at home in their own Cities. Another sort there were of the Kings flattering favorites, who being deeply drenched in debt, and despite of bettering their fortune (at the present Rate held still) abandoned and gave themselves over to entertain all changes and innovations. And some there were besides, possessed with a vain humour of their own, because Perseus seemed to have more favour of the common people. A third sort there were (and those of the best and wisest of all other) who if it had lyen in their hands to de-

they would have to be greater lord, wished to have been under the Romans rather than the KK. Many if they might have had their liberty to be masters simply of their fortune, by their good will they would not have had the one part advanced by the depression and subversion of the other: but that the forces and puissance of them both remaining entire and unfolded, peace thereby might be entertained; and so between them both, the state of the Cities should continue in the best case, while as the one part might ever protect the weaker side, from the injuries of the mightier. And when that stood affected thus, held them quiet & laid not a word; but being left themselves, beheld the behaviour and deportments of those that were the partakers and favourers of either side.

The Consuls that day wherein they entered their government, when they sacrificed according to the ordinance of the Senat) with greater beasts in all the temples and chapells, wherein (for a mid part of the year) the sacred beds and couches for the gods were prepared; and thereby had prayed by good tokens, that their prayers were acceptable to the immortal gods, made report unto the Senat, That their sacrifices were as they ought to be, as also their prayers, which they bestowed without touching the war. The Bowell-priests likewise by their learning declared, that if they went about any new enterprise, they should make speed; for why? all did prognosticate victory, triumph, and enlargement of their seignory. Whereupon the LL. of the Senat commanded the Consuls to propose to the people the first day of the general assembly of the Centuries in this manner: In the name of God, and in the welfare and happiness of the Commonwealth; whereas Perseus (son of Philip K. of Macedonia, against the accord and covenant concluded with his father first, and after his death renewed with him) hath levied war upon the allies of the people of Rome, wasteth their territories, seizeth their Cities, complecteth into his arms against the people of Rome, wasteth and hath provided armour, soldiers and a fleet: unless he make satisfaction, pleaseth justice war be enterprised and waged against him. This bill passed by all the suffrages of the people. Then was there an act of the Senat likewise entered, that the Consuls should either agree together, or else cast lots for the provinces of Italy and Macedonia; and look whose lot fell to Macedonia, he should persecute with fire and sword K. Perseus, and all that fed and faction which took his part, unless they made amends to the people of Rome. It was concluded also, that four legions should be newly enrolled, for either Consul (twain) with this preeminence and advantage to the province of Macedonia, that whereas to the legions of the other Consul (according to the ancient custom) there went but five thousand foot and two hundred horse apeece, there should be enrolled for Macedonia six thousand foot and three hundred horse equally to a legion. Also for the one of the Consuls in the army of the allies, the number was augmented, so as besides those six hundred horsemen which Cn. Scipio had conducted already, he should of those allies transport over into Macedonia, sixteen thousand footmen and eight hundred horse. As for Italy, twelve thousand footmen of allies and six hundred horse were thought sufficient. Moreover this prerogative had the Province of Macedonia, that for Centurions and soldiers the Consul might enroll of the elder sort whom he thought good as many as were not above fifty years of age. In choosing of Tribunes military and colonels, the old manner was this year changed, in regard of the Macedonian war; to wit, that the Consuls (by advice and authority of the Senat) should move the people, that the said Tribunes might not that year be elected by voices of the people, but that their elections should be referred to the judgment and discretion of the Consuls and Pretors. The charge of command was thus divided among the Pretors as followeth. The Pretor whose lot fell to go whether it pleased the Senat to send, was assigned to take his way to the fleet at Brundisium, and there to survey and revise the sea-servitors, and look how many he thought not meet for service, them to discharge, & to make up the number with chosen Liberties; and in any wise to order it so, that two third parts consisted of Roman natural citizens, and the other third of allies. Item, That provision of victuals for the navy and the army, should be brought out of Sicily and Sardinia. And the Pretors of those two provinces had in charge to exact a double tenth of the Sicilians and Sardinians, and this grain to be conveyed into Macedonia for the army. Now Sicily fell to C. Caninius Rebulus, Sardinia to L. Furus Philus, and Spain to L. Canuleius. C. Sulpicius Galba was L. chief justice for the citizens of Rome, and L. Iunius Annius for the strangers: but C. Lucretius Gallus his lot was to go where the Senat would employ him. Between the two Consuls there was some jar and wrangling, rather than any great debate about their province. Cassius for his part said, That he was by the right to war in Macedonia without any casting of lots for the matter, forasmuch as his colleague might not enter into it with him, and save his oath. For he being Pretor, had sworn solemnly in a frequent assembly of the people (because he would shift off and not go into his province) that he had occasion to celebrate sacrifices in a certain place and upon set daies, which could not be performed (as they might if he were at sea. And the same) as I take it cannot be well done during his absence now, that he is Consul no more then while he was Pretor. Howbeit, if the Senat be of opinion and judge, that more consideration is to be had to satisfy Caius Licinius his will now in the Consulship, then regard of the oath he took before in the Pretorship, yet will I notwithstanding accommodate myself to the pleasure of the Senat. The LL. were consulted with hereabout, who judge, that it were a proud part to deny him the government of a province, unto whom the people of Rome had granted the dignity of a Consulship, commanded the Consuls to cast lots. Thus Macedonia fell to P. Licinius, and Italy to C. Cassius. Then they put to lottery also the conduct and employment of the legions: whereby the first and third were to be transported into Macedonia, the second and fourth to remain in Italy. In the manner and choice of soldiers, the Consul went more simply and slightly to work by far, then customarily he used at other times. As for Scipio, he enrolled the elder sort also, as well as the younger, as centuries; and many of them were who voluntarily entered their names, because they saw how their brave well and grew rich, who had served either in the former Macedonian war, against Antiochus in Asia. Now when as the martial Colonels called forth the centuries by name one after another, and the principal first, there hapned to be three, and a twelfth century, by name one of them, who beforetime had been Principulus, had led in the chief and best place, and when they were cited, they called unto the Trib. of the Com. forth to be relieved by their lawful assistance. But two of that fellowship and society of Tribunes, namely, M. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Fulvius Marcellus, referred them to the Consul, alledging, that by right, the knowledge of these matters pertaining to those who had plenary commission to take matters, and to manage the war-affairs. But all the rest of the Tribunes avowed that they would assume it into their own hands, and determine of that for which they were called unto as competent judges; yea, and the injuries were offered to their fellow-citizens, they would not fail but help and succour them. All this was debated in the Tribunes-court. Thither was M. Popilius, a Consular man, called to the hearing of this matter, and thither appeared the centuries and the Consul also. And when the Consul required that the case should be heard and decided in a general assembly, thereupon the people was summoned to meet in public together. In which solemn congregation M. Popilius who had been Consul two years before, spake in behalf of the centuries to this effect. "These martial men (quoth he) have accomplished their full time of service required by law; they carry about themselves as well spent and craze for age, as broken by continual travels; howbeit relate the same as them bodies as, but are ready to do their devoir unto the Commonwealth. This only they humbly crave and request, that they may not be assigned to bair places of command, then wherein they have been employed already when they bare arms. Then P. Licinius the Consul commanded, the act of the Senat to be openly read, wherein it was ordered first to levy war upon Perseus, the next to enroll as many as they could of the old experienced Centurions for that war, and last of all exempt none from soldiery but such only as were above fifty years of age. "After this he earnestly besought them in this new war to seek to Italy, and against a Prince so puissant, neither to hinder the Colonels in levying soldiers, nor forbid the Consul but that he might appoint to each man what place and degree was thought to stand most for the good of the Commonwealth. And in case there arose any doubt and difficulty in this business, to submit the decision thereof to the Senat. After that the Consul had delivered his mind, Sp. Ligustinus one of them who had appealed to the Tribunes of the Commons, requested both the Consul and the Tribunes to give him leave for to speak a few words unto the people: who having liberty granted with all their good wills, made a speech unto them in this wise. "My masters, you Quirites, I Spurius Ligustinus of the tribe Crustumina, am descended from the Sabins. My father left me an acre of land and all the cottage to it, wherein I was born, bred and brought up, and whereupon at this day I dwell. Six sons God hath sent between us, and two daughters to them, both maidens marriageable. Four of our sons are men grown, and have put on mans robe; two are boies till in their Præputia, under seventeen years old. I myself was first to the wars, the year when P. Sulpicius and C. Quinctius Flamininus, in regard of my forwardnesse assigned me the tenth place of leading among the Hastati in the vanguard. After that Philip and the Macedonians were vanquished, and we brought over again into Italy and discharged, I went immediately as a voluntary servitor into Spain with M. Porcius the Consul. When King Antiochus was chased and the Aetolians subdued, we were brought back again into Italy, and two years together I was in pay of the legions that received yearly wages and allowance. Twice after this, I bare arms and served in Spain, once under Q. Fulvius Flaccus, a second time under T. Sempronius Gracchus the Pretor. By Flaccus I was brought home among others, whom for their valour and prowesse he thought good to have in train for the honour of his triumph; and at the request and treaty of T. Gracchus I accompanied him into the Province. Six civick coronets have I received: two and thirty years full have I followed the wars & more then fifty years old I am. Now if neither had served out all the years required by law,

A law, nor might plead exemption and immunity by mine age, yet seeing I am able to shew four soldiers for one, my four sons [I say for my self alone] me thinks it were reason, O P. Licinius, that I were now freed and discharged. And all this I pray you take, as spoken for the benefit of my cause. Now as touching my person thus much, so long as any man who hath authority to enroll soldiers, shall judge me sufficient and able to bear arms, I will not go about to excuse and shift it off. And look what place the Colonels and Marshals shall suppose me worthy of, if it be in his good will and pleasure to assigne me unto it: but to perform that no one person in the whole army hurt me in valor, that shall be my own endeavor; like as no one of my captains, but those also who have served with me are able to tell thee, That never had I earned my self and performed as much. And you likewise my fellow soldiers, albeit you practise and keep in use the priviledge and benefit of appealing to the Tribunes, yet meet and reason it is, since in your youthfull daies ye never did ought in any place against the authority of the Senat and the Consuls, ye now also in your declining age be at the disposition of the Senat and the Consuls; yea, and to esteem all places worshipsfull, wherein you shall defend and maintain the Common weal. When he had thus said, the Consuls highly commended him, and from before the people brought him into the Senat. And there also by the advice and authority of the honorable boult, thanked he was, and the Marshal-Consuls, in regard of his vertue, appointed him to be the principall Centurion of the Pilani in the first legion. So the rest of the Centurions recommending their appeal to the Tribunes, yielded obedience in the muster and levy above said.

To the end that the Magistrats and great commanders might go more timely into their governments, the Latine feasts and holydaies were published to be holden upon the Calends of June. Which solemnity being finished, C. Lucius the Pretor took his journey to Brundisium, having first before all necessary furniture and provision for the fleet. Besides those armies which the Consuls levied, a commission was directed out to C. Sulpicius Gale the Pretor, to enroll four legions of Roman citizens, with the ordinary full proportion of infantry and cavalry, and to chuse out of the body of the Senat four Colonels to command them. Also to levy Latin allies, 5000 foot, and 1200 horse, and to take order that his army should be ready to go whithersoever the Senat thought good. P. Licinius the Cos. at his own instant request (that over and above the armed citizens and allies, he might have an addition of auxiliaries) obtained of Ligurians 2000 of Carthagers an uncertain number, namely, as many as the Candians upon request would lend. Moreover, certain Numidian horsemen and elephants: for which purpose L. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Terentius Calles and C. Aburnius were sent in embassy to Masanius and the Carthaginians. Semblably it was thought good to send three Embassadors into Crete, to wit, A. Posthumius Albinus, C. Decimius, and A. Licinius Nero.

At the very same time these levies Embassadors from King Perseus. But suffered they were not to enter into the City; considering that both the Senat had ordained, and the people assented already to make war upon their King and the Macedonians. So admitted they were into the Temple of Bellona before the Senat, where they delivered their message in this manner: That King Perseus marvelled why there were armies transported over into Macedonia? And if the Senat might be intreated so much, as to recall them home, the King would make satisfaction for the wrongs done unto their allies, in such sort as the Senat in their discretion would appoint. Now there was in the Senat-house at that time Sp. Carvilius, sent back for that very purpose out of Greece from Ch. Sienius. He made report and remembrance, how Perseus was forced by arms, and certain Cities of Thessaly won: with other exploits that King Perseus had either performed, or else was in hand to enterprise. To which challenges the Embassadors were commanded to make answer. But shortly were seen once to falter in their speech, saying they had no farther commission then that they had delivered already; they were willing to relate unto the King their matter, that P. Licinius the Consul would shortly be in Macedonia with an army, unto whom the King might address his Embassadors, if he minded to do as he said and to make amends. As for sending any more to Perseus, there was no need nor cause, forasmuch as they would not suffer any of them to pass through Italy. When they were dismissed with this short dispatch, P. Licinius the Consul had in charge, to command them to go out of Italy within 10 daies, and to send Spurius Carvilius for to guard them all the way to the sea-side until they were shipped. Their occurrences passed in Rome before the Consuls were gone into their provinces.

Now by this time Cn. Sienius (who ere that he left his magistracy, was sent before as far as to Brundisium to the fleet and the army) having put over into Epirus 5000 foot and 300 horse, was encompassed before Nymphæum in the territory of the Apollonians. From thence he sent certain colonels with 2000 soldiers, to seize the forts and castles of the Dæseretians and Illyrians, by occasion that they of their own accord made meanes and sent for garrisons, to the end they might be better guarded & secured from the violence and invasion of the Macedonians bordering upon their confines.

Some few daies after, Q. Martius, A. Atilius, P. and Ser. both Cornelii and Levanti, together with L. Decimius, who all had been sent in embassy into Greece, brought them to Corcyra one thousand footmen; where they both parted between themselves their several quarters whither they would go, and also their soldiers. Decimius was sent to Genius King of the Illyrian, with whom he would go, and saw him any waies coming on and inclined to entertain amity with the Romans; so found him and gave the assay, yea, and to draw him into the association of the Romans.

The two Lemuli were sent into Cephalonia, from thence to travel and cross over into Epheſus, and before winter to fetch about and compass the coast of the Well-ſea. Marius & Attius were assigned to visit Epirus, Boeotia and Thessalia. From thence they were enjoined to have an eye into Baetia and Euboea, and to sail into Poloponnesus where they appointed to meet with the Lemuli. But before that they departed from Coryra, letters were brought from Pyrrhus, wherein he demanded what reason the Romans had either to transport any force into Greece, or to seize upon the Cities; thought good it was to return him no answer by writing, but only by word of mouth thus much to lay unto the messenger that brought the letters, that the Romans did it for the defence and safeguard of the laid towns. The Lemuli as they rode their circuit visiting the Cities and towns of Poloponnesus, exhorting the States and commonalties thereof indifferently one as well as another, to aid the Romans at this present against Pyrrhus, with semblable courage and like fidelity as they had stood with them first in the war against Philip, and afterwards in that with Antiochus; might here in their publick assemblies much muttering and grumbling thereat. The Achaens (who from the very beginning of the Macedonian war had been together for the Romans, and during the war against Philip, enemies to the Macedonians) took it in disdain that they were reputed in the same rank with the Messeni and Eleans, and no better then they who had born arms against the people of Rome; for Antiochus their enemies and who but the other day, being enrolled into the commonalty and council of the Achaens, complained that they were delivered unto the victorious Achaens, as the recompence and gerdon of their conquest. Marius and Attius as they went up to Gisana a town of Epirus, ten miles from theſe, in a general Councell holden there of all the Epirians, had audience with great contentment of them all. Four hundred of their yong and able lusty men they sent into the Oritians country to lie in garriſon for defence of those Macedonians who by them were set at liberty. From thence, they held on their progress into Ætolia; and after they had joyned there some few daies (whiles a new Pretor was elected in the room of him that was deceased, and Lyciscus appointed the governor, a man known for certain to favour the Romans) they passed over into Thessaly. Thither repaired the Embassadors of the Acermanians and the banished persons of Ætolia. The Acermanians were enjoined to utter and declare before them what they had committed and done against the people of Rome, being inveigled and deceived by the promises of the two Kings Philip and Antiochus during the wars against the one and the other; since occasion was now presented unto them, for to make amends and save all that was amiss. Forſo upon their ill demerits towards the people of Rome, they had made trill and talked of their clemency, they might now by good defence prove their boundy another while. As for the Boeotians, they were reprov'd and upbraided for coming into association with Pyrrhus; and when they seemed to lay the whole fault upon Imenius captain of one of the two factions, and certain Cities and States which being of a different opinion were drawn to the side; Say ye so? (Quoth Marius again) and that shall soon appear, for we all permit every commonalty and City to answer apart and severally for themselves the best they can.

Now was the Diet of the Thessalians holden at Larissa; where, as the Thessalians took good occasion and found ample matter of thanksgiving, the Romans, for the liberty which by their goodness they had obtained: so as the Roman legats had as copious an argument to render them thanks, for that first in the war with Philip, and afterwards of Antiochus, they had been so mightily aided by the Thessalian nation. Thus by this mutual rehearsal of pleasures and good turns given and taken, the hearts of the multitude were enkindled with a fervent zeal to decree and ordain whatsoever it pleased the Romans to desire. After this councell was dissolved, there came Embassadors from K. Perſeus unto Marius, upon a speciall alliance of the privat friendship and hospitality which had passed between his father King Philip, and the laid Marius; [and his father.] These Embassadors began the speech with a commemoration of the laid familiar and inward acquaintance, requesting him to permit the K. for to have access unto him, and to come and join together. Marius answered, that he also had heard his father speak of the amity and mutual hospitality between him and K. Philip: in regard and remembrance of which near bond of familiarity he was the more willing to take upon him the charge of that embassy and communion. As to the party, he would not have deſpised it at all, if he might commodiously have wrought it: and now for this present he promised (so soon as he possibly could) to send his couriers before to advertise the King, that they might come to the river Peneus, whereas the passage lieth from O-molium over to Dium. And verily at that time, Perſeus was retired from Dium into the inland quarters of his realme, and had gathered some pretty gale of hope, in that Marius had given out, how for love of him he had undertaken this embassy. After some few daies they repaired to the place appointed, This King accompanied with a great train as well of his friends, as his courtiers and pensioners which guarded his person. The legats likewise were attended upon with no lesse a troop, by reason as well of many that followed them from Larissa, as also of divers embassadors from the States which assembled at Larissa, and were desirous to carry home with them certain news of the league, which they should bear. Every man had an inward desire sealed in his heart to see the manner of the meeting of this noble K. & these high commiſſioners from the sovereign State and mightiest people of the whole world. Being come to the interview one of another they stood still on either side of the river, which only parted them sunder. For a while they passed encounters between: whiles they made it strange on both parts, who should pass the river first, for the Macedonians stood somewhat upon the royal majesty of a King; & the Romans were as

A reſpective to the reputation of the people of Rome, considering wichall, that Perſeus sought the means & made first motion for this parley. Whereupon, to end this controverſie, Marius call out a merry word, What needs all this (qd. he) let the younger come to the elder without more ado, and the son to the father: this he spake, for that himself also was surnamed Philip. The K. soon defended thereunto. But then arose another doubt and difference, namely, with what number he should pass over. The K. thought it meet & convenient to come with his whole train: but the legats would have had him either to bring over with him three perions, and no more: or else if he were minded to pass with so great a company, to put in hostages for assurance, that during the time of the parley no outrage should be committed. So Perſeus sent as pledges, Il prius & Pan-tarchus, the principal and most especial friends, that were about him, whom also he had employed in the embassy. Now were these hostages required, not to much for a gage & pawn of security, as that it might appear unto the allies there present, that the K. in meeting and communing with the Roman Commiſſioners, should not keep state comparable with him, but abate somewhat of the port and majesty which they carried. Their mutual greeting and salutation was nothing strange, as between enemies; but kind and amiable, as among familiar friends. Which done, they sat them down upon their chairs set ready for them. After they had thus siten a while in silence and said nothing, Marius began in this manner: "You expect (I suppose qd. he) that we should answer to your letters which you sent to Coryra, wherein you demand, Why we are come in embassy and commiſſion after this manner with armed soldiery, and plant garriſons as we do in every City? To which question of yours not to answer at all, I fear me you would take it to be pride in me; and again to answer a truth, I doubt it will be too harsh and unpleasant to your ears. But seeing that he who breaketh a covenant must be chastised either by word or sword, (like as I had rather that any other but my self should have commiſſion to make war upon you) so I will be bold (however it fall out) to speak rough and tart unto you as to my friend: and herein will I follow the manner of Physicians, who for the health of their patients, otherwhiles minister bitter medicines and apply thinking corrosives. Since time that you first attained unto the crown, the Senat thinketh you have done but one only thing of all that you ought to have done, namely, that you sent your embassadors to Rome for to renew the league; and yet they judge you had done better in not renewing it, than after it was renewed, to violate the same. Chaled you have out of the Realm * Abryopolis, a confederat and friend of the people of Rome. The murderers of Arcturus you have received and entertained, yea, and given the world thereby to understand, that you were well pleased (to say no worse) with his death: & killed they have a Prince most fast and faithfull to the Romans, of all others in Ilyricum. Thorough Thessaly and the territory of Malis, you have marched with an army against the tenor of the league, as far as to Delphi: and more than that, contrary unto the laid accord, sent you have aid and succour to the Byzantins. With our allies the Boeotians, you have entred into a secret association and bound the same with an oath, which by right you ought not to have done. Who it was that murdered the Theban embassadors Eusebia & Callistius who came directly from us, I had rather enquire than charge any man and declare. The civil wars in Ætolia the massacres of their Princes & States, unto whom may they be imputed in any likelihood, but to your people? As for the Dolopians, wasted they were by your self in person and by no other. It grieveth me and greech to my heart, to speak who it is that K. Eumenes challengeeth and burdeneth with this, That in his return from Rome into his own kingdom, he was like to have been killed as a beast for sacrifice; & that at Delphi, in a sacred and hallowed place, even before the altars. As for the secret practices which your host of Brundisium hath disclosed and set abroad, I know right well, that not only you have received letters thereof from Rome, but your own embassadors also have told you all by word of mouth. You might have soon avoided all this, and heard nothing thereof from me, if you would have forborn only to ask & demand: Wherefore our forces were transported over into Macedony, & why we sent garriſons into our confederat Cities? But since you would needs put out such a question, more pride it had been in us to have held our peace, than to utter the plain truth as we have done. Verily, for mine own part, in regard of the hospitality and friendly curtesies that have passed between your father and us, I favour you, and will gladly make the best of your cause: and would to God I had some good occasion ministred from your self, to solicit and further your suit before the Senat.

To these challenges and imputations, the K. framed his answer in this wise: "Content I am to appeale my cause before you, the parties appellants and judges both, which would be found (I King Perſeus, doubt not) good, if it were debated and handled in the presence of indifferent and equal arbiters. And first, as touching those matters which are objected against me, they are such as in part I wot not well, whether I may not glory in them, or at least wile not blush in the confessing and avowing thereof. As for the rest, as they are charged upon me in bare words, so plain words may serve flatly and simply to deny them. For say that this day I were subject unto your laws, and by them to have my triall, what can either that promoter of Brundisium, or K. Eumenes inform against me, but it will appear, that they accuse me not so much with matter of truth, as exhibit only slanderous and reproachfull terms? A like matter, I wis, it is, that neither Eumenes had any other enemy but me, (he, I say, who hath done such wrong and injury to so many both in common and also in particular;) nor I could find a fitter person to serve my turn in the execution of my projects but this Romulus, a fellow that I never had seen before, nor was ever like

"to see again hereafter, I must (if sooth) give account for the Thebans, who as it is well known, H perished by shipwreck: as also for the murder of Antistius; and yet therein I am no deeper charged than thus, that the murderers of him lived in exile & were shadowed within my realm.
Newly surely this hard conclusion and unreasonable condition I will not refuse to undergo, in case you also will be content to take upon you and avow all those crimes and facts, for which they (stand condemned, who as banished persons have fled either to Rome or into Italy; but in case both you and all other nations will disavow that, I also will be one among the rest. And in good faith, to speak uprightly, to what end should any man be banished from one country, if he may not find a place in another, and be permitted there to live in exile? And yet (so soon as ever I found by advertisement from you that they were within Macedony) for my part, made diligence search until I had them, and then I commanded them to depart out of my kingdom, yea, and ex-piously forbade them for ever letting foot again within my dominions. And thus much verily concerning the criminal matters objected unto me as a defendant pleading at the bar. Now let us argue and debate the rest, enforced and laid against me in quality of a King, namely, which concern and touch the accord contracted between me and you. For if the words run in this sort and are thus written in the forelaid covenants of accord, That I may not be suffered to defend myself and my realm, no, not if any enemy of mine levy war against me: then I must confess indeed, that the league I have broken, in that I stood upon my gnaid and defence by force of arms against Abruptus, an affociat of the people of Rome. But if it were lawful for me to do so by warrant of the accord, and allowed also by the law of nations, by force to repell force; what should I else say, what could I else have done I pray you? When Abruptus had laid waste the frontiers of my kingdom even as far as to Amphipolis, led into captivity many persons freeborn, carried away a mighty number of slaves, and driven before him many thousand head of cattell; should I have sitten still and suffered him until he had come armed to Pella, even unto my royal palace? But some man may haply say, You did well indeed and justly in making head and pursuing him by force of arms, many vanquished he should not have been, neither ought he to have suffered those calamities which follow men vanquished. Why if I have endured the fortune thereof, provoked as I was to war, how can he justly complain of talking the like, being himself the cause and first motive of all? I will not use the same manner of defence (O Romans) to this, that by force of arms I have repressed the Dolopians: for if I have not done by their accord, but by their demerits, yet I am sure I have dealt by the virtue of the right I have over them being as they are of mine own kingdom, under my obeysance, and made subjects to my father even by a decree of your own drawing. And yet, were I to render a reason of my proceedings against them, I say, not unto you nor unto my allies, but even to those who like not of any cruel command so much as over bondslaves; I can be thought to have exercised more rigor against them, than equity and reason would bear. For, Euphrates, whom I deputed governor over them, they killed in such sort, that death is too good for them, and the least punishment of all others that they have deserved. And as I marched forward in my progress from thence to visit the Cities of Lavissa, Antroon, & Pylleon, I ascended up to Delphi, there for to sacrifice, to the end that I might discharge my conscience & pay those vows which I had of long time owed. Now to aggravate matter in this also against me, it is said moreover, that I was there with my army, and intended (no doubt) for to seize Cities into my hands, and put garrisons into forreifes; for which at this present I complain of you. Call the States and Cities of Greece together to a general assembly, through which I passed. Let any one man come forth & make complaint of the least harm done by any of my souldiers; then will I not refuse to be reputed for one who under pretence of divine sacrifice, went about another thing. We sent indeed garrisons to the Ætolians and Bizantines, yea, and with the Boeotians we contracted amity. But these things, in what sort & for what purpose they were done, my ambassadors have not only declared, but also excused offences before your Senat: where I found some Umpires to hear and decide my cause, although not so indifferent and favourable to me, ward, as your self are. O Martius, my fathers old friend and familiar, For as yet Eumenis my accuser was not come to Rome, who by false suggestions, writing at his pleasure every thing to the worst, to make all suspicious and odious unto you, went about to make you believe that Greece could not possibly be restored to freedom, & enjoy the fruit of your gracious benefit, so long as the kingdom of Macedony stood entire and upright. Well, the world you shall see, will turn about; and anon one or other will be here, to make remembrance and prove, That to no purpose Antiochus is removed and confined beyond the mountains of Taurus; that Eumenis is become much more grievous and unupportable to all Asiathan An-tiobus ever was: and that your allies cannot be at rest nor live in quiet, so long as he keepeth his royal court in Pergamus, a Citadel (as it were) overlooking and commanding all the neighbour Cities bordering thereupon. Right well I know, O Q. Martius, and you A. Attilius, that whatsoever either you have objected against me, or I answered for my defence & purgation, is such as the ears and affections are of the hearers: neither what I have done, nor what I have not intention I have carried in mine actions will be so much regarded, as how you take every thing either done or intended. Mine own conscience beareth me witness, that willingly I have not faulted; now, if for want of knowledge and foresight I have been overseen and done somewhat amiss it may be corrected and amended by this present chastisement. This I am sure, my trespass is not incurable, neither have I committed ought that you should deem worthy to be punished

"by war & force of arms. And if ye do, then surely it is for ought, that there goeth this having a broad thorough all nations of your clemency and gravity both. If I say for so slight occasions which hardly are worth the complaint and the reasoning about, you be ready to enter into arms and levy war upon your confederat Princes. Martius for that time accorded to his speech, and moved him to address ambassadors to Rome, being of advice and opinion himself to try all means of the very last point, and to let slip nothing whereof (some hope of good might arise. It remained only to be debated in council, how ambassadors might pass in safety. And to this purpose, when it was necessary for the King to request a furcase of arms, albeit Martius himself was willing and desirous thereof (for that his drift was to nothing else by all this conference and parley, yet he seemed to make a hard matter and difficulty of it, and to do a special favour and pleasure unto Perseus in gratifying his petition. The truth was, the Romans yet were not ready nor thoroughly appointed at this present for the war: they had neither army puissant enough, nor captains sufficient: whereas Perseus (but that he was blinded in all his councils with a vain hope of peace) had all things prepared and in readines, and might then have begun to wage war, as in the best and most opor-tune season for himself, to the worst and unfittest of all other times for his enemies.

After this parley and the abstinence of war assured faithfully on both parts, the Roman Commissioners were appointed and resolved to go into Boeotia, where there was begun already some trouble and commotion, by reason that certain States of the Boeotians were departed from the society of the common Council, ever since it was reported back, how the Roman Legats made answer that it should appear and be seen, what Cities they were indeed which took no pleasure to have any affociation with the King. And first the ambassadors from Choreates afterwards, from Thebes encountered them upon the way, who assured them that they were not present in that Diet and Council, where this affociation was concluded. To these embassages no answer for this time was made, but willed they were only to give their attendance and follow them to Chalcis.

At Thebes great variance there was, which arose by occasion of another strife and debate. In their solemn assembly for the election of the Prator of the Boeotians, that part which had the repelling in revenge of that injury and disgrace, assembled the multitude and made a decree at Thebes.
That the Boeotarches should not be received within their Cities: in such sort, as like banished men they resorted to Thebes: from whence (for received there they were incontinently without any stay) being called again to Thebes upon better advisement and change of mind, they made an ordinance, That if to the number of twelve private persons held any conventicle or publicke meeting together, they should be condemned to exile. After this, Ismenius the new Prator, a noble personage and of great puissance, by virtue of a decree adjudged them in their absence for to lose their lives. To Chalcis they were fled, and from thence to the Romans at Larissa they went:
where they declared that Ismenius was the cause of their association with King Perseus. Upon that forelaid difference, they grew to hot contention, yet ambassadors from both parts came to the Romans, as well the banished persons and accusers of Ismenius, as also Ismenius himself. But so soon as the Roman Legats were come to Chalcis, the States and heads of other Cities (who every one by a speciall decree of their own had renounced affociation with King Perseus) joy-ned with the Romans: whereat they took exceeding great contentment and joy. Ismenius thought himself and reason that the Boeotian nation should be committed to the protection of the Romans. Whereupon arose a tumultuous fray, & but that he fled into the Tribunal of the Legats to save himself; he had escaped narrowly from being killed by the said exiled persons, with the help of their supporters and favorites.

Also the City of Thebes, which is the capital place of State within Boeotia, was in great trouble and distress; whilst some drew to the King, others inclined to the Romans. Besides, there was a multitude of Coronians and Halartians gathered together to maintain the ordinance and decree as touching the association with the King. But such was the resolute persistence of the principall and chief men, who shewed by the late calamities of Philip and Antiochus, how great the forces, and how happy the fortune was of the Roman empire, that the same multitude relented, and being overruled, passed a new decree, to reverse and cancel the former confederacy with the King: sent those that were the motives and periwaders of contracting that amity to Chalcis for to satisfy and content the Roman Legats: yea, & to conclude were of advice to recommend the City to the Affiliat patronage of the said Commissioners. Martius & Attilius took great pleasure to hear the Thebans sing this note, they persuaded with them severally apart, and gave them counsell to send ambassadors to Rome for the renewing of this amity: but before all things they took order for the restoring of the banished persons: as for the authors of the confederacy contracted with the King, they by their own decree condemned. Having thus by this means inflicted and made frustrate the Deceit of the Boeotians (the thing which above all they most desired) they took their journey to Thessalonica, together with Ser. Cornelius, whom they had sent for to Chalcis. For their takes a Council was holden at Argos, where they demanded nothing else of the Achean nation, but only to furnish them with 1000 souldiers. This garrison was sent to the defence of Chalcis, until the Roman army were transported into Greece. Martius and Attilius having thus dispatched all the affairs that they had to do in Greece in the beginning of winter returned to Rome.

When there was sent from thence about the same time an honourable embassage to the Illes in Italy. These Ambassadors or Legats were three in number, to wit, T. Claudius, P. Postumius, and for the Romans. And the mightier and more wealthy any City was, the more earnestly travelled they there; because the inferior States were like to frame and fort themselves suitable to the ample and authority of the greater and superior. Now of all others the Rhodians were reputed of most import and consequence every way, for that they were able not only to favour with their countenance, but also aid and maintain with their forces this war; and by the persuasion of Hergellus they had got together a fleet of forty sail. "This Hergellus their sovereign Magistrate (whom they call Prytanis) had by many reasons prevailed with the Rhodians to abandon the hope they had by entertaining the KK. (which they had found by often experience how vain it was) and to hold themselves to the society and alliance of the Romans, the first hold of all others at that time in the world, as well for strength of forces as truly assurance and fidelity. There is intended war by them (qd. he) against Perseus, and no doubt the Romans will require of us the same provision and furniture of ships and sea-forces, which they have seen in their war lately against Antiochus, and before that, against King Philip: and then you will be to seek, and forced in great haste to provide a fleet, when it were more time it should be let out and lent forth, unless ye begin betimes to repair and rig your ships, unless I say, you let in hand to furnish the same with sailors and mariners. And with so much more endeavour ought ye thus to do, that by your deed and effectual employment, you may refuse and disprove the false imputations wherewith Eumenes hath charged you. By these remonstrances induced they were, inasmuch as at the arrival of the Roman Legats aforesaid, they were able to shew unto them an armada of 40 ships ready rigged and well appointed, that they might know and see, they looked not for to be exhorted thereto. And this embassy was of great moment and importance also to gain the hearts of the States in Asia. Only Dicimius returned to Rome without any effect of his errand and commission, nay, he ran into ill name and obloquy, upon suspicion that he had received certain bribes of the Princes in Ilyricum.
M. Valerius. They in their circuit and visitation exhorted all their allies to take arms against Perseus.

Perseus upon the conference and communication had with the Romans, retired into Macedon and sent his Embassadors to Rome, to treat about the conditions of peace begun already with Marius: to other Embassadors also of his he gave his letters to carry to Byzantium and Rhodus: the tenor of which letters was one and the same directed to them all: namely, That he had communed with the Roman Legats, but he had fo placed and couched as well what he heard as what he spake, that it might seem he gave not one foot unto them, but gained the better hand in that dispute & debating with them. These Embassadors added moreover, and said unto the Rhodians, "That they hoped assuredly there would be a peace, for that they by the motion and advice of Marius and Attilius were added in embassy to Rome. Now if the Romans, say they, against the covenants of accord proceeded to levy war, then the Rhodians were to endeavour with all the credit and power they have, to reunite the peace again; but if with all their prayer and entreaty they might not prevail, then they were to look about and labour this one point, That the might and puissance of the whole world were not devolved into the hands of that one people. And as this imported and concerned all the rest, so the Rhodians especially, who sunguoned other States in dignity and wealth, both which should be obnoxious and embroiled, if there were regard and respect made of none but the Romans. The letters of the King and words of the Embassadors, were entertained with friendly audience, other effect they took none to change their settled minds: for upon the authority of the better part began also to carry the greater way. But this answer was returned to them, & that by way of decree, That the Rhodians wished peace with all their hearts: but if it should come to war, their King and Master was neither to expect, nor cry to exact any thing at their hands, to disjoyn the ancient amity which they held with the Romans, and which they had acquired by many and great dejects, as well in war as in peace. In their return from Rhodus, they went to the Cities of Besnia, and namely, to Thesba, Corymba, and Haliartus, from whom it seemed a thing extorted forcibly against their will, that they were disbanding from the King & gave to the Romans. The Thebans stood firm and immovable, although they were somewhat discontented with the Romans, both for condemning their chief and principal Citizens, and also for restoring the banished persons. But the Coroneans and Haliartians upon an intired and settled favour by kind an othe Kings, sent Embassadors into Macedon, requesting a garrison for their defence against the excessive pride of the Thebans. To this embassy the King thus answered. That a garrison he might not lend, by reason of the truce made with the Romans: howbeit, he advertised them to maintain and guard themselves against the injuries of the Thebans all that ever they could: but yet so, as they gave the Romans no cause to be their heavy friends, and so to proceed in rigour against them.

Marius and Attilius being come to Rome, made report of their embassy within the Capitol in such manner, as in nothing they gloried more, than in deluding and deceiving them by means of a cessation from arms, and a pretended hope of peace. For so well supplied was he and furnished with all provision for war, and they contrariwise to unprovided every way, that he might easily have possessed himself of all places of opportunity and advantage, before that they any could pass over into Greece. But now having this relief and time of the truce, as the King would come nothing better provided, so the Romans might begin the war, more fully furnished with all things convenient. Moreover, they related how they by their coming distracted and let a jaw in the general Council of the Boetians, so as by no means any more hereafter they can be joyed to the Macedonians by consent and accord. The greater part of the Senat approved this service of theirs

as theirs as performed with singular discretion and dexterity: But the old Senators and those that held in remembrance the ancient manner and custom of the Romans, said plainly, "That in all the course of that embassy, they could see no Roman practice and dealing at all. Our ambassadors (say they) were wont to war not by wait-laying and lesser ambushes, nor by skirmishes in the night-season, nor yet by false semblance of running away and sudden turning their face against unwares upon their unprovided enemies; neither sought they to glorify themselves by subtil flights more than by true virtue and valour: Their use and manner was, to intimate and publish wars before they made any: yea, and to denounce and proclaim the same; or otherwise also to assign and appoint the very place where they went to strike a battell. According to this plain and faithful dealing, they detected and disclosed unto K. Pyrrhus the Physician that would by pay have taken away his life: by the same they delivered bound unto the Faliskians the villainous traitor that would have betrayed the children of their K. These are the Roman fashions (say they) not to use the cunning casts and sly shifts of the Carthaginians, nor the crafty policies of the Grecians, who ever reputed it more glorious and honourable by fraud to compass, than by force to surpass the enemy. Indeed otherwhiles for the present time, more good is done and greater matters are effected by guile and policy, than by valour and virtue: but to say a ruth the course of that enemy is nor ever conquered, who is forced to confess, that he was vanquished not by cunning nor by venture, but in just and lawful war by main strength and close fight at handy grips. Thus spake the ancients, who had no great liking to the new-found devices of these politicians. Howbeit, that side of the Senat which made more reckoning of profit than of honesty, carried it away and imported so much, that not only the first embassy of Marius was approved, as well performed, but also himself was sent back again with certain Quinquagres, with a mandate also & commission to deal in the rest according as he should think to stand with the good of the Common-weal. They dispatched likewise Ant. Attilius to seize Laurissa in Thessaly: for fear lest in the term of truce were expired, Perseus should find a garrison there, and hold in his hand the capital City of Thessaly. The laid Attilius had a warrant to receive 2000 footmen of Cn. Sicinius for to effectuate that enterprise. Also P. Lentulus lately returned out of Achaia was allowed the conduct of 300 souldiers of the Italian nation, to the end that at Thesba he should endeavour to bring all Besnia under the obedience of the Romans. When all things were set in this forwardness, they went at a point and fully resolved to make war yet thought good it was to give audience unto the embassadors of Perseus in the Senat: who rehearsed and related in manner the reasons which were delivered by the King in the late conference and parley. Much ad they made and laboured hard, to acquit the King of the imputation laid to his charge for seeking the death of Eumenes; but with small probability of none at all: for the thing was too too apparent, to the end they fell to prayer and intreaty: howbeit, no ear was given unto them, with any such mind and heart, as could be either intruded or inclined. Instead thereof, warned straightly they were to depart immediately forth of the liberties of Rome, and within thirty daies out of Italy.

After this, P. Licinius the Obf. who was charged with the Province of Spain, had a commandment given him to assign unto the army the soonest day that he could, for to meet in one certain place. Quintus the Prator who had the conduct of the fleet, took his leave of the City with forty Quinquagres: for advised it was, that the rest of the ships which had been repaired, should be hid at home for to be employed otherwise about the City. And the Prator sent his brother Lucius before with one Galeace or Quinquagres & commission to receive of the allies that shipped with by covenant they were to find; and with them near the Island Cephallenia, to joyn with the rest of the armada: to wit, from the Rhogens one thirteenth gally, from the Locrians twain, from the Urits 4. With which he coasted along Italy, and having doubled the utmost point of Calabria within the Ionian sea, he arrived at Dyrbachium. There he found 19 galleons or barks of the Dyrbachians, 12 of the Illeians, and 54 belonging to K. Gentius: which he took all with him along, making semblance that he supposed they were provided of purpose for the service of the Romans: with this fleet by the third day he fell with the Isle Corfu; and so forward he made sail. And arrived at Cephallenia, C. Lucretius the Prator, having looked to sea from Naples, crossed the straits of Sicily, and on the fiftieth day cut over likewise to Cephallenia. Then the fleet from anchor, expecting as well the arrival of the land-forces, as also that the hulks and vessels of carriage which were scattered upon the seas from the rest of their company, might overtake them. It happened about this time, that Pub. Licinius the Col, having conceived and solemnly made his vows within the Capitol, departed in his coat of arms from the City. A solemnity at all times very much in done with much dignity and majesty: but especially with exceeding great pleasure and contentment of the beholders; when the Col, is accompanied with a stately train at his first setting forth, to encounter some great and famous enemy, renowned as well for virtue as quality and fortune: for at such a time men assemble and gather together, not only in regard of duty to acquit themselves of their devoir, but also upon a desire they have of the very thing and sight presented unto their eyes: namely, to see their captain to whose conduct and counsel they have committed the managing and defence of the Common-weal. Moreover, they took occasion thereby to think of the hazard of war, how adventurous is the event, and how doubtful the issue of battell in the field. They call to mind the alternative course of good fortune and bad, and namely, how by the blind ignorance or the unadvised rashness of leaders, many folks and overthrow have happened; and contrariwise by politick wisdom and hardy courage, great matters have been effected, and happy victories achieved, And what mortal man is he that knoweth, of what kind and carriage of good or bad, how fortunate or unlucky the Col. is, whom they send forth to war: Whether he be like soon to be seen again in triumph with wife with his victorious army mounting to the Capitol unto those gods, of whom now he taketh his leave; or shall give occasion to the enemies in the same manner to rejoice? As for Perseus the K. against whom this expedition and journey is taken, a Prince he is, highly renowned both by the Macedonian nation (so famous for feats of arms), and also by his father Philip, who among other fortunate achievements of wars was enabled by his war against the Romans. Moreover, the very name of Perseus himself (since time that first the diadem was set upon his head) was in every mans mouth, and no talk considerably but of him and the expectation of this war. With these and such like cogitations (I say) a mighty number of men of all sorts and degrees attended and accompanied the Col. at his departure. With him I were sent two Colonels or knight-marshalts above the rest, who had been Col. namely, C. Claudius and Q. Mutius: also three brave and lusty young gallants, to wit, P. Lentulus and the two Manlius, both surnamed Acinidius, the one son to M. Manlius, and the other to L. Manlius. The Col. thus accompanied, first went to Brundisium to the army, and from thence passed the least to Nymphæum and so encamped in the territory of Apollonia.

* This M. Manlius seemeth to be plebeian genus: for that there passed an act long before, That no Manlius Patricius might be named Marcius: and that there were Manlii surnamed gentis, Fabius, Priscus that learned Antiquary hath well collected out of Cicero in 1. Philip.

Perseus some few daies before, upon the return of his ambassadors from Rome, who had clean put him out of all hope of peace, held a council: wherein for a good while the matter was debated with great variety of sundry opinions. Some were of mind that in case the Romans enjoyed them either to yield a tribute, or to forgo some of their lands: yea, if they imposed upon them some fine by way of amends and satisfaction: in brief, whatsoever else they let down and ordained to do and suffer all for to redeem their peace, and not to refuse any condition were it never so hard but to take heed and provide in any wise, that Perseus put not himself nor the realm upon the dangerous hazard of so great a jeopardy. For if he held still the main point and continued in quiet possession of his kingdom, in time and space much good might happen: by means whereof he should be able not only to lick himself whole and recover his losses, but also become hereafter dread and terrible even unto those of whom now he standeth in fear. But the greater part carried with them a more courageous spirit and gave advice accordingly. For they affirmed, That if Perseus parted with ought and yielded never so little, he must make account withal to quit the free-hold of his whole kingdom soon after. For it is neither money nor land (say they) that the Romans want: but this they they work well, That as all things else in the world, so especially great monarchies & empires are subject to many accidents and casualties: right well they know also, how they have quelled and braked the puissance of the Carthaginians, and for to yoke their necks and hold them down, have set up a mighty King to be their neighbour and to command them: yea, and that Antiochus and all his race is removed and chased beyond the mountain Taurus. There remaineth only now the realm of Macedony, which is both seated in a near region and also (if the fortune of the people of Rome should hap to fail) I seemeth able to give heart and courage to her Kings at this day, answerable to that of their noble progenitors in former times. And therefore whiles the State standeth entire and unfolded, Perseus ought to resolve, whether he had rather forgoing one thing after another, strip himself in the end of all his goods and lands, & so turned clean out of his kingdom, be driven to request at the Romans hand either Samothracia or some other such petty Isle, where, in quality of a private person he may survive his royall estate, and live to old age in base contempt and needy poverty: or else, to take arms in the defence and maintenance of his royall place and dignity, like a Prince of valour and courage: and either abide all hazards whatsoever the fortune of the field shall plunge him into: or after victory achieved deliver the whole world from the dominion and imperious seignory of the Romans. And no greater wonder and miracle is it to hunt the Romans out of Greece, than it was to chase Annibal out of Italy: neither see we in good faith (say they) how by any reason it can well stand, that he who resisted with all his might and main his own brother, that would have made himself K. against all right and law, should now to strangers and aliens render the possession thereof, which he came so well and truly by, and wherein he is so right fully invested? Finally, in war and peace whoever men make questions, disputing and arguing to and fro, yet this conclusion they all grant and agree upon, That as there is nothing more shameful and dishonest, than to abandon and lose a kingdom without battell, so there is nothing more glorious and honourable than for the maintenance of Princely dignity and regal majesty to hazard all fortune whatsoever. This Council was holden at Pella, the ancient Palace wherein the Macedonian KK. kept their royall court. Why then (qd. he) on Gods name, since you are of that mind and resolution, let us take arms & to the field: whereupon he sent his letters into all parts to his gallants and captains, and assembled & drew all his forces to Citium, a town of Macedony. Himself in person after he had performed a magnificent sacrifice (like a K. for 100 head of beasts to the honour of Minerva, surnamed Aleida, he departed accompanied with a number of his courtiers, pensioners, and yeomen of the guard to Citium. To which place were gathered already all his forces, as well Macedonians as auxiliary strangers. He pitched his camp before the town and embattelled all his armed men in the plain. He was in all forty thousand strong: whereof one half well-near consisted of those whom they call Phalangians, and those were commanded by one Hippias of Berythea. Besides, there were two choice companies (for the flower of age and strength of body) selected out of the whole number of targettiers, called Cetrarii. This regiment,

A themselves called by the name of The legion: and the Strata was under the conduct of Straton and Therapsius both Euboeians. The rest of the targettiers to the number of three thousand or very near were led by Antipholus of Edessa. The Promachians, those also amounted to Straton (placed subject to the Thracians) and the Agrians, together with some inhabitants of Thrace in the country amongst them, amounted also to the number of three thousand. Didas of Pessina had levied and armed them, even the man that murdered young Demetrius. There were besides two thousand Frenchmen in arms under the leading of captain Alephobolus, whom Heraclea likewise of the Sintians country, there were three thousand Thracians, free men born, under a leader of their own. The like number well-near of Cerebantes followed their Commanders, Saps of Phidarna, and Syllus of Gnosfa also Donides the Lacedemonian had the charge of five hundred g out of Greece, but a mixt company they were of divers nations. This Laonides was said to have been of the blood royall, a banished person, condemned in a frequent assembly and Council of the Acheans, for certain letters which he sent to Perseus, and were intercepted. The Ætians and Boeotians, who in all made not above five hundred, were conducted by Lycas an Achean. Their auxiliaries or aid-fouldiers of so many natiues and nations mixt and blended together, grew it unto the number of 20000 armed men. As for the Cavalry, he had levied out of all Macedony 3000 horse or thereabout. Corys King of the Odryians, the son of Sankles, was thither come with 1000 chosen men of arms, and almost as many footmen. In sum, the whole army arose to the number of 39000 foot, and 4000 horsemen. And this was held for certain, that the like army was never raised by any King of Macedony, unless it were that again, with which Alexander the Great crossed over into Asia. Twenty years now and fix were come and gone, since time that peace was granted unto Philip at his own suit and request: during which space between, Macedony being in rest and quietnes, had brought forth a goodly fry of fresh youth: a great part whereof was of sufficient age to bear arms: and by the continual skirmishes which they maintained with the Thracians their neighbours, were rather whetted than weakened, and more enured than wearied: and, in one word, lived ever in practice of martiall tests: whereby it came to pass, that all things were preft and in readines for the war, which Philip first, and Perseus afterwards projected to wage against the Romans.

This army stirred and advanced a little, not in manner of a full march as to a present battell; but only for this that they would not be seen to have stood still in their arms: and thus armed as the fouldiers were, Perseus called them to an audience, intending to make an Oration unto them. Being mounted up to his Tribunal, he stood there with his two sons about him, one of either hand, whereof the elder (named Philip) he adopted to be his child, whereas indeed by nature he was his brother; but the younger (whom they called Alexander) was his own natural son. Then and there he exhorted his fouldiers to fight manfully, and laid before them what wrongs and injuries the people of Rome had done both to his father and also to himself. "As for my father (qd. he) forced he was by all kind of indignities to enter into arms and begin war again: but in the every preparation thereof, he was suddenly surprised and stricken with death. To my self, one time were ambassadors from them sent to treat of peace, and armed fouldiers also for to seize upon the Cities of Greece. Afterwards by a deceitful shew of a parley under colour of reconciliation and peace making, we were born in hand and drawn out a whole winter, to the end that they might gain time to prepare for war. And now is the Col. coming with two Roman legions, having either of them some 300 horse besides, and with a proportionable number (and that is the most) of allies, as well foot as horse. And say that the KK. both Eumenes & Masaniassa joyn with their aid, forces yet can they not amount above the number of 7000. Now that ye have heard what the strength is of the enemies, regard and compare your own army, namely, how far both in number, as also in goodness and quality of fouldiers, you surpass them: being your selves from your childhood and infancy warriors trained in practice of arms and warfare, wrought, and hardened in so many battels: whereas they be new & raw fouldiers taken up in haste, and enrolled now the first time against this present service. As for the auxiliaries of the Romans, what are they but Lydians, Phrygians, and Numidians? but we to let against them, have to aid us Thracians and Gauls, the most courageous nations under heaven. For harness and weapons, they have no other than such as every poor fouldier is able to provide for himself: but the Macedonians are furnished out of the Kings royall armory and arsenal with such armors of proof, as my father in many years caused to be made with great care, & to his no small expense. The Romans be far from their provisions, and the same exposed to all the casualties of the sea: but we besides the revenues and issues out of the mines of metal, have laid by both coin and corn sufficient to serve for ten years. The Macedonians have more and plenty in great abundance of all things necessary, & be provided as well by the gracious favour of the gods, as the careful diligence of a K. It remaineth now that ye carry that mind and courage with you, which your noble progenitors bare before you, those I say, who after they had conquered & subdued all Europ: passed into Asia, and by force of arms made way & discovered that part of the world that was never heard of before, and gave not over to win ground still and make more conquests, until they were barred by the red sea, & could find no more land to conquer. But now beleeve me, fortune hath denouced a trial by war, not for the purchase of the utmost bounds & marches of India but for our free hold and possession for our inheritance even of Macedony. These Romans, when they warred against my father, pretended a goodly title, & made a glorious way to the world, as though they

"would deliver Greece, and establish it in freedom: but now in open and plain terms they sought at Macedonia, intending to bring it into servitude: At the end there might be no K. near neighbor to the Roman signory, nor any nation renowned for martial prowess, permitted to bear arms and have weapons in hand. For these things and no less forced shall be to part with, and deliver up these proud I.L. together with King and kingdom in case ye successe war, and to do whatsoever they will command you. All the while that he delivered this speech, there might be heard secret exclamations oftentimes, sufficiently testifying the general assent of them all: but at these last words they lift up their voices and cried out aloud, part for anger, & indignation, meaning the enemy, part for courage and resolution, exhorting the King to be of good cheer, and take a good heart: inasmuch as he was constrained to give over, and make an end of his Oration: only he commanded them to be ready for the remove, & to put themselves in the journey against the enemy: for by this time advertised he was that the Romans were dislodged from Nymphæum. After this assembly was dismissed, he gave audience to the embassages from the States of Macedony: for some they were to make promise and offer both of money & grain to maintain this war, every one according to their ability. Thanked they were each one and released of all that charge, with this answer, that the Kings provision was sufficient. Only he commanded them to find wains and carts for carriages of the pieces of ordnance, the engines of battery, the darts, quarrels and other shew, whereof a mighty deal he had provided: and in sum, all the instruments & furniture of war. Then he set forward with his whole army marching toward Eordea, and near unto the lake which they call Begariæ, he encamped. The next morrow he advanced to Elyssa upon the river Haliacmon. After this, having passed over the mountains named Cambunus through a straight and narrow passage, he descended to those that inhabit Acronus, Ephorus, and Doliche, which quarter is called Tripolia. These three towns laid some while in insulence, by reason that they had given their hostages to the Larissians: but in the end, overcome with the fear presented before their eyes, were content to yield themselves into his hands. Perseus used gracious words to this people, making this account, that the Perrhæbians would do the like: & in very deed he entred upon the City (which surrendered at his first arrival) without any doubt or stay at all made by the inhabitants within. As for the town Cyrtæ, he assaid to batter it, and the first day he was repulsed in a sharp skirmish: for the very gates made by the townsmen that put on arms, drew to an head, and made resistance. But the morrow after, when he had assailed the City with all his forces, they submitted all to his mercy before night. The inhabitants of the next town to it, Mylo, presuming upon their fortifications, and standing upon this, That their City was impregnable, were so proud and lusty, that they could not be contented to shut the gates only against the King, but most rudely and malapertly spared not to cast out reproachfull taunts and gibing terms against his own person and the Macedonians. Which manner of dealing, as it envenomed the enemies and edged them, the rather to enforce and follow the assault, so it kindled themselves the more (upon despair of all pardon & mercy) to maintain and make good their place & stand more resolutely in their own defence. Whereupon for three daies together the town was assailed by one part, and defended by the other with mighty courage right valiantly. The Macedonians were so many in number, that by turns they relieved the assault without any difficulty, and entred one in the place of another. But the townsmen who evermore day and night guarded the walls, without any change & new supply, were not only overcharged with many wounds, but also wearied and enfeebled with continuall travell and want of sleep. The fourth day, when at one instant the scaling ladders were reared against the walls in every quarter, and the gate assailed with greater force and violence than before, the inhabitants being driven from the curtain and battlements, ran all to ward the gate, and made a sudden fall upon the enemies: which proceeding more upon inconsiderat and blind anger, than any true and assured confidence of their own strength, caused them (few in number and wearied) to be discomfited & put to flight by the enemies fresh and in heart, who entred pell-mell with them into the said gate standing wide open. Thus was this City taken and ranfacked. The bodies also of the free born persons, as many as remained after the bloody execution, were sold in market. Perseus after he had rased, ruined, and burned a great part of the town, dislodged and departed from thence to N Phalanna, and the next day following went onward, and marched to Cyrtone. But being advertised that T. Minutius Rufus and Hippias the Prætor of Thessaly were entred thither with a garrison, he passed besides the town, and never made offer of any assault. But he surprised Elania and Gonnus, by reason that the townsmen were stricken with exceeding fear upon his sudden arrival. These two towns are situate upon the very straight which leadeth to Tempe, but Gonnus especially. And therefore he left it guarded with a strong garrison both of foot and horse, as also fortified with a treble trench and sumpier. Himself in person went onward till to Sycorium, minding there to attend the coming of the enemy: and withall he commanded his army to forrage and purvey corn every way all over the territory of the enemies lying under him. For Sycorium is seated upon the hanging of an hill toward the very foot of the mountain Ossa, having upon the South side the plain champion of Thessaly under it, but behind on the back Macedony and Magnefia. Over and above these commodities, the place is very healthfull and plectuous of all good things, watered also with many quick and running springs round about.

The Roman Consul having his army on foot about that time marching toward Thessaly, at the first found good way and ready passage through Epirus: but afterwards, when he was passed over once into Athamania, he met with a rough country & rugged soil, & in manner insuperable.

As for as with exceeding great difficulty and by short journeys he had much ado to reach unto Gomphi. And if at that time, whilst his men and horses were encumbered and tairped, the King had made head in battell arranged, taking the vantage of time and place against him, leading as he did an host composed but of rude and untrained novices, the Romans themselves cannot deny, but it would have gone very hard with them, and a great overthrow they must needs have received in that conflict. But when they were come once to Gomphi without any skirmish, besides the joy which they conceived, for that they had escaped and overcome that dangerous passage, they began also to contemn their enemies, for that they knew not their own good, and were to ignorance of the opportunities which they had. The Consul after he had duly sacrificed (as it appertained) and distributed the allowance of corn among his souldiers, joyned there some few daies for the rest and repose both of man and beast: where, hearing that the Macedonians ranged and over-ran the country of Thessaly, waiting and spoiling the territory of the Roman allies, he led his souldiers now sufficiently refreshed unto Larissa. And having marched from thence within three miles of Tripolia (which they call Seia) he pitched his tents, and lodged upon the rivet Peneus.

At the same time Enmenes arrived by sea at Chalcis, together with two of his brethren, Aratulus and Athenus, leaving at Pergamus a third brother Philisternus for the defence of his Realm. From thence, accompanied with Aratulus and a power of four thousand foot and a thousand horse, he came to the Consul, and left at Chalcis two thousand footmen, commanded by Athenus. Thither also repaired other aids which came in to the Romans from all the States of Greece, but most of the particulars were so small as now they are grown out of remembrance. The Apollonians sent five hundred horsemen, and a hundred footmen. From the Ætolians there came a Cornet of horsemen, even the whole Cavalry that the said nation could make. Likewise all the Cavalry of the Thedaliats, which exceeded not the number of three hundred that served in the Roman camp, & quartered apart, The Achaïans sent one thousand men of their youth, armed for the most part after the Candior manner. And much about this time C. Lucretius also the Prætor, who had the conduct of the ships that anchored in the rode of Cephalonia, after he had given charge to M. Lucius his brother, to make sail with his fleet beyond the Cape of Malea, & to pals to Chalcis, himself went aboard upon a trireme galley, & sailed toward the gulph of Corinth, for to be seized first of the country of Boeotia, and to prevent all matters there. He made way but slowly, because of the infirmity and weakness of his body. M. Lucretius being arrived at Chalcis, and advertised that P. Lentulus lay against the City of Haliartus, sent a messenger commanding him in the name of the Prætor to raise the siege and dislodge from thence. The lieutenant notwithstanding he had learned that service with the help of the youth of that part of Bœotia which took part with the Romans retired from before the walls. The laying of the siege gave occasion of a new enterprise: for incontinently M. Lucretius besieged and invested Haliartus with his own sea-forces, to the number of 10000 fighting men, together with 2000 souldiers from K. Enmenes, whereof Athenus had the charge: and as they were now upon the point to give an assault, the Prætor came in unto them from Cephæa, and very near to that time, there arrived also at Chalcis certain ships from the allies, namely, two Quinquereme galleaces of Carthage, two trireme gallees from Heraclea in Pontus, four from Chalcidæa, as many from Samos, and five quadrireme gallees of Rhodes. All these vessels the Prætor brought back again to the allies, and called them of that charge, because there was no service to be performed in any place. Q. Marcius also came by sea to Chalcis, after he had won Haliartus, and assaulted Larissa called Cremasæ.

This was the State of Boeotia, when Perseus (as hath been said before) lay encamped at Sycorium, who after he had from every coast therabouts got together all the grain that he could come by, & certain companies to give the waste unto the territory of the Phœtians, supposing the Romans might be surprised, when they should be drawn far from their own camp to the succouring of their distressed associates. But perceiving that they stirred never the more for all that tumult: he sent among his souldiers all the prey, but only of men and women: now the booty of food most upon cattle, where with they made good cheer. After this, but near about one and the same time, the Col. & K. Perseus both debated in their council, how and where they should begin the war. Perseus had taken great heart and courage by occasion that the enemy suffered him to make such havoc and do his pleasure in the Phœtians territory. And therefore his resolution was to march directly against the Roman camp, without giving more time, and making any further delay. The Macedonian wife, for whose parts were of opinion, that all forlacking now would greatly prejudice the reputation among the confederates, who took it exceedingly to the heart, that they had not surprised the Phœtians. As they late consulting what to do, a now Enmenes and Aratulus both were present at this Council, there came a messenger in post hafe, with news that the enemy approached nearer at hand with a mighty army. Whereupon the Council brake up, and presently the army was gotten to arm. And advised it was in the mean while, that there should go forth 10000 men, and as many darters and foot out of King Enmenes his companies.

At the fourth hour of the day, being come within a mile and somewhat more of the Roman leaguer, commanded the ensigns of the footmen to stand, himself in person with the men of arms and light armed souldiers advanced forward, and so together with King Perseus and the Captains of the other auxiliaries, they two marched before. Now when they were within half a mile from the camp, they might discover the horsemen of their enemies. Two Cornets they were, most part Gauls, under the conduct of Cassianus; besides the loose and light armed footmen, hope, to the number well-near of a hundred and fifty, and those were partly Mysians and partly Cretensians. Hereat the King made a stand not knowing well the number of the enemies; and anon out of the regiment that he had with him he drew two wings of Thracian horse, and as many Macedonians; likewise two Cohorts of Cretensian and as many Thracian footmen. Hieropus ensued a skirmish; but so far as they were marched even in number, and no account came in to relieve from the one part or the other, it ended likewise in doubtful balance of victory. Of Emmenes his part there died about thirty: in which number Cassianus the Commander of the Gauls was slain. So for that time Perseus retired his forces to Symphium; but the next morning the King marched with them again to the self-same place, and much about the forehead hour, certain carts and wains laden with water followed after: and by reason that for a dozen miles space, all the way was waterless, and full of dust withal, hardly bestead (as it should seem) they had been for very drought and thirst in case they had been charged and put to skirmish, at the time when they were first in fight. But considering that the Romans kept quiet, yea, and had reduced their corps de guard within their rampier, Perseus likewise retired with his forces into his camp. This did the enemies for certain daies together, hoping ever that the Roman Cavalry would charge upon the tail of the rearguard in their retreat: and when by that occasion the skirmish was once begun and that they had trained and drawn them far from their camp; then they might with ease wheresoever they were, turn upon them and make head, having the odds of them in horsemen and light armed fouldiers. But the King seeing this would not speed, encamped nearer unto the Romans, and fortified the compass of half a mile. From whence betimes in the morning by the break of day, after he had embattelled his infantry in the usual place, he led all his Cavalry and light-armed men toward the camp of his enemies. The Romans seeing a greater dust raised by more in number, and the same nearer than ordinary it had been, were mightily afraid within their camp. But at the first they would hardly believe the messenger that brought the news: for that continually all the former daies the enemy used not to be seen until the fourth hour of the day, and now the sun was but newly risen. Howbeit, afterwards (I say) when about their gates there were thick alarms given, and more and more running from thence, and that now there was no doubt at all of the matter, there grew an exceeding trouble & hurlyburly. The Marshals, Colonels, Captains, and Centurions, betook themselves into the quarter about the Prætors pavilion; and the fouldiers ran every man to his own tent. Perseus had embattelled his men less than half a mile from the rampier about a little hill which they call Calicinus. King Corys had the charge of the left wing, with althoſe of his own nation. The ranks of the cavalry Rood marshalled asunder one from the other: by reason that the light armed fouldiers were bestowed between. In the right wing were placed the Macedonian horsemen, and the Cretensians likewise intermingled among them. Milon of Berrha led these light armed fouldiers; but Meno of Antigonis commanded the horsemen, and the whole regiment of that part. Next to those wings the Cavalry of K. Perseus was ranged together with the selected aid-fouldiers of many and sundry nations: and the same were conducted by Paracles of Antigonis, and Didas the governor of Peonia. In the midst of all was the King himself: having about him a band called Agema, and certain cohorts of horsemen named [The sacred wings]. Before him he planted the lingers and darters, who both together amounted to the number of 400; and over them he appointed for to be their leader one Ios of Thracian, and Timon the Dolopian. In this manner as is before said, Rood the Kings force embattelled. The Col. having put his Infantry in order of battell, sent out his Cavalry likewise with the light armed companies, who were set in array before the camp. C. Lucinius Vassus the Consul's brother had the leading of the right point, with all the Italian horsemen and the footmen lightly appointed intermingled among them. M. Valerius Lavinius in the left, commanded the horsemen of the greek associates, together with the light armed fouldiers of the same nation. Q. Mucius conducted the battallion in the midst with certain extraordinary chosen men of arms. Before their Guidons, the horsemen of the Gauls stood in ordinance: and of the auxiliaries of K. Emmenes, 300 Cyprians and 400 Thessalian horse. Not far from thence were ranged, somewhat above the left point King Emmenes himself and his brother Antabus, with all their power were planted behind, even between the rearguard and the trench. Thus Rood both battels (thatch after this manner arranged: and having of either side a like strength in number of horsemen and light-armed; they encountered and charged one another; and then the conflict was begun by the bold hope of loose shot to wit the lingers and darters that went before. And first of all others the Thracians, being like wild and savage beasts, who had been long pent up within some grates and cages, with a mighty cry advanced forth and ran upon the Italian horsemen in the right wing: to the end that they might trouble and amaze them: being of the same nation, as well by nature as for long experience and practice of war. The footmen with their swords aimed upon the heads of their pikes: and one while they thought their hostles, and another while they ran them into their flanks. Perseus rode into the midst of the battell, and at the first he forced the Greeks to turn aside and give way; and when the enemy pressed more over head upon them behind, behold the Thessalian horsemen who were placed in the rearguard for succour, and stood somewhat apart and reversed from the left wing, who at first were beholders only of the fight (as keeping without the danger of the charge) afterwards Rood them in very good head-ven as they were at the point to go down & have the worse. For as they retired hastily without breaking

A breaking their ranks, after that they once joyined with the aids of Emmenes, they both yielded the opportunity to their allies who were disbanded in the rout, to retire in safety within their ranks; and also eſſying their own vantage, when the enemies pursued not to thick in troops they adventured to put themselves forward beyond, and so staid many of those their allies whom they encountered and received in their flight. Neither durst the Kings men, being now all dispersed and dispersed here and there in following the chase, come to hand-fight and joyne battell with those, continuing so well in order as they did, and marching firm and strong together: whereas the matter had been dispatched and the war brought to a small end, in case the King who won the better in horse-fight, had never to little come in with help and succour. For as he encouraged his soldiers to fight, there came in place very fitly and in passing good time, the Phalax, which Hippas and Leonatus (because they would not be behind-hand in this hardy enterprise) brought of their own accord in great haste soon as ever they heard of the winning hand of the Cavalry. And as whether the K. was in doubtful suspense, between hope and fear of this so great an adventure, Evaner the Cretensian, whose service Perseus had used in the war laid for K. Emmenes at Delos, seeing that main battell marching heavily armed under their ensigns ran into the King and earnestly advertised him to take heed, lest that presuming too much and bearing himself over-confident of this good speed of his, he brought not unadvisedly the main chance of all his estate, into a needlesse and unnecessary hazard. For if (quoth he) you can be content with the happy fortune of this fair day and so rest, either you shall have the means to make an honourable peace, or else (if you had rather prosecute the war) to win exceeding many allies to bear arms with you in the field; who, no doubt, will follow the train of your good fortune. To this way Rood the Kings mind ever, and thither he soon inclined. Therefore having commended Evaner for his good advice, he commanded the ensigns to retire, and the footmen to return into the camp: likewise to sound the retreat unto the Guidons of the men of arms. In this battell 200 Roman horsemen that day lost their lives, and no fewer than 2000 footmen, and near upon 200 of the Cavalry were taken prisoners. Of the Kings side, there died not past 200 horsemen and forty of the other.

After that the victorious enemies were upon their return into the camp all were jocund & glad in general, but above the rest the Thracians shewed themselves in joy for this their victory, over insolent: for they returned singing full merrily, and carried the heads of their enemies fixed upon their spear-points. But the Romans were not only sad and heavy for this unfortunate journey, but fearful also lest the enemy should forthwith assail their camp. Emmenes gave counsell to dislodge and remove to the other side of the river Peneus, that it might serve them instead of a defence and bulwark, until such time as the amazed soldiers had recovered their spirits and taken heart again. The Col. was ashamed and abashed to bewray his fear; howbeit, over-ruled with reason, lest his army over the river in the dead time of the night, and encamped on the farther bank, K. Perseus the morrow after advanced forward to bid the enemies battell, perceiving they were lodged in safety beyond the river, he confessed that he had fainted indeed, for that he had not followed his victory the day before: but more over keen a good deal he was in lying still and taking repose that night: for without troubling any else of his own men he might have sent out the light armed fouldiers only to set upon the enemies as they passed over the river in haste and right, and so defeated a great part of their forces. Now the Romans shook off their fear for the present, considering they were encamped in a sure place: but among other damages, the blot especially of their honour and name grieved and troubled them. And as they fate in Council before the Consul, every man for his part laid all the blame upon the Aetolians, who first began to be afraid and run away; and whose example of fear the other allies of the Cities of Greece followed: for it was said, that five principal men of mark among the Aetolians, were seen and noted first of all other to have turned their backs. But the Thessalians were praised in a full assembly of the whole army; and their Captains for their virtue and valorous service were honoured with prebents. The spoils of the enemies were brought before King Perseus; out of which he bestowed freely upon some, brave and gorgeous armours; upon others goodly great horses; and finally, certain were rewarded with the prize of good prisoners. Targets there were above a thousand and five hundred, cuirasses and corsets not so few as a thousand; besides a far greater proportion of murrions, swords, and shot of all sorts. Great matters these were, considered in themselves; but much more amplified and set out by the King himself with a speech that he made in a frequent audience of his army assembled together, after this or the like manner, "You lee already by this (quoth he) what you may judge before-hand of the final issue of this war: discomfited ye have the better part of your enemies, to wit, the Roman Cavalry, wherein they took themselves to be invincible. For their horsemen are the very gallants and bravest of their youth; their Gentlemen of arms (I say) are the seminary and nurse-garden of their Senat. From them they chuse their Nobles and Peers to make Consuls of yea, and Generals of the field another day. And the spoils of these we have erewhiles divided among us. Neither is the victory less which ye have gained of the Infantry and legions, who although by night they made an escape from you, yet in chasing to pass over the river, they resembled a sort that had suffered shipwreck at sea, and in fearful haste for their lives have swum & overpassed the river every where with their bodies. Sooner shall we & with greater ease I trow, get over Peneus, to chase them thus already overcome, than they did making such haste for fear: and being once met on the other side, we shall out of hand

battallion of footmen.

"hand assail their camp, which we might have forced and won this day, but that they took them "to their heels and fled. But if they will come to a field and try the quarrel by the sword point,
 "look ye for no other issue of the conflict with footmen, than was before of the other with "horsemen. These words, both the horsemen (who bare upon their own shoulders the spoils of "their enemies lying slain before their eyes in open view) heard with great pleasure and content"ment, as measuring the hope of the future speed by the fortune passed; and also the footmen en-
 "flamed now with the glory of others (and namely those that were of the Macedonian Phalanx)
 "winced with all their hearts to have the like occasion offered unto them, wherein they might not "only shew their valiant service before the King, but also win semblable glory of their enemies. Thus "the assembly was dissolved, and the morrow after the King marched forward and encamped upon Mopsus, which is an hill situate in the mid way between Tempe and Larissa. The Romans remo"ved their camp into a place of more security, howbeit, not far from the bank of Peneus. Thither re"paired Macedonia the Numidian, with 1000 horse and as many foot, besides 22 Elephants. Now
 "as K. Perseus during these daies, sat in Council what course to take as touching the main conduct "of his affairs, when his courage was now well abated and not so lusty for his late victory, some of "his friends were so hardy as to advise him to use this good fortune of his for the obtaining and "compassing of some honourable peace, rather than upon a vain hope to carry his head aloft, and "engage himself and his whole state into some hazard & jeopardy, out of which he should not be "able to recover and retire into safety. For to keep a mean and moderation in prosperity, and not "over-confidently to trust upon the present flattering fortune, is the part (say they) of a wise man in"deed and truly happy. And therefore the best course is, to send certain men of purpose unto the "King, for to renew the league upon the same conditions, with which your father Philip had ac"cepted peace heretofore of T. Quintus the conqueror. For neither (say they) can the war be taken "up with greater honour and reputation, than after so memorable a battell; nor ever will there be "presented more firm and assured hope of a peace to continue for ever, than upon this occasion, "which will work and mollifie the Romans as a man would have them, to come on and assent to "any accord, considering they are well tamed with the infortunity of this battell. But in case the "Romans upon an inbred peevishness and engrafted pertinacity of theirs, should not hear reason
 "but refuse an indifferent end, then both God and man shall be witness, as well of the moderation
 "of Perseus, as of their pride & insolent forwardness. The King was willing enough to give ear to this,
 "and indeed never misliked such discourses; and therefore the advice was approved by the chief "of the most part; whereupon embassadors were sent to the King, & in a frequent Council assem"bled, had audience given them. Peace they demanded and promised that Perseus should pay unto
 "the Romans as great a tribute as Philip had covenanted for; and likewise quit the same Cities,
 "coasts, and territories, which Philip had given up and surrendered. To this effect spake the embas-
 "sadors; who being retired aside, the Romans debated in Council, and in the end Rome con"sistently imported and had the upper hand: for in those daies the manner and use was, in time of ad"versity to bear all out and set a good countenance, but in prosperity to hold an even hand and a "niggard governance. So agreed it was to return this answer, That peace might be granted with this "condition, That K. Perseus should permit full and free power to the Senat of Rome, for to dispose "both of his person and the kingdom of Macedonia at their good pleasure. When the Embassadors "had made relation hereof, this constant resolution and invincible persistence of the Romans made "them to wonder again, as being not acquainted with their manners and fashions: and most of "them forbore to make mention any more of peace, saying, That the Romans would be glad short"ly to seek for that of their own accord, which now at this present they loathed & rejected when "it was offered. But Perseus mightily feared, that this arrogant spirit of theirs, proceeded from the "confidence they had in their own forces; inasmuch as he gave not over so, but assailed to tempt
 "the King, happily by augmenting the sum of money, he might buy peace at any price & reckoning "whatsoever. But seeing him nothing to come down, nor to alter one jot from the first answer, in "despair now of all peace, he returned to Syeurium from whence he came, purposing once again to "try the hazard of the field. Now the fame of this late flight of cavalry was flown over all Greece,
 "and discovered the minds and affections of men: for not only they that took part with the Ma"cedonians rejoiced to hear this news, but also very many of them who were obliged and be"holden unto the Romans for benefits and favours received at their hands, and some likewise who "had tasted of their violence and proud government. And this they did for no other reason at all,
 "but only upon a foolish and perverse affection, like to that wherewith the common people ordi"narily is carried away in the beholding of disports and trial of masteries, even to favour eve-
 "more the weaker and him that taketh the foil.

At the same time Lucretius the Praetor had with most forcible means assailed the City of Hatturus in Baetia: and albeit the besieged defendants within were relieved by no fortin aid, but "only the youth of the Coronians (who at the beginning of the siege entered the City) nor hoped "for any to come; yet they stood out and made resistance with courage of heart more than with "strength of hand: for they issued forth many times, and filled upon the fabrics and engines of the "enemy, yea & when the ram approached hard to the wall, they let fall thereupon a mighty weight "and counterpoise of lead and so depressed and drove it down to the ground. And if happily the en"emies who ran with the ram against the wall, avoided the device of theirs, laid battery, and took
 "it in some other place; the townsmen within, raised presently with great speed another mine, piling

A piling up hastily the stones one upon another, which they found lying among the very ruins of the "breaches. The Consul seeing this manner of service by way of ordinance and battery, to become "slow and tedious, commanded to divideladders amongst every company, and purposed to inveig
 "the City round about with the Eisalado: supposing that the number which he had would be suf"ficient to exploit this enterprise, because on that side whereas the Town is enclosed with a marsh,
 "it was too little (or rather impossible) to assault it. Himself in person presented 2000 elect sol"diers before that part, whereas two curreurs, and all the wall between was beaten down and over"thrown to the end that in the very instant, whilst he assailed to enter at the breach, his the town-
 "men should run all thither to repulse him, and in the mean while the walls void of defendants "might in some part or other be scaled and won. But they within desired themselves as lustily to "give him the repulse. For having piled in the very open breaches a mighty number of faggots "made of drifvine cuttings and such small brush, they stood ready with flaming firebrands and "burning links, threatening ever and anon to kindle the same and let all on fire, to the end that be"ing defended from the enemy by the means of fire between, they might have time to oppose an in"fer countermeasure against them. But by mischance this device and enterprise of theirs was em-"peached. For there poured down on a sudden such a mighty shower of rain that the faggot would "not easily take fire, and look what was set a burning, it soon was quenched again, fly which means
 "not only the passage was made open between the smoking faggots drawn apart one from another
 "here and there; but whilst they all intended wholly the defence of that one place, the walls were "taken at one instant by ladders reared up against many and sundry parts thereof. In the first heat
 "upon the winning of the City, old and young such as chanced to come in their way, without any "respect at all of age were put to the sword. The armed soldiers fled into the Castle, and the next "day being past hope to make good the place, they yielded and were all fold under the girdle in "portals, to them that would bid most, to the number of 2500 men or very near. The ornaments "and beauties of the City, as statues, images, painted tables and pictures, and whatsoever was found "in the pillage to bear a better price, was carried to shipboard, and the Town itself raised from the "very foundations, and laid even with the ground. From thence the army was conducted to Thebes:
 "which being won without any resistance he put into the hands of the blemished perions and those "that took part and sided with the Romans; but those of the contrary faction, such as favoured the "King and the Macedonians, he sold by whole families in open market to the best chapmen, having "performed these exploits in Baetia, he retired himself to the Sea side to his ships.

Whiles these affairs passed thus in Baetia, Perseus lodged for certain daies in a camp at Syeurium,
 "where being advertised, that the Romans made great haste to the corn new sown, he respected down,
 "and to carry it from all parts of the fields unto the leaguers, and that every soldier before his tent
 "cut and shored off the ears as they lay bound in sheaves, to the end they might thrash and drive
 "the cleaner corn, by which occasion they had made great heaps of straw throughout all parts "of the camp, he supposed it was an easy matter to set all their tents and pavilions on fire. Where"upon he commanded to provide torches, links and balls made of tow besmeared with pitch and "urth; these provided and furnished, he set out at midnight, that by the dawning of the day, he might "put this device in execution without being defiered before. But ill came to nothing for the for"tune of the Emol corpus de guard although they were surprised with this sudden coming, by their trouble and "affright awakened and raised all the rest, and immediately the alarm was given; so as at one instant
 "the soldiers were ready and well appointed at the gates, and upon the rampier bent and preit for
 "to defend the camp. Perseus likewise incontinently turned about with his ensigns, putting his far-"drels and carriage before, and then commanded the infantry to march after: himself with the ca"valry and light armors staid behind to fortify and guard the rewer and supposing, as it fell out in"deed, that the enemies would make after to charge upon the tail of the march. His light armed "soldiers had some short skirmishing especially with the forlorn hope and loose avant-couriers,
 "but the horse and footmen both, retired without any impeachment into the camp. Thus when all "the corn was cut down about those quarters, the Romans dislodged and removed into the terri"tory of Crannon, which as yet was not endangered. Whiles they lay encamped in security and "mitting nothing (because the enemies were so far off, and by reason that the way between Syeurium
 "and Crannon was so difficult for want of water;) beheld all on a sudden early in the "morning by day light, the Kings cavalry and light armed soldiers shewed themselves upon the "hills that overlooked them from above, and put them into great trouble. Departed they were
 "from Syeurium at noon the day before, and had left the infantry behind about the break of day
 "upon the plain next thereto. For a while he stood upon those said hills, hoping that the Romans
 "might be strained forth to an horse-fight. But perceiving them not to stir at all, he sent one ori-
 "back to command the footmen to retire again to Syeurium, and himself in person followed "straight after. The Roman horsemen made after a pretty distance off, if happily they could spie any "ravage in one place or other to charge upon them, disband and straggle asunder. But when "they saw that in their dismarch they kept close together following their guidons and keeping their "ranks they also returned into the camp. After this, the King weary of making so long journies dis"lodged and removed to Mopsus. The Romans for their part likewise having mowed down all "the corn of Crannon passed into the territory of Phalaenum. The King having intelligence by a "straggler revolt that the Romans were scattered all over the fields and reaping the standing corn,
 "without any guard of armed men, made a rode with 1000 horse, & 2000 Candiors & Thracians;
 "Kkkk who

who marching with as great hast as possibly they could, set upon the Romans at unawares all on provided; where he took a thousand carts or thereabouts, together with their teams, most of them laden, and upon 600 men besides. The guard and convoy of this booty into the camp he committed to the charge of 300 Cretanians. Himself having rallied his cavalry dispersed here and there busy in execution, and reunited withal the rest of the footmen led them to the next corps de guard or garrison of the enemies, supposing that with little ado they might be surprised and vanquished. L. Pompeius a Colonel had the command of them, who seeing his souldiers affrighted with this suddain coming of the enemies, retired with them to an hill neer at hand, for to defend himself by the vantage and strength of the place, considering that otherwise in number and forces he was too weak. Where after he had call his men into a ring, for to ward against the shot of arrows and darts by a roof and dence of targets couched close together over their heads: Perseus having environed the hill round about with armed men, commanded some to mount up and assay to win the place on all parts, if possibly they could; and then to fight close hand to hand: others he charged to lance their darts and shoot their shafts thick at them a far off. The Romans were beset with a double fear; for neither could they maintain skirmish and fight close together because of those who laboured to climb the hill: and say they had broke any ranks with excursions and outroides upon them, they were they exposed and lay open to the shot of arrows and darts. Most hurt they had by certain weapons called Cestrophendone (sling darts.) A new kind of dart this was and lately devised in the time of this very war. It had a sharp head of iron the length of two hands breadth, and the same set fast in a steel which was half a cubit long, and about the thickness of a mans finger: for to slide direct and straight, three leathers it had about it in man of a shaft: the sling from the middle part had two cords of an unequal size: now when as the sling swung in about, as it lay even poised in the greater capacity of the leather thong, out flew the dart and was driven with violence like a bullet. Many of the souldiers being very sore wounded as well with this weapon as all other sorts of shot, so as now for weariness they were scarce able to bear their own armour: the King was earnestly in hand with them to yeeld and submit, assuring them upon his faithful word their lives, yea, and otherwhiles promised them rewards and recompences. But there was not a man whose heart ended once thereto. Now as they stood thus stiff and resolute to die there shone upon them a little comfort and some hope of evasion beyond all their expectation. For certain of the forragers and corn purveyors, who happened to flee for refuge unto the camp, brought word unto the Consul, that the corps de guard aforesaid was besieged round: where upon being moved with the jeopardy wherin so many citizens stood (for about 900 they were, and all citizens of Rome) he went forth of the camp with the cavalry and light armed souldiers, and unto them joyned certain new succours of the Numidians as well horse as foot, together with the Elephants: and gave commandment to the martial Colonels, that the ensigns of the legions should follow after. Himself in person marched before toward the hill aforesaid, taking with him a certain number of skirmishers, for to strengthen the light armed auxiliaries. Eumenes, Antalus, and Mageus also the King of the Numidians, flanked the Col. on either side. When as the besieged Romans had a sight once of the foremost ensigns of their friends and fellows, they took comfort and courage again upon their former extreme despair. Perseus, who had purposed in the first place not to spend any long time in laying siege to this corps de guard but to content himself with the fortunate success which at a venture hapned, in that he had taken and slain some of the forragers: secondly (when he was in some fort entred into that action) to depart (whiles he had means thereof) without any damage received, as knowing that he had no strength, to speak of, about him: yet puffed up and carried as it were above the ground with the conceit of his late good hand, both staid in person to attend the enemies coming, and also sent out in all haile, for the [Macedonian] Phalans. Which coming later than the present necessity required (albeit in great haile they hurried) it tell out so, that they were to encounter (troubled and disordered as they were in running) their enemies that were well appointed and provided aforehand. And the Col. who had prevented them presently welcomed them with battail. At the first the Macedonians made resistance: but afterwards being in no respect equal unto the enemies after they had lost three hundred footmen with four and twenty of the most forward and bravest horsemen out of that corner which they call Sacra (amongst whom Antimachus also their leader died) they endeavoured to retire and be gone. But the way by which they were to pass, was more troublesome to speak of, than the skirmish and battail it self. The Phalans being sent unto by a messenger in haile, and conducted as hastily, encountered affront in a certain straight troop of prisoners, and likewise the waggons charged with corn. Who being led at to give way, thereupon arose a great trouble as well of the one part as the other: whiles no man took heed how to march in order: but the armed souldiers cast down and overthrow the heaps of fardage and baggage, for otherwise there could no way be made: and the draught-beasts being pricked and provoked forward, ragged and made foul work in the press and throng. Hardly and with much ado were they disengaged and rid of this confused and disordered company of captives, when they met with the King his company and the horsemen discomfited. In which place, the noise which they made crying unto the Phalans. Back again Back again made a fright among them as if there had been something ready to fall upon their heads: in such sort as if their enemies durst have entred into the straight and pursued farther after them, no doubt they had received a great overthrow. But the Consul contenting himself with a mean good hand, in that he had rescued and recovered his corps de guard from off the

A the hill, retired with his forces into the camp. Some write that there was a great battail fought that day, and how 8000 enemies were slain: and among them Sepater and Antipater two of the Kings Captains. Also that there were taken prisoners about 2400: and military ensignes 27 carried away. Neither was the victory easily gotten, but at blood, for not so few as 4200 were slain of the Consul his army, and five guidons of the left wing lost. This journey recomfited the Romans, but dined, and quailed Perseus in such sort, as after he had staid a few daies at Apollonia, expecting about entering the bodies of his dead souldiers, and lost a sufficient garrison at Gomoni, he retired his army into Macedonia, leaving also at Philae one of his own Captains named Timolonus with some small forces, whom he commanded to assay the Magnesium and the borders adjoynting. When he was come to Pella, he dismissed his army out of the field, and sent them to their wintering harbours, but himself together with King Corys went to Thessalonica.

Thither news came, that Attalus a petty King of the Thracians, and Cornelius a Captain under King Eumenes, had invaded the marches of Corys, and were masters of the country which they call Mareum. And therefore supposing that he must needs discharge Corys to look to the defence of his own realm, he bestowed rich presents upon him at his departure: and gave him 200 talents for six months wages of his cavalry, whereas at the beginning he purposed to be at the charge of a whole years pay.

The Consul after he heard that Perseus was gone, approached with his army neer to Gomoni, and there lodged: if haply he might force and gain that also. Situat it was over against Tempe, at the very mouth and gullet of the straight, and is the very frontier Town, yielding both a most assured Defence and strength to all Macedonia, and also a commodious passage for the Macedonians to enter into Thessaly. And being a place impregnable, as well for the natural site thereof, as the strong garrison therein placed, he gave over the enterprise. So turning and bending his way into Parva Macedonia, after he had forced Mallas at the first assault and put it to the ransom: and received Triphylus with the rest of Perkhabia, yeilded by composition, he returned to Larissa. And then having left Eumenes and Antalus home into their own country, and bestowed Mageus and the Numidians in diverse Cities of Thessaly neer at hand, to remain there for the winter time: and distributed part of his forces throughout all Thessaly, in such sort, that not only they had all commodious wintering, but also lived in stead of garrisons to the Cities. Q. Mutius his Lieutenant he sent with a regiment of 2000 men to guard Ambracia and keep it in obedience. All the confederats of the Greek Cities, save only the Achaeans he licensed to depart. With one part of his army he went into Thessaly in Phthia, where he rated down to the ground Pileum abandoned of the inhabitants. But Antonus he won with the good will of the Townsmen. Then afterward he approached beyond Larissa with his forces. The City was left desolate, for all the people were retired into the towns, the which he began to assault: and first the Kings garrison of Macedonians quit the place at whom the Townsmen being forsaken and left to themselves, submitted incontinently. Then he stood in doubt whether he should assail Demetrias first, or have an eye and look into the troubles and state of Boeotia. For the men of Thebes, being grievously molested and annoyed by those of Graecia, had sent for him into Boeotia: at whole prayers, thither he conducted his army: and besides, Boeotia was a country more commodious to winter in than Magnesia.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the three and fortieth Book.

DiVERS Pretors were judicially condemned, for demeaning themselves with cruelty and avarice in the administration of their Provinces. P. Licinius Crassus the Pro-consul, won by force many Cities in Greece, and cruelly risted them. For which rigour of his, the captives whom he had sold under the standard in open market, were by an order directed out of the Senat, restored, returned to their former states. The Admirals of the Roman fleet committed many outrages and inhumanities against their allies. Besides, there are comprised in this book, the prosperous affairs of King Perseus in Thessaly, which he had, vanquished the Dardanians and subdued Illyricum, whereof Septimus was King. The troubles which began in Spain by means of Olonicus, were appeased by his death. M. Emilius Lepidus, was by the Senat created president of the Senat.

The three and fortieth Book of T. Livius.

THE same summer, wherein the Romans won the victory with horse-fight in Thessaly, the Lieutenant being sent into Illyricum from the Consul, compelled by force and arms two rich Towns to yeeld: unto which nevertheless he gave all their goods again, to the end that by an opinion of this clemency, he might win the hearts of the inhabitants of Carinus, that strong City. But when he saw that he could not constrain them to tender, no more than force them by siege; because his soldiers should not seem to have been wearied for nothing in the besieging of two Towns, he fell to rifle and ransack that, which before he left untouched. The other Consul C. Cassius neither performed any memorable exploit in Cambr, which was his Province by lot; and having endeavoured to conduct his legions through Syracusa into Adriaticum, all his designment came to no effect at all. That the Consul was enticed upon this journey the Senat was certified: by the Embassadors of the Aquileians, who complained that their colony newly erected was feeble, and not as yet well secured among those fierce nations of Illyrians and Allyrians; and withal they made suit, that the Senat would provide and take order, that the said colony might be fortified: and when the question was put unto them: Whether they would be content that commission should be directed unto C. Cassius in that behalf? they answered, That that said Cassius, having assembled his army at the Rendevous in Aquileia, was departed through Salavonia into Macedony. This at first was thought incredible, and every man supposed verily, that he had been gone to levy war upon the Carnians haply or the Illyrians. The Aquileians were able to copy no farther, nor affirm more upon their knowledge than this. That allowance of coin was made for the soldiers to serve thirty daies, and that guides were sought and brought on, who knew the waies out of Italy into Macedony. Hereat the Senat (ye may be sure) took great misgiving and was highly displeased, that the Consul should be so hardy as presume to leave his own province for to pass into that which belonged to another, and to lead his army an unknown and new way, and the same dangerous, through strange and forraine countries, thereby to open passage as it were, for so many nations to come into Italy. Whereupon in a frequent assembly of the Senators, there passed a decree, That C. Sulpicius the Pretor should nominate three Embassadors out of the body of the Senat, forth depart out of the City that present day, to make all the hast they possibly could to overtake the Consul wheresoever he was, and to give him warning to levy no war against any nation without direct warrant from the Senat. And these Embassadors went, namely, M. Cornelius Cetegus, M. F. Fulvius, and P. Martinus Rex. The present fear as touching the Consul and the army, was the occasion that the care of fortifying Aquileia was deferred for that time.

After this, were the Embassadors of certain States in both Provinces of Spain admitted to come into the Senat: who complained of the covetousness and pride of the Roman Officers and Governors among them; humbly beseeching the Senat upon their knees, Not to suffer them (being allies and confederats) to be more shamefully pillaged and spoiled than the very enemies. Among other indignities for which they shewed themselves aggrieved, notorious it was, that the said Magistrats had taken bribes, yea, and used extortion in wringing money from them. Whereupon a commission was granted to L. Canuleius the Pretor (unto whom Spain by lot was fall) to ordain five judges or commissioners (and those out of the rank and degree of Senators) for every person of whom the Spaniards claimed to recover such monies; and likewise to permit the plaintiffs to take into them what Advocats and Counsel they would. Then, after those Embassadors were called again into the Senat, this decree and act of the Senat was read unto them, and willed they were to nominate their Advocats; who named four, to wit, M. Porcius Cato, P. Cornelius Scipio the son of Cn. L. Aemilius Paulus, the son of Marcus, and C. Sulpicius Gallus. And first they took commissioners to proceed against M. Titinius, who had been Pretor in the higher Province of Spain, when Au. Manlius and M. Junius were Consuls. Twice was the cause of the accused party adjourned to a farther time, but at the third session he was quit and found unguilty. Then arose a some variance and dissension between the Embassadors of those two Provinces, The States of this higher Spain, took for their patrons and Advocats, M. Cato and Scipio; they of the further and lower Spain, made choice of L. Paulus, and Gallus Sulpicius. They of high Spain convened before the delegate judges, P. Furius Philus; the other of the base Spain, M. Matienus. Philus had been L. Deputy there three years past, when S. Posthumius and Q. Manius were Consuls; but this Matienus two years before, during the Consulship of L. Posthumius and M. Popilius. Charged they were both of them with right grievous matters and imputations, and a farther day dragged of a final judgment: but when they were to answer judicially again, they made default, and for excuse it was alleged, that they were both out of the country; and so they departed into voluntary exile, Furius to Transse, and Matienus to Tyber. The voice went, that the patrons of the plaintiffs would not suffer them to follow procelss still against such noble and great personages: and the suspicion hereof was more pregnant, by reason that Canuleius the Pretor let this matter fall, and began to take matters and levy soldiers for the war; and so forth with directly went into the Province, to the end that no more men should be brought into question and troubled by these Spaniards. By this means, all former matters past were buried in silence and no more speech made of them: but for future time, the Senat took order and provided for the Spaniards so well, that they obtained animunity. That no Roman Magistrate should have power and authority to set the price upon any gain, nor force the Spaniards to sell the Victims at what rate he pleased to set down: also that there should be no commissioners appointed within their Towns for the gathering and receiving of the revenues and money issuing from thence. Besides, there came another embassy of a sort of people out of Spain, after a new and strange manner: for there were above four hundred persons, avouching themselves the children of Roman soldiers and Spanish women not joynt in wedlock: who appeared before the Senat and besought them, for

A to allow them a City to inhabit. Whereupon obtained it was, That they should erect their names and be matriculated before their Pretor L. Canuleius: And look whomsoever of them he affianced and made free, chose: they thought meet to be sent to Clunia near the Sea side, and there planted into that whole Cartaginians, who were willing thither to keep home and remain there, should be permitted as Colonizers and so enrolled, and to enjoy besides a portion of Lands assigned unto them. This was a Latine colony, and was called the Colony of the Libertines.

At the same time there came an Embassador out of Africa, Gaius the son of Magnus, and likewise the Cartaginians in embassy. Gaius was brought into the Senat, who desired what his father had sent him with against the Maccedonians, promising withal, that if it pleased them to impose more upon him, he would be ready to perform the like in remembrance of the benefits received from the people of Rome: finally he gave the LL. of the Senat a caveat by the way, to take heed that the Cartaginians deceived them not in the end: for that, resolved they were, and went in hand to prepare a great navy, under pretence of sending it to the Romans against the Maccedonians: which it is were once ready rigged and furnished, it was in their choice, then to make whom they would either friends or foes.

Being entered the camp, and siting with the heads aloft, they struck such a fear, that it immediately the army had come forward and advanced against them, the camp might have been won; and yet even then it was, they remained still, and some there were who gave their opinion, to send Embassadors to treat and with prayers to intercede for peace. Upon the news reported hereof, many Cities submitted and were surrendered, such as made excuse, and laid the fault upon the folly of two Periodontis, who had of their own accord offered themselves to be punished, obtained pardon of the Pretor. And then forthwith he went in expedition against other Cities: but finding them all ready to do whatsoever they were commanded, he parted quietly with his army through that country in peace, which but a while before was all up in arms and on a light fire. This lenity of the Pretor, which he used in taming and subduing this most fierce and proud nation without effusion of blood, was by so much more acceptable to the LL. of the Senat and the whole body of the people, as the Consul Lucius and the other Pretor Lucius had waited in Greece with greater cruelty and warfare. As for Lucius, the Tribunes of the Commons accused him daily in their ordinary Orations before the people for his absence: Now withal adding his excuse was alleged, that absent he was, and employed about the affairs of the State. But in those daies, no unknown words things done hard by, that even at that present he was at his farm within the territory of Ambrona, and busy in conveying a conduit of water out of the river Corniciato into Amium: the charges wherewith he defraided with the money raised out of the sale of prize taken from the enemies, some say that he bargained to have that piece of work effected, for the sum of a hundred and 3000 Mils. Moreover he embellished and adorned the Temple of Castellus, with the painted tables found in the pillage. The envy and ill will, the obloquy also and dishonor like to grow to Lucius; turned upon his successor Hortensius, by occasion of the Embassadors of Ardery, who impudently complained with tears before the Senat, that their Town was by Hortensius forced and ransacked: How the cause of this ruin and destruction of their City was no more but that, that being engaged by him to make payment of a hundred thousand Denarii, and allowance of fifty thousand Modii of wheat: they requested some respite of time, wherein they might address their Embassadors, as well to Hortensius the Consul as unto Rome, concerning this imposition. For scarcely were they come unto the said Consul, but they heard how their City was forced, the principal citizens thereof beheaded, and all the rest sold in port-sale under the garland. These were grievous indignities in the sight of the Senat, whereupon they passed the same ordinance in the behalf of the Aberdites, that the year before had been directed in the like case as touching the Cornonians; and commanded the Pretor Q. Manilius to publish the said decree before the public assembly of the people. In like manner two Commissioners were sent, namely, C. Sempronius Blaesus, and S. Julius Caesar for to re-establish the Aberdites in their freedom: who also had in charge to signify from them, both to the Consul Hortensius, and also to the Pretor Hortensius. That the Senat judged the hostility offered unto the Aberdites injurious, and the war unlawful, and therefore that all such as were brought into servitude, should be fought out and restored again to liberty.

At the same time presentation was made unto the Senat of certain complaints against C. Cassius who had been Consul the year before, and at that time was employed in quality of a Colonel-marshal together with A. Hostilius in Macedony. Likewise there arrived the Embassadors of Cinebilas a petty King of the Gauls. A brother of this having audience granted in the Senat made a speech, wherein he complained, that C. Cassius had given the walt to the lands and territories of the people inhabiting the Alpi who were their allies and confederats, and from thence had led away into captivity many thousand persons. And much at one instant there came the Embassadors of the Carnians, Illyrians and Japides with complaints against Cassius. That first he had enjoined them to furnish him with guides for to shew and direct him the best way to march with his army into Macedony, and so departed in peace from them, as if he had meant to war elsewhere: but afterwards out of the midway of his journey, he returned upon them and in hostile manner overran their frontiers, robbing, spoiling & burning whosoever he went and to this day they cannot devise and know the reason: wherefore the Consul should hold them for enemies and deal so cruelly by them. As well the Prince of the Gauls as aforesaid being absent, these Embassadors in place received this answer, that as touching the outrages for which they shewed themselves grieved; the Senate neither knew thereof beforehand, than ever they were intended, nor yet approved of the same, since they were committed. But against all right and equity, it were so condemn unheard in his own defence, and albeit, such a personage as he is, namely, a man who had been Consul; considering also that his employment about the City, in the occasion of his absence, when C. Calfius once returned out of Macedony, then if they would try themselves and accuse him face to face, the Senate would hear the cause and take knowledge accordingly. Yes, and endeavour that they should be satisfied and contented. Moreover, though good it was, that these matters should not be dispatched only with this bare answer, but that the Embassadors also should be sent into the foresaid King beyond the Alps; and other three to the people above named, for so acquainted them with the resolution of the Lords of the Senate. And they gave order besides to send presents to each of the Embassadors to the value of two thousand Ases over and above, to the two Princes that were brethren, these gifts following, to wit, two chains of gold weighing after they were wrought five pound of gold; also five peeces of plate in silver, amounting to the weight of twenty pound; two hard horses with their riders and lackies likewise, horsemen, armour and their caissons; and liveries likewise for all those of their train, as well bond as free. These were the things sent unto them. But at their own request granted it was besides, that they might for their money buy each of them ten horses, and be allowed to transport them out of Italy. The Embassadors sent with the Gauls beyond the mountains, were C. Lelius and M. Emilius Lepidus: to the other nations C. Sicius, P. Cornelius Blasio, and T. Memmius.

Moreover, there met together in Rome at once, the Embassadors of many States both of Greece and Afia. And first the Athenians were brought into the Senate, who related, That they had sent unto the Consul P. Licinius and the Pretor Q. Lucretius, what shipping they had, and all the fighting men they were able to make; but seeing they had no use of them, they had raised a levy of a hundred thousand Modii of corn. Which albeit their land was but barren for tillage; and the very husbandmen themselves lived of forain corn brought in unto them, yet they had made means to do accordingly, because they would not seem to be wanting in any dutiful service; and willing they were yet, and prest to perform whatsoever they would require. The Milesians for their part said, That hitherto they had done nothing, marry they offered themselves to be ready to accomplish all that the Senate should command them toward this war. The Alabandians shewed, that they had built a Temple to the City of Rome, and ordained besides, that in the honour of that goddess there should be a solemnity of games and plaies exhibited every year. Also, that they had brought with them for a present, a crown of gold weighing fifty pound, to set it up in the Capitol as a gift and offering to Jup. Opt. Max. and withal, three hundred horsemen shields, which they were minded to bestow upon those unto whom it pleased them to appoint and command. Their petition was, that they might be permitted to offer their present in the Capitol, and there to sacrifice. The men of Lampascus came, with a golden crown weighing fourscore pound, protesting, That they had quick and abandoned Perseus, to loon as ever the Roman army was arrived in Macedony, notwithstanding they owed allegiance unto Perseus, and were homagers to his father Philip before him. In which consideration, as also for that they had performed their devoir to their full power to the Roman Generals, they requested no other favour, to be gratified withal, but to be received into the amity of the people of Rome; and in case there should be peace concluded with Perseus, that they might be excepted and exempted in the accord, for being reduced under his obedience. The rest of the Embassadors had a gracious answer returned unto them. As for the Lampascens, order was given to Q. Maximus the Pretor, to enter and enroll them in the number of allies. Every one of these Embassadors were rewarded with a present worth two thousand Ases. The Alabandians were appointed to carry back with them into Macedony their shields aforesaid, and to deliver them unto A. Hostilius the Consul. Over and besides, the Carthaginian Embassadors out of Africa, made relation that they had brought from thence ten hundred thousand Modii of wheat, and five hundred thousand of barley, which they had on shipboard at the sea-side, ready to carry the same wherever the Senat would appoint. This benevolence of theirs they accompanied with good words, saying, they knew well that this gift and recognisance of their duty, was inferior either to their own good will, or the demerits of the people of Rome. Howbeit many times heretofore they had shewed themselves to do the part of thankful, faithful, and trusty allies, in all things tending to the profit and good of both States. In like sort the Embassadors of Masaniissa promised the same proportion of corn, with 1200 horse, and twelve Elephants, assuring them in his name, to do whatsoever the Senate would impose and should be thought needful; and that with as free an heart as the benevolence offered of his own accord. Thanks being given both to the Carthaginians and also to the King, requested they were to transport over into Macedony to the Consul A. Hostilius, those things which they had promised. To the Embassadors were sent by way of presents, two thousand Ases apiece. The Cretensian Embassadors, related how they had sent into Macedony such a number of Archers, as the Consul P. Licinius had imposed upon them; and when they denied not upon the question asked, that there served more Archers of theirs under Perseus than with the Romans, this answer was made unto them: That if the Cretensians would well and truly and in good earnest prefer the friendship of the people of Rome before that of King Perseus, the Senat of Rome likewise would give them as certain and assured allies: in the mean while, they should men to understand,

stand, that it was the will and pleasure of the Senat, that the Cretensians should with all speed possible call home all those souldiers whom they had in any garrison of King Perseus. The Caudious being diffimiled with this dispatch, then the Chalcidians were called in; and at the very first sight of them, it loon appeared upon what terms of necessity they were driven to send an embassage: when Mecion the chieftain among them, by occasion that he was lame with the gout in his feet, was brought into the Senat in a litter. In which extremity diseased as he was, there was no pleading of any excuse by his infirmity, nor craving pardon, since he was to go without, when he had almost. He began by way of preface and preamble, saying, He had nothing left alive but his tongue, for to deplore and bewail the calamities of his country: then he went forward, and first shewed what courtesies and good turns the State wherein he lived had performed to the Captains General and armies of the Romans, both of old, and also of late in the war against Perseus. After this, he declared what parts of pride, covetousness, and cruelty, first C. Lucretius a Roman Pretor had exercised upon his country-men, and afterwards what L. Hortensius practised, at that time above all others: also how the Chalcidians were resolved to endure all calamities, were they more grievous than those which they presently suffered, rather than they would yield to Perseus. And as for Lucretius and Hortensius, they knew full well, that it had been better and more for their safety to have shut their gates against them, than to receive them into their City. For such as had excluded them forth, as namely, they of Emathia, Amphipolis, Maronea, and Enus, remain still entire and in good estate; but with us (say they) the Temples have been robbed of all their beautiful ornaments, and utterly spoiled by these railedgeders, C. Lucretius hath carried all away by water over to Asinium, and hath led away into bondage and captivity the persons free born, so as the goods and fortunes of the allies of the people of Rome, both have been and daily are pillaged and rifled. For according to the use and fashion brought up by C. Lucretius, Hortensius likewise househ his mariners as well in summer as winters, and our houses are full of a rabble of these sailors and sea-men, in such sort as our wives and children be forced to converse among such grooms as make no account at all what either they say or do. He upon thought good it was, to send for Lucretius into the Senat, that he might see his accuser, answer face to face, and purge himself of these challenges. But when he was come in place, he heard much more in presence, than had been spoken against him in his absence. Over and besides, there shewed themselves and joined together against him two other more stout adversaries and bitter accusers, to wit, M. Lucretius Tulus and P. Aufidius. And these two not only coured him before the Senat, but also having drawn him by force into the general assembly of the people, and charged him before them with many reproaches, took out their process also and arrested him to make his appearance and answer judicially at a day before the people. Then Q. Manius the Pretor, by order from the Senat, answered the Chalcidians in this manner: Whereas ye alledge and say, That ye have well deserved of the people of Rome both heretofore and also in this present war now in hand, the Senat knoweth all that to be true, and accepteth the same thankfully in the best part, as of right they ought. As touching your grievances and complaints for the few parts which C. Lucretius hath plaied, and which L. Hortensius still practiseth (both Pretors of Rome) the same neither have been nor are committed and done by the will and allowance of the people of Rome. For who would not judge so of it, that knoweth how they leyed war upon King Perseus and his father Philip before him, for to enfranchise Greece and set it at liberty; and not that their allies and friends should thus hardly be increased by their Magistrates and Governors sent from hence? Write therefore they would unto L. Hortensius the Pretor, to let him understand, that the Senat is not well pleased with these pranks of his which the Chalcidians complain of. Also if any free-born persons were become thrall and bound, that with all convenient speed he should take order to seek them up and restore them again to their former freedom. Last of all, that they deemed it meet and reason, that no sailor or mariner, but only the masters of ships should be lodged and entertained in your houses. And these were the contents of the letters written unto Hortensius, by commandment from the Senat. Unto the Embassadors were gifts sent, to every one as much as came to 2000 Ases. As for Mecion, he was allowed his Farainge in chariots at the charges of the City, and order given that he should with all ease ride in them to Brundisium. As for C. Lucretius, when the day of appearance was come, the Tribuns commended an action against him before the people, to be fined at a million of Ases. And in a general assembly and Session holden for this purpose, cast he was and condemned by the suffrages of all the tribes, evenly thirty five and no fewer.

In Ligeria no memorable exploit was that year performed: for neither the enemies entred into arms, nor the Consul led his legions into their country; and when he was assured of peace for that year, he discharged the souldiers of two Roman legions, within 60 daies after his first coming into the Province. As for the army of the Latine allies, he brought it early into the Cities of Luna and Pisi: there to winter: and then himself with the cavalry visited most of the Cities in the Province of Gaul.

In no place was there any war but in Macedony: howbeit they had in suspicion Genius and the King of the Illyrians. Therefore the Senat ordained to send from Brundisium eight ships ready rigged and fully furnished, unto the Lieutenant C. Furius at Issa, who was Governor of the land with the guard and strength of two Iffean Vessels: in which were put aboard and shipped 2000 souldiers, which Q. Manius the Pretor by a warrant directed out of the Senat, enrolled in the City of Italy which lieth opposite to Illyriens. In like manner the Consul Hostilius sent Appius Claudius unto Ilyricum with four thousand footmen, for to defend the people in those parts: who not content with those forces of his own which he had brought with him thither, demanded here and there aids and succours of the allies, until he had put in arms eight thousand men of divers and sundry nations. And after he had made his progress through all that region he set him down and reſted at Lichnidum a City of the Dassaretians. Not far from thence there stood a frontier Town called Hypane, and for the most part ranged under the obedience of Perseus. There were within it one thousand citizens, and a small garrison of Cresians for their better safeguard and defence. From thence there came to Claudius secret conspirators, advertising him, that if he would approach nearer with his army, there would be some ready at hand to betray the Town into his hands: and worth the adventure it was: (say they) and would quit for all the pains: for able it was with pillage to enrich not himself and his friends only, but also all his followers. The hope of this cheat, fitting so well his covetous humour, so blinded his spirit and understanding, that he had not the sense to keep with him any one of those conspirators that came unto him, nor the wisdom to demand hostages for assurance of his enterprise which was to be accomplished by stealth and fraud, nor yet the foresight to send out scouts and spies, or so much reason and mother-wit as to require their oath and bond of faithful promise. Only at the day appointed he departed from Lichnidum, and within twelve miles of that City toward which he went, he was encamped. Then by night at the relief of the fourth watch, he removed and set forward, leaving behind him a regiment of a thousand, for the guard of the camp. At length, to the City they came, disordered in a long train, marching nothing close, but far asunder loosely, one from another and scattered, by reason that in the night season they went many of them out of the way. This negligence of theirs was the more, when they saw no man appearing upon the walls: but so soon as they were approached within a darts cast, the inhabitants issued forth at once out of 2 gates, and together with the shout of them that sallied forth, a mighty noise and outcry besides arose from the walls, women howling, yelling, and ringing brazen basins and bells on every hand: besides, the confused multitude of the base people and bond-slaves together, set up most hideous and dissonant cries. These manifold terrors presented from all parts, were the causes that the Romans could not abide and stand out the first tempest and violent storm, as it were, of their folly and charge. Down they went therefore and were slain more in flight than fight, and scarce 2000 men with the lieutenant himself, escaped and recovered the camp: for the longer way they had thither, the more means and opportunity had the enemies to chase and overtake a great number of them, weary upon the way. Appius stayed not so long in the camp, until he had sallied thence, that were distressed in the rout, (which had been the only way to have saved those that were trapped in the field) but immediately retired with the broken reliques of his army after this overthrow, to Lichnidum. This infelicity and such other like misfortunes hapning in Macedony, were made known at Rome, by occasion of Sex. Dignus a Colonel: who was returned home for to celebrate a solemn sacrifice. In regard whereof the LL. of the Senat fearing to receive some greater ignominy and dishonour, addressed Embassadors into Macedony, M. Fulvius Flaccus and M. Caelinius Rebolus to make a true report upon their knowledge how the world went there, Also that A. Hostilius the Consul should publish the assembly general for the election of Consuls, so as it might be holden in the month of January, and then repair himself with all convenient speed to the City. In the mean time, M. Retius the Pretor had in charge, by virtue of an edict, to call home into the City all Senators from every quarter of Italy, unless such as were absent about the affairs of the state: also to give straight warning to them who now were at Rome, not to absent themselves farther than five miles from the City. These things were done according to the advice of the Senat. So the grand assembly for the election of the Consuls, was holden the 28 day of August, wherein were created Consuls, Q. Martius Philippus the second time, and Q. Servilius Capius. Three dates after the Pretors also were chosen, namely, Caius Decimius, M. Claudius Marcellus, M. Sulpicius Gallus, Martius Figulus Son, Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Fonteius Capito. Unto these Pretors elect, besides the two charges within the City of civil jurisdiction, these four provinces and governments were assigned, to wit, Spain, Sardinia, Sicily, and the admiralty of the navy.

Appius

* Ad quatum calendar Septembris. I doubt, this for [Septembris] it should be [Februarius] and then is the 28 of January: which considering the precedent month and the subsequent circumstances, suiteth better to the story.

To the God of Bounds, Terminus. Solemnized it was toward the end of February, the last month of the year, as appeareth by Ovid. Fasti. Qui sequitur annum veteris fuit ultimus mens: Tu quoque (scilicet) Terminus, Terminus, Terminus.

At the very end of February, the Embassadors aforesaid returned out of Macedony: who recounted the acts achieved fortunately by Perseus the summer past, and in how great fear the allies of the people of Rome stood, after so many Cities reduced under the obedience of the King. Moreover, that the Consul his army was distressed of men, by reason that so many of them made friends to be discharged, and so for favour had their pass-ports and were dismissed: the fault here in, the Consul laid upon the military Tribunes or Colonels, and they again upon him. The LL. of the Senat perceived well that they made but light of the shameful loss received by the inconsiderate rashness of Claudius, in saying, That there were but very few soldiers lost of the Italian nation, and those for the most part taken up in haste and enrolled on a sudden. The Consuls elect so soon as they entered into their magistracy, were commanded to propound unto the Senat concerning the Province of Macedony, and to them were assigned the governments of Italy and Macedony. This year was leap-year, and the third day after the feast of Terminus, was the day isolated between, which hapned upon the calendar [of March.] Within the compass of that year certain Priests to wit, L. Flaminius, and two Pontiffs or Bishops, L. Furius Philus and O. Livius Salinator, departed this life. The college of these Pontiffs, elected T. Manlius Torquatus in stead of Furius, and Marcus Servilius in the room of Livius.

In the beginning of the year next following, after that the new Coss, Q. Martius and Q. Servilius, had moved in the Senat as touching their provinces, advised it was, That with all speed possible they should either agree between themselves, or else cast lots for the governments in Italy and in Macedony. And before that the lots determined this matter so doubtful and uncertain, to the end that nothing afterwards should be done for favour partially, thought good it was, to ordain before hand a competent and sufficient number of souldiers for the supplement of the armies in both Provinces: namely, for Macedony 6000 footmen of Romans, and as many of Latine allies: 250 horsemen Romans, and 300 allies: also to cast the old souldiers, so as in every Roman legion there should not be above 6000 foot and 300 horse. As for the other Consul, he was not gaged with any certain flint of Roman citizens, to be levied for the full accomplishment of his legions. Only this was determinately set down, That he should enrol two legions, and either of them to contain 3200 foot and 200 horse: but for footmen of Latins, he had a greater number allowed than his colleague: namely, 3000 foot and 600 horse. Moreover, commandment was given to enrol four legions more, to be led forth into the field, upon what need and occasion soever should fall out. The Marshal-Colonels of the army the Consuls might not be permitted to elect, but created they were by the people. The allies of the Latine nation were enjoined to set out seven thousand foot and a thousand horse. And this power was only to be in readines at an hours warning, for to be led forth as occasion should be offered. Their principal care was about Macedony. Ordained also it was, That for the service at Sea, there should be enrolled to serve the navy, of the Roman citizens (such as were libertins and newly enfranchised) out of all parts of Italy one thousand, and as many out of Sicily: And unto whether of the Consuls the Province of Macedony fell, he should give order for their transporting thither, to the armada wherefoever it was. For Spain there were three thousand Roman footmen and three hundred horsemen appointed to make up the deciated bands. There also, a certain number was set down for every legion, to wit, five thousand foot and three hundred and thirty horse. Moreover, that Consul whose lot was to govern in Spain, had commision to levy of the allies four thousand footmen, and three hundred horse.

I am not ignorant, that from the same prophane negligence and irreligion, whereby commonly men now adays are of belief, that the Gods portend and fore-signify nothing to come by signs and tokens: it proceeded also, That no prodigies which happen, should any more, either be published and reported abroad, or recorded in the annals and chronicles. Howbeit, for mine own part, in writing of these acts and monuments of ancient times, I know not how, but the thinks I say a mind, that is become (as it were) antique also: yea, and some scrupulous devotion ariseth in my spirit, which moveth me to account the things not unworthy to have place in my histories; which those false fathers and most prudent personages in old time thought meet to be considered of the State, yea, and to require publick expiation. Well, to proceed, from Anagnum were two fearful fights reported that year, namely, That burning and blazing flame was seen in the skies; and a cow known to speak, kept and nourished at the publick charges. At Minerva also much about those daies, the welkin seemed to be on a light fire. At Rome there fell a shower that rained stones. In the fottress at Cumes the image of Apollo wept three daies and three nights continually. In the City of Rome, two sextons or keepers of the Temples made report, the one, That in the Church of Fornus there was a Serpent crept by many men, crested with a mane: the other, That about the chapel of Fortuna Primigenia, which standeth upon the Capitol hill, there hapned two divers and different prodigious signs, namely, That in the Chapel-yard there sprung up a palm-tree: and all one day it rained blood. Two other strange things there were, whereof there was no regard nor account made: the first, because it chanced in a privat place; for T. Martius Figulus reported, That there grew up a palm or date-tree in his court-yard: the second, because it hapned in a forrain place for spoken it was, That at Fregelle in the house of M. Atrius, a lance or spear which he had bought for his son a souldier, burned in the day time for two hours space and more, yet so, as the fire consumed nothing thereof. In regard of those publick prodigies, the Decemvirs had recourse to the books of Sibylla: who out of them declared, That the Consuls should sacrifice forty head of greater beasts, and they shewed also to what Gods. They added moreover and gave advice to hold a publick procession, and that all the Magistrats at every shrine and upon every altar of the Gods should sacrifice greater beasts, and the people wear garlands and chaplets of flowers: All things were executed accordingly, as the Decemvirs suggested and directed.

After this, the assembly was published for the chusing of Cenors. In election there were lot this dignity of Cenorship, the very principal persons and of best note in all the City, C. Valerius Lentulus, L. Posthumius Albinus, P. Mutius Scaevola, C. Junius Bruns, C. Claudius Pulcher, and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. These two last rehearsed the people of Rome choise for Cenors, When as by occasion of the Macedonian war, a greater care was had about the taking of matters, than at other times before, the Consuls found much fault with the common people, and complained unto the Senat, that the young and able men for service being called, would not answer to their names. But C. Sulpicius and M. Claudius two Tribuns of the Commons, maintained the cause against them in the behalf of the Commons, saying, That it was no hard and difficult matter for Consuls to levy souldiers: many for corrupt, affectionate and popular Consuls, it was not so easy a thing, and namely, such as would be sure to enrol no souldiers against their wills. And to the end that the LL. of the Senate might know this to be a truth, they should see the Pretors (if the Senate were

* Cum principis gentis fuerit, when the was first born, Pat. Marthianus.

* The civil Pretors within the City were allowed but two Lictors, and the provincial abroad in foreign parts not above six apiece, whereupon Polybius calleth a Pretor Centurio, whereas each Consul had every where twelve.

(to content, and thought well thereof) whose power of command and authority of government was less than the Consuls, to go through with the matters without respect to them. So that charge was committed to the Pretors with the great ill will of the Senators, but need without blame backbiting and detraction of the Consuls. And the Consuls forsook what they would publish in the senate made at known, and protested in the full assembly of the people, that they would publish in the senate touching the review and estimate of every mans estate and honesty, that besides the ordinary oath of all citizens, they should swear to these points in this form following: Art thou thirty six and forty years of age? then by vertue of the edict made by the Consuls C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius, come forth and shew thyselfe the musters so often as there shall be any levy taken: and what Consuls soever shall happen to be in place, thou shalt appear and be enrolled; in case thou wert not a prett soldier before. Moreover, because the voice went, that many soldiers in the Macedonian legions were absent from the army, and had obtained large passages without limitation of return, and that through the corruption and favour of the Generals; they published an edict as touching the soldiers enrolled for Macedonia, when P. Aemilius and C. Popilius were Consuls, or any time after. That as many of them as remained within Italy, after they were enrolled and registered first under their hands, should within thirty daies repair again to their colonies in the province: and whosoever of them were at the disposition of father or grandfire, their names should be presented and declared before them. Semblably, they would take knowledge of their causes who were clean dismissed and cast: and look whomsoever they judged to have obtained their discharge by any special grace and favour, before they had served out their full time by law required, they would command them to be enrolled soldiers again. By vertue of this edict of the Consuls as also by their letters sent out and divulged abroad in all incorporate Towns and places of resort for market and merchandise, there assembled together and came to Rome such a multitude of luty, yong, and able men; that their unusual and extraordinary number was chargeable and cumbersome to the City. Thus besides the former levy taken of those that were to be levied and employed in supply of the old armies, four legions more were enrolled by C. Sulpicius the Pretor, and within eleven daies the musters were accomplished and ended.

Then the Consuls cast lots for their provinces. For the Pretors had their governments allotted unto them before, and the sooner, by reason of the civil causes which required their jurisdictions. The one over the citizens was said to C. Sulpicius, the other over forrainers to C. Decimius. M. Claudius Marcellus obtained the regiment of Spain; Serg. Cornelius Lentulus of Sicily; P. Fontius of Capua ruled Sardinia; C. Martius Equitulus had the conduct of the Navy. And then, Tiberius, to Q. Servilius one of the Consuls fell the government of Italy, and to Q. Martius the other of Macedonia. This Martius so soon as the Latine laws were solemnized, departed toward his province immediately. After this, upon the motion of Capit to the Senat to know their pleasure, which two legions of the new he should conduct into Gaul? the LL. ordained, That the Pretors C. Sulpicius and M. Claudius should give unto the Consul, which it pleased them of those legions that they had enrolled. This he took to the heart, that he a Consul was thus subjected to the will of the Pretors; yet after the Senat was risen, he stood waiting at the Tribunal of the Pretors, and required them according to the order set down by the Senat to assign him his two legions. But the Pretors submitted the choice thereof to the Col. himself. This done, the Consuls took a review of the Senat and chose new Senators; said M. Emilius Lepidus was elected president of the Senat; and these were the third Senators that made choice of him consequently one after another. Seven were displaced and deposed from their Senators dignity. Now in taking the number of the peoples, and in assigning them, they compelled to return into Macedonia those who were departed from the army there: and by means of this assignment, they soon knew who were absent from their companies: they examined them for what causes they were discharged from soldiery; and who of licence they judged not to be grounded of good and sufficient reason those they forced to take the military oath again in this manner and form: According to the edict of C. Claudius and Tib. Sempronius the Consuls, thou shalt well and truly swear, to return willingly and with all thine heart, into the province of Macedonia; and this shalt thou do thy power without fraud or covin. In making the review of them that served on horseback, their censures was executed with great rigour and extremity. They took from many their horses of service: upon which occasion having given offence to the whole estate of Knights and Gentlemen of Rome, they blew the coals and kindled the fire of ill-will and heart-burning against themselves: by a certain edict of theirs besides, whereby they intimated, That none of them who in time that Q. Fulvius and An. Postumius the Consuls had taken to farm the revenues, fruits and profits of the City; or undertaken at a price the publick works and provisions, should be so hardy as to present themselves to their speerest up, either to be farmers or undertakers, no, nor to be partners, or have any thing to do with those that were in such negotiation, commerce and bargain. The old Publicans and farmers had oftentimes complained hereof to the Senat: but when they could obtain no comfort from them; to moderate and abridge this infinite power of the Consuls, at length they met with a Tribune of the Commons, one Rutilius, to stand with them and defend their cause; a man who upon a particular and private quarrel of his own was offended and bare a grudge against the Consuls. And this was the occasion: They had commanded one of his late vassals and enfranchised retainers, to pull down a wall standing in the street Sacra over against a publick edifice; pretending that the said wall was built upon the City ground. The man a private person, called unto the

A the Tribuns for their lawful help and favour: but when as none of them all but only this Rutilius would meddle in the matter and interpose their helping hand, the Consuls sent to strain and take gages for to bind him to answer the cause, and before the body of the people intended an action against him, and let a grievous fine upon the head of that party aforesaid. By means I say of this debate begun upon such an occasion, when as the old publicans betook themselves for succour to this Tribune, presently there was a bill preferred and subscribed with the name of the said Tribune alone, in this form, That what publick revenues and profits of the State, C. Claudius and T. Sempronius had to farm let for a rent, or what publick works and provisions they had put out to be made and purchased at a price, the same leases and bargains should not stand for good but be cancelled, and new demises drawn and made. Also that it might be lawful for all men indifferently either to be farmers or undertakers of the premises. And the said Tribune assigned a day for a general assembly and session, to have this bill to be cast by the voices of the people. When the day was come, the Consuls advanced and put themselves forward to disswade and plead against the bill. So long as Gracchus spake, he was heard with patience and silence. But at Claudius, when he opened his mouth, they hissed and kept amuttering, so as he was forced by an aies made by the crier to procure audience: which being made, the Tribune found himself grieved and complained, that the people there assembled were withdrawn and called away from him, to the prejudice of his authority and honour, and with that flag out of the Capitol where this assembly was holden. The next day he kept a great coil and made a toulhir: first, he interdicted the goods of him, C. Claudius as condemned and accused, for that in letting a fine, and streining gages of him, who had appealed to a Tribune, and in not obeying and condescending to his opposition, he seemed to set light by his Tribunes authority, and prejudice his reputation. As for C. Claudius, he arrested him to answer at a day, for that he had withdrawn the assembly from him: may be protested that he would indite both the Consuls of treason or felony in the highest degree, and required of Sulpicius Pretor for the citizens, a day of assizes for their judicial trial. The Consuls refused not to have this matter put to an issue with all speed, and to be tried by the doom of the people. So the time for the hearing and determining of this heinous crime of majesty or treason aforesaid, was assigned the * daies immediately before the eight and seventh calends of October. Upon this, the Consuls incontinently ascended up into the Porch of Liberty: where after they had made sure and sealed the publick Registers and Records, shut up and locked all the offices upon the Chancery, and discharged for the time the publick Clerks and proto-Notaries attending upon that Court, they protested that they would norgo in hand with any publick affairs of state, before the sentence and judgment of the people were passed upon them. The day came, and Claudius first pleaded his own cause and spake for himself: and when of twelve Centuries that were of Gentlemen, eight had found the Cenfor guilty and cast him, yea, and many other centuries of the first Classis. Then presently, the principal persons of the City in the very sight of the people, changed their weed, laid away their rings, and went about from one to another in humble manner, to crave the commons to begood unto the Consuls. But that which most of all either flaid or reversed the definitive doom against him, was (by report) Tib. Gracchus himselfe the other Cenfor: for that when the commons cried from all parts, that there was Gracchus growing toward Gracchus, he was by expels words. That if his colleague were condemned, he would (without attending the judgment of the people as touching himselfe) accompany him into banishment. Howbeit the defendant and accused person, was driven to this neet point and hard exigent of extremity, that he came within eight centuries of being cast and condemned. Thus when Claudius was acquit, the Tribune said he would not trouble and molest Gracchus.

This year at the earnest suit of the Aquileian Embassadors unto the Senat, for to have the number of their colonies increased: a thousand and five hundred families (by vertue of a decree granted to the Senate) were enrolled: and for the conducting of them to Aquileia, were sent as Triumvirs or commissioners these three, to wit, T. Annius Lælius, P. Decius Subulo, and M. Corn. Cethegus. The same year C. Popilius and Cn. Octavius Embassadors, who had been sent into Galatia Cethegus, having first read and published at Thebes the areit and ordinance of the Senat, carried it thence throughout all the Cities of Peloponnesus, to this effect, That no person should contribute toward the wars, and put into the hands of the Roman Magistrats, more than that which the Senat had set down. This put them in good hope and assurance for the future time that they should be eased of those charges and expences; by which they were impoverished and wasted; whiles every one imposed upon them some taxation or other, and never gave them repose. In the Achæan general council holden at Argos, they had audience given them and were heard in grace: from whence leaving this most loyal and faithful nation in singular good hope of happy success for the time to come, they passed into Ætolia. There was as yet no sedition broken out there: but all were in jealousy and suspicion one of another, and full of natural accusations: in regard of which jars and troubles, the Embassadors only demanded hostages, and without regard of what jars and troubles, the Achæanians granted unto these Embassadors a Diet to be holden at Tyrrhenum of the States: some debated that there should be garriisons of divers factions. Some principal men of the where required that there should be garriisons received into their Cities, to bridle the willfull folly of those that inclined to the Macedonian nation: others gainst this counsell, and besought the contrary, for fear lest that peaceable and

The same time Perseus knowing that the enemy approached, but yet ignorant which way he meant to come, determined to beset all passages with strong guards. Whereupon he sent ten thousand yong and lusty men lightly armed, to the pitch of the Cambanian hills (which the inhabitants themselves call Volsuani) under the conduct of captain Ajlepiodorus. But he commanded Hippias with a power of twelve thousand Macedonians to seize the streights of a certain fortress upon the marsh Astura, and is called Lapathia. Him self in person accompanied with the rest of the forces, lodged him self near to Diurn: but afterwards seeming as if he were unprovided of counsel and void of sense and understanding, he with his light horsemen made roads and courses along the strand, one while toward Heraclea, and other whiles to Phila; and so backward again the same way to Diurn. In this mean time the Consul resolved fully to lead his army by that path where we said before that the army of King Philip encamped sometimes near a place called Orolophus. Howbeit he thought good to send out before four thousand armed men, for to prevent the enemies and be possessed first of the most commodious places of advantage: this regiment was commanded by M. Claudius and Q. Marcius, the Consul's son; and inconsequently all the forces in general followed after. But the way was so steep and difficult, rough, uneven and rugged, that in two dayes space, they which were sent before, albeit they were not charged with the carriage of any thing, had much ado to march fifteen miles: where they lodged, and the place which they made choice of was called the Tower Eudoria. From whence the morrow after they journeyed seven miles forward and seized a hill not far from the enemies camp: where they dispatched a courier back to the Consul, to give intelligence, that they were come near to the enemy, and led in a place of safety, commodious also for all purposes; and withall to advise him to make all possible speed after, for to overtake them and join together. This messenger encountered the Consul at the Meas Astoria, where he was greatly perplexed as well for the difficulty of the way which he was to enter himself, as also in regard of the danger of them whom in a few number he had sent before, even through the midst of the enemies corps de guard. Whereupon he took a better heart to himself; and having united all his forces, encamped upon the foreland hill which his men already held, on that side which (considering the nature of the ground) was most commodious. And there they might discover within the view of eye, not only the enemies camp distant from thence a little above a mile, but also the whole country as far as to Diurn and Phila, yea, and all the coast by reason that the high pitch and top of the mountain yielded a prospect far and neer round about. And this was it that let on fire the soldiers hearts, when they beheld the whole weight of the war, the Kings forces altogether, and the enemies country so neer unto them. In which spirit of cheerfulness, when they were earnest with the Consul, and exhorted him to advance directly against the enemies camp, they had but one day granted them to rest after their wearisome journey. So upon the third day the Consul leaving part of his forces to guard the camp, led the rest against the enemy. Now had Hippias been lately sent from the King to keep and guard the passage, who since the time that first he espied the Roman camp upon the hill, had prepared the minds of his men to a battle, and so encountered the army of the Consul and met it half way. The Romans advanced forth to fight, nimble appointed; and the enemies likewise were highly armed, and by reason thereof most fit and provided for to give the charge and begin skirmish. So soon as they sighted and encountered one another, presently they fell to lancing one of their darts on both sides. Many a wound was given and received of the one part as well as the other by their rash charging at random, and few of both sides were slain. Thus were their strokes whetted and edged against the morrow; and then had they skirmishes, and maintained fight with greater forces, and more deadly feud, if the ground would have served them to have displayed their battalions at large: but the top of the mountain was freight and aloft a sharp creck in form of a coin or wedge; and hardly afforded room enough for three ranks of armed men affront; and therefore when some few were in fight, all the rest and specially they that were heavily armed, stood as lookers on. As for the light armour of one part, they would run forth at the broken crags of the hill, and ever from the sides join battle with the like of the other part; yea, and find means to charge their enemies, were the place even or uneven, it skilled not whether. But after that more than that day, no were wounded then killed, the night at length parted the fray. The third day, the Roman General was to seek and wist not what to do; for neither could he stay any longer upon that hill, for want of all things; and retire back from thence it was not possible, without dishonour and danger both. Moreover, if he had retired, the enemy might press upon him from the upper ground with advantage. There remained therefore no other means to be taken that which was the audaciously enterprised, with as resolute & hardy persistence in execution; a thing that other whiles proveth well in the end, as if it proceeded from wit and deliberat counsel. And verily to this hard passage and difficult terms they were come, that if the Consul had been to deal with an enemy like to any of the Macedonian Kings in old time, he might soon have received a great foil and overthrow. But K. Perseus as he cooled and ranged with his cavalry upon the strand near Diurn (albeit for the space of 12 miles well-neer, he heard the cries and shouts of them that were in fight;) neither reinforced the companies by sending fresh soldiers in aid of the wearied, nor showing himself in person at the battle; (which had been a thing of assuredness of most importance) whereas the Roman General being above 60 years of age, corpulent besides, sunweld, performed himself right lustily all military services of a valiant warrior, persisting in that to the very end most bravely, which he had begun a and enterprised so boldly, and having left Popilius for to guard the hill top, passed over places that had no tracks at all to direct them, by sending out before, certain men of purpose to scour and prepare to make a pass ge. As for Aratius and M. Agrippa, he commanded them both, with the auxiliary soldiers of their own nation to guard them that opened the way before. Then he putting before him in the march the horsemen with baggage, came behind with the legionary footmen in the rear guard. No tongue is able to expresse what a toil and painful labour they found in going down the hill, the lamper horses with their backs & carriages tumbled to down one with another in so much as when they had scarcely gone four miles forward, they wined in their hearts nothing more, then to return the way they came, if it had been possible. The elephants troubled the march as much in manner as the enemies could: for when they were come to a place where they could see no way, down they cast their riders and governors, laying them along on the earth, and with the horrible braying that they made, affrighted their horses especially, until such time as a device was found for their passage. They began first to make the head or entrance of the bridge at the very bow and edge of a steep downslope: this done, in the lower ground beneath, they tell in the right good strong and long polls of wood, two by two distant one from the other, while little more than the largeness of one of their beasts. Upon which rested fast joined [with ten oxen or mules] certain rafters like wall-plats 30 foot in length, and those being couched with planks, crossed over in form of a bridge, had earth and mould cast thereupon. A little way off beneath it, such another bridge was made; and so a third likewise, and many more consequently according as the craggy ground was broken and uneven. Now the elephant from the firm ground entered upon the first bridge afore said; but before he was gone as far as to the foot and end thereof, the polls above named were cut in two underneath; to the end that the bridge might fall, and in the earth feeling thereof the beast also gently slide, as it were, and he carried therewith as far as the head of the second bridge. Thus some of them slid and kept themselves standing upright on their feet, others fell upon their buttocks. Again, when they were come to the plain and level floor of another like hill bridge, by the fall of it in manner afore said they were driven unto a third bridge beneath it, until such time as they were come to a more plain and even valley. In this order the Romans could rid little more than seven miles that day. And the least part thereof went upright on their feet but were fain most what to tumble and roll over, and over with the armor and targets about them, and thus they got forward in all kind of pain and trouble, in such sort that he who induced them to this journey & conducted them therein, could not deny but the whole army (with a final power coming against them) might utterly have been defeated. By night they arrived at a pretty plain; but the place being enclosed on all sides, they had no space and room to view round about, whether it were dangerous or no. At length after much ado and beyond their expectation, they met with a firm piece of ground, whereas they might take free footing; and there they were forced the morrow following to attend in the hollow valley the coming of Popilius and the companies left with him: who also were exceedingly sore vexed and plagued with the roughness of the way, albeit the enemies troubled and affrighted them no whit at all. The third day after they had joined their forces together, they took their way through a pass, which the inhabitants call Calapace. The fourth day they passed over a place that had no more means to direct them, then the other before; but by use and experience there were grown more skillful: and better hope they had, for that the enemy in no place appeared, but approached neer to the sea. When they were come once down into the plains between Heraclea and Lebebrus, the footmen (whereof the greater part kept the hills) pitched their tents and took up the valley, and a good part of the plain wherein the horsemen should quarter. As the King was doing himself, it is said that word came, how the enemies were neer at hand: at which news he was so leared, that he leapt out of his lodging vessel, and in half got him out of the barge, crying aloud, that he was vanquished without drawing sword and stroke given: neither will he for fear which way to turn him, taking fancion of one of another, and commanding he knew not what, (sometime this and sometime that) in this perplexity he sent for Ajlepiodorus (one of his two elippical friends) out of the place where he lay in garrison, to go to Pella where all his money and treasure lay; and by this means opened all the avenues for the Romans to make war. Him self, after he had had in the great hall bestowed and piled up in his ships, all the gilded images at Diurn, to the end that the enemy should make no prize of them, caused with all speed possible to trundle up and to remove to Phila; & hereby gave occasion, that the enterprize of the Consul which might have seemed rash-ness (in that he had engaged himself so far, that he could not possibly to retire again without leave of the enemy) proved in the end, no inconsiderate and unadvised designment. For now the Romans had the choice of two passages through which they might escape away, the one, by Tempe into Thessaly, the other into Macedonia, by the way neer Diurn both which before were held by the Kings guards. So as if a resolute and fearless captain could have held out and endured but one ten dayes the first appearance and shew of terror that approached, the Romans could never have returned into Thessaly by Tempe, nor found way for convenience of provision & victuals to the place where they were. For Tempe is of itself a difficult passage, even without any force of arms to make it dangerous. And why besides the straight gullet five miles in length, yielding a very narrow way, the beasts to go charged with burden; the rocks of either hand, are so steep and upright, that no one beast is able to look down from them, but his eyes will dazzle, his brain turn, and his head be dizzy withall. Moreover, the sound and noise, yea, and the depth of the river Peneus running directly through the midst of the valley, encreased the fear so much the more. This place is perilous of its own nature, had been holden and guarded with the Kings' garrisons in four several & distant places. The one kept at the very first entrance, near to Comus; the second at Candyl, a fort impregnable; the third about Lapathus, which also they call Charax; and the fourth was placed even upon the very avenue it self about the midst of the valley, where it is at the freighth, and which may easily be defended with ten men, if there were no more. In this manner (1st) the passage being stopped up by Tempe, as well for portage of provisions thither as for return from thence, the Romans must perforce have retired again up to the same mountains from whence they were defended. But as they come down and were not discovered, to be now desired, they could not possibly have gained them again in open view, considering that the enemies had possessed the tops of the mountains; and no doubt the difficulty thereof besides, which they had tried already, would have cut off all hope of that adventure: so as, being waded thus far into this rash enterprise, there remaineth no means else for them, but to have passed through the midst of the enemies, at Diium, for to escape and passe into Macedony: an adventure no doubt, (if the gods had not bereft the King of his right wits) most difficult and dangerous unto them. For it being so, that from the foot of the mountain Olympus unto the sea, there is little above a mile space between: the one half whereof, is taken up with the mouth of the river Baphrys, which in this place, spreadeth very broad and large; and another part of the plain, either the temple of Jupiter or the town it self occupieth: the rest besides, being but a very small place; might have been enclosed and made fast against them with a little trench and rampier: besides which there was of stone ready at hand, and of timber out of the forest, that they might either have raised a wall, or framed turrets and such like fabricks in their way. But the King (whose spirit and understanding was blinded with sudden fear) foreseeing none of all these things, but, dismurmuring every sort of their garrisons, made open passage for the current of war, and fled himself to Pydna. The Consul perceiving that he had gotten great advantage and many hopes by the folly and negligence of his enemy, dispatched a courier back toward Larissa unto Sp. Lucretius; willing him to seize those forts into his hands about Tempe, which were abandoned by the enemy: and after he had sent Popilius before in person to discover all the passages about Diium, and perceived that the avenues were open in all parts, he marched forward himself, and the second journey came to Diium; where commanded to encamp under the very temple, to the end, that no violent outrage should be committed in that holy place. Himself in proper person entered into the City, which it was not great, so it was garnished with fair publick buildings, beautified with a number of goodly images, and paising well fortified besides: in so much as he could not well believe, the things of such importance were abandoned for nothing, but that there was some secret deceit and treachery lurking underneath. After he had staid there one full day, to espie and see that all coasts were clear, he dislodged and marched on: & supposing verily that he should be provided of sufficient store of grain, he advanced forward that very day to the river named Agrus. The morning after, he took possession of the City Agass, which the inhabitants willingly rendered unto him. And to win the hearts of all other Macedonians, (contenting himself only with hostages) he promised to leave their City clear without a garrison, and to permit them to live under their own laws without payment of any tribute. Being marched onward one daies journey from thence, he pitched down his tents fast upon the river Agrus: but feeling and finding still (the farther he went from Thessaly, more and more want of all things, he retired back to Diium; and then all men plainly & made no doubt, to what streights he should be driven in, case he had been clear sent out from Thessaly, considering that it was not late for him to remove far from thence, where he was Perseus having rallied all his forces, and assembled his captains into one place, checked and rattled up the captains of the garrisons and guards aforesaid over the passages: but above all he rebuked Aclepiodorus & Hippias most, saying, that those two had betrayed unto the Romans the portage to Macedony: whereas indeed no man was more justly to be blamed, for that than his own self.

The Consul after he had discovered a far off from sea a fleet of Roman ships, conceived good hope that vessels were coming charged with provision of victuals (for now in his camp the want was great, and brought they were already to extrem want and scarcity.) But he was advertised by them who were entered within the harbor, that the hulks and ships of burden were left behind at Magnesia. Whereupon, being in great doubt what to do (so hard went all things, with him for the present, that he had work enough to wrestle with that only difficulty, without being farther encumbered with any impediment from the enemy) behold, in happy time, letters were brought unto him from Sp. Lucretius, importing thus much, That he was master of all the forts and holdes planted upon Tempe and round about Phila, where he had found great plenty of corn and other necessities. The Consul right joyous for these good tidings, let his army on foot from Diium to Phila, as well to strengthen the garrison there, as also to deal corn among his soldiers; which would have required a long time ere it could have been brought over to them at Diium.

That departure & journey of his was nothing well spoken of: for some gave out that the General retired from the enemy for very fear; because that if he had staid there still, he should have been forced to a battell: others said, that he had no skill in war, neither in those occurrences, which sometimes wheele turning about altered every day, offering one new thing or other, who when occasions and opportunities were presented unto him, let the same slip out of his hands, which ought after might not possibly be recovered again. And verily he had not so soon quite the possession of

of Diium, but he started and wakened the enemy, and put in his head now at length to regain those matters, which had been lost before through his own default. For hearing that the Consul was departed, he returned immediately to Diium: where he repaired what ever had been demolished and ruined by the Romans: the battlements of the walls, which were cast down he let up again in the right place; and in all parts fortified the mure and bulwarks of the City. Which done, he encamped five miles off on this side Enipeus, intending that the river it self (which is very hard to be passed over, should serve in stead of a rampier and trench of defence. This river runneth out of the vale from under the mountain Olympus, and in summer season is small and shallow, but in winter it rieth high and spreadeth broad by reason of rain: running also with a forcible current and stream, it surmounteth great rocks, and among those stony crags and shelves maketh many whirlpools: by occasion likewise, that from thence it carrieth away with it into the sea, store of earth, there are many gulfs of exceeding depth: and by reason that it hath eaten a hollow channel in the mids, the banks of each side are very high and steep upright. Perseus, supposing that by the means of this river, the enemies were debarred from all passage, purposed in his mind to hold off, and drive out the rest of the summer in that sort.

But the Consul in the mean while sent Popilius from Philainto Heraclea with 2000 armed fighting men. This Heraclea standeth about five miles from Phila, situate in the mid-way between Diium and Tempe, upon a rock that commendeth this river, Popilius, before that he caused his men to approach the walls, sent certain persons of purpose to persuade the magistrats and chief of the City, to make proof of the faithful protection and clemency of the people of Rome, rather then to trie their rigor in violence. But this motive and advice availed not, because they might discern the fires out of the kings camp near to Enipeus, whereupon both from the land and sea-side (for the fleet also being arrived anchored near the shore) as well by force of arms as by fabricks and engines of battery, they began to assail the town. Moreover, certain young and lusty Roman soldiers (making use now in war of exercise, which they had practised in the games Circenses) gat over the wall where it was lowest. The manner was in those daies (before this talk prodigality came up of filling the whole cirque or show-place with beasts set out of all countries) to devise and seek sundry sorts of publick lights & spectacles to behold; & not running one course with the chariot, and another on horseback, and so on end, to employ at both races the space of one full hour. Among others feats of activity exhibited, the masters and wardens of those exercises and games brought into the race commeth 60 (and otherwhiles more) lusty young men in arms well appointed. Their training in part represented a show and apparance of two armies encountering and encountering and charging one another, in part also the use and practise of a more gentle and elegant exercise then military profession, and coming nearer to the handling and managing of weapons after the order of sword-fencers. These young gallants, after they had performed other ordinary running courses, put themselves into a four-square squadron, with the bucklers or targets close conched and joined together over their heads, in this manner: they that were foremost in the front stood bold upright; the second rank stooped low somewhat lower under the other; the third course more then they; and so the fourth untill the hindmost kneeled upon their knees: and by this means they resembled a pavoiade rising up higher & higher, like the pent-house or roof of a dices. This done, two men well armed, fetching their run fifty foot or thereabout backward from thence, and seeming to desie and challenge one another, mounted the foremost pavoiade, ran from the nether end up to the top upon those targets so jointly united and set close, and thick together: and one while they set their countenance as though they would defend the sides and edges thereof, whereas in the mids they seemed to performed their devoir and maintain combat one with another, as upon firm and steady ground. Like for all the world to this, was there a pavoiade framed and brought close to that part of the wall: and when armed men were mounted upon it, they that stood upon the very ridge thereof, were as high full as the defendants which kept the walls who being once beaten back and turned down, two ensigns of soldiers gat over into the City. The only difference between this pavoiade and the other above described was this, that they only who stood in the front before and in the flanks, bare not their targets aloft above their own heads, because their sides and bodies should not be naked and exposed to hurt, but carried them before after the usual manner of fighting men in a battell. By which means, neither the arrows and darts discharged from the wall hurt them affront, nor the heat that light upon their targets took any hold, but glanced and slid down-ward from the top without doing any harm, like to rain water that shooteth from the ridge of an house, and runneth down the eaves. The Consul likewise, now that Heraclea was won, advanced forwards with his army thither, pretending, as though he marched toward Diium, and as after he had chased and driven the King from thence, he minded to passed forward also into Phila. But preparing now against winter, he commanded to make the waies fit and handsome, for the carriage of provision out of Thessaly, and to chuse out commodious places for garners: also to build certain houses, wherein they should brought the provision, might lie in covert and lodge commodiously. Perseus in the end having taken heart again and gathered his wits together, upon that late fright which had amazed his spirits, wished then withall his heart, that his commandments had not been obeyed, at what time as a fearful fit begave expresse charge to call the treasure into the sea at Pella, and to set on fire, the artell at Thessalonica. Antiochus being sent for to the same purpose to Thessalonica made no halt to execute his will, but rised out the time for the nonce, leaving the King some respite to repent, as it fel out indeed. Nicias was not to provident and wel advised as Pella, in throwing away some part of the money which he there found: howbeit he thought himself such, as might in some sort be remedied and amended: for that, all the said treasure in manner was recovered by the means of certain dyvers that fished for it under water, and fetched it up from the bottom of the sea. But the King himself was so affamed of this foolish fear, that in a melancholly he commanded those poor dyvers to be secretly murdered, yea, and afterwards Andronicus and Nicias also: the end that no person should remain alive that was privy to that foolish commandment of his.

Amids these affairs, C. Martins having looked to sea from Heraclea, and with his fleet sailed to Thessalonica, landed his armed souldiers in divers places of the shore, and made wall in the territory all about: and when they made sallies out of the City and charged upon him, after some tumult skirmishes, he chased them back and beat them within the wals. So as at length he terrified the town it self: but not only they who ranged up and down here and there, unsolicitedly approached the wals, were wounded with shot discharged out of instruments of all sorts, planted upon the wals; but those also who were in the ships, were hurt with stones, weighted and levelled from engines a far off. Upon which occasion he commanded his souldiers to retire a shipboard, and leaving the siege of Thessalonica, they passed from thence to Enia, a City fifteen miles off, situate in a fertile soil full over against Pydna. When they had spoiled the territory lying to that City, they coasted along the shore and arrived at Antigonis. Where, being set a land, first they spoiled the country in every quarter, and brought good store of prizes to their ships: but afterwards, as they straggled out of order and disbanded, the Macedonians, as well footmen as horse, ran upon them, and chased them as they fled aspace to the sea side; in which rout they flew about 500 and took as many prisoners. And nothing else provoked the courage of the Romans (in regard as well of utter despair otherwise to save themselves, as of the indignity it fell, so to hazard their honour) but only the extreme necessity wherein they stood, having no means to recover their ships in safety. Whereupon they turned head, and renewed the fight upon the very sea strand. They also who were a shipboard, lured and helped them. In which conflict, two hundred Macedonians lost their lives, and as many were taken prisoners. From Antigonis the fleet weighed anchor, & made head toward the territory of Pallene, where the souldiers were set on shore to spoil the country. The territory appertained to the confines of the Cassandreans, the most fruitful tract of those parts which they had coasted and sailed by. There, King Eumenes, being departed from Elea with twenty war ships met with them. So likewise five other covert ships were sent from King Prusias. The Pretor seeing this good increase and addition of his forces, took a better heart unto him, even to belittle Cassandrea. This City was built by King Cassandra, in the very stright & gullet which joyneth the territory of Pallene with the rest of the Macedonian country, enclosed on the one side with the Toronian sea; and on the other with the Macedonian. For there lyeth out a bank or shelf like a tongue into the sea, upon which the City standeth, and beareth unto the deep, no less in compass and quantity than is the mountain Asus. It butteth full against Algeesia, with two promontories of unequal bigness; of which the greater is called Pogadum; the lesse Cassistrum. This town they began to assail in two divers parts. The Roman (Pretor) drew his fortifications to a place called Chila, opposing certain strong fortified stakes for to debar and shut up the way from the Macedonian sea to the Toronian. On the other side there is a bays or arm of the sea, from which quarter Eumenes gave the assaile. The most trouble and toil that the Romans found, was in damming and filling up the trench, which Brutus had cast against them a little before. And as the Pretor enquired where the breach was belovest, was shewn out of the trench so far off, because he could see no heaps thereof any where, there were shewed unto him certain vaults and arches within, which bewrayed a new wall not built to the thickness of the old, but with perpendicular work, laid with one course of brick and no more: Whereupon he resolved to pierce through the said wall, and so to make way into the City. The which he thought, to execute and perform without being discovered; in case he should be walled in another quarter, and by making a shout and alarm there, withdraw all the defendants of the City to the guard of that one place. There lay in garrison at Cassandrea (being a sufficient number of servicable young men of the City) eight hundred Agrians, and two thousand Penetils of Scythians, sent from thence by Phrygians; and both these nations are hardy warriors. At which time they descended the wals manfully, and the Romans endeavored with all their might to climb over, the which was the vaults and arches afore said were wrought and digged through in the turning of an hand, and gave entrance into the City. Now if they who brake in, had been armed as they were but pioneers (the town had been taken at that instant). But when as the souldiers heard news that the said work was finished, they suddenly set up a cheerful shout for joy, being ready some in one place and some in another to rush into the City. The enemies at the first wondered what the meaning should be of this sudden cry; but the captains of the garrison, Pytho and Philippus (who being once advertised that the town lay open, supposing that herein consisted the vengeance who could first prevent the other and give the charge, sallied forth with a strong band of Agrians and Thyrians; and while the Romans rallied themselves some from this place, and others from that, and were called together for to enter the City with banners displayed, they set upon them unready as they were, and nor ranged in any good order, put them to flight and chased them as far as to the trench, where they overbore them one upon another by heaps; 600 or very were there killed; and

A and in manner whom they could reach between the wals & the trench were sore hurt. The Pretor thus overtaken in his own enterprise, was not so hally to project any new designs, neither sped Eumenes any better, albeit at one time he assailed the City both by land & by sea. Whereupon they accorded both, to set strong guards, for to impeach the passage of all garriions out of Macedony thither and (since once force took no better effect) to assail the wals with fabricks & engines. As they were busie in preparation thereof, there arrived ten frigots of the Kings, sent from Adesodun with certain select auxiliary Gauls. These when they perceived their enemies ships riding at anchor, sailed in single range one after another, as close as possibly they could to the shore in the dark night, and so entered the City. The bruit that went of this new succour and garriion, forced as well the Romans as the King to give over the siege; so fetching a compass about the promontory, they B arrived before Torone. And when they began to lie against it, after they perceived once, there was a valiant company there to defend it, they abandoned their enterprise without effect, & sailed to Demetrias. Being approached thither, and seeing the wals full of armed men, they sailed by and anchored at Isclos: intending after they had spoiled the territory, to set upon Demetrias. Mean while, they Consul also, because he would not sit still doing nothing in the enemies country, sent M. Popilius with five thousand souldiers to give the assaile to the City Melibeas. Seated it is at the foot of the mountain Ofsa, on that side which looketh to Thessaly, and very fitly for the purpose commandeth Demetrias. The first arrivall of the enemies put the inhabitants of the place in great affright; but after they had recovered their spirits daunted with lo unexpected fear, they ran in arms to the gates, and up to the wals, where they doubt and suspected any place like to give entrance, and incontinently cut off all hope from the enemies, that it could possibly be forced at the first assaile. Whereupon they prepared to lay siege unto it, & began to make fabricks and engines to batter the wals. Perseus having intelligence, that in one instant both Melibeas was beleaguered by the Consul, and also that the fleet anchored before Isclos, to the intent that from thence he might go in hand to assail Demetrias: sent Euphranor one of his captains, with a chosen regiment of two thousand souldiers to Melibeas: with this charge and direction; That if he could raise the siege from Melibeas and force the Romans to depart, he should march C cheerly to Demetrias; & put himself within the town, before the Romans could remove from Isclos and advance before the City. The assailants of Melibeas discovering him with his forces all at once upon the higher places, quit their fabricks and engines in fearful hast, and let them all on fire; and thus they departed from before Melibeas. Euphranor, having levied the siege from the one City, forthwith led his army to Demetrias. And then the citizens assured themselves; that they could be able not only to defend the City against the siege, but also to save their territories from wals and spoil: and so they made sallies upon the foragers dispersed loosely here and there, not without drawing blood of their enemies. Howbeit the Pretor and the King rode about the wals, and viewed the situation of the town, if peradventure they could elope any one place which they were like to force, either with battery of engines or force of arms. The voice went, that by the means of Cylos the Cretanian, and Antiochus governor of Demetrias there was a treaty of peace and amity between Philip and Eumenes. But howsoever it was, this is certain, both Eumenes and the Pretor departed from Demetrias. As for Eumenes, he sailed to the Consul, and testified unto him the joy that he conceived for his life and prosperous entrance into Macedony; and from thence returned to Pergamus into his own realm. But Martinus Fulgus the Pretor, when he had sent part of his fleet into the harbor of Scythians there to winter, with the rest of his ships went to Oenone in Bœotia: supposing it a commodious City, from whence victuals and all provisions might be sent to the armies that abode either in Macedony or Thessaly. As touching Eumenes, sundry authors have written diversly. If a man should go by Valerius Antius and believe him, he reporteth, that neither the Pretor had any help from him by his navy, notwithstanding that oftentimes he had sent for him by his letters; nor took his leave of the Consul in good terms with favour, at what time as he was to depart into Asia, as being highly displeased, that he was not permitted to quarter with him in one of the same camps; inasmuch as he could not possibly be entreated by him, to leave behind that Cavalry of Gauls which he had brought thither with him. As for Attalus his brother, he remained still with the Consul (as Valerius saith) and continued sincere and faithful unto him without any change and alteration; yea, and performed right good service in all that war. During these wars in Macedony, there came Embassadors from beyond the Alps to Rome (sent from a pety King of the Gauls (Balanor) he had to name), but of what lineage he was descended it is not recorded) promising aid to the Macedonian war. Thanked they were from the Senat, and presents were sent unto them: to wit, a chain of gold weighing two pound; certain golden cups of four pound weight, a brave courier barbed and trapped, and an horsemans armor. After these Gauls were gone out of place, the Embassadors of Pamphylia brought with them into the Senat golden crown, valued at 20000 Philip-pieces of gold: their request was, that they might be permitted to set up the said present and oblation in the chappell of Imp. Opi. Max. and likewise to sacrifice within the Capitol. Their petition was granted: and when these Embassadors were desirous to renew the amity between them and the Romans, they received a gracious answer, and had of them a reward sent of two thousand Alises. Then the Embassadors of King Prusias, and anon after, others from the Rhodians had audience; who of one and the same argument discouraged diversly, for both tended to one thing, namely, a treaty for reconciliation of peace between the Roman, & K. Perseus. Prusias seemed to integrate rather than to demand; protracting that he had had ever to that day stood with the Romans in that war; and willingly would friend them still to the very end thereof: but since that there came Embassadors unto him from Perseus, and that he dealt with him to make an end of the war between him and the Romans, and for that he promised them to be a mediator and intercessor for him to the Romans: therefore his request unto them was (if they could so find in their hearts) to stint their anger, & so they should move him in any service, as one that would acknowledge himself beholden unto them for a favor, in effecting this atonement and reconciliation. In this manner (I say) spake the K. his Embassadors. But the Rhodians contrarywise, in a proud humour of theirs, reckoned up a becloud of their demerits towards the people of Rome, attributing the greater part (believe me) of the victory of K. Antiochus to themselves: moreover they added and said, that when the Macedonians and Romans were at peace, they began to enter into league and amity with K. Perseus: which they had interrupted and discontinued against their will: not upon any defect or occasion given of his part, but only because it pleased the Romans to draw them into the association of the war. Three daies now already (say they) have we felt the smart of this war and lived by the loss: by reason that the seas are shut up from us, and our land is decayed and distressed for need and want, having lost our tollage and customs issuing from the seas, which we are not able to endure any longer, have addressed Embassadors to Perseus into Macedony to intamate unto him, that the Rhodians will and pleasure was, that he should grow to a comp. of union and beat peace with the Romans. Our selves also are sent to Rome to declare the same: and likewise to denounce, that whosoever shall impeach and hinder this course tending to pacification, the Rhodians will consider of them accordingly & bethink how they are to proceed against them. I am verily perswaded, that there is no man at this day, who can hear or read this, but his stomach will rise therewith indignation; grieve then thereby how the LL. of the Senat of Rome were affected and touched as then, at the hearing thereof. Claudius mine author saith that there was no answer at all given unto them. Only an arrest or decree of the Senat was read before them, importing thus much, that by order from the people of Rome, the Carians & Lycians were made free: and presently were letters dispatched to both nations to signify so much unto them. Which when the principal persons of the embassy once heard, even he, whose big and brave words a little before, the whole Senat-house was hardly able to contain, fell down flat before them in a swoon and extatic. Other Historians write, that this answer was returned, "That the people of Rome at the very beginning of this war, knew assuredly (by intelligence given from persons of right good credit) how the Rhodians had secretly plotted with Perseus against the state of Rome; and if there had been some doubt thereof before, yet the words of the Embassadors ere while delivered, made all clear and put it past peradventure: and no marvel, since that for the most part it falleth out, that such cautious practices, howsoever at the first they are covertly & cleanly carried, yet one time or other are betrayed and discovered. Let the Rhodians send their messengers over the world and spare not; let them make themselves judges to determine of war and peace at their pleasure: as for the Romans (they will) take arms in hand, and lay them down again at the will and appointment of the gods in heaven. We are well holpen upon now in deed, if we must have the gods no more to be witnesses of our accords, but the Rhodians forsooth. And must the Romans (I would not else) be ruled by them, and withdraw their forces out of Macedony? They will consider and advise themselves how to proceed against us! How shall we do then? What will the Rhodians will see to, well may they perhaps themselves know: but the people of Rome (that is certain) will consider indeed and resolve after that Perseus is vanquished (which they hope will not be long first) to recompence and requite every City and state according as they have deserved in the service of this war. As sharp as this answer was, yet they sent a reward to their Embassadors, to every one of them 2000 asses: but none would they receive.

After this, were the letters read of Q. Marius the Consul, containing thus much, namely, How he had passed over the freights of the forreist, and was come into Macedony, where he had provision of victuals which the Pretor had given order for out of other places to serve for winter: and besides had taken up of the Epirots twenty thousand Modii of wheat and ten thousand of barley, for which corn they should make money ready at Rome to content their Embassadors. Also that they must send from Rome soldiers livres and other apparel, and need he had besides of 200 horse or thereabout: especially of Numidia: for in those parts he had no plenty of any thing. Hereupon an act was granted out of the Senat. That all these things should be done according to the tenor of the Consul his letters. So C. Salpustius the Pretor bargained for the transporting over into Macedony of 600 fide catsacks and 2000 short coats & jackets together with horses: for to be disposed and distributed at the discretion of the Consul: and besides paid the Embassadors of the Epirots good money for their grain. He brought also into the Senat Onesimus the son of Pytho a noble personage of Macedony. This man was evermore of counsel with the K. perswading him to peace: and admonished him as his father Philip before him observed an order even to the time of death to read over twice a day from point to point the instrument of the accord & covenant between him and the Romans; so he also would take up that good custom and practise the same, if not to continually, yet at leastwise many a time and often. But when he could by no means (care him not) avert his mind from war, he began at first to withdraw and absent himself, alledging for his excuse one while this occasion, and otherwhiles that because he would not be present at the debating of those matters which he approved not: and in the end perceiving that that he was had in some jealousy, & otherwhiles charged to be a traitor, he changed his allegiance revolted to the Rom. and served the Consul in right good stead. This Onesimus being brought into the Senat house, related all these premises: whereupon the Senat ordained, that he should be enrolled formally in the number of allies: also, that he should be provided of a lodging, and his ordinary expenses for the time allowed at the Cities charge. Moreover, 200 acres of land in the territory of Tarentum, which was consigned to the people of Rome, should be let out for him; and a messuage in Tarentum bought for his habitation. To see all this performed, C. Decimus the Pretor had in charge.

The Consuls upon the * thirteenth of December, took a survey of the number of citizens and an estimate of their goods, more strictly then aforesaid. Many were unknowned and had their B. horses taken from them; and P. Rutilius among the rest, who when he was Tribune of the Com. had been their accuser and called them to violently reckoning; degraded he was besides and displaced out of his own tribe, & made no better then a very labourer in the Cities works. Whereas the one moiety of the Cities renewes and profits for that year, was let by and allowed unto them by the treasurers (according to an ordinance of the Senat) Tib. Sempronius out of the money assigned unto him, purchased the house of P. Africanus on the back side of the old Curia next the image of Fortunus; the shops also wherein they sold wool and the other adjoining thereto, all to the use of the City. He caused likewise the stately palace to be built, which afterwards was called Sempiterna Basilica.

Now was the year come about and well near at an end, when by reason of the great care principally about the Macedonion war, men began to talk, whom they were to create for Consuls against the next year, to achieve and end the said war? Whereupon there passed a decree of the Senat, that Cn. Servilius with all speed possible, should make haste to Rome for to hold a general assembly of election. This decree Salpustius the Pretor within few daies after read to the Col. to the end that he should repair home into the City before the day prefixed. Whereupon both the Col. halted; & the said election was also furnished by the day appointed. Cost, these were created, L. Amilius Paulus the second time (even 14 years after his former Consulship) with C. Lucius Crassus. The day following were the Pretors also chosen, to wit, Cn. Babius Tampilus, L. Ancius Gaius, Cn. Octavius, P. Fomcius Balbus, Mar. Ebnius Helva, and C. Papirius Carbo. The careful regard of the Macedonion war caused every thing to be done with greater expedition. And therefore it was thought meet, that these new elect magistrats should cast lots out of hand for their provinces, that it might be known to whether Col. Macedony, and to which Pretor the conduct of the navy should fall; that thereupon they might presently consider and provide for all things requisite to the war, & requite the advice of the Senat as need required. Obtained it was when the Consuls were entered into their office, to solemnize the Latine festival holidays as soon as they might conveniently, without offence of the gods and breach of any religious order: that the Consul whole let his leggo into Macedony, were not detained behind upon any occasion. After these ordinances, Livy and Macedony, were nominated for the provinces of the two Consuls; and for the Pretors, the two civil jurisdictions within the City of Rome, the navy, Spain, Sicily, and Sardinia. In Spain, Macedony fell to Amilius the Consul, and Italy to Lucius the Pretor. Cn. Babius was lord chief justice of the pleas of citizens, and L. Ancius of aliens. And if the Senat thought good to send the navy any whither, Cn. Octavius had the charge thereof as L. admiral. P. Fomcius was appointed by lot L. Deputy of Spain, M. Ebnius of Sicily, and C. Papirius of Sardinia.

All men soon saw, that L. Amilius intended not to go coldly about the managing of that war; both for that he was not an ordinary man, but singular above all other, and also because that night and day he mused and studied upon nothing else, but that which was requisite and pertinent thereto. The first thing of all wherewith he went in hand was this, a request to the Senat for to dispatch certain elegant commissioners into Macedony, to visit the armies there and the armada; to make true report upon their certain knowledge, what was needful to be done for to supply the forces as well by land as sea; also to lie in espial & estimate as much as possibly they could, the King's power; moreover, what quarter of the province were taken by our men, and which the enemies kept; whether the Romans lay encamped till within the breach, or if they were past beyond the freights and come into the even ground; who continued truly allies, who were suspected, who hung in doubtful terms, as whose faith depended upon fortune: who seemed to be professed enemies: how great the provisions were of victuals, from whence they were conveyed by land: from what places transported by water: & lastly, what exploits had been done the summer past both by land and sea: supposing, that for a light given and certain intelligence delivered of these things, he might be sure y directed in the casting and laying of future plots & designs. So the Senat granted out a commission to Cn. Servilius the Col. for to send the delegates into Macedony, such as L. Amilius thought good of. Whereupon within two daies after, Cn. Domitius Enobarbus and A. Lucius Nerva, took their journey as legats and commissioners. News came in the latter end of this year, that it rained stones twice, namely in the territory of Rome, and likewise about Fes: and therefore a novendial sacrifice was celebrated. This year there died certain priests, namely, Pub. Quintilius Varus, a flamin of Mars, and M. Claudius Marcellus a Decemvir in whose room was substituted Cneus Octavius, and now noted it was, that the negligence and port of the people of Rome encreased, for that in the places called Circensia exhibited by Publius Cornelius Scipio Naso, and Publius Lemulus Ediles Curule, three score and

3 wild beasts out of Africa with 40 bears, & elephants, were baited to make sport to the people. When L. Aemilius Paulus and P. Licinius entered their Consulship upon the fifteenth of March, which was the beginning of the year following, the LL. of the Senat were in great expectancy, and especially what the Consul would propose unto them as touching the Macedonian war, which was his proper province. But Paulus said that he had nothing to propound and put to council, seeing that the Delegates aforesaid were not returned. And at Brundisium (quoth he) they now are, having twice in their voyage upon the sea been driven back by tempest and cast upon Dyrbachium. But to soon as I am once advertised and have perfect knowledge of those things that first are to be known, I will then consult; and that will be within very few days. Now to the end that nothing may stay and hinder his journey, he told them, that the even before the Ides of April, was appointed for the solemnity of the Latine festival holidays. And after sacrificiously performed [upon the Alban hills] the Senat should no sooner ordain, but he and C. Officiarius would set forth and put themselves on their way. As for C. Licinius his colleague, his charge should be in his absence to provide and fend all things requisite and needfull for this war. Mean while (quoth he) the embassies of forrain nations may have audience given. So when he had sacrificed as the manner was, before they took in hand the great affairs of State, the Embassadors of Alexandria, from King Ptolemæus and queen Cleopatra, were called in. Clad they were in poor array, the hair of their head long, their beards side and overgrown, and carrying in their hands branches of the Olive-tree, they entered into the Set; and fell grovelling and prostrat upon the floor. Their habit and apparel was not so simple and mournful, their look and countenance not so heavy and sorrowfull, but their speech was more piteous and lamentable. Antiochus now King of Syria, and who had sometime been hostage at Rome under a colourable pretence of honesty and equity to restore Ptolemæus the elder to his Kingdom, made hot war upon his younger brother, who then held Alexandria; and after a victory obtained in sea-fight near Pelusium had made a bridge of bally work upon the river Nilus, over which he transported his army, & now laid siege to Alexandria: so as by all likelyhood he would shortly by way of conquest be lord of a most rich and wealthy Kingdom. In which regard, these Embassadors made pitifull moan and grievous complaint, & beseeching within the Senat, of their aid and succour to that realm and those Kings, who were such friends to their feignory and dominion. For perceiving they were that the people of Rome had done so much for Antiochus in particular, & were of that account & authority with all other Kings and nations, that if they would but send their Embassadors to intimate thus much, that the Senat was not well pleased with waging war upon confederate Kings, he would presently raise his siege, depart from before the walls of Alexandria, and withdraw his army clean away into Syria. But if they protracted the time long and delayed thus to do, then should Ptolemæus and Cleopatra within a while be driven out of their realm, and forced to come to Rome with some shameful sort of dishonour to the people of Rome, in that they had not left their helping hand in that extremest danger of all their fortunes. The LL. of the Senat moved with compassion at the prayers of these Alexandrians, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenas, C. Decimus, and A. Hostilius as Embassadors to determine and make an end of the war between those two Princes. In commission they had first to go unto Ptolemæus, and then to Antiochus, and to let them in both understand, that unless they foretook and gave over arms, they would take him neither for friend nor confederate, whom it was long of that the war was not given over. So these three together with the Alexandrian Embassadors, took their leave within three daies & departed. Then the forsaide Delegates returned from out of Macedony, the last day of the festival games to Minerva called Quinquatrus, and not before they were welcome; for so looked for they were, had it not been evendie when they came, the Consuls would immediately have called the Senat together. But the morrow after the Senat sat, and those commissioners had audience given. Report they made first, that with more danger then profit ensuing, the army entered into Macedony over those passes and streights, where was no way nor pass: so that the King kept the country of Pieria, into which the Roman army was now advanced, and were so neer encompassed one to the other, that nothing but the river Enipeus between kept them asunder; that neither the K. made offer of battle nor the Rom. were of sufficient strength to challenge & force him to fight; moreover that the winter had overtaken them (a time unseasonable for warlike exploits) that the soldiers were muzzled and nourished in idleness, notwithstanding they had victuals to serve no longer then six daies; also, that by report the Macedonians were thirty thousand strong. Were it so that Ap. Claudius had a good and sufficient power about Lychnidum, he might be able to trouble the K. and put him to his trumps in a battle; but now both Appius and the garrison with him, are themselves in extremest jeopardy, unless with speed either a complete army be sent thither, or else they draw from thence where they are, into Macedony. Over and besides they related, how from the camp they went towards the fleet, where they heard say, that some of the sea-faring men and mariners were dead of sickness, others, and namely, those of Sicily above the rest, were gone home again to their own houses, inasmuch as there were not men enow to serve the ships; & those that remained, had neither their wages paid & money to put in their purse, nor liveries & apparel to hang on their backs. As for Eumenes & his fleet, they (like ships driven to a coast by force of wind and weather, without any other errand or cause else) were come and gone again, and it seemed the mind of that K. was not well settled and resolved. But as they reported all of Eumenes suspiciously & in doubtful terms, so they assured them of the singular fidelity & constancy of Nisalus his brother: When these Legats had spoke, then said L. Aemilius, Let us debate now in council what is to be done as concerning the said war. So the Senat ordained, that for eight legions the Consul and the people should elect an equal number of martial Tribunes or Colonels; the one as many as the other; and that none should be created and advanced to that place for that year, but such as had born some honourable dignity: then, out of all those Tribunes thus elected, that Ap. Claudius should make choice for those two legions which were to go into Macedony; of whom he would himself: also, that after the solemnity of the Latine feasts performed, L. Aemilius the Consul, and C. Officiarius the Prator and Admistrall of the fleet, should depart into their Province. A third was joyed in commission with them, to wit, L. Aemilius the Prator and L. Chief Justice for Stragete, and preadined it was, that he should pass into Illyricum about Lychnidum, for to succeed Ap. Claudius: The charge of taking mules was put upon C. Licinius the Consul. He had commandment to enroll eleven thousand [foot] Citizens of Rome, and two hundred horsemen and to charge the Latine allies with a levy of seven thousand footmen, and four hundred horse. Also to send letters unto C. Servilius, who governed the Province of Gaul, to enroll six hundred men of arms. This army he had commandment to send with all convenient speed to his Colleague into Macedony, so as in that Province there should not be above two legions, and the time full and complete, containing six thousand foot, and three hundred horse apeece. As for the increase, as well of the Cavalry as Infantry, they should be disposed and belowed in sundry garrisons. And all such as were unfit for service, were to be casted and sent away. Moreover, the allies were put out to let and find 10000 foot, and 800 horse. And those were to serve in garrison under Antiochus, over and above the two legions (which he was commanded to lead into Macedony) consisting of 5200 foot, and 300 horsemen either of them. Also for the navy were enrolled 5000 mariners and rowers, Licinius the Col. was appointed to defend and keep in obedience his Province with two legions, and to take besides of allies ten thousand foot and six hundred horse.

After these ordinances of the Senat were accomplished, L. Aemilius the Col. went forth of the Senat house into the common place before the assembly of the people; where he made a speech unto them in this wise following: "Me thinks I perceive and see, my good friends and Citizens of Rome, that ye have shewed more apparent tokens of joy and gratulation in my behalf, for that the Province of Macedony is fallen to my lot; than either at the time that I was deputed and selected Col. of that day whereupon I first entered into government: & for no other reason in the world, but upon the opinion which you have conceived, that the Macedonian war, which hath so long continued, may be brought by my means to such an end as becometh the greatest & majesty of the people of Rome. And for mine own self I have good hope, that as the gods in favour have directed this fortilege, so they will be present and propitious unto me in performing the service. In these matters, I say, I am but carried partly with conceit and partly with hope. But this one thing I am assured of; yea, and I dare affirm and promise on my own head, that I will endeavour myself and employ all that is in me, that this your good opinion of me may not be vain conceived. As for all things necessary and requisite to this war, both the Senat hath ordained; & also, for that they have thought good I should depart immediately (for which my self am well pleased and contented, neither in me there shall be any delay) my Colleague C. Licinius, a singular man, and of great valour, will provide with as great care and diligence, as if himself had the full conduct of this war. For the effecting whereof, see that whatsoever I shall write either to the Senat, or to you, ye believe for true: as for running rumours which have no certain author, give no ear and belief thereto; neither feed them with your foolish credulity. For now I advise you, (a thing that I have observed to fall out ordinarily in this war) there is no man so fittest to little by the common bruits that are blazed abroad, but his spirit and courage may be thereby quailed and danted. In all meetings now, yea, and at every board (I would not else) ye shall have them, that in their table talk will lead your armies into Macedony: that know where they are to lodge and encamp; what commodious places are to be seized and kept with garrisons: at what time and through which pass the entry must be made into Macedony; where the garnes and storehouses for corn should be built and set; which way by land and sea both, the provisions of victuals ought to be brought; when the time serveth to encounter and fight with the enemy, and when to sit still and rest. Neither are they content to let down and pronounce, what is to be done for the better: but if ought hap to be managed otherwise than they have judged expedient, they are so bold as to controul the Col., yea, and ready to commence actions against him judicially. These are shrowd hindrances, I may tell you, to Warriors & men of action. For all men have not the gift of resolution and constancy to neglect the speech and talk of men, as sometimes Fabius had, who chose rather to have his authority & command diminished and impaired by the folly and vanity of lewd people, than with their favourable applause and good opinion to manage his affairs but untowardly. Yet take me not so, as if I were a man that would have no captains to be admonished and advised by others; my contrariwise, of this judgment I am, That he who worketh all by his self-will & followeth only his own head is self-willed and proud, and nothing sage & wise. What is then to be done? First, in mine opinion, Generals and Commanders of armies, are to be instructed by discreet and prudent men: by such as are skillful by profession in fears of arms and military science; by those that by long practice are thoroughly experienced: nay, more than that, they are to be taught and counselled by them, that are usually present and conversant in the execution of affairs, who daily fee the advantage of

"places, mark the proceeding of the enemies, and observe the opportunities of sittings: those (they) who as passengers in one ship are partakers of the same danger, if there be any land-shore, who is verily persuaded of himself, that he is able to direct me and give me any counsel (in) the conduct of this war which I have in charge) for the good of the Commonwealth, let him come forth, and not deny his helping hand to the weak publicke, and go along with me hither. Macedony. Furnish him I shall, with ship, with horse, with treasure, with conduct, money, and all things necessary for his voyage. If any be loath so to do, and had rather sit warm at home, preferring the ease and repose of the City before the travel and gain of warfare, let him not here be the land take upon him to play the pilot and steersman, & sea. Matter he shall find enough within the City to talk of, and seek no farther: let him hold him there & keep his babble and practise himself: to know he (whoever he is) that we will content our selves with our own council about us in the camp. And this oration ended, and the Latine festivals solemnized the day before the Calends of March, together with the sacrifices duly celebrated upon the Alban mount the Col, and the Prætor Cn. Octavius departed incontinently into Macedony. It is recorded in the Chronicles, that the Col was honoured with a greater frequency that accompanied him, than usually had been known: and that men prefaged in manner assuredly, the end of the Macedonian war: how the Col should have a speedy return, and obtain a brave and glorious triumph.

* The last of February.

During these occurrences in Italy, Perseus who (because he was to be at the charges of disbursing money) never thought of it, to go through with that which before he had begun, namely, to join unto him Genius King of the Illyrians: so soon as he perceived, that the Romans were entered the straits, and the war came now to this extremity of hazard: though good now to make that sure and put it off no longer. Whereas therefore he had covenanted & promised by his Ambassador Hippas three hundred talents of silver, with condition also, that for security hostages should be put in of both parties interchangeably: he sent Pantaneus one of his most trusty friends to dispatch and make an end of this affair. This Pantaneus met the Illyrian King at Medon in the Country of Labeatis: where he both took an oath of the Kings, and also received his hostages. Genius likewise sent his ambassador, named Olympus, to demand the semblable oath of Perseus, and require hostages accordingly: with him were certain persons sent, of purpose to receive the money, who also by the advice of the said Pantaneus were to go in embassy with the Macedonians to Rhodes: and the men hereto appointed were Parmenio and Morus. But they had in charge and commission after the oath taken, after hostages & money received, to go to Rhodes, & not before. L. Gaius hope they conceived that the Rhodians might be solicited and induced to take arms against the Romans, by using the name of these two Kings, at once: and this account they made, that if this State which carried the renown and honour above all others for sea-service, would once combine and band with them they should leave the Romans no hope at all, either on land or sea. When the Illyrians arrived, Perseus departed with all his Cavalry from before the river Enipeus where he was encamped, and encountered them near Dium. There were all the complements performed according to the covenants, in the light and midst of the Cavalry, whom the Kings of purpose would needs have to be present at this accord of association made between him and Genius, supposing that it would comfort & encourage them the more. So the hostages were given and taken in the presence of them all. They also who were to receive the money were sent to Pella where the Kings treasure lay: and those that should go to Rhodes with the Illyrian ambassadors had commandment to embark at Thessalonica. Now was Metrodorus there, lately come from Rhodes who assured them by the means of Dyon & Polyaratus, two principal personages of that City, that the Rhodians were preit and ready to war. Whereupon the said Metrodorus was appointed the chief in this embassy of Macedonians and Illyrians together. At the same time likewise was addressed and imparted both unto Eumenes & also unto Antiochus, such advice and counsel in common, as the present condition wherein their affairs stood, might minister & afford argument namely: That a free City and a King were two by nature, enemies that possibly could not fort together: That the people of Rome went in hand with them severally one after another: & that which was a greater indignity & unsupportable, used the force of Kings to overthrow the state of Kings. For by the aid of Antiochus he had brought his father Philip to ruin by the help likewise of Eumenes, & partly also of his father Philip. Antiochus was defeated; & even now against himself both Eumenes and Perseus were put in arms. If the kingdom of Macedony were once subverted, have at Alex next: which the Romans have in some part seized already for their own under a colour of enfranchizing Cities, & setting them free: & then they will not leave until they have Syria too. For now is Perseus preferred in honour before Eumenes; & Antiochus for all his conquest is chased & barred out of Aegypt, which ought to have been the recompence of the war by him entered & achieved. In these regards Perseus advertised each of them to consider & provide therefore either to force the Romans to make peace with him, or else to hold them for the common enemies of all Kings, in case they persisted still in so unjust a war. The commission that the ambassadors had to Antiochus was apt & open: but unto Eumenes an ambassador was sent under a pretence of ransomning certain captives: but praised they were under hand more secret compass which caused Eumenes even then to be suspected & odious unto the Romans, yea & charged afterward with more grievous matters, although untruly. For he was reputed little better than a traitor & a professed enemy to their state, whereas indeed both he & Perseus strove who could compass, surprize, & overtake one another better in fraud & avarice. Now there was one Cydnus a Cretan,

An inward & most secret friend to Eumenes: this man had continued still at Amphipolis with one Chimarus a countryman of his, who served under Perseus in the wars; and afterwards at Dymmeis conferred with another named Meneceus, also with a certain third person, called Anagarchus captain to K. Perseus, even unto the very walls of the forlaid City. Over and besides, in rogon with at this time was sent, had beforetime been employed in two several embassies to the said Eumenes. These secret communications and embassies were badly spoken of: but no man knew what was concluded between the two Kings. However, this the rate stood, Eumenes as he had no mind nor intention to war upon Perseus, (who was not dubious in his heart, that he should have the victory of the Romans; not so much for the old enmity which had been between both their fathers, as for the hateful quarrels kindred among themselves. For this concupiscence & emulation there was between these two Princes, that Eumenes could never abide to see Perseus to purchase to great wealth & so much honour, as he must needs acquire by the conquest of the Romanish law moreover, that Perseus from the first beginning of this war, fought by all means possible for peace: & the nearer he was to danger & damage, aimed thereat every day more than others, employing his whole study & care about nothing else. He perceived also that among the Romans, because the war grew to be longer than they hoped and looked for, as well their captains as the Senat were well enough content and very desirous to see an end once of so troublesome, hurtfully, and difficult a war. Knowing thus as he did, the mind and will of both parties, he inclined & framed to that which of it self as he thought might fall out, where the stronger was weary and the weaker in fear: and therein desired he to shew his double diligence, thereby to win a thank & purchase favour of both parts. For he entered into bargain with Perseus for a sum of money, one while not to aid the Romans either by land or sea: another whiles to be a means for peace and to treat with the Romans thereabout, and not to meddle at all in the war, but to sit still: he capitulated (I say) for 1500 talents; making semblance and shew, that for the assurance both of the one and the other, ready he was not only to swear, but also to put in good and sufficient hostages. Perseus was the willingest man in the world to set in hand with this, as being driven thereto by the exigent of fear: and presently without delay dealt with him as touching the hostages which were to be received: and in fine concluded it was, that they should upon their delivery and receipt be sent into Crete. But when they came thence to talk of the money afore said, he halted and stuck at that: and to say a truth, either of these two sums (between Princes of so great name and honour) was but a base and dishonest consideration: a thing much unfitting (I wis) the giver, and more the receiver. Perseus verily for his part, in hope to purchase peace with the Romans, was willing enough to be at the expence of so much money: marry, he said that he would make payment thereof when the thing was done and accomplished: & in the mean time lay it up safe for that purpose within the temple of Samos at Tracia. Eumenes again, considering that the said Island was an appurtenance to the dominion of Perseus, could not see but that it was all gone for, if he were and in Pella: and therefore was earnest to have part thereof in hand. Thus between them there was nothing but lying in the midst for the vantage, who could over-reach the other: & what was, gained in the end but infamy and discredit? As for Perseus, he not only let fall this design and lost this opportunity, (and that by his nigardice only) when by the means of Eumenes he might have had either his money paid enough, or peace for it, (which indeed he should have bought, if it had cost him the one half of his kingdom,) and being once received into grace & favour [of the people of Rome] he might have defamed and brought into obloquy and danger his concurrent, by charging him to have received a piece of money for a bribe, and so justly have let the Romans upon his top: but also the association with King Genius which now was at the point of a contract, was neglected: yea, and a mighty army of Gauls spread at that time all over Illyricum and presented unto him, was even then recalled and discharged by this pinching and saving of his money. For there came and offered their service ten thousand horsemen, and as many foot, and those to well practised and so good of foot, that they were able to hold out & keep pace with horses yea, and run by their sides: such (I say) as when the riders were unhorsed and slain, could vault & mount on the empty horse back ready to fight in their turns. These had bargained to have for pay every horseman ten Philip pieces [of gold] paid down aforehand, and a footman five, and their Captains a thousand. Perseus departed from his league lying near the river Enipeus, and with the one half of his own forces met these coming upon the way, and capied proclamation to be made in all towns and villages near the high waies. To made ready and bring abroad their provision of victuals, and see that there were plenty of corn, of wine, and cattel. Himself brought with him horses and trappings, and five thousanders caskets, to bestow as presents upon the chief of them, with some little sprinkling of gold to deal among a few of them, supposing that all the rest besides of common soldiers, might be drawn on and retained with bare hope. Thus he came to the City of Alamania, and encamped upon the bank of the river Axius. But the army of these Galatians were lodged about Disphobis in the country of Medion, and relied there expecting the payment of the money afore said, according to covenant. But Perseus sent unto them Antigonus one of his gallant and courtiers, to will and command the multitude of the army to dislodge and remove to Bylaxora, a place so called in Pannonia, and a good sort of their chieft to repair unto him. Now were there three score and fifteen miles from the river Axius and the Kings camp. And when Antigonus had delivered unto them this mandata as he had in charge, and added besides, with what cause and diligence the King had laid his provisions by the way of all things in great plenty for the army, and with what gifts of apparell, silver, and horses, he purposed to receive and enertain their Captains at their first coming unto him: as for that (say they) we shall take knowledge thereof when we are in presence personally: but now for this time, we demand, Whether ye have brought with you in ready coin according to bargain, that gold which is to be paid to the soldiers, as well horse as foot? And when he could make no answer thereto, but was yet rogatus, then the said Clivdianus their Prince, Go your waies then good men, and tell your King and Masters, that the Captains they may receive the gold, and hostages for their security, will not stir one foot forward, Relation being made hereof unto the King, he called his Council: and when it was known, that they all would advise him to do himself, who could skill better to keep his money together, than hold the royal estate of his Kingdom, began to enter into a discourse of a disloyalty and savage nature of these Gauls; making remembrance, how he had experience by the calamities and losses of many before him, that dangerous it was to receive so great a multitude of them within Macedony, for that the Gauls would be found worse neighbors than the Romans were in times. Five thousand horsemen are sufficient (said he) to do many well we may have good use of in wars, and need not be afraid of them for their number, but every man saw well enough that it was the wasting of such a number that he feared and nothing else. But when no man durst give him counsel, albeit he needed to ask the advice, Antigonus was sent again with a message unto the Gauls, that the King hoped in need of five thousand horsemen, and no more, as for all the rest, he weighed them then. When their Barbarians heard that, all the rest began to mutter and grumble, yea, and to take great scorn and indignation, that they were levied and departed out of their native country for nothing: but Clavdianus redeemed, Whether he would make present pay to those five thousand according to covenant, yea, or nay? but seeing that he was to seek, and made thence to avoid a direct answer, he let this deceitful messenger go his waies, and did no harm unto his person (as saying that Antigonus himself would scarcely have thought could possibly have been: And so after they had given the waste unto those parts of Thracia which lay near to their way, they returned back again to the river Iffer. Which power of men it had passed the Straights of Parthia into Thessaly against the Romans (although Perseus had not stirred at all, but sitten still at Enipeus) might not only have spoiled and laid bare the territory all about, and impeached the Romans for expecting any victuals there; but also destroyed the towns utterly, whilkes Perseus held the Romans play at Enipeus that they could not relieve and succour the Cities of their allies and confederates. Nay, the very Romans should have enough to do to look unto themselves, considering, that there was no tarrying for them, after that Thessaly was lost, which nourished and maintained their army: and pass forward they could not possibly, having the Macedonian camp to affront them. But Perseus by that deed, as he confirmed the hearts of the Romans, so he qualified not a little the courages of the Macedonians, who depended upon the hope and expectancy of it. As by the same miserable pinching of this he estranged also the heart of K. Gentius from him. For when as at Pella he had paid 300 talents unto those that were sent of purpose from Gentius to receive the same; well content he was that they should leave that money. Afterwards he sent unto Pantiscus ten talents, and commanded him to deliver the same to the King in person: as for the rest signed up with the seal of the Illyrians, he commanded his own men who had the convey thereof, in going with it to take small journeys, and when they were come to the utmost frontiers of Macedony, there to rest and attend the messengers from him. Gentius, after he had received as earnest that small portion of the whole sum afore said, being called upon continually by Pantiscus and set on to provoke the Romans by some hostility of their own, made no more ado, but committed to prison M. Perperna and L. Petilius, who chanced at that time to come unto him in embassy. Which when Perseus once heard, he had enough and thought verily that Gentius had done that, whereby of necessity he must be forced to wage war with the Romans; and thereupon sent out presently to call those back who had the carriage of the fore said talents; as if he had studied and sought for nothing more, than to relieve as great a booty as possibly he could, for the Romans to enjoy, after that they had vanquished and subdued him, Eropan returned likewise from Eumenius, and with not what he had contrived secretly between them. That their treaty was about certain captives, yet themselves had given forth abroad, and likewise Eumenius advertised the Council so much, for avoiding of all suspicion.

Perseus after the return of Eropan from Troiti Eumenius was much dismayed and cast down. Whereupon, he sent Antenor & Callippus (admirals of his navy) to Tenedos with forty pinnaces, unto which number five Gallions were adjoined: who from that Coast dispersing themselves all about the Islands Cyclades, might wait and guard the lighters and hoies charged with corn, as they sailed to Macedony. These ships were put to sea at Chalcedonia, and first they fell with the havens that lie under the foot of the mountain Arthos and from thence sailed to Tenedos with pleasure in calm sea: where finding certain Rhodian open ships riding in the harbour, they spake courteously to Eudamius their Admiral, and let them alone without any hurt at all done unto them. But afterwards upon knowledge, that fifty hulks of theirs on another side were shut up and pent in by the war-ships of K. Eumenius (which rid in the mouth of the haven, and were commanded by Damius) he turned about in all haste, & dispersed the enemies ships with a sudden terror, that he put them in, & sent the said hulks & vessels of burden into Macedony, with a convoy of ten brigantines to wait them over, with this charge, That after they had conducted them past all danger into place of safety, they should return again to Tenedos. After nine daies they retired toward the fleet anchoring then in the roade of Sigamm. From whence they crossed over to Sabota, an Island lying between Euboea and Attica. It fortune that the morrow after the fleet was arrived at Sabota, five and thirty ships, which they call Hippogae (serving for the transporting of horses) which came from Elia, having aboard certain horsemen of Gaul and their horses, made head toward Phana, a Cape or promontory of the Chians, from whence they might cut over into Macedony. And there were sent from Eumenius to Antalus, Antenor being advertised by a signal given him from a watch-tower, that those ships were discovered under sail in the open sea, looted from Sabota; and between the Cape of Erythraea and Chios, where the sea is most narrow, he encountered them. The admirals of K. Eumenius thought nothing less, than that any fleet of Macedonians were abroad in those seas; but imagined one while they were Romans, otherwhilkes, that it was Antalus of some sent back from Attica; who from out of the Roman camp were sailing toward Perseus. But as they approached nearer, they took knowledge by the form and fashion of their pinnaces, who they were, by their high rowing also and making head lull against them they were out of all doubt that their enemies were at hand. Then were they mightily afraid as having no hope to resist and withstand them, considering the ships were unwelldly and unhandsome, and the Gauls besides could hardly brook the very sea without any other trouble. Some of them therefore, who were nearest to the firm land, saved themselves by swimming to Erythraea; others set up their sails, and being cast upon the Island Chios, forsook their horses, and ran as fast as they could for refuge to the City. But the barks discharged their armed souldiers nearer to the City in a more commodious place for landing, where the Macedonians overtook the Gauls and slew them: some in the way as they fled, others before the very gate of the City, being kept out and excluded from thence: for the Chians not knowing either who fled or who pursued, had shut their gates upon them. Nine hundred Gallio Greeks, of every near lost their lives and were hewn in peeces, and 280 taken alive. As for the horses, part perished in the sea after the ships were split and broken, and the Macedonians haulted and cut the strings of their gambrels of as many of them as they found upon the shore. Twenty of the best and fairest horses, together with the pinnaces, Antenor commanded that those ten barks which he had sent before, should transport to Thessalonica, and return again with all speed to the fleet for that he would expect their coming at Phana. The fleet staid about three daies under the City side, but afterwards went forward to Phana; and when the reinforcements afore said were returned sooner than they looked for, they set up sail in the Aegean sea for Delos.

In this while the Roman Embassadors, C. Popilius, C. Decimius, and C. Hostilius, departed from Chalcis and arrived with three Quinquageme gallees at Delos, where they found forty Macedonian pinnaces, and five royal Quinquageme gallees of K. Eumenius. The holiness of the Temple and Island wherein it stood afforded security to them all, so as there was no hurt done nor violence offered from one to another. And therefore, as well Romans as Macedonians, and besides the sailors and mariners of K. Eumenius conversed together, intermingled one with another in the Temple, and the religious devotion of the place yielded them truce and licence of hospitality.

Antenor the admiral of K. Perseus, when he was advertised from the watch and sentinell, that certain ships of burden were seen a far off in the sea, fell sick & made after them himself with part of his pinnaces, and part of them he bestowed in wait among the Cyclades, and laying those that he directed their course toward Macedony, he either drowned or spoiled them all: Popilius did the best he could, and Eumenius with his ships likewise, to save some; but the Macedonians, who sailed by night with two or three pinnaces at the most, deceived them and were not discovered.

Much about this time the Macedonian and Illyrian Embassadors came together to Rhodes, who carried the greater authority and credit with the Rhodians, by reason not only of the coming of their brigantines, which sailed to and fro ranging over the Aegean sea, and among the Cyclades, but also by the conjunction and association of the two K. Perseus and Gentius, together with a rumor that ran of the Gauls, who were coming with a great number, as well of horse as foot. And now both Dion and Polyarchus, who took part with Perseus, took more courage and heart unto them: by whose means there was not only a gracious answer returned to the Kings, but also produced openly it was, that by their authority they would make an end of the war: in regard whereof, the Kings also for their parts were to be disposed and well willing to accept of peace.

Now was it the prime of the spring, when as the new generals were attired into their Provinces: Aemilius the Consul into Macedony; Othavins to the navy at Oreum; and Anticius into Illyria, whose commission was to levy war against Gentius. This Gentius was the son of Pleaurus King of the Illyrians, and Euridica was his mother: two brethren he had, so wit, Plator of the whole blood by father and mother both, and Aravantius only by the mothers side. This half brother he left suspected, by reason of his base parentage from the father: but as for Plator he murdered, together with two especial friends of his Eutivius and Epicadus (brave men of action) to the end, that he might reign in more safety and security. The voice goeth that he carried an envious eye to that brother of his, for that he had espoused Erika the daughter of Homulus the Prince of the Dardaniens: as if by this marriage he meant to make himself strong and combine with the Dardanian nation: and the more likelihood this carried with it after he married the damoelle indeed. When he had made away Plator, and rid himself of the fear that he might have of his brother, he began to molest and oppress his own natural subjects: and as he was by nature given to violence, so that indisposition of his he set on fire with untimely drinking of wine. But as we laid before, being moved and incited to war against the Romans, he assembled all his forces together unto Lissus, to the number of 15000 armed men, and sent his brother thence with 1000 foot and 50 horse against the Cavians, for to subdue that nation either by force or fear, whilst himself led his army five miles against the City Antiochia from Lissus. Now were the Bullians confederates allies of the Romans; and therefore when they were first followed by the Medians to yield, they relieved rather to endure a siege than do so. As for Caracanthus he was peaceably and friendly received at his first coming into Durium, a town of the Cavians; but Caracanthus another City, made the gates fast against him; and as he gave the waste to the territory about it, some of his soldiers straggling here and there, were by the peasants and villagers killed, who came forth and made head against them.

And now by this time Appius Claudius having taken with him, over and above his own army, the auxiliaries of the Bullians, Apolloniates, and Dyrhachians, dislodged out of the place where he had wintered, and encamped near the river Gemissus. For hearing of the alliance made between Perseus and Gentius, and incensed besides with the outrage committed upon the Roman ambassadors, whom Gentius put in prison, he resolved certainly to war upon him. Anticus the Prator being at that time at Apollonia, and advertised in what terms the affairs stood in Illyricum, dispatched letters beforehand to Appius, willing him to attend at Gemissus for his coming; and so within three daies after came himself to the camp there; and to shole aids, which he had of his own, he took with him two thousand foot, and two hundred horse, drawn out of the youth and flower of the Partins. Of the Infantry Epicadus had the conduct, and Agathus commanded the Cavalry. With this power he prepared to go into Illyricum, principally for to levy the siege before Reffania; but this design projected by him, was empeached by a bruit that was blown of certain pinnaces which waited and spoiled the sea-coasts. A fleet they were together of eighty sail, sent from Gentius by the indignation of Pantacutus, to forrage the territories of Apollonia and Dyrhachium. Then the fleet

Which being furnished, they submitted also and yielded themselves. And so consequently other Cities of that country one after another did the semblable; and the inclination & disposition of mens minds that way, was much set forward by the clemency and justice of the Roman Prator which he used towards all. Then they marched to Scedra, the capital place and seat-town of the war: not only for that Gentius had seized upon it for his own self, as the chief strength and fortrels of all his realm, but also because it was the strongest peece of all the Lebeates nation, and very difficult for access. Enclosed it is with two rivers: to wit, Chaulala which runneth along the East side of the City, and Barbanus on the West, arising out of the marsh Lebeatis. These two rivers joyn in one, and are discharged together into the great river Otiundus: which springing from the mountain Scedrus, and increased still with the confluence of many other waters and rivulets, falleth at length into the Adriatick sea. This Scedrus is the highest hill by odds of all other in those quarters: on the east it hath Dardania under it, on the South Macedony and Illyricum on the West. Albeit, this town was strongly fortified, by the natural site of the place, and defended by the whole nation of the Illyrians and the King himself in person: yet the Roman Prator (encouraged with the good success he had at the first, and supposing the fortune of the totall war would be answerable to so happy beginnings, and that a sudden terror also would serve him in much stead and prevail) approached the walls of the town with his army ready embattelled, and displayed his banners against it. Now if they had shut their gates, and defended their walls and turrets over the gates, with armed guards bestowed accordingly, surely they had repulled the Romans from the walls, and defeated them of their enterprize clean; but they issued forth of the gate, and in the plain and even ground gave battell with more animosity and courage than they maintained it with persistence. For being discomfited and driven back, and in the chafe huddled by heaps together as they fled, after 200 & above were slain in the very straight entrance of the gate, they put the rest within in such a fright, that Gentius incontinently sent unto the Prator as Orators, Tentius and Bellus, the principal persons of that nation to treat and intreat for a surcease of arms, that in the mean while he might debate in counsell and be advised as touching the main estate of his affairs. And when for this purpose he had obtained a grant for three daies, and the Romans lay encamped from the City half a mile; Gentius took a barge, and sailing along the river Barbanus, passed into the lake or mear of the Lebeates, as if he had sought some secret by-place to consult in. But as it appeared afterwards, he was moved upon a certain vain hope of his brother Caracanthus his coming, who was said to be near at hand accompanied with many thousands of fighting men, whom he had levied and brought out of that quarter into which he was sent. But when this rumour was over-blown & vanished to nothing, down the river he went again with the stream the third day after in the same vessel to Scedra, and sent courriers before him to the Prator, requesting leave to parley & commune with him; which being granted, he entered into the camp. First, he began his speech with accusing and condemning his own folly in the end his last refuge was to pour out prayers and shed tears: and so humbling himself at the Prator his feet, he submitted to his devotion. The Prator at the first had him take a good heart unto him and be of good cheer, and invited him to supper: and so he returned to his own people into the City, where he was honorably feasted that day by the Prator. But afterwards he was delivered to the guard and keeping of C. Calfius, a martiall Colonel: and thus received he of K. Perseus only ten talents, a mean reward and hardly sufficient to consent a simple word-plat; to engage himself into a world of danger, and being a K. as he was, to fall into this extreme calamity and misery. Anticus having entered upon Scedra, first before all other things, took order as that the two Embassadors aforesaid, Perseus and Perpernia should be sought out and brought unto him: whom after he had restored to their plucking estate and reputation, he sent Perpernia presently to appease the friends and kinsfolk of the King: who took his way directly to Medus, a City of the Lebeates, and brought with him into the camp at Scedra Elleuda the Kings wife, with her two sons Scardilus and Pleumans, together with Caracanthus the K. his brother. Thus Anticus having ended the Illyrian war within the compass of thirty daies, sent Perpernia to Rome with tidings of this victory: and within few daies Gentius himself after him together with his mother, his wife and children, his brother, and other L. of the Illyrians. This was the only war achieved and brought to an end, before they heard at Rome that it was begun.

During the management of these affairs, Perseus also was in great fear and affright, by reason of the coming of L. Enepilus a new Consul (who as the voice went, matched against him with great menaces) together with Octavius the Prator. Neither was he less terrified with the Roman navy and the danger of the sea-coasts. Emmenus and Athenagoras had the keeping and command of Thrace with a small garrison of two thousand targettiers. Thither he sent Captain Androsius also, with commandment to encamp close to the very harbor where the ships lay in rode. Unto Anticus he sent one thousand horsemen under the leading of Antigonus, to guard the sea-coast, to the end that whatev part soever they heard the enemies ships were arrived, they might incontinently advance to the succour of the peasants and country people. Five thousand Macedonians were likewise sent to lie in garrison at Pythium and Petra, under the conduct of Hippias, Theagenus and Midon. After these were departed, he went in hand to fortifie the bank of the river Enepilus: because it was passable over the very channell on dry foot, And to the end that all the multitude should be employed hetherabout, the very women were compelled out of the towns adjoining, to bring victuals into the camp. The soldiers were commanded from out of the woods near by

Finally, the water-bearers in leather bits of bottles, were commanded to follow him to the sea, which was a quarter of a mile off: and thenceupon they flood to dig pits, some in one place, and some in another, a pretty distance asunder. The exceeding high hills all about put him in good hope (& the rather because they sent out from them no rivers to be seen in open view) that they contained within them some hidden springs, the veins whereof draining into the sea, were intermingled with the sea-water. They had scarcely sunk through the uppermost course of sand above, when they might see small fountains to boil up, at the first troubled, but afterwards they began to yield finer and clear water in great abundance; by a speciall gift (as it were) of the gods above. And even this occurrence also increased the name and reputation of the Captain with his soldiers. Then after he had commanded his men to make ready their armour, himself with the martiall Tribunes and the principall forme of ranks, marched to recognise and view the passages; and to see where the armed men might defend with ease, and where they might with least trouble mount up the bank on the farther side. When he had taken a sufficient survey hereof, he forecalt & gave direction aforehand, for all things to be done in the army in good order without trouble and tumultuous noise, even at the very beck and commandment of their leaders. For when a thing to be effected is pronounced to at all once, it falleth out that every man is not within the hearing; and so receiving an uncertain signal and commandment, some put more of their own head to that which was commanded, and others do less again for it: and so there arise from all parts dissention cries, and by this means the enemies know sooner whereabout they go, than many of themselves. Therefore to avoid this confusion, he ordained that every martiall Colonel should give a secret watch-word to the principall Centurion of the legion, and round him in his ear what he would have done: then he and so forth every one should deliver unto each Centurion as he is next in rank and place, what was to be executed: whether it were that the commandment was to be carried from the front of the army to the tail, or from the rearguard behind to the vanguard before. He brought up a new order and custom, forbidding the watchmen to carry with them any targets to their sentinels: for that the watchman went not out to fight, whereby he needed any armour, but to keep watch: that when he descried the enemies coming, he might retrace himself, and raise others to take arms. Item, he ordained that the helmetters or morioners should stand upon their feet, having their shields upright before them: and when they were weary to lean and bear upon their javelins, and resting their head upon the edge of their shields, so to take a nap and sleep: to the end that their glittering armour might be discovered afar off by the enemy, whereas himself could not see far before him. The manner also of warding in the day time, and of the corps de guard he altered clean. For whereas they were wont to stand all the day long armed, and the horsemen holding their horses bridled; it fell out so that in summer daies when ordinarily the sun is extreme and scorching hot, both horse and man became weary and languished again with abiding so many hours in the heat, and oftentimes the enemies being fresh, although they were but few in number, set upon them and put them to trouble and hazard enough. Hereupon he commanded that the morning guard should break up at noon, and others succeed in their places for to ward in the afternoon. By this means the enemy fresh and in heart could never overtake them weary and so charge upon them. When he had pronounced in a publick assembly gathered together that his will was, that these orders should be observed accordingly, he delivered unto them a speech, much resembling the former Oration which he used before to the people within the City of Rome. Namely, "That the Generall of an army ought only to foresee and provide for all that is meet to be done, sometime by himself, otherwhiles with those whom he hath joyned assistants

of L. Enepilus myself.

"time will come when you will be of that mind, of which I am now. Taught I am by experience
 "of many adventures and actualities in war, to know when it is good time to fight, and when it is "better to forbear and fulfill. For this present needful it is and beneficial (as I said) as we do now
 "arranged in order of battle) to tell you what motives they be, that induce me to think it better
 "to be quiet, and not to stir this day: another time demands the reasons thereof; and I cannot "red I advise you, with the authority and credit of an old warrior and experienced Captain. The "young man was blank and said not a word: perwaded he was doubting what the Consul's "impediments to stay the battle, which to himself appeared not. Phalaris, who thus perceived that
 "the camp was set and quartered out, & the carriages belovied according to order, of the three "guard the Triarii then afterwards the Prætor, while the Ala of the Prætor kept their standing "still in the vanguard (happily the enemies should offer battle), at the last he withdrew them al"together, beginning first at the right point, taking by little and little the soldiers from it, every one "after another. By this means were the footmen had away without any trouble and tumult, and the "horsemen together with the light armoured opposed against the enemy in the front and head of the "main battell before the enemies: neither was the Cavalry called back from their stations where"in they were placed, until the forefront of the rampier and trench was fully finished. The K, like"wise, who without any refusal of battle had stood ready that day to fight, contenting himself with "this, that he knew the day thereof was occasioned by the enemy, led his companies back into his "camp. After the Romans were encamped and well fortified, C. Sulpicius Galba, a martial Colonel "of the second legion, who had been Prætor the year before by permission of the Consul called "the soldiers to a general audience, and before them all declared and pronounced, that the next night
 "following there would be seen an eclipse of the moon, from the second hour of the night until
 "the fourth: and this he did, because no man should wonder (he said, as if it were a prodigious token,
 "Alto he made demonstration unto them, that it might be well fore-known and fore-told,
 "because it is a thing coming at certain times by the ordinary course of nature). For like as they
 "nothing marvelled at the rising and going down both of sun and moon at set hours, nor to see
 "the moon sometimes shine bright out at the full, otherwhiles in the waning light only with the "small tips of her horns: even so they ought not to make a wonder and miraculous matter of it,
 "that the should be dark, when as her body is hidden by the shadow of the earth. Thus the moon
 "was eclipsed at the hour before prognosticated, a night before the even of the Ides of September.
 "by occasion whereof, the Roman soldiers held Gallus for a deeply learned sage, and a "divine Philosopher: but contrariwise, the Macedonians were troubled with the sight thereof, as "a heavy prodigy, portending and presaging the ruin of that realm and the utter destruction of "the whole nation. And surely the howling and yelling which they made in their camp all the while,
 "until the moon recovered her full light, again, was a very prognostication and prediction of no "less. The morrow after both the armies were in hot and greedy of fight, that both K and C:
 "were blamed by some of their own soldiers, for that they went out on the field the day before,
 "and struck not battle. As for the K, he had his excuse and defence ready, not only because the ene"my refused the fight, but in open view of all men, and so retired his forces into his camp; but also
 "in that he had pitched and ranged his engines in such a place, unto which the Macedonians could "called Phalanx, could not advance, considering that with the small loss, disadvantage of the ground,
 "there is no use at all thereof. The Consul, for his part, as the day before he seemed to have premeditated "and lost the opportunity of a combat, yea, and to have given the enemy advantage to depart in "the night-season (if he had so list), so now also he trifled out the time, making semblance of sacrifice,
 "whereas the signal of battle at the point of day was put forth for the soldiers to enter into "the field. Well at the last, when the sacrifice was duly performed, about the third hour of the day, "he assembled his Council about him; where, some there were, that thought he prolonged the "time on purpose, with his discourses and unreasonable consultations, and spent that opportunity "after, which should be employed better in fight and execution of some worthy exploit. Howbeit,
 "after some speeches passed, the Consul made an Oration unto his soldiers in this wise: Pub. Nafus
 "qd. he a right valiant young gentleman, of all those that advised to give battle yesterday, was "the only man that uttered his mind, and acquainted me with his counsel; yet afterwards, even
 "he held his peace and kept silence, in such sort, as he seemed to change his opinion, and to be of "my mind in the end. Some others there be, that have taken a several course by themselves, and "thought it better to carp at their General behind his back, than to admonish him to his face. As "for me, I will not think much nor make it daunt, to render a reason both to you. O. P. Nafus
 "& to them also who have thought the same that you did, although they carried it more secret"ly, why I made such stay and delayed battle. For, so far off am I of suspecting for our yesterday's "repulse, that I am of this belief rather, how by this means and policy alone I saved the whole ar"my. And because none of you may think that I have taken such a petty, and hold that opinion "of mine without just cause, let him consider & discourse together with me (if he think it good)
 "what advantages the enemies had, & how many things made against us. First and foremost, how "far they surpass us in number, assured I am that none of you either was ignorant before, or "could chide but observe and mark yesterday, seeing their army how it was thrust and thronged "together. And of that small number which we were, the fourth part of our fighting men was left "behind to guard the carriages, & we yet wot that we set not the most cowards to the keeping of "our baggage. But suppose we had been all there together. How then? think we, I pray you, that

The Oration
 of C. Sulpicius unto his army

"we have not enough of it, even out of this very camp wherein we have rested the whole night.
 "So go either this day or to-morrow at the farthest, with the leave and power of the gods, into "the field, if you shall so think good? Skillful it is not indeed, and is all one, to bid a soldier "take arms, whom neither the travel of this daies journey, nor toil of laborious work hath "tained and wearied, but is at quiet, yea and fresh within his tent, & to bring him forth into "the field for a battle lusty and strong, full of bodily vigour of heart? or to offer and expose unto
 "the enemy who is hearty and fresh, who hath taken his rest and ease, & hath brought with him "to a fight, his strength entire and whole, not soiled or spent upon any occasion: to present, I say,
 "unto such an enemy, a soldier tired out with long journey upon the way, wearied with carry"ing his burden all molen to sweat and dropping therewith, his throat scorched for thirst, his "face and eyes full of dust, and all his body roared against the noon-sun? how tell me, by the "oath to the gods, what is he that being in this so good a plight, were he the vilest beast and
 "coward otherwise in a country, could not foil and beat out of the field the hardiest and most val"iant man that is? Moreover, what should I say how material & important this also was that our "enemies had marshalled their battalions with great leisure after long time of rest, that they had "repaired and refreshed their own strength, & stood ranged every man orderly in his own rank,
 "whereas we were at one instant both hastily to embattle and let our men in array, yea, and also "to fall to skirmish pell mell without all order? But may some men say, True it is, our battel in"deed we should have had much out of square and shuffled in great confusion: yet our camp was "well fortified: we had forecast and provided for good watering, the passage thereto was good
 "and safe by reason of strong guards placed every way: & all coasts were cleared about us by our "epials. Nay, I wis, but contrariwise, nothing (to say truly) was ours, but the bare & naked plain "field where we were to fight. Your ancestors in times past, esteemed a camp fortified with tan-
 "piers and trenches, as good as a port and harbor of sure refuge, for an army against all char"ges and misfortunes whatsoever: from thence to issue forth, & thither to retire for safety, after they "had been tossed and beaten with the tempest of a battle. And therefore when it was empaled
 "round about with good defences, they had a care also to re-enforce & strengthen it with strong "guards: so much as he that hath lost his camp & is turned out of it, is ever holden for vanqui-
 "shed, notwithstanding he won the day & had the better in the field. The hold of a camp serveth "for a place of retreat to the conqueror: & of refuge to the conquered. How many armies could "I reckon, which having sped but badly in the battle, were driven to take their leaguers: yet after"wards seeing their time, and spying their vantage otherwhiles fallen forth, & in the turning of "an hand repulsed and discomfited the enemy for all his former victory? This feat and retreat of "soldiers in time of war, resembleth as a man would say, another native country of theirs: the "rampier serveth instead of walls, the tent and pavilion is to every soldier his house and home.
 "And should we have fought indeed like vagabonds without any place of mansion wherunto we "might betake our selves after victory? But against these difficulties and emplacements of giving
 "battle, this one thing is objected: How and if the enemy (say some) had gone his waies last night
 "between: what a foul deal of trouble & sorrow should we have endured again in pursuing him
 "as far as to the heart, nay, to the farthest frontiers of Macedonia? But I for my part verily hold this "for certain, that if he had ever meant to have started from hence, he would never have said thus
 "here as he hath done, nor brought his forces out into the field. For how much more ease was it
 "for him to depart & be gone when we were farther off, than now when we are ready to tread "upon his heels, and go over his back? Surely he could not possibly have given us the slip, but we "should have been aware of his dislodging either by day or night. But, say he had gone his waies,
 "what could we have withered more at the gods hands, than to let upon the back part of the ene"mies in the open plain ground, departing in disarray disbanded one from another, as they aban"doning their fort and strong hold, and whose camp situate most sure upon an exceeding high and "steep bank of a river, fortified also with a rampier, and many a fence and turret besides, we gave "the venture to assault? Lo, what the causes were, why the battle was put off from yesterday to "this present. For I must tell you, I am as willing my self to try the fortune of a field as any other:
 "and to that end (because the adventures to the enemy over the river Enipeus were stopped up a"gainst us) I have found a new way through another pass and straight, by dislodging the guards of
 "the enemies there left: and never will I give over until I have defeated him quite, and brought "this war to an end. After this oration all kept silence, partly for that many of them were won to "his opinion: and partly, because they feared to find fault to no purpose & so to give offence, when "thing howsoever once past, cannot be recalled and amended. But that day neither, was there
 "battel fought, for any great desire that the Consul or King had thereto. The King wished it not:
 "because he was now to charge his enemies, not weary of their way as the day before, nor trou"bled about their embattling in such sort & hardly at the last brought into order. The Consul a"gain had no great stomach thereto, for that his camp newly pitched, was provided neither of fire-
 "well nor forage brought in and laid up already: and for the purveyance thereof, out of the villa"ges and fields near at hand, many of the soldiers were gone abroad forth of the camp. And thus
 "when neither of the Generals were willing thereto, mere chance and fortune (which is more po"werfull than all the counsel and policy of man) made means and gave occasion of a battle. There "was a river not very great, near to the enemies camp, whereto both Romans and Macedoni-
 "ans watered: and on either bank side certain guards kept their stations for the safety and security as well of the one part as the other. Two Cohorts there were for the Romans of Macedonians and Peloponnesians, footmen: two troops or companies besides of Samothracians, all commanded by M. Sergius Sylva a lieutenant. Over and besides, another flying company of footmen quartered before the camp, containing three cohorts, namely, of Erimian, Vettine, and Cemonian footmen together with two troops of Placentine and Esernian horsemen, all conducted by Publius Cestius. Now when all was well and quiet about the river, and no side provoked or challenged the other, it happened that a sumpter horse of the Romans about the fourth hour of the day brake from the hands of those that had the tending and keeping of him, took the river, and made toward the bank of the farther side: & when three foldiers followed after, cross the water almost knee-deep to catch him, the Thracians began to train the jade from the middle of the river to their bank side but after one of them was slain, the Romans recovered the dead again & retired to their own guard. Now there was a strong corps de guard of 800 Thracians upon the bank, which the enemies knew, from whence some few at first, taking it to the heart that a contrivance of theirs should thus be killed before their face, travelled over the river in pursuit of those that had slain him; afterwards more and more, and in the end all followed after, and together with that guard.

Leadeh to the battell. Men were moved with a reverence of the majesty of his place, as he was L. General; also with respect of the honour and glory of the man otherwise, and above all, with the regard of his age: for that being about threecore years old he had undergone the offices and parts of young men in the adventures of greatest travell and danger. That void space which was between the light targetters, called Cetrari, and the thick battailions named Phalanges, the legion took up clean, and broke within the battell of the enemies. Behind the Cetrari was this legion, and had in front them the Pavoiers called Agrippides, with repellent or thrusting shields, L. Arriani, who had been Consul belotetime, was commanded to lead against the battailion of other Pavoiers called Leucopid with white shields. And that was the main battell of the enemies. Against the right flank, from which quarter the skirmish first began about the river, the Elephants were conducted together with a wing of confederate horsemen, and from thence began the Macedonians to fly. For like as many new devices and inventions of men, carry some shew in appearance of words when they are first spoken of: but come to practice and try them once, and not to argue and dispute how they should be put in execution, they vanish away without effect and prove just nothing: even so at that time, the Elephants bare a name only in the battell, without any use and service at all. That violence of the Elephants (such as it was) the Latine allies seconded immediately, and forced the left flank to retire. Then the second legion was put forth, and in the midle entered upon the Phalanx and put it to flight; neither was there any caule of victory more evident than this, namely, that many skirmishes there were in divers places, which at the first troubled the Phalanx, and afterwards discomfited it. True it is that to abide the force thereof it is impossible, so long as it keepeth close united together & putteth forth their sharp pointed pikes bent thick touched together breast-high: but if a man by charging the same here and there, force them once to turn about those pikes, which for their length and heavy weight are unwieldy and hard to guide, they soon are intangled and catch one within another untowardly: but in case it fall out so that there be any tumult made either afank or behind, then there cometh a general trouble and confusion of all, as if they all at once came tumbling down: like as it hapned then, when as against the Romans, who assailed them by troops in sundry parts, they were driven to break their battailion into many pieces, as it were, and so to make head & affront the enemy. But the Romans espied where there was a breach made and lance left between, and there they would infiltrate, and wind in with their ranks and files: who, if they had runnup from the front of the Phalanx close ranged altogether with their whole battailion, they had enwrapped and entangled themselves within their pikes (which in the beginning of the conflict hapned to the Peloponnesians) as they unadvisedly dealt with the targetters, called Cetrari, and had never been able to sustain that battailion united thick and closed together. But as there was a cruel slaughter committed upon the companies of the infantry in every place, save only those that flung away their weapons and fled: so the foldiers of the Cavalry departed in manner late and loud out of the conflict. F. K. himself was the first man that fled: and now by this time was escaped beyond Pedia, and with his cornets of horsemen which they call Sacred made halle to Pella. Anon after followed Coffant, and the Cavalry of the Odyssians; consequently, other troops and companies of Macedonian horsemen departed and kept their arraires in broken: for that the Phalanx or battailion of the footmen between which kept the conquerors occupied in execution, put them quite out of remembrance to pursue the men of arms. A long time continued the massacre of this Phalanx afank, & behind. In the end, they who escaped the hands of the enemies & fled without weapons to the sea; some took the water, and stretching forth their hands to them that were aboard in the ships, most humbly besought them for to save their lives: and when they saw the small pinnaces and cockboats making apace on all hands toward them from the ships, they imagining that their coming was to catch them for their prisoners rather than to kill them outright, waded farther into the water, yea, and some swimm'd forward: but when they saw they were by them of the boats slain in all hostile manner like enemies, as many as could, swam back again to land: where they met with a fouler mischief, and were worse plagued than before: for the Elephants (driven by their governors to the shore) trode them under foot and crushed their guts out. All men generally agreed in this point, That never at any one field, were so many Macedonians defeated and killed by the Romans: for 20000 men were there slain, and to the number of 6000 (who fled to Pydna out of the battail) came alive into the enemies hands; 3000 besides were taken prisoners, as they fled scattering and disbanded here and there. Of the victors, there died not above an hundred, and the more part by way of Pe-lignians; but a greater number somewhat, were hurt and wounded. And if the battail had begun sooner, that the winners might have had day enough to follow the chase upon their enemies, as their forces had been utterly defeated and deavoured by the sword; but now the night coming upon them, as it covered and shadowed the enemies that fled, so it caused the Romans not to be so hotly and forward in pursuit; considering they were not acquainted with the coasts of the country. Perseus fled to the forest Pieria by the port road way, with a great number of horsemen and his royal train about him. So soon as he was entered the forest where the way divided into hindry and divers parts, seeing that the night approached, he turned out of the high beaven way with very few of his most loyal and faithful friends. The horsemen being thus abandoned and left destitute of their leader, slip some one way and some another home into their own Cities: certain of them (but very few) recovered Pella before Perseus himself, because they rode a direct and ready way. The K. was much troubled and vexed until midnight almost, what with fear and what with difficulty to find out the way. When he was come to Pella, Enlius the Governour thereof, and the Kings pages, were ready attendant at the court to wait upon him and do him service: but contrary-wise, of all those friends who escaped safe out of the battail and chanced by variable adventures to come into Pella, there would not one come at him, notwithstanding they were oftentimes sent for. Three only bare him company in that flight of his, to wit, Evander of Cyete, Nicomach a Boeotian, and Archidamus the Ætolian. Fearing therefore lest they who refused to come unto him, would soon after enterprife some greater matter against him; with those three he fled still forward, about the fourth watch of the night. After him there followed upon 500 Cæcetanians. Toward Amphipolis he went; but he departed in the night from Pella, making all he hath he could to pass over the river Axius before day-light, supposing that the Romans would give over the chase there, by reason of the difficult and dangerous foord.

The Consul being returned into the camp with victory, because he should not have the victory of fingers and palm, he was greatly disquieted and troubled about his younger son, as that son was Paulus, furnished also afterwards Africanus, because he called the City of Carthage: the name of the son was of the Consul Paulus, and the adopted nephew or grand child of Africanus was at that time 17 years of age, and (which augmented the sorrow of the father) while he lay in that time the enemies upon the spot, was carried by the prefect contrary way, in such sort, it was late ere he returned: and then the Consul having recovered him again safe and found, felt the joy of it to great a victory, and not before.

When the bruit and news of this battail was arrived at Amphipolis, and that the dames and wives of the City ran flocking into the Temple of Diana, whom they call Taurapolis, to beseech and call for her aid, Diadora the chief Governor of the City, fearing the Thracians (who were tooke in garriton) left in that tumult and garboil, they would spoile and rife the City: secretly labouring a fellow on set purpose in guile and shew of a letter-carrier, and received from him letters in the midst of the market place; wherein it was written, That the Roman fleet was arrived in Emathia, and that the centurios all about were pitifully waled by them; and therefore the rulers and capitans of Emathia requested him to send a garriton to succour them against these foragers. When he had read these chunterie letters, he exhorted the Thracians to undertake this expedition and to go into Emathia for to guard the coasts thereof: giving them to understand, that considering the Romans were loonly stragling and scattered about the fields and villages, they might make a full havock and laughter of them, and besides raise and bring away with them a great booty: withall he forger not to elevate himself as he could, the fame of the forsaide unhappy field fought, saying, That if all had been true, there would have been messengers coming thit once after another, with their flight, to bring fresh tidings all thitof. Under this pretence he sent away the Thracians; and so soon as he saw they were passed over the river Strymon, he contently he shut the gates. The third day after the battail fought, came Perseus to Amphipolis, and from thence he sent Orators to Paulus with an herald of peace, Mean-while Hippias, Midon, and Pantacrus the Kings principal friends, went themselves to the Consul, and surrendered unto the Romans Berribad whicher they had retired and fled immediately out of the field. Other Cities also stricken with fear, one after another, prepared to do the like.

And after another, prepared to do the like. The Consul, after he had sent to Rome with tidings and letters of this victory, Q. Fabius his own son, together with L. Lentulus and Q. Metellus, gave the spoils of the enemies army thus lying dead about, unto his captives; but the Romans he allowed the booty of all the territory round about, with condition, that they should not be absent from the camp more than two nights. Then, he received nearer unto the sea, and lodged about Pydna, Bistia, Bordia (as is before said) yielded, then Thracians and Pellians; and consequently, all Macedony wel-neer within two daies was surrendered. But the Pydneans who were next unto him, as yet were behind with fending their Embassadors: the reason was, for that the confused confidence thither of many nations, and the disordered multitude, at that that fled out of the field, and were all met there together, hindered the counsel and comfort of the whole City: so as the gates were not only shut, but also mured up. Now were Mitridates and Pompeius faine to parle under the walls with Salon, who lay there with a garrison; by whose means the whole troop and multitude of armed men was sent away, the City rendred up, and the pillage given to the souldiers.

once published, they all immediately revolted to the Romans, and stirred their names with C. P. P. H. himinus, a martial colonel. Likewise Ion of Thessalonica, delivered into the hands of Othobius the young infants of the King, and not one of them all was left with Perseus, but Philip his eldest son: and then he yielded both himself and that son into the hands of Othobius, crying out upon fortune, and blaming the Gods in whose Temple they were, for that he received no aid and succour from them, notwithstanding he humbly craved and besought the same. Then commandment was given, that he should be embarked in the admirals ship: and thither also was brought aboard all the money that remained, and then forthwith the fleet retired to Amphipolis: from whence Othobius sent the King to the camp unto the consul, but first he had dispatched his letters to give him knowledge, that he was sure enough under his hand; and that he was at the point to be brought unto him. Pamphus, reputing this for a second victory, (as it was no less indeed to be esteemed) presently upon the receipt of the message, killed beasts for sacrifice: and when he had called his Council about him, and read the letters of the Pretor before them, he sent Q. Aelius Thersites to meet the King, upon the way, and commanded the rest in good frequency to remain in his capital pavillion, and give attendance upon him. Never was there seen before, so great a multitude to run out to see any solemn fight or pageant. In their fathers daies King Syphax was taken prisoner and brought into the Roman camp: who besides that there was no comparison between him and Perseus, either in regard of his own name or the renown of his nation, was then also but an necessary as it were to the Punick war, like as Geminus now to the Macedonian. Perseus was the very head of this war, neither was it the fame of his father and grandfire only (whom he neerly touched in birth and blood) that made him renowned, but the resplendent glory of Philip and Alexander the Great, who brought the sovereign empire and monarchy of the whole world to the Macedonian nation. Well, Perseus entered the camp arrayed in a black cloak, without any one of his own train to accompany him, who partaking his misery, might cause more compassion to be had of him. The affluence of the people was so great who went out to see him, that for the very price he could not march forward, until such time as the consul sent his sergeants and his sister to void the thronging of the multitude, and make way for him to go to the consul his pavillion. The consul arose, and (giving commandment to the rest for to sit still) advanced forward a little, and caught up his hand to the King as he entered into the pavillion; and when he bowed and debased himself to his very feet, he took him up again and would not suffer him once to touch his knees, but led him into the tent and caused him to sit down right over-against those whom he called thither to counsel. The first question that he demanded of him was this: "What wrong he had sustained at the hands of the people of Rome, that he should be constrained to enterprise and begin the war against them with so malicious a mind as he did, and so to hazard himself, his whole state and Kingdom, in such extremity of danger? And when every man attended what answer he would make, he staid a good while without utterance of one word, casting his eyes willy upon the ground, and shedding tears withal. Then spake the consul again: If you had been but a young (qd. he) when you came to the crown, I would verily for my part marvel the less, that you should be so ignorant as not to know how important it was, to have the people of Rome either for a friend or an enemy: but now, since you both had your hand in that war which your father waged against us and also could not chuse but remember the peace afterwards made with them, and which we observed most faithfully, What policy was it for you to entertain war rather than peace, with them, whose force you had tried in war and whose fidelity you had found in peace? When as he would yet make no answer at all either to question or accusation, the consul went on and said: "Well, howsoever these things are thus fallen out: and come to pass, be it through the error and frailty of man by adventure of fortune and hard hap, or fatal necessity of the destinies, he of good cheer yet, and take a mans heart unto you: the gracious clemency and mercy of the people of Rome, well known and proved in the misfortunes of many Princes and States, afforded unto you not only hope, but certain assurance of safety. Thus much spake he to Perseus in the Greek tongue: then, turning to his own assistants and company about him, he directed his speech to them in Latine as followeth. "A notable example and rare mirror you see (qd. he) of the changeable variety of this world: to you I speak especially, my masters here that are steeple and youthful gallants in the heat of your young blood. And therefore let no man in time of his prosperity, carry himself proud and violent against another, nor yet confidently to trust upon the present state wherein he is, for who knoweth what may hap once yet before midnight? But him alone will I hold for a man of valour indeed, whose heart neither the gentle gale of this fawning and flattering world is able to louse aloft, nor yet the blustering blasts of frowning fortune cast down or dash upon the rocks. After the consul was risen and departed, he committed the charge and custody of keeping the King to Quintus Aelius. But forth day Perseus was not only invited courteously to sup with the consul, but respected also in all kind of honor, as possibly might be done unto him in that state and condition of his.

After this the army was divided here and there into garrisons for the winter time. The greatest part thereof was received into Amphipolis, and the other cities neer adjoining entertained the rest. This was the end of the war between Perseus and the Romans, which had endured four years one after another continually: and here an end withal of the most flourishing Kingdom of the greatest part of Europe and of all Asia. Perseus was counted the twentieth King after Carausius, who was the first that reigned there. This Perseus began his reign that year wherein Q. Fulvius and and L. Manlius were Consuls. In the time of M. Junius and A. Manlius Consuls of Rome, the Senat entitled and honoured him with the name of King, and eleven years his reign continued. The name of these Macedonians was very obscure and basile, until the daies of Philip the son of Amyntas. From that time and by his means it began to grow and wax great: howbeit, contained it was within the compass and precincts of Europe, comprehending all Greece, and part of Thrace and Illyricum. Afterwards it spread into Asia, and in thirteen years space, during the reign of Alexander, it subdued and brought under subjection, first all those parts whereunto the empire of the Persians extended, which was an infinite dominion in circuit: afterwards it reached to Arabia and Indu, even to the end of the earth, bounding and confining all about upon the red sea. At that time was the monarchy and name of the Macedonians the greatest in the whole world, but upon the death of Alexander, distracted it was and divided into many and sundry Kingdoms. And whilst each one endeavoured & strove by force to draw unto him more and more puissance, they dissembled and rent the whole: & so from the height of pitch of prosperity, brought it down to a most base and low condition, after it had continued in good estate a hundred and fifty years; When the bruit of the Romans victory was blazed and blown as far as to Asia. Antenor who with a fleet of barks and pinnaces rid in the harbour of Pharos, sailed from thence to Cassandrea. C. Popilius, who was in Delos to guard and wait those ships which were bound for Macedonia, after he heard say that the war in Macedonia was brought to an end, and the enemies vessels removed out of their rode, dismissed also for his part the Athenian ships, intending to go forward in his voyage for Egypt, to accomplish that embassy which he had taken in hand: to the end that he might encounter Antiochus, before he approached the walls of Alexandria. As these Embassadors coasted along the river of Asis, and were arrived at Loryma (a port somewhat more than twenty miles distant from Rhodes, and situate just over against the city) the principal States of Rhodes, met him in the way (for now by this title was the fame of this victory flown so far) requesting him to let sail thither and thence to land: for that it concerned their city much in fame and reputation, yea, and was expedient for their good and safety, that they should be made acquainted with all that either had been done or was now in hand at Rhodes, and so to make report thereof at Rome upon their own knowledge, and not as things were voiced by the common bruit. They refused a long time, but in the end they were so importuned, that content they were to sail a little farther, and spend some small time for to gratify and benefit a city associat unto them. When they were come to Rhodes, the same principal citizens aforesaid urged them instantly with much prayer and entreaty to come into their general assembly of the people. The arrival of those Embassadors rather augmented than empaired the fear of the city. For Popilius made rehearsal there in open audience, of all which had been done or spoken (founding any way to hostility) either in particular or in general by them, during the late war. And being as he was a grim fir, tough and fierce by nature, he aggravated all that he spake, with his sour visage and sharp language, like an accuser at the bar: in such manner as they might well conjecture and guesse, how the whole body of the Senate stood affected unto him, by the bitterness of one only Senator, who otherwise for himself had no occasion of particular ill will and malice against the city. But the speech of Decimius was more temperate, who said, that the blame of those imputations for the most part which were objected by Popilius, was not to be laid upon the people, but upon a few persons, who had solicited and stirred the multitude: for those having their tongue at hire, and using to speak for gain, had made decrees full of flattery to please the King, and sent such embassages, as the Rhodians at all times were no less ashamed than repented of. All which practices of theirs no doubt would fall upon their heads who were faulty, in case the people had the government and rule in their own hands. Audience he had with great assent and applause: not more for elevating the fault and trespass of the common people, than for laying the weight upon those that were the authors culpable. And therefore when the chieft men among them made answer to the Romans, their words, who went about to excuse and save in some sort as well as they could the articles objected by Popilius, were not so well taken, as their speech who accorded to Decimius, in delivering the guilty persons and offenders to be punished according to their demerits. Whereupon there passed presently a decree, That all those who might be convicted of any deed done or word spoken in favour of Perseus against the Romans, should be condemned and have sentence to lose their heads. Some of these persons were departed out of the city upon the coming of the Romans, others laid violent hands upon themselves. These Embassadors or delegats having sojournd no longer than five daies at Rhodes, departed and made sail for Alexandria. And notwithstanding their absence, the execution of judicial proceeding was no less holily followed at Rhodes, according to the decree made in their presence. For the moderation and gentle carriage of Decimius was the very cause that they persisted resolute, and gave not over until they had gone through with it, and dispatched all.

Whilst these affairs were thus managed, Antiochus after he had assaid in vain to force the walls of Alexandria, was departed from before the city, & having possessed himself of all Egypt besides, and left the elder Ptolemus at Memphis, (for whose behoof he pretended by his own forces to reconquer the Kingdom, to the end that soon after the conquest obtained, he might set upon him, likewise) withdrew his army away into Syria. Ptolemus for his part was nothing ignorant of his designment and intention, making full account, that whilst he kept his younger brother affrighted with the fear of siege, by the help of his sister he might be received into Alexandria: considering withal, that his brothers friends were not opposed against him, first he sent unto his sister, after.

afterwards to his brother and his friends, and never gave over to write and send, before he had concluded and established a peace with them. The thing that made him to suspect Antiochus was this, for that when he had made over all the rest of Egypt unto him, he left yet a strong garison behind at Pelusium: and well he knew, that he held still the frontier Towns as the very keys of Egypt: to the end that he might with an army enter and invade again, whenever he would. And thus he conceived of it, that this would be the issue of the civil and domestical war between brethren. That the victor wearied with war, should not be able to make head against Antiochus. These things wisely forecaft and seen by the elder brother, were received with assent of the younger, and those that were assitant about him: and the sister between stood in very good stead, not by her good advice and counsel only, but also by her effectual prayers. And therefore by a general accord of all, a peace was concluded, and the elder Ptolemus received into Alexandria, without any gain- saying or resistance at all so much as of the very multitude: notwithstanding that during the war they were much decayed and weakened (not only by the siege, but also after it was raised and the army gone from Alexandria) for want of all things, by reason that no provisions were brought thither from out of Egypt. Now, where as Antiochus should have taken great contentment and rejoiced much for this, in case he had brought his forces into Egypt for to restore Ptolemus into his own estate (which was the goodly pretence and colourable shew that he made to all the States of Asia and Greece, when he received their embassages, or sent forth his letters into all parts) it fell out, that he was to highly offended and displeased hereat, that he went in hand and prepared to make war now against them both much more eagerly and with greater malice than before against one alone. Presently he rigged and sent out his navy at sea to Cyprus; himself in person at the beginning of the spring minding to invade Egypt marched forward with his army as far as into Cale-Syria. The Embassadors of Ptolemus encountered him in his journey about Rhinocelura, and gave him thanks in behalf of their King, and matters, for that by his means he had recovered the inheritance of his fathers Kingdom: requesting withal to maintain that benefit and good deed of his; to declare rather by word of mouth what he would have done, than deal by sword in hand and force of arms, and not of friend and ally to become a mortal enemy. His answer was, that he would neither call back his fleet nor withdraw his army upon any condition, unless he quit unto his use as well the whole Isle of Cyprus, as the City  Pelusium*, together with the territory about the mouth of Nilus, called  Pelusiaceum Offium*. And therewith he set him down a day before which he expected to receive his answer as touching the accomplishment of the said conditions. After the day prefixed for the truce was past, as they failed in the mouth of Nilus near Pelusium, the states along the deserts of Arabia yielded. Then, being received of them, that inhabit about Memphis, and the rest of the Egyptians, partly with favor and good will and partly for fear and constraint: by small journeys he descended toward Alexandria. When he was passed over the river at Leontine (a place about 4 miles distant from Alexandria) the Roman Embassadors met him upon the way. After greetings and salutations at their first coming, he put forth his right hand to Popilius: but he delivered unto him a scroll written, and willed him before he did any thing else to read that script. After he had read the writing through he answered that he would devise with his friends and consider what was best to be done. But Popilius according to his ordinary blunder manner of speech which he had by nature made a circle about the King with the rod that he had in his hand, and withal, "Make me an answer (qd. he) I advise you such as I may report to the Senate, before you pass the compass of this circle. The King assented at this so rude and violent a commandment, after he had staied and paused a while: I will be content (qd. he) to do whatsoever the Senat shall ordain. Then and not before, Popilius gave the King his hand as to a friend and ally. Afterwards when Antiochus was departed out of Egypt by the day prefixed, the said Embass. or delegates having by their authority established concord also between the two brethren (who as yet were not thoroughly agreed) some of them failed to Cyprus, and from thence they sent away the fleet of Antiochus, which already had given an overthrow in battail to the Egyptian ships. This was a noble embassage and much renowned among those nations, for that thereby Egypt was undoubtedly taken from Antiochus, who was as good as possessed thereof already, and the inheritance of the Kingdom restored again to the race of Ptolemus.

Of the two Consuls that year, like as the one was famous in his place by this notable victory, so the other was little or nothing spoken of, by reason he had not matter of any great exploit to be employed in. And first of all when he was assigned a certain day for the legions to meet, he entered into the temple without the lucky approbation of the auspices. And when the Augurs were moved and their advice required therein, they declared, that there was an error committed in the appointment of the said day. In his voiage for France he kept his standing leaguer for the summer time about the mountains Sicimina and Popinus near the plains called  Macri*. And afterwards he wintred about the same places with the allies of the Latine nation. For, the Roman legions, because the day was not rightly appointed for the assembly of the forces at the Rendevous, remained behind at Rome. Also the Pretors, save only C. Pappus, Carbo, unto whose lot Sardinia was fall, went forth into their Provinces: and him the LL. of the Senate had ordained to attend upon his civil jurisdiction at Rome between citizens and foreigners. Popilius, likewise, that embassage which was sent to Antiochus returned to Rome: where he made relation that the controversies between the two Kings were decided & the army of Antiochus retired out of Egypt into Syria. After this, came the Embass. also of the Kings themselves. Those of Antiochus made report that the King their inalter esteemed more of the peace approved by the Senat, than of any victory whatsoever: and obeyed the orders set down by the Roman Embassadors, no less than the very messengers coming with commandments directly from the Gods: and finally they testified their own contentment, and wished them great joy of their victory obtained, saying that the King himself would have been with all his power at the achieving thereof, in case he had been enjoined to perform any service: The Embassadors of Ptolemus in the name jointly of their King and of Cleopatra, rendered thanks unto them, acknowledging themselves more bound & beholden to the Senat and people of Rome, than to their own parents, yea & more than to the immortal Gods for by their good means they were still delivered from the most lamentable miseries of a siege, and had recovered their fathers Kingdom, which they were at the point to have lost for ever. The Senat returned this answer again, that whereas Antiochus had been ruled by the Embassadors, thereby he did well and as it becomed him, and in so doing he highly contented and pleased the Senat and people of Rome. Again, Ptolemus and Cleopatra the King and Queen of Egypt, had found any goodneels and commodity by them, the Senat was very glad thereto and rejoiced thereat and would endeavour and work it so, that they might be persuaded that the greatest assurance and safeguard of their realm rested at all times most in the faithful protection of the people of Rome. This said, the Pretor C. Pappus had in charge to see that presents and gifts were sent to these Embassadors according to the ancient custome. Then were letters brought out of Macedony to redouble the joy of the victory, importing that Perseus was sure enough in the hands of the Consul.

When those Embassadors were dismissed and gone, much debate and argument there was between the Embassadors of the Pisans and Lunenies. They of Pisec complained that they were diseized & driven out of their territory by the Roman coloners: contrarywise those of Luna plainly averted, that the Land in controversy had been set out and assigned for them by the Triumvirs. The Senat hereupon sent five men as commissioners to make inquiry into the limits of the said territory and to determine accordingly, and those were Q. Fabius Buteo, P. Cornelius Blafio, T. Sempronius Mancus, L. Navinus Balbus, and C. Apulcius Saturninus. There came likewise a solemn embassage sent in common from Eumenes, Attalus, and Antiochus, all three brethren, to notify the joy and contentment which they took for the Romans victory. Moreover, L. Manlius the treasurer was ready at Puteoli to receive and welcome Masgaba the son of K. Masinissa, as he should disembark and set on land: for sent he was of purpose with money to meet him upon the way, to conduct him aloft and bring him to Rome at the cities charges. He was no sooner come, but immediately audience was given him in the Senat. "This young Prince (pake in such sort, as the things which of themselves were acceptable enough indeed, he graced and made more worthy of acceptance by his good words. He rehearsed what forces of foot and horie both, how many Elephants, what quantity of corn for that four years space (during the war) his father had sent over into Macedony. But two things there were for which he was dismaied and could not chule but blush: the one, that the Senat by their Embass. had made request unto him; and not commanded rather to furnish them with necessaries for the war: the other, that they had sent him money to pay for their corn. For Masgaba was not forgetful, but bare well in mind, that he held his Kingdom as he had conquered for him, afterwards augmented and amplified many waies unto him by the people of Rome: and for his own part, he could contege himself with the life and occupation thereof, as a tenant in fee-farm: acknowledging the propriety and possession thereof to be in them, who as Lords of the fee scoffed him therein. Good reason therefore and meet it was that they also should be hold with their own to take and not to aske to have and not to crave, much less then to buy the commodities & fruits issuing out of the lands by them demised, given & granted. As for Masgaba, sufficed he was, and evermore would felt contented with that overplus which the people of Rome might leave and spare for him. Thus much (qd. he) I had in charge and commission from my fathers own mouth: when I departed and took my leave of him: but afterwards certain horsemen riding post overtook me, to let me understand that Macedony was subdued, and to charge me, that after I had signified our joy in your behalf, I should shew unto the Senat, that my father took such contentment therein, that he would gladly come to Rome, to offer sacrifice and render thanks to Iuppiter, Mars in the Capitol: which to do he requested leave of the Senat, (so he might stand with their good liking, and be no trouble unto them. The Prince received this answer from the Senat: That his father Masgaba did as becomed a good man and thankful person, for so doing giving such a grace and honor over & above, to benefit of duty required; moreover, that the people of Rome acknowledged how they had received great help at his hands in the victory of the people of Rome, yea, and afterwards according to equity and justice had born himself right worthily in all sorts of devours and duties during the wars of three Kings one after another. Neither was it any marvel at all that he rejected at the victory of the people of Rome, being a King, who had engaged, hazarded and entangled all his own fortunes and the whole estate of his Kingdom with the Roman affairs. As for rendering thanks to the Gods for the victory of the people of Rome, let him do that himself in his own house at home; for it should suffice, that his sons for him performed that duty at Rome. That he, and his father both had sufficiently for their parts testified their joy. As for Masgaba in proper person to leave his realm and depart over  Africa*: over and besides that it was in no wise profitable to himself, the Senat deemed it not expedient for the weal-publick of the people of Rome. Masgaba further more requested, that that Hanno the son of Amilcar should be least hostage in place of another Carthaginian (whose name is not known) but the Senat answered, That they thought it not meet to demand hostages at the pleasure of Masaniſſa. The treasurer was commanded by order from the Senat, to buy certain presents for to bestow upon this young Prince, namely, as much plate as might sate one of an hundred pound weight of silver: also to accompany him as far as Pisaudi to defray all his charges during his abode within Italy; and to hire two ships for to transport and conduct him & his prince by train into Africa. To all his returns as well bond as free, there was allowance made of apparel.

Not long after, were letters brought as concerning Miffagenus the second son of Masaniſſa who after that Paulus had vanquished Perseus, was sent home by the said Paulus into Africa with his Cavalry: but as he sailed, was driven (sick as he was) upon Brundisium with three ships only, for that the rest of the fleet was dispersed in the Adriatick Sea. Stertinus the treasurer was sent to him at Brundisium, with the like gifts as were bestowed upon his brother at Rome, and a charge to see to his lodging.

By virtue of an act granted out of the Senat, the Libertini [the sons of freed men] were enrolled into the four tribes of the City, all save those who had a son above five years old; with express commandment, That when they were to be enrolled at the review next ensuing their goods also should be valued, and they accordingly entered into the subsidy books; namely, That as many of them as possessed any manor or manors in the country, esteemed better worth than 30000 Sesterces, should be enrolled and assessed. This ordinance being thus observed, Claudius denied flatly, that the Censor had authority to take from any particular person, and much less from a whole state and degree of men, the right and liberty of inheritance, without the warrant and ordinance of the people: for say, that he have power to take a man out of his tribe, (which is nothing else but to command him to change his tribe) it followeth not then, that he may dispossess and displace him out of all the 35 tribes, which is as much as to strike him out of the number of citizens, and deprive him quite of his freedom and bourgeoisie: and is not (I say) to limit and set down in what rank he shall be enrolled, but to exclude him full and wholly out of all enrolment.

This dispute and debate passed between them; untill at last they grew to this point, that of the four City tribes, they should cast lots openly in the Hall and Cloister of Liberty for one tribe, in which all they should be registred and comprised, who had been villains sometimes and were then freed. Now this lot fell to the tribe Exquilina. Then Tib. Gracchus pronounced, That ordained it was to enrol in it all the Libertini. Great honour and reputation with the Senat gained the Censors by this act: Sempronius likewise won much thanks therefore; because he had persisted constantly in that good enterprise so well commended: and Claudius went not without his due thank, for that he was no hindrance to this proceeding. In this review and survey taken by the Censors, more Senators were removed and put out of the council, yea, and more Centurians commanded to sell their horses of service, than by other Censors in former time. And all those by both of them jointly were not only displaced out of their tribes, and made no better than Strangers (i. to lose their voice) but also to pay all taxes whatsoever to the utmost. And look who was noted and disgraced by the one, had no relief nor hope to recover his credit and place by the other. Now when these Censors demanded, That according to a custom and order, they might be allowed a years space and two months of stop in the reparations of the public edifices, which they were maintained wind-tight and water-tight; as also to see whether they who had undertaken to finish certain works at a price, had performed their bargain accordingly: Cn. Tremellus a Tribune interposed himself and denied this demand, for aeger that he was not chosen had taken into the Senat. The same year C. Ceregrinus dedicated a chapel in the Albaine mount, which he had vowed five years before. Also that year was L. Posthumius Albinus entailed a Plaine of Mars.

The Consuls Q. Elius and M. Junius propounded in the Senate, as touching the government of their Provinces: and the LL. ordained, That Spain should be divided again into two Provinces, which had been united in one during the Macedonian war: also that the same L. Paulus and L. Anicius should defend and keep in obedience as before, Macedony and Illyricum, untill such time as they by the advice of certain deputed commissioners, had both composed all matters and affairs disordered and troubled by the wars: and also reformed the estate of that realm, by introducing it into a new form. The Provinces assigned unto the Consuls were Pisand and Gaul, and they had the command of two legions of footmen, and four hundred horsemen apiece. The Pretors had their lots for government as followeth: The civil jurisdiction over citizens fell to Q. Cassius, and over strangers to M. Juvencius. Talon: Tib. Claudius Nero was L. deputy of Sicily, Cn. Fulvius of the better Spain, and C. Licinius Nerva of the farther: last of all, A. Manlius Terentius was appointed to the government of Africa: but into his province he could not go, by occasion that he was detained at home by virtue of an act of the Senat, to make inquiry into certain felonious and capital crimes. After this, consultation there was in the Senat as touching the prodigies which were reported. The chapel of the Penates (protectors of the City) in Pala was smitten with thunder and lightning. Also in the Town Minervium, two gates and a good part of the wall fell like harm. At Arminia had rained earth, and in Laonivius there appeared in the sky a burning flame. Moreover, M. Valerius a citizen of Rome gave knowledge, that in Celutis within the publick territory of that City, for the space of three dayes and two nights together, blood gushed out in his chimney hearth where he kept fire: and for this strange sight above all the rest, the Decemvirs were commanded to have recourse unto the books of Sibylla: who pro-

* This hath respect to some other act, which is not extant.

A proclaimed a publick supplication of the people for one day, and sacrificed fifty goats in the common market place of the City. Also in regard of the other prodigies, a supplication was holden another day, and men did their devotions at every altar of the Gods: greater beasts were killed for sacrifices, and the City was solemnly cleansed and purged. This done, as touching the honor of the immortal Gods, the Senat ordained, that sofar as such as the two Kings Perseus & Centius their enemies were overcome, and now at the devotion of the people of Rome, together with Macedony and Illyricum, Q. Cassius and M. Juvencius the Pretors should give order as great oblation to be offered unto the Gods at every shrine and altar, as had been heretofore (when App. Claudius and M. Sempronius were Consuls) for the defeat of King Antiochus. Then they ordained certain delegats, by whose advice L. Paulus and L. Anicius the two Generals, might let all affairs in order, namely, ten into Macedony, and five into Illyricum. For Macedony were nominated A. Posthumius Lucius and C. Claudius, (who both had been Censors) C. Licinius Crassus, late companion to Paulus in the Consulship, and who at that present had the government of Gaul continued him. To these delegats above-named, men of Consular dignity all by their callings, were adjoined in commission Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, Ser. Cornelius Sylla, L. Junius, C. Antistius Labo, T. Naevius Tergintius, and Aulus Terentius Varro. For Illyricum were these named, P. Elius Light, one that had been Consul, C. Cicereius and Cn. Babius Tamphilus (this Babius had been Pretor but the former year, and Cicereius many years past) P. Terentius Terevianus, and P. Manilius. Then the Consuls being advertised by the LL. of the Senat, that (sofar as such as one of them must succeed C. Licinius in Gaul, who was nominated one of the delegats) they should part their Provinces between them either by accord and agreement, or by lot make choice of the fortune of lottery. So Pisae fell to M. Junius (but before he went into his province, he had in charge to bring into the Senat, those embassies which from all parts were come to Rome for to declare their joy in the behalf of the people of Rome) and Gaul to Q. Elius.

Albeit such perfections were sent, as by whose large counsel good hope there was, that the chief commanders of the Roman armies would pass no decree unbefitting either the clemency or Majesty of the people of Rome, yet debated it was in the Senat about the sum and principal points of all their counsels and designs: to the end that the said Legats might carry unto the Generals all things plotted already and begun to their hands at home in the City. In the first place ordained it was, that the Macedonians and Illyrians remain free and enjoy their liberties, that all nations of the earth might see, that the draft of the Roman armies and forces was not to bring free states into servitude, but contrarywise to reduce those that were in bondage to liberty, to the end that those nations which now enjoyed freedom, might be secured under their safeguard and protection both of surety and perpetuity, and such as lived in subjection under the Kings, might both for the present time find their government more mild and righteous, for that respect which the Kings have of the people of Rome; and also, if it fortune hereafter, that there should be war between the people of Rome and their Kings, they might be assured that the issue of those wars would bring victory to the Romans, and procure liberty to themselves. Also agreed it was that there should be no more farming out of the metal mines in Macedony, albeit they yielded a great revenue; nor yet of publick lands and possessions in the country: for possible it was not that these matters should be practised and followed without publicans; and where those intermeddle & have ought to do, then it must needs follow, that either the publick right and prerogative of the State be annulled, or the liberty of allies come to nothing. Neither were the Macedonians themselves able to twidle the same: for look where the ministers and managers of any thing see a booty presented before their eyes, there, occasions of sedition and contention will never be wanting. Moreover, concluded it was, that there should be no common and general counsel of the whole nation, for that left at any time the low vulgar people having by the Senat liberty granted unto them tending unto a good and wholesome moderation and equality of the State, should abuse the same and draw it into a malicious and pestilent licentiousness. But they thought it good policy to divide Macedony into four quarters and comities, that each one might have their several counsel: likewise it was supposed to stand with good reason and equity, that they should pay the onemoney of that tribute which they were wont to yield unto their Kings. Semblable commission and like directions, they had for Illyricum. As for all other matters, referred they were to the managing of their affairs, the Legats according to the occurrences presented unto them in the managing of their affairs.

Among many and sundry Embassadors of Kings, nations, and states, Antistius the brother of K. Juvencius most of all others amused mens minds, and drew their eyes upon him: for by them who had born affairs together with him in that war, welcomed he was much more heartily, and received with greater courtesy than if Emmenes the King himself had come. Two occasions there were outwardly pretended, and those carrying a good show of honesty and credit, which brought him to Rome: the one, a gratulation or testimony of joy (as meet it was) for that victory, wherein himself had helped hand; the other, a complaint of French tumultuous wars and the bloody hostility of Adelpius their King, by which means his brothers Kingdom was in great jeopardy. But thereby another thing hidden underneath, namely, an inward and secret hope that he conceived of honors and rewards from the Senat, which hardly he could seem to aim & reach unto, without some kindness and violence offered to brotherly duty and affection. For some there were even of the Romans also, who did him no good, but gave him bad counsel, drew in his appetite with fair hopes, hopes, and set him a longing, feeding him with these and such like conceits; That in Rome this was the opinion entertained of Attalus and Eumenes, as if the one of them were a friend fast and sure to the Romans; the other an ally, found and faithful neither to the Romans nor yet to Perseus; and therefore hard it were to set down and say, Whether of the twain would be more easily obtained at the Senate's hands, namely, a suit made in his own name for his prebendment, or a demand of some hard course against his brother: so bent were all men in general to grant any thing to Attalus, and to deny every thing to Eumenes. Attalus (as the sequel and proof shewed) was pliant to those persons whose desires reach at all that hope promitteth, had not the sage admonition of one friend come between to bridle his affections, ravished and transported so as they were with the amiable aspect and fawning flattery of his own good fortune. He had about him at that time one Siratus a Physician, sent by Eumenes (who rested not secure of his brothers loyalty) to Rome, of purpose for to lie in espial and observe all that Attalus did and to advise him faithfully, if he saw him tread awry and practise ought against his duty and allegiance. When he came unto him, he found his ears already possessed, and his spirit tempted and solicited beforehand: howbeit taking his times and waiting opportunities, he went roundly to work and stuck so it close, until he had set all up again which was at the point to run on end and fall to the ground. He alleged and laid these remonstrances before his eyes, saying, "That Kingdoms have grown mighty, some by one means, some by others: but as for theirs, being but newly erected, & grounded upon no strength of ancient foundations, it stood upright only by the mutual concord of him and his brethren, in that one of them beareth the name and title of King, wearing the diadem and crown alone upon his head, but in effect all three brethren be KK. As for you Attalus (qd. he) you are the eldest brother have one, who is it that reputeth you for less than a King, not only for that he seeth you so mighty at this present, but also the next heir apparent, and without all doubt like shortly to reign indeed; considering the feeble body and crazy age of Eumenes, who hath besides, no issue of children to succeed him in the royal throne? (as yet he took no knowledge of him that reigned afterwards.) What need then is there to use violence, and to force that which of its own accord will shortly be devolved upon you & fall into your hands? Moreover, a new tempest and storm is risen of French wars, threatening peril unto the realm, which it will be hard for you Princes to withstand, agree as well as you can in all brotherly love, unity and concord. But if for a war abroad, there should arise a domestic and civil dissension between you at home, what remedy then but utter ruin and destruction? Neither shall you Attalus purchase any good, but this, first, to prevent that your brother be not King, and then so diabolic and disappoint your self, that near and assured hope you have to be KK. But say, that to preserve a Kingdom for a brother, and to wrest a Kingdom from a brother, were honorable and glorious deeds both the one and the other; yet surely of the twain, to have saved a Kingdom delivereth greater commendation and praise, in that it forth to well with piety and kindness. And certainly, seeing the other is a cruel and detestable part, even next neighbor to parricide, what struple and doubt remaineth now which needeth any farther deliberation? For tell me, I beseech you, is it one parcel of the Kingdom that you reach at, or shoot you at the whole? If you aim at a part only, then upon the dismembering and distraction of your piñance, you shall be both twain much weakened and exposed to the danger of all injuries; if you would have all, what shall become of your brother? Would you wish him being your eldest, to live a private person? or so far fleet in years as he is, a banished man; and namely, with those infirmities of body which he carrieth about him? or would you command to take his life away and rid him out of this world at once? Now truly to say nothing of the unhappy and miserable issue of such graceless and wicked brethren delivered unto us in fained fables, you see what a goodly fair end Perseus is come unto, who being in the Temple of Samothracia, was constrained lying prostrate upon the ground to prostitute himself at the feet of the enemy his conqueror, the crown and diadem which he came unjustly by, even with the unnatural murder of his own brother: as if the Gods in heaven had been there present, to require due punishment for his horrible fact. To conclude, they also themselves, who in friendly love and affection to you, but in rancor and hatred to your brother Eumenes, have upon these designs into your head, and prick you on to execute the same: even they. They will praise your kindness, your piety and constancy, in case you persevere true and trusty to your brother; to the very end. These and such like important persuasions prevailed with Attalus and ferred deeply in his mind. Therefore being admitted into the Senate, after he had wished joy unto them, and protested his own for the late victory, he laid abroad and declared his own demerits and good service in that war, the favors also (such as they were) done by his brother, and last of all, the revolt of the Gauls lately broken out with great troubles and commotions. His petition to the Senate was, for to send their Embassadors unto them, by whose countenance and authority they might be reclaimed, and to lay arms at de. Having declared this message which concerned the profit in general of the realm; he made a special suit for himself, and demanded to have Eumenes and Myrrina given unto him. And thus, when he had put them besides their hope, who thought verily, that after he had accused his brother, he would have required the kingdom to be divided between him & dismembered, he departed out of the Council-house. Seldom had been known at any time before any man whatsoever, King or subject, to have had the like audience with so great favour and applause of all men, as he: received and entertained he was right honourably with gifts & presents of all sorts whiles he was at Rome, and with the like they accompanied him at his departure.

Among

Among many Embassies of Asia and Greece, the Rhodian Embassadors were most marked and looked upon throughout all the City: for whereas at first they were all trim and goodly to be seen in their white and bright apparel, as decent it was for them that would seem to congratulate for the victory (for if they had worn black or been poorly arrayed, it might have been contrived, that they mourned for the misfortune and calamity of Perseus) after that M. Junius the Consul brake with the LL. of the Senat (and all that while the said Embassadors stood without in the common place Comitium) to consider and advise, whether they would allow lodging, presents, and give audience in the Senat unto them: they resolved and were of opinion to oblige no rights nor customs of hospitality with them. Then went the Consul out of the Senat: unto whom when the Rhodians said that they were come to rejoice in their behalf for the late victory, and withal to answer in the name of their City to certain crimes where-with they were charged, requesting that they might speak before the Senat and be heard with indifference: the Consul pronounced aloud unto them, That the custom indeed of the Romans was to entertain their allies and friends graciously, and among other matters of courtesy and hospitality which they afforded unto them, to grant them also a day of hearing in the Senat: but the Rhodians had not demeaned themselves during the war, in such sort, as to be reckoned in the number of lovers and associates. At the hearing of these words they cast themselves all prostrate on the ground, beseeching the Consul and all those that were present, not to suffer that false imputations of late furnished should against a free people, prejudice the Rhodians more, than their good deeds of old (whereof themselves were sufficient witnesses) stand them in Read. And presently after they had put on simple apparel and mourning weeds, they went about from house to house visiting the principal persons of the City humbly beseeching them with tears, to hear their cause before they were condemned. M. Junius (who the Pretor or chief justice for the pleas between citizens and strangers, was the only agent that provoked and incited the people against the Rhodians: nay, he had promulgated and published a bill to this effect, That war might be denounced against the Rhodians; also, that out of the Magistrats for that year they would make choice of some one to be sent as Admiral with a Fleet for the managing of that war: hoping that himself should be the man. But this action and proceeding of his was crossed by M. Antonius and M. Pomponius, two Tribuns of the commons. Cret and besides, the Pretor, to say a truth, had broken this matter after a new and strange fashion, and to the evil example of future times, in that he preferred a bill unto the people of his own head alone, without asking the advice of the Senat, or making the Consuls acquainted therewith: and that in this manner and form. Pleaseth it you, and is it your will, that war be proclaimed against the Rhodians? whereas alwaies before-time, in question of war, the Senates advice was first taken, and then the thing was proposed unto the people. Likewise the Tribuns of the commons for their part, did more than they might, and aching not warrantable by any precedent, for it was a custom and tradition observed ever of old, that no person should interpose his negative to cross any bill, before that privat men in particular had their course and turn granted, both to periwade or dissuade the same: by which means many a time it fell out, that even they who never protested nor meant to oppose themselves, being moved and induced by the reasons of those that stood up to disswade, and perceiving also by them the inconveniences of such a bill, would step between and baffle all: yea, and contrarywise such as came of purpose to cross and nip the same being convinced by the authority and born down by the important arguments alledged by those that enforced the said bill, would desist and surcease. Thus the Pretors and Tribuns strove much who should do every thing more unseasonably than others. The Tribuns impeached and laid the halities of the Pretor, interposing their negative before the time, and delaying the matter until the coming of the L. General.

"Whether we have transgressed and offended yea, or no, that yet remaineth doubtful: but sure we are of this, that we suffer all punishments and shameful ignominies already that can be devised. Heretofore, when the Carthaginians were vanquished, when Philip, when Antiochus was overthrown, we came to Rome: from our publick lodging provided for us at the charges of the City, we presented our selves, (my LL.) into your Council-house, to testify our great contentment for your conquests: from the Council-house we went directly to the capitol, carrying with us presents and oblations to the honor of your gods. But now we the same Rhodians are come unto your Senat clothed in this poor habit and array, as you see, from out of a base hostelry and common inn, where hardly we could have lodging for our money: being commended in manner of enemies to make our abode without the City walls: we Rhodians (I say) whom but lately ye feasted with the grant of two Provinces, Lycia and Caria, and whom ye graced with a kind of honors, and enriched with all manner of gifts and rewards. You ordain as we hear say that the Macedonians and Illyrians should live free, notwithstanding they were in servitude before they levied war against you. Neither speak we this in envy & repine for any mans welfare and good estate: nay, we acknowledge therein the rare clemency of the people of Rome: and will yet then make the Rhodians of friends, enemies, who during this war did no more but sit and meddle with neither part: Now surely ye Romans are the men that pretend and give out ordinarily, that you are wars have good success and speed well, because they be just and righteous: neither do you long so much in the event and issue thereof, whereby ye are revengers and conquerors, as for the beginning and first enterprises in that ye undertake them not without good cause. The beseeching of Messana in Sicily by the Carthaginians, was the cause that the people of Rome reported them.

enemies.

"enemies. The affailing of Atheny by Philip his intent and purpose to bring Greece into servitude, H
 "his relieving of Annibal with men and money, caused him likewise to be holden for their ene"my. Thus Antiochus brought upon his own head the Roman war, for that he being solicited
 "by the Ætolians your enemies came willingly out of Asia, and with a fleet sailed over to Greece:
 "and when he had seized upon Demetrius, Chalcis, and the treights of Thermopylae, went about
 "to dispossess you of the empire. And last of all, Perseus by levying arms against your allies, by "killing some of their petty kings and princes, by murdering other chief persons of sundry nati"ons and cities, gave you just occasion to make war upon him. But what colourable cause can
 "there be pretended of our calamity, if needs we must likewise perish? All this while I "make no difference between our cities safe and that of Polyaratus and Dion our citizens, even "those persons whom we have brought to deliver into your hand. For suppose that the cause
 "were all one, and that we Rhodiens were all faulty and culpable alike, what might that crime be "for which we are touched in this war? We favoured Perseus and that side (you will say) and "like as in the war of Antiochus and Philip, we stood with you against those kings, & now we "took part with the Kings against you. Was that all? Well, in what sort we are wont to aid our affo"ciates, and how lustily to enterprize wars, do but ask of C. Livius and L. Ennius Ætolians, the "Admirals of your fleets in Asia. Your ships never fought at sea without us; yet we were our Ar-
 "madore alone fought a battail once before Samos, and a second time in Pamphylia against Antiochus.
 "And lastly, which victory there achieved was unto us by so much more honorable and glorious,
 "for that after we had in an unfortunate fight near Samos lost many of our ships, and very whole
 "and stout of our youth we nothing terrified and dismayed with so great an overthrow, did turn
 "again to make head, yea, and were so hardy as to encounter the Kings royal navy coming out of "Smyra. And all this have I related not by way of boast & to glorify our selves, for we are not now "in case to stand upon those terms; but to give you a tale by the way and put you in mind in what "manner the Rhodiens have used evermore to succour their confederates. And for the better proof
 "thereof, after the defeat of Philip and Antiochus we received at your hands right great rewards "& recompence for our service. In case the fortune of Perseus had been so happy as yours is at this "present, I praised be the Gods for their grace and goodness & thanked be your own valour (withal)
 "and we had come into Macedony to the King upon his victory to require & demand rewards,
 "what could we allege therefore? Might we say that he had bin maintained by our money, or relie"ved with our corn, with land forces, or strength at sea? Was there any place by us kept and held "with a garrison for his use? were we able to tell where we fought, either under the conduct of his
 "Captains, or upon our own leading and direction? If haply he should demand in what quarters
 "our soldiers kept, in what coast our ships lay in guard for his defence, what could we answer?
 "Peradventure we might plead our cause & excuse our selves in the presence of him, supposed con"queror, like as we now do before you here in place. For by sending our Embassadors to and fro
 "unto you as well as to him about a treaty of peace, this is all the good we have got, that in stead
 "of winning the love & favor of both parts, we incur the heavy displeasure of the one; being thus "charged with crimes and wrapped in dangers. And yet my good LL. and honorable Senators of "Rome, Perseus might truly object that to us, which you in no wise can, namely, that we in the be"ginning of the war sent Embassadors to you making promise in our name of whatsoever was "needful thereunto: also that we would be ready at all affairs to furnish you with ships strongly "fitted and with our youth well appointed, like as in the wars aforesaid. That we performed not "these promises of ours, you only were the let and hindrance, who (whatsoever the cause was) "refused our offered service & rejected all our succours. We then, neither have we attempted ought "as enemies, nor failed in the duty of good friends and allies: but impeached have we been by
 "you for effecting that which we intended. How now? may some man say: Hath there been no"thing done or said in your City (O ye Rhodiens) that you wish unfaid or undone, & whereto
 "the people of Rome may justly take exceptions and be offended with you for it? Undertake to "justify and make good whatsoever hath been done, I will not; neither have I to lose wit I troi
 "but never I will the publick cause of the whole state, from the privat offences committed by par"ticular persons: for no City is there under the sun, but may otherwhiles have lewd and naughty "citizens some or other, and evermore a rude and fottish multitude. I have heard say, that even "amongst you here at Rome, some have fought to advance and let themselves aloft by currying fa"vor and flattering the common people; and that the time was, when the commons role and de"parted from among you (so as the rule of the common-weal and people of Rome was out of your "hands, as in a very Anarchy. If such a thing as this might chance in this your City (so well qual"ified & ordered as it is) how can any man make a wonder, that among us there have been some;
 "who (affecting and seeking for the amity and friendship of the K.) might haply corrupt and se-
 "duce our commons with their naughty counsel? And yet when all is said, they prevailed no more "than thus, that we sat still and failed in doing our devoir to you: for I will not over-pass in this "place the greatest and most grievous crime of all other wherewith our City is charged during "this war, and that is this. At one and the same time we sent Embass, both to you and Perseus ab"out a peace. This designment so untoward and unlucky as it was, a furious and brainick orator "and agent of ours (as afterwards we understood) handled as foolishly: who (as it is for certain "known) framed his language in that manner, as if he had been C. Popilius the Roman Embassador,
 "whom ye sent to the two KK. Antiochus and Ptolemæus, to warn them both to lay down arms &
 "surcease

"surcease war. But that behaviour of his, (call it what you will, either pride or folly) was no worse
 "before you than it was to K. Perseus. Every City hath their conditions and qualities by them"selves, like as particular and several persons: and flemably it is in whole nations, some are teily
 "and choleric, bold and audacious; others again be fearful and timorous: some are given to wine
 "and drunkenness, others to women and wantonness. The people of Atheny (by report) are too
 "hally, hot, and forward to enterprize any thing, even beyond their power. The Lacedæmonians
 "again, be as slow and backward, calling many doubts & difficulties to enper upon the very things "which they are assured of. I cannot deny, but that all the country of Asia in general breedeth
 "many a mad brain and vain spirit: and I will not say, but that our people jolly fellows of their "tongue and can speak big, for that we seem (among other cities and states bordering upon us)
 "to excel and surpass; and that no so much in the confidence we have of our own forces, as for the "honorable regard ye have had of us and the great testimonies and judgments ye have given out
 "of us. But that foolish embassage of ours even then at the very time had punishment sufficient "being sent away (as it was) with so heavy an answer of yours; and if we were not then disgraced
 "and shamed enough, now surely this present embassage is humble and pitiful were able to make "full satisfaction for a more insolent embassage than it was. All pride and arrogancy of words espe"cially choleric persons indeed hate, wife men deride, and humely from an inferior to his bet"ter, but no man ever judged it a mortal sin and worthy of death: many here was all in danger, "half haply the Rhodiens might seem thereby to despise the Romans. How then be there not some "also that cannot rule their tongue, but will be railing & uttering blasphemous words against the "Gods: yet we never heard of any that have been therefore smitten dead with a thunderbolt.
 "What remaineth then for us wherein we should purge and clear our selves, if we neither can be "charged in fact with hostility; and if our embass, hath used some proud and presumptuous words
 "more than became him, which deserve not the total ruin of our City but some sharp checks and "hard rebukes on both sides of our ears? But hear (my good LL.) that in your ordinary talk a"mong your selves when ye are together, we are censured for our inward affection only & secret
 "thoughts, and condemned no less than for some deed, namely, That in heart we favoured the K.
 "and wished him rather than you to obtain the victory; and therefore they deem us worthy to be "persecuted with fire and sword. Some there be again of you, who think verily that thus indeed
 "we stood affected, howbeit they would not have us for it to be warred upon as enemies; for that
 "it standeth not with the custom or law of any City in the world, that if a man with a mischief
 "to his enemy, he should be straightwaies condemned therefore to die, so long as he hath not en"tered into any action tending thereto. And verily these men we have to thank, who free & quit "us yet from punishment, although they clear us not of guilt: howbeit this sentence we pass a"gainst our own selves. That if it can be proved, that we were all of us so minded and disposed in "affection as we are burdened, (for content we are that all go under one heart and hand, will and "deed, without distinction) then let us all be punished for it and feel the smart. But if of the great "men and chief among us, some affected you & others the King: we require not, that for the love
 "of us who sided with you, the Kings supplicants should fare the better and escape clear; but we re"quest and beseech rather, that for their sakes we perish not and be quit undone. And certainly,
 "your own selves are not worse affected and more let against them than our very City is: which "they knowing well enough, most of them either fled away, or else killed themselves: others of "them (such as we have condemned and passed judgment against) shall be at your censure (my "good LL.) to do with them what you will. All the rest of us Rhodiens, as thanks we have merited now "in this war, so we have deserved as little punishment. Lay the over-deal and imputation of our "former good deeds and demerits to this want of duty now, and let the heap of the one make up
 "the scant measure of the other. With three Kings of late years ye have maintained war: let not "our slackness and sitting still in this one, endamage and hurt us more, than our devoir and em"ployment in the other twain may seem to satisfy and countervail. Set Philip, Antiochus and Per-seus, for three verdicts and sentences as it were passed upon us: two of them acquit us clear; the "third is doubtful whether it will go against us or no. Indeed if they themselves were to sit upon "us, we should no doubt be cast and condemned; but you (my good LL.) that are our competent
 "judges determine now at once, Whether there shall be a City of Rhodes remaining upon the face "of the earth, or be razed utterly & destroyed from the very foundation for ever for you are not "to debate in council about making war upon us: which we you may begin and go in hand with
 "at your pleasure; but follow and manage you never shall, because there is not a Rhodian that will "take arms and come into the field against you. Will you not be pacified but persist still in your
 "choler and anger? then will we crave at your hands some respite of time, whiles we may go home "and report there how we have sped in this lamentable embassage of ours. And then, all of us in
 "Rhodes frank-born and of free condition every one, I say, man and woman with all our wealth
 "and substance will embark our selves, forsake we will our privat houses and publick edifices; and
 "to Rome straight will we all come: and when we have laid on heaps here in your common hall,
 "and at the porch and entire of your council-house, whatsoever gold and silver we have either
 "in privat possie or common chist; commit we will to your devotion and mercy our own persons,
 "together with the bodies of our wives and children; and never will we go further but even here
 "in this place will we suffer and abide that which we have to undergo and endure. Let our City
 "then be sacked, rifled and burned, so it be far enough out of our eye that we see it not. The Rho-
 "mans

"mans may (if it please them) judge the Rhodians enemies: yet you will give us leave to pass in "some sort a doom of our own. That we in our consciences never condemned our selves for such,
 "nor ever will enter in any hostile action against you, come what will, even the utmost extremity
 "that can be suffered. After their oration in this manner uttered, they fell down again all prostrate,
 "and as humble suppliant petitions put forth and shook their branches of the olive, until at length
 "they were raised up on their feet, and so departed out of the Senat, Then began the LL. wishing to "give their opinions and pass their sentences of them. The heaviest enemies and most maliciously
 "bent against the Rhodians, were those, who had conducted the war of Macedonia, as Consuls, Pre"tors, or Licentiates; but M. Porcius Cato was their only patron that stood to them and supported "their cause right earnestly: a man otherwise by nature severe and severe, but as then he shewed him"self a mild and gracious Senator. I will not infer here the lively portraiture and resemblance "of that copious and eloquent person, by relating the flowing speech which he then delivered: his "oration is extant in writing, and contained in the fifth book of his Origines. In fine, the Rhodians "received such an answer, as they neither were concluded enemies, nor yet remained in the same "and quality of friends. The principal persons of this their embassy, were Philocrates and As"medes. Ordered it was & agreed between them, That Philocrates with some of his fellows should "report this answer at Rhodes: and that Asmedes (with the rest) should stay behind at Rome, to
 "to know what was practised and done there, and give intelligence thereof accordingly to their "citizens at home. For that present, the LL. of the Senat gave them in charge, to remove their Cap"tains and Governors by a certain day out of Lycia and Caria. These news related at Rhodes, im"porting matter (in it self considered) of grief & heaviness, turned into joy, in regard that they were
 "eased from the fear of a greater mischief, for they doubted sore that they should have had hot war.
 "And therefore presently they ordained for the Romans a crown amounting to the value of 20000
 "pieces of gold, and with this present they sent Theodatus the Admiral of their navy in embassy.
 "A will and desire they had to make fair suit to the Romans for association: but so as no act and ordi"nance of the people should be entered therof, nor any instrument engrossed as touching it. And
 "this they did, to avoid the greater shame and ignominy of repulse, if haply they mislaid of their "purpose, and could not obtain. The Admiral alone had this privilege, and was permitted to treat "of that matter, without any bill at all either published or enacted by the people. For in so many "years before they had continued in amity with the Romans in such sort, as they never linked and "tied themselves unto them by any formal deed and covenant upon record, and that for no other "reason in the world, but because they would neither cut the strings off from all hope of their aid,
 "if haply any of them might stand in such need, nor disable themselves of the possibility they had to "reap some fruit & receive good of their bounty and prosperity. But surely at this time (me thinks)
 "they ought to have fought sadly and in good earnest for their liberty, not to much for safety "and security against others (for none they feared at all but only the Romans) as to be rid of the suspi"cion and jealousy which the Romans had of them. About the same time the Caunians also revol-
 "led from them, and they of Mylissa took certain Towns of the Euronessians. Now were the "hearts of these Rhodians within the City not so much broken or abated, but they saw well en"ough that if the Romans took from them Lycia and Caria all the rest would either by way of re"volt put themselves in liberty and shake off the yoke of their subjection, or else be surprised and "seized by the neighbour nations bordering upon them: and that then they should be pent up and "shut within the compass of a small Isle and the strands of a barren soil, not able to nourish and "maintain the inhabitants of so great and populous a City. Therefore with all speed they dispatched "and sent forth their youth, and not only forced the Caunians (notwithstanding they had joined "unto them the aid of the Cybirs) to their obedience, but also in battle near Orthesia overcome
 "the Mylaeans and Alabandians: who having dispossessed the Euronessians of their province, ad"vanced jointly with their united armies against them.

"While these affairs thus passed there, while some occurrents fell out in Afacedora, and others
 "likewise at Rome, L. Anicius having subdued King Gentius (as is before said) and brought him under "his own hand, placed a garrison in Scodra, the Kings royal seat, and appointed Gabinus the Cap"tain thereof: but in Rhizon and Olcinia, two commodious Cities of great importance, he ordained
 "C. Licinius the Governor. Having thus made over the rule of Illyricum unto these twain, himself "with the rest of the army went into Epirus. Where the Town Phoenia was the first that yielded "unto him, and the whole multitude of the people came forth to meet him with their intiles in "token of submission. After he had put a garrison in this place also he passed over into the country "of Molossis, where he received the surrender of all the Towns thereof, excepting Passaron, Tegmon, "Phylacum, and Horreum. And then he led his army first against Passaron. The principal men and "rulers of that City were Antinous and Theodorus, men of mark and name, as well for their valour
 "as for their wit, as the hatred they carried to the Romans: the only persons who had counselled
 "and perwaded the whole nation to revolt from the Romans. These two having guilty consciences "within them for their private treasons, and being past all hope of finding any grace and pardon, shut
 "the gates of the City, to the end that they might perish with the overthrow of all, and be over"whelmed with the total ruin of their own country: and therewith they exhorted the multitude to "prefer present death before servitude and slavery. No man durst open his mouth to contra"dict these so great and mighty persons. At length a certain noble young Gentleman, named also
 "Theodorus, with whom the greater dread from the Romans abroad prevailed more, and overcame
 "the

"the fear of the rulers at home. "What will you my masters (said he) and fellow citizens, what rage
 "and madness haunter you to coward and interests the whole City in the fault and folly of their "two persons? Certainly, I have often heard of men that for their country have willingly lost "their lives, but to think it meet, that their country should perish for them, these are the first "that ever were known. Why rather open we not our gates and submit our selves to their empire, "into which the whole world besides is subject. As for these words the multitude followed "him toward the gates, which when Antinous & Theodorus saw they made no more ado, but brake "up the first corps de guard of the enemies which they came unto, and exposing their bodies to the "swords point, were soon killed, and the Town was yielded into the hands of the Romans. Tegmon
 "also, upon the like wilful obstinacy of Prince Cephala, had shut their gates, but after that he was "slain, the Town was taken by surrender. And neither Phylacum nor Horreum would abide the assault.
 "Having thus quieted Epirus, and bestowed his forces by garrisons in diverse commodious Towns
 "for the winter time, he returned into Illyricum: where he held a general Assembly at Scodra, to "which he had summoned the principal States of the whole nation, and whither also there were ar"rived five delegates from Rome. And there in this frequent and solemn session he pronounced from "the Tribunal seat, by the advice of the counsel assistant unto him. That the Senate and people of "Rome ordained the Illyrians to live free and enjoy liberty, and that himself would withdraw the "garrisons out of their Towns, Fortresses and Castles. As for the Licenses, Taulantians, Tiruntians in "the Dissartians country, Rhizonians and Olcianians (for that whiles Gentius his fortune stood up"right, they had ranged with the Romans) he declared them not only free, but also exempt and pri"vileged from all tributes. The Dorians also, for leaving Charynium, and passing with their ar"mies to side with the Romans, he endowed with the like immunity. They of Scodra, Dassaria, and "Sedopia, with the rest of the Illyrians, were to pay the one moiety of the tribute which they had "yielded to the King. After this he divided Illyricum into three cantons: the one of them he made
 "of those before named: the second, all the Labeates: and the third, of the Agravanites, Rhexonites, "Olcinians, and those that bound and border upon them. Having let down this order in Illyricum,
 "he returned to Passaron a City in Epirus, there to lie for the winter time.

"While these things happened in Illyricum, Pasulus before the coming of the ten Legats, sent Q.
 "Maximus his son (who was now lately returned from Rome) to the sacrifice of Aganion and A-
 "gasse. The quarrel against Agasse, was for that they having delivered the Town once to Martius
 "the Consul, and therewith of their own accord craved the alliance of the people of Rome, revolted
 "notwithstanding afterwards to Persus. As for the Aganians, they had committed a late and trea"cherous revolt: for giving no credit to the lame that was voiced of the Romans victory, they cruelly had "killed certain Roman soldiers, who were entered into their City. Moreover, he sent L. Publius
 "likewise to ransack in hostile manner the City of the Enians, for that they had persecuted in arms
 "more fifty than the other neighbour Cities. Now was it about that season of the year which men
 "call Autumn: in the beginning whereof, so soon as he had determined to ride a circuit and visit all
 "Greece round, and to see those places whereof there went to great a name, and which were more "renowned by hear-fay than known by sight of eye: he left C. Sulpicius Gallus for the command "and guard of the camp, & set forward in his progress, accompanied with no great train. And being guard-
 "ed of the one hand with his own son Scipio, and on the other, with Archonius the brother of King
 "Eumenes, he passed through Thessaly, toward the famous Oracle at Delphos. Where, after he had "sacrificed to Apollo, he destined and appointed those Columns & Pillars (which were begun in "the porch of that Temple, and whereupon the Statues of King Persus should have been erected) for to "sustain and bear the Statues of himself with the title Victorious, He visited also the temples of J.
 "Trophan in Lebadia: where, after he had seen the mouth of that peakish cave into which they use "to defend that would have the benefit of the Oracle, and know the will of the Gods: after sacrifi"ce also done to Jupiter and Hercules, whose temple there is to be seen, he went down to Chalcis,
 "to behold the frith of Enripus: and that Island which in times past was united & joined to the firm
 "continent by a bridge. From Chalcis he crossed over to Aulis three miles distant from thence, a por"t comble for the rode famous time there of Agamemnon fleet, consisting of a thousand sail. Being
 "there, he went to the Temple of Diana, where that King of Kings (Agamemnon) offered his own "daughter in sacrifice upon her altar, to have a prosperous voyage for his fleet intending to sail to "Troy. After this, he came to Oropus, a Town in Attica, where Amphicla the Prophet is worshipped
 "as a God. There, was to be seen an ancient Temple, most pleasant to behold for the goodly "Fountains and Rivers round about it. Then went he forward to Athens, a City likewise for anti"quity of fame much spoken of, and highly renowned time out of mind: wherein were many mo"numents also, worth the seeing: namely, the citadel, the havens, the walls that reach from the City
 "to Pyram, the aretials made by great Captains and Commanders, the images of the Gods, and of "men likewise, for rare & excellent: as well for the artificial workmanship, as the matter whereof they "were made. When he had sacrificed within the City to Minerva the goddess, and patroness of the "City, he kept on his journey, and the next day following arrived at Corinth. A fair & beauti"full City this was in those daies, before it was destroyed, the fortels there and the Isthmus were
 "things of especial mark and worth the sight: for the said fortels notwithstanding it was moated
 "up to an exceeding height above all, yet it sit full of fountains; and the Isthmus by a narrow ridge "of land divideth two seas near together, the one lying East, and the other West. From thence he "went to Sicyon and Argos, two noble Cities, and so forward to Epidaurum, nothing in wealth, com"parable

to give them summons was this, that amongst the Kings records and rolls they had found the excess of the principal Statesmen of other nations; but of the Achæans there appeared no writings at all under their hands, and therefore the imputations charged upon them were both void and false.

After the Achæans were dismissed, the nation of the Acarnanians was cited and called into place: as for them, there was no change nor alteration; only Leucus was exempt from doing so, in respect to the high court and general assembly of the Acarnanians. As they followed the summons full number and further, making enquiry who either in public or private had taken part with the King, they extended their commission as far as into Afia, and from Larbi to demolish and raze Marissa a City in the Isle Leibos, and to translate the inhabitants thereof to Milthymia: the pretence was, for that they had given harbor in their haven to the provisions of Antioch the King's Admiral, at what time as he hovered and ranged about Leibos with his pinnaces. Two there were that lost their heads, men of quality and great worth, to wit, Andronikus the son of Andronikus, for that he followed his father and bare arms against the people of Rome; and Nemus the ban by whose advice and persuasion they had conspired a society with Perseus.

After this conquest of foreign causes interposed, and coming between the assembly of the Macedonians was called again: wherein as touching the state of Macedony, pronounced and published it was, That there should be certain Senators chosen, whom they call Synedrivi, by whose counsel the common-weal should be managed and governed. After this, were the names read of the principal Macedonians, whom he appointed (together with their children as many as were above fifteen years of age) to go before into Italy. This at first was thought to be an hard and cruel course, but soon it appeared to the multitude of the Macedonians that it was all done for their liberty. For nominated there were the Kings friends and gallants of his court, the commanders of armies, the Admirals of the fleets, and the Captains of the garrisons, who were wont to serve the King basely, but to over-rule others proudly and imperiously: some exceeding rich and wealthy others depending above the proportion of their revenues and living: all faring at their table, and arrayed in apparel like Kings, not one carying with him the civil mind of a good citizen, nor one that could abide to be of laws, or of equal liberty. At these therefore, who had been employed in any ministry or service about the King even they also who had been used in the least embassages that were had commandment to depart out of Macedony and to go into Italy: and look who obeyed not this edict, were threatened with death. Unto Macedony he gave laws, with such diligent care and good regard, as if he had reckoned them not for enemies vanquished, but for allies of good desert: such laws (I say) as the very practise and trial of long time (the only corrector of all statutes) was not able upon that experience, to check and control.

After these serious affairs were finished, he exhibited with great furniture and preparation, a solemnity of game and sport at Amphipolis, whil he long before he had intended, and for the intention whereof he had both sent out his messengers to the States of Afia and to the KK, and also himself in his circuit and visitation of the Grecian Cities, had given warning to the great men and principal citizens. And thither repaired out of all parts of the world, a number of cunning, dextrous, and artificial actors, that made profession of such plaies and pastimes; besides a sort of wrestlers, hampians, and brave horses of the best kind and breed. Also divers embassages with their beasts for sacrifices, and whatsoever else was usually done of custom, at the great and solemn games in Greece. Thus it came to pass, that men admired not only his magnificence, but his wisdom also in exhibiting these shows and fights, wherein the Romans at that time were altogether rude and ignorant. Moreover, he ceased and banketed the Embass, in the same sumptuous manner and respective consideration. And this (by report) was an apophthegm and common saying of his, That none could make feasts and set forth plaies better than he who had the skill to win a field. Having represented these solemnities of all sorts, and bestowed all the brazen shields on his spoils; all other armor and weapons of sundry kinds, he piled upon a mighty heap, and after his prayers made to Mars, Minerva, Lucina and other Gods and Goddesses, unto whom of right and duty appertained to consecrate and dedicate the spoils of enemies; himself the General with his own hands put under a burning torch, and kind ed the fire, and after him all the martial-colonels standing round about, cast every man his fire-brand, and set all a burning. This was a thing noted in that great assembly of Europe & Afia, where there was such a confluence of people from all parts, as well to testify their joy in his behalf as to see the shows and sports: in that meeting, I say of great armies of sea-servitors and land-souldiers, there was that plenty of all things and cheapness of victuals, that Amphipolis the General, of that exceeding store and abundance, gave much away freely to privat persons, to cities and nations, not only for their present use, but also to carry home with them into their countries. And this multitude there assembled took not more pleasure either in beholding the stage-plaies acted, or seeing them practise feats of bodily strength and activity, or the running of horses in the race, as in viewing the Macedonian booty and pillage laid all abroad to be seen: namely, of Statues, and painted tables, of rich cloth of stiffe, of vessels in gold, in silver, in copper, and ivory, most curiously wrought in that royal seat of King of Pella, not only to serve for a present shew and no more (like those that the Kings Palace of Alexandria was replenished with) but also for continual and everlasting use. These were all embarked, and committed to the charge of Cn. Octavius to be transported to Rome. Paulus after he had given the Embassadors a gracious and courteous farewell, passed over the River Strymon, and lodged within a mile east of Amphipolis. From thence he dislodged and journeyed until he came on the fifth day as far as Pella,

38 Cities there of this name.

Pella. And passing by the City, he abode two daies at a place which they call Speleum, and then he sent P. Nasica, and Q. Maximus his own son with part of the forces in an expedition, to give the wait unto those Illyrians, who had succoured Perseus in his wars, but he commanded them to meet him at Oricum. Himself marching toward Epirus, at the fifteenth remove arrived at Passaron. Not far from thence lay Anicium encamped: unto whom he dispatched his letters, to the end that he should not be troubled at those designs which were to be put in execution, signifying therein, that the Senat granted to the army the pillage of all the Cities of Epirus, which had revolted unto Perseus: which done, he bestowed certain Centurions, and sent them into all the Towns with instructions, to give out that his coming was to withdraw all the garrisons from thence, with an intent that the Epirots should enjoy their freedom as well as the Macedonians; & so he summoned out of every City ten of the chief to repair unto him. And when he had charged & commanded them to bring abroad into the market place all the gold and silver which they had, he sent out certain cohorts and companies of souldiers to every of the said Cities: they who were assigned for the places farther remote went before them which were appointed to the nearer; and this was ordered so, that upon the same day they should enter into them all at once. Now the Colonels and Centurions had their errand delivered them what to do. In the morning, betimes all the gold and silver was brought forth according accordingly, and that at the fourth hour of the day a signal was given to the souldiers to follow to ransack and rife the Cities. Wherein they found great store of pillage, that every horiman had for his part 400 Denarii, and the footmen 200 apiece, and a hundred and fifty thousand pils were led away into captivity. Then the walls were rased of the said Cities thus spoiled, and those were to the number of seventy. All the booty and prizes were sold, and out of that mass of money were the souldiers paid. From thence Paulus went down to the Sea side, unto Oricum. But the souldiers minds were nothing so well satisfied, as he supposed they had been, for discontented mightily they were and angry, that they had no share at all in the Kings pillage and treasure, as if they had made no war in Macedony. At Oricum he found those forces which he had sent under the conduct of S. Nasica and Maximus his sons: there he shipped his whole army, and sailed over into Italy. In like manner a few daies after, Anicium, when the session and general meeting of the other Epirots and Acarnanians was ended, having given commandment, that their principal persons should follow him into Italy (the knowledge and deciding of whole causes he reserved and referred thither) himself attended the ships which the army had used in Macedony, and passed over likewise into Italy.

At what time as these affairs were thus managed in Macedony and Epirus, the Embassadors who had been sent with Attalus to end the war between the Gauls and King Eumenes, arrived in Afia. A surcease of arms for the winter time, was agreed upon between both parties, during which cessation the Gauls departed home, and Eumenes was retired to Pergamus there to winter, where also he lay grievously sick; the spring was no sooner come, but the Gauls began to stir and look abroad: but by that time they were come as far as the Synedrivi, Eumenes had assembled his forces from all parts to Sordis. There at Synedrivi, the Romans parled with Sollicitus the Generall of the Gauls: Attalus also went with them: but thought good it was not, that he should enter within the Gauls camp, for fear of stirring coals in heat of argument, and raising choice of the one side or other. So P. Licinius communed with the Duke of the Gauls abroad: and when he had done, he brought word back, that the more he was entreated, the worse he was and less tractable; in so much as it might seem a wonder, that the words of the Roman Embassadors were so powerful and effectual with Antiochus and Ptolemaus (two mighty and puissant Kings) as to make peace so presently between them, since they prevailed to little or nothing at all among the Gauls.

To return again to Rome. First, the two captive Kings, Perseus and Gentius were sent thither, and committed there to ward they and their children: after them, the multitude besides of prisoners, then consequently those Macedonians, as also the other chief peers of Greece, who were wanted to repair unto Rome. For not they only were summoned to make appearance there, who had been seen present in place, but also all those were sent for by letters missive peremptorily, who were reported to have been with the Kings. Then Paulus himself a few daies after embarked in a ship of the Kings, a Galeace of a mighty bigness, making way with sixteen banks and rows of oars to a side, and the same set out and adorned with the Macedonian spoils, not only of brave gorgeous armour, but also of rich hangings, stiffe & cloth of gold out of the Kings wardrobe came up the Tyber against the stream: where great numbers of people went forth to meet him, and filled the banks on both sides of the river. Some few daies after Anicium and Octavius arrived also with their fleet. And to all three by an act of the Senat was triumph granted. Q. Cassius the Pretor had commandment to deal with the Tribunes of the Commons by warrant from the Senat, that they should prefer a bill unto the common people, that those three should be in full commission of command and government that day when they were to ride triumphant into the City. See, how mean things escape the touch of envy, but the highest commoners are met with. No doubt was made at all of their triumph of Anicium, nor yet of Octavius. But Paulus, with whom even they themselves would have been ashamed to compare, could not avoid the basking of flatterous & malicious tongues. His souldiers according to the ancient discipline of war, he had held hard to their service. And to them had he given a donative indeed out of the booty, but more sparingly & with a lighter hand than they hoped for, from out of so great wealth and riches of the Kings: and yet in good faith to say a truth, full well he knew that if he had satisfied their greedy desire, and dealt resemble L. Paulus, in a City so unthankful, nay so spiteful and malicious to all good men? say there were no question at all of infamy and obloquy, but of honor only and reputation, tell me (I beseech you) is there any triumph that compriseth not the glory also of the Roman name? so many triumphs over the Gauls, so many again over the Spaniards, and so many over the Carthaginians, are they reputed and called the triumphs of the Captains alone, and not likewise of the people of Rome? And like as we say, that we triumphed not over Pyrrhus only, nor over Antibal, but over the Epirots likewise and the Carthaginians: even so neither M. Curium alone, nor P. Cornelium, but the Romans also have triumphed. True it is, and I must needs say, that the founders have a proper interest and part by themselves in that they alone (dight with branches and chaplets of laurel, and every one bravely to be seen and adorned with the gifts that have been given them) resound Te Triumpho, Te Triumpho, and as they pass along the City sing and chant the praises of themselves and of their Captain-Generals. And if it fortune at any time that the founders be not brought home out of the province to the triumph, they grumble & are discontented: yet notwithstanding, albeit though they be, they think it is their due and so long as their General and leader triumpheth, they triumph also, because the victory was achieved by the strength of their arms. Good soldiers, is a man should ask you, for what intent you were recruited into Italy? and wherefore so soon as the service was performed and the war brought to an end, ye had not presently your congys of discharge? moreover to what purpose ye came by companies and quadrons under your ensigns and colors? for what cause ye stay and remain here, and go not every man his waies to his own home? what answer would ye make else, but, That ye would be seen in triumph? And to say a truth since ye have won the victory and are conquerors, I cannot blame you, nay, ye ought to desire for to be seen and seen again. It is not long since we triumphed over Philip (this man father) and over Antiochus likewise: and reigned both they did as Kings, when the triumph was: and shall there be no solemnity of triumph over Perseus, taken prisoner and brought captive with his children into the City? L. Paulus, standing beneath as a privat person (one amongst the company of gowned citizens) seeing L. Lucium and Cn. Octavius arrayed (imprudently in cloth of gold, and in their rich purple robes and mantles of state, mounting up the Capitol in their triumphant chariots, should ask them the question and say in this manner: Te I me, O Lucius Ancus and you Cn. Octavius, judge ye in your own conceit that you are more worthy of a triumph than I? They would no doubt come down each one out of his chariot and yield him their place; yet, and for very shame deliver up all their ensigns and ornaments unto him. And you Quintus, had you rather see Gentius than Perseus led in triumph? would you wish indeed to triumph for an accidental appendant only of the war, rather than for the main substance of the war? Shall the legions coming out of Scythia, and the mariners at sea, enter the City crowned with laurel garlands: and the legions out of Macedon, being denied their own triumph stand still and behold others to triumph? Moreover, what shall become of that rich booty? what shall be done with the spoils of that great and wealthy victory? where shall be bellowed and laid up so many thousand corselets and armors plucked from the bodies of enemies slain? shall they be sent back again into Macedon? Those costly images of gold, of marble, of ivory, those goodly fair pictures: those pretious clothes and hangings of purple, scarlet and tincture: that mighty quantity of gold and silver wrought into vessels chased and engraven: that huge mass of the Kings money and coin, what shall we do with it? What? shall it be carried all away as if it were goods into the public treasury and City Chamber? The goodliest fight of all the rest, what say you to it? A most noble and puissant King is taken prisoner, where shall he be shewed to the people of Rome his conqueror? What running, what concourse there was of people to see K. Syphax captive (yet he was but an accessory to the Punick war) most of us do well remember. Shall K. Perseus then, a prisoner and captive: shall Philip and Alexander his sons (persons of so great name, be hidden and kept from the sight and eyes of the City? And there were no more but L. Aemilius himself, twice Consul, the conqueror & rebuilder of Greece: all men would desire to see him enter the City in his triumphant chariot. We created him Consul for this intent that he should finish and determine this war, which to your dishonor and great shame had hung for the space of 4 years. To him then who (at what time as the lot of that province fell unto him, and when he departed on his voyage from Rome) had all our hearts to prelate victory and triumph, shall we now deny triumph when he hath the victory? And verily in so doing, we shall not only defraud men but rob the gods also of their honor: for due it is to the very gods also and not to men alone. Have not your ancestors ever used to enterprize all great affairs in the name of the gods first & therein also to end last? The Consul or Pretor when he is to take his journey into his province or to levy war, with his Lictors before him clad in their coats of arms, is ever wont to make his solemn vows in the Capitol: after he hath acquitted himself of his charge and obtained victory, when as he triumpheth, he transferreth in pomp the rich presents of the people of Rome well deserved and offereth them to the same gods in the said Capitol, unto whom there first he pronounced his vows. And the beasts for sacrifice going before the pomp of triumph are not the least part of this solemnity: that it may appear, how the General in his return is mindful of the gods, & rendereth thanks unto them for the happy managing of the affairs of Commonweal. As for those beasts for sacrifice which he hath appointed to be shewed in the pomp of triumph, they them neither makes it matter whose hand doth in some kill one & some another, but those sacred hands of the Senat, which are not to be eaten in any privat house, nor in publick place unhallowed, but

but only in the Capitol: and there, not for the pleasure of men, but of Gods and men together, as will ye trouble and impeach at the suggestion of Servius Galba? Shall the gates be shut against the triumph of L. Paulus? shall Perseus King of the Macedonians with his children and the multitude of captives, with the spoils of the Macedonians, be left behind at the river side? shall L. Paulus go directly from the City gate home to his house as a privat person, like one that hath been abroad in the country to see his farm and is newly returned? But then Centurion and thou louding in ear, I advise thee, to the ordinance which the Senat hath decreed as touching the General Paulus, rather than to the vain speech of Serv. Galba: hearken to this that I say the word, rather than he. As for him, he hath learned nought else but to prate and talk, and that to the depraving of others full maliciously. I tell thee, I ought have I with mine enemies even upon defiance given twenty times and three; done I have my devoir, and from them all that were in combat with me, I never failed but carried away their spoils: I bear the marks about me of many a wound, and the honorable scars thereof are to be seen, all naked skin, and related withal in what battle he my body. As which word, they say, he bared his naked skin, and chanced to discover some had received this or that wound. Now as he shewed these scars, and chanced to discover some parts that better I wis and more honestly had been unseen, and therewith, a * bunch of swelling of a rupture that he had in his groin, wherof some of them that stood next unto him took up a laughter, then (qd he) even this that you have eloped hereof and make such game as I caught with a strain, riding continually as I did, and never from my horseback day nor night: and no more ashamed I am and displeased with myself for that infirmity, than for these scars which you here C see: since that it never was any impediment unto me in performing my service to the Commonwealth, either in civil affairs of City, or in warfare abroad. Well, I an old servitor, have been content here to shew unto young men and raw soldiers, my body, many a time and often hacked, pierced and slashed with the sword. Let Galba now lay bare that whole skin of his own to flick and fair. Now my masters, you that are Tribunes, call the tribes again to the scrutiny, and take their voices. As forme [down I will, and go after the soldiers hard at heels. Know I will which be those lewd and unthankful companions that had rather be footed up and flattered in the wars by mutinous persons, than serve under the martial discipline of their General.] * *

V. Lucius Ancus reporteth, That the sum of all the gold and silver taken in pillage and carried in the pomp of this triumph, amounted to the worth of 120 millions of Sesterces. Which mass, no doubt, ariseth much greater by the proportion of the number of wains, and the poies both of gold and silver by the same author let down in general terms. And as some have recorded, he either spent in the war next before, or else scattered and lost in his flight when he made halt to S. strace, as much again as that came to. And the more wonder it was, that so mighty a mass of money had been gathered and heaped up within thirty years after the war between Philip and the Romans, raised part out of the issue and incomb of his metal mines, and part out of other profits and tributes. Thus Philip very bare of money, and Perseus contrary-wise exceeding rich, began to make war with the Romans. Last of all, Paulus himself rode in his chariot, carrying a great port and majesty with him both for his comely and personable body, and also for his reverent old age. After his chariot, among other honorable personages rode his two sons, Q. Maximus and P. Scipio. Then followed the horsemen by troops, and the footmen by their cohorts and companies, every one keeping their ranks full decently. The footmen had given them a hundred Sesterces apiece, the Centurions double, and the horsemen triple so much. And it is thought, that he meant to have given the footmen as much as the most, and to the rest in proportion, in case they either had not denied his honour by their voices, or if in token of thankfulness and joy, they had but willingly and cheerfully shouted, when this sum which they received was pronounced and related unto them. And not Perseus alone (ed as he was through the enemies City in chains before the triumphant chariot of the conqueror) but also Paulus himself the conqueror glittering so gloriously in his cloth of gold and costly purple, was a mirror to the word in those few daies of the transitory and mutable state of mans life. For of those two sons, whom (after he had given the other two by way of adoption from himself) he kept alone at home as he himself to bear his name, to maintain the sacred rites and sacrifices of his family, and to uphold the house itself, the younger a stippling under twelve years of age, five daies before his triumph died, and the elder full fourteen years old and more, departed within three daies after the triumph. Which two youth indeed ought to have been arrayed in their embroidered robes of purple, and so to have ridden in the chariot with their father, predestining and aiming to themselves like triumphs another day.

Some few daies after, M. Antonius a Tribune of the Commons assembled a solemn audience of the people for his sake, wherein when after the manner and custome of other Generals he should discourse of his own exploits and worthy acts, he made unto them a memorable Oration and well becoming a noble Roman Prince, to his effect. "Albeit I suppose (quoth he) my neighbors and friends, the citizens of this noble City, you be not ignorant, both how happily I have adorned the weal publick and also how unfortunately within these few daies two thunderbolts have shaken my private house, as having one while beheld the goodly tree and pomp of my triumphs withstanding the one, and seen another while the woeful funerals and obsequies of my two sons declaring the other: yet I beseech you suffer me with that singleness of heart and affection, as I ought, to make a brief comparison between mine own particular private fortunes, and the publick

of Paulus

"publick felicity of the City. At my departure from Italy, I loosed from Brundisium, and set sail at the sun-rising: by the ninth hour of the same day I arrived safe with all my ships at Corythos. The fifth day after I came to Delphi, where I sacrificed unto Apollo, for my self, for your armies, and your navy. From Delphi I departed, and within five daies was in the leaguers. Whereafter, I had received the charge of the army, and altered some things which might gratefully have hindered the victory, I marched forward, forthat the enemies camp was inexpressible, and the King could not be forced by any means to fight: and piercing through his guards that kept the passage, I went as far as Petra: so as by this means having perforce drawn the King to fight, I vanquished him in plain field and ranged batel. Macedony I subdued, and brought it in subjection to the people of Rome. Finally, that war which for four years together other Consuls before me so managed, as each one left it ever to his successor worse than he found it; I achieved, and brought to a final end in fifteen daies. I followed then in this train other prosperous affairs, as the fruits ensuing of that victory. For all the Cities of Macedony yielded unto me. The Kings treasure I seized upon: the King in person (as if the very Gods themselves had delivered and put him into my hands) I took prisoner, with his sons in the Temple of the Samothracians. But then my heart misgave me, and even then I suspected the surpassing favour of my good fortune: then call I doubts, and began to fear the dangers at sea, having to mighty a maul of the Kings treasure to transport, and my victorious army to record back into Italy. But seeing all things fall out to hearts desire, a prosperous voyage, safe arrival, and whatsoever I could pray for at the Gods hands: this I wished in my heart, (as knowing full well the wonted manner of fortune, when she is at the highest pitch, to turn back again and come as fast down) that mine own house, rather than the Common-weal, might feel that change and alteration whensoever it came. And therefore I hope that this so notable a calamity of mine own, shall excuse the City for having any other misfortune, since that my triumph (as it were to check and mock the changes of this world) hath slain joist between the funerals of my two sons. See how I and Perseus are represented above all others for two notable examples of the frail and unstable condition of man. Lo how he, who being a prisoner himself, saw his sons likewise led captives before his face, hath them yet living found and safe: and I, who have triumphed over him, came from the burial of one of my sons to ride in my chariot up to the Capitol, and from thence defended again to find the other lying at point of death: neither is there of all that fair issue that I had, one left to bear the name of L. Paulus Æmilius. For two of them the house of the Corvelli and the Fabii have, unto whom I gave them in adoption, as out of a great race and breed of children: so as now, in the family of Paulus there is not one left but himself. Howbeit for this calamity and ruin of my house, your felicity and the happy estate of the City is a great comfort and consolation again. These words delivered with such a magnanimity, troubled the spirits of the auditors, and aliened them more, than if he had lamentably mowed himself unto them with piteous tears, for his childless estate and desolat condition.

C. Octavius solemnized his naval triumph over King Perseus the first day of December: in which solemnity, he neither had prisoners led in shew, nor spoils carried in pomp. He gave to his mariners and sailors seventy and five Denarij apiece: to every pilot double, and to the ship-masters four times as much. After this the Senat assembled, and the LL. ordained, That Q. Cassius should lead King Perseus with his son Alexander, together with his train that accompanied him, as also bring all his money and goods, silvers, or what moveables and furniture soever he had to Alba, there to be kept in sure custody. But the Kings son of Thrace, with the hostages was sent to Cassiodorus, there to lie in safe ward. As for the rest of the captives who had been led in triumph, thought good it was they should be clapt up fast in prison.

Some few daies after these things, there arrived Embassadors from Corys King of the Thracians, bringing with them money for the ransom of his son and the other hostages. Unto the Senat they were brought: where, by way of preamble they laid this for the ground of their speech, That Corys had not sided with King Perseus in the war, upon his own motive and accord, but was compelled to give hostages: then they besought the LL. of the Senat to suffer them to be redeemed at N what price soever they would let down, were it never so high. Unto whom this answer was returned by authority of the Senat, "That the people of Rome bare well in mind the amity which they had with Corys, with his progenitors, and the whole nation of the Thracians. As for the giving of the hostages, it was rather an evidence to prove, than an argument to excuse their trespass and fault: considering that when Perseus was quiet, the Thracian nation stood in no fear and awe of him, much less then, when as he was troubled and occupied in war with the Romans. Howbeit although Corys preferred the favour of Perseus before the friendship of the people of Rome, yet they would consider of the matter, and respect more his quality and what was meet for his estate, than his desert and what he was worthy to have; and therefore they would release his son and the hostages, and send them home again. As for the people of Rome, their manner is to bestow their favours and benefits freely without regard of recompence: the worth and estimation whereof they had rather leave to the consideration and minds of the receivers, than require and demand the same presently. So there were Embassadors nominated to record the hostages unto Thrace to wit, Quintus Flaminius, C. Licinius Nerva, and M. Cincius Rebilus. And to those Thracian Embassadors were given by way of presents 2000 asses apiece. So But with the rest of the hostages was sent for from Cassiodorus, and with the fore-named Embassadors returned again to his father.

The

The Kings ships taken from the Macedonians, of an extraordinary and monstrous bignes, before time, were landed upon Marsi field and there laid up drie. Whilest the late remembrance of the Macedonian triumph, remained full not in the minds only, but as it were in the very eyes of men, L. Anticus triumphed over King Gentius and the Illyrians upon the very day of the feast. Quirinus was generally thought that all things therein rather resembled some likeness in shew, than otherwise counterveiled in substance the former triumph. The General himself Anticus was inferior to Æmilius both in nobility and also in quality of person: and setting together their places of command, the one being but Pretor, and the other Consul: neither was Gentius equal to Perseus, nor the Illyrians to the Macedonians. Spoil for spoil, money for money, gifts for gifts, there was no proportion nor comparison between them. And therefore as that little late triumph was more resplendent and glorious than this, so considered in it self without other respect, it was not to be found fault withal and despised. Anticus within few daies had vanquished and thoroughly tamed the nation of the Illyrians: both by Sea and Land proud and mighty, bearing themselves stout and bold for their strong and fenced forts. The King he took prisoner, and those of the Kings race and royal blood. He shewed in triumph many field-engins, besides other spoils and moveable goods of the King. Likewise of gold seven and twenty pound weight, and of silver nineteen besides 3000 Denarij, and a hundred and twenty thousand peeces of Illyrian silver in coin. Before his chariot were led King Gentius with his wife and children: Carvantius also the Kings brother, and certain noblemen of Illyricum. Out of the pillage he gave unto his footmen 45 Denarij apiece, to every Centurion a double proportion, and unto the horsemen a triple. To the allies of the Illyrian nation he allowed as much as to citizens: the sailors and mariners he made equal with the footmen. Herein he surmounted the triumph of Æmilius, for that his soldiers followed after his triumphant chariot more joyous and merry, and the General was praised and extolled in many a ditty and ballad. Anticus writeth, That of his booty there was raised, as much money as came to twenty millions of Sestertij, over and above the gold and silver that went into the common treasury. But because I could not see how possibly such a sum should be made, I have let down mine author for the thing, now, chuse you whether you will believe him. King Gentius with his wife, children, and brother, was by order from the Senat led to Spoleitum, there to be kept in ward: all the captives besides were at Rome clapt into prison, and there lay. But when the Spoleitans refused to take the charge and custody of him and the rest, these Princes were translated from thence to Igiturium. There remained besides of the Illyrian prizes two hundred and twenty harks, which being taken from King Gentius, Q. Cassius by the ordinance of the Senat gave and distributed among the citizens of Corinth, Apollonia, and Dyrrachium.

The Consuls that year after they had only wasted the territories of the Ligurians, because they could never train the enemies forth to fight, having done no memorable service, returned to Rome for the choice of new Magistrats in the room of the old. And so the first comitial or court day that came, they created Consuls M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Sulpicius Gallus. The morrow after were elected for Pretors L. Livius, L. Apuleius Saturninus, A. Licinius Nerva, P. Rutilius Calvus, P. Quinctilius Varus, and Marcius Fomelius. These Pretors had their government in this manner: two for the jurisdiction within the City, two for Spain, the other for Sicily and Sardinia. This year leapt, and the leap day was the morrow after the feast Terminidia. That year died C. Claudius the August, and in his place the college of the Augurs chose T. Quinctius Flaminius. Allo M. Fabius Pretor the Flamin of Quirinus the same year departed this life. This year also came King Prusias to Rome with his son Nicomedes. He entered into the City with a great train attending upon him: from the gate he went directly to the common place and the tribunal of Q. Cassius the Pretor. And when there was a great concourse of people about him from all parts: he said that his coming was to worship the Gods which are the presidents of the City of Rome: as also to salute the people of Rome, and withal to shew his own joy and to wish theirs, for their happy victory over the two Kings Perseus and Gentius, and for that by subduing the Macedonians and Illyrians, they had enlarged their signory and dominion. And when the Pretor made an offer to call King Prusias for him even that present day, if he would of himselfe be desired two daies respite to see the Temples of the Gods, to view the City, and to visit his good friends and acquaintance, L. Cornicius Scipio the treasurer was appointed to go about with him and shew him all: who also had been sent as far as to Capua for to meet him upon the way: also for him and his train about him, there was a sufficient house taken up, where he was kindly and liberally intertained. The third day after he came into the Senat, where after he had congratulated in their behalf for their late victory, he recounted his own demerits and good deserts during the war: and then requested, that he might have leave to pay his vows and namely, to sacrifice at Rome in the capitol, ten head of greater beasts, and one at Prenteste to Fortune. For that he said those vows were made for the victory of the people of Rome. Also that the league and alliance with him might be renewed. Item that the Land won by conquest from King Antiochus, which being not by the people of Rome given unto any, the Gaul notwithstanding held in possession, might be conveyed unto him by a deed of gift. Last of all, he recommended his son Nicomedes to the Senat. He found much favor among all them, who had been Generals of armies in Macedony. And therefore he obtained directly all other things that he made: only as touching the said lands, this answer he had. That they would send certain commissioners to see and view the thing. And if it appeared and fell out, that the foresaid land appertained to the people of Rome, and was not passed away by gift to any already, they would

"repute King Prusias the worthiest man of all other, to receive that donation at their hands, But if it never belonged to King Antiochus, and so was plain and evident that the people of Rome had no right unto it, or if the Gauls had a grant thereof already, Prusias then must be content and pardon them, if they were unwilling to gratify him with any gifts preiudicial and injurious to another. Neither could a thing never so freely given, be an acceptable gift, which he knew the donor may take away from the donee at his pleasure. As for Nicomedes his son, they would willingly receive him into their protection at his hands so recommended. And how careful and tender the people of Rome was over Kings children committed unto them to keep, may appear by Prolemus the King of Egypt. With this answer was Prusias dismissed. Order was given that he should be presented with a certain summe of sesterces, and with silver plate to the quantity of 50 pound weight. Also they ordained that his son Nicomedes should have gifts proportionable to that sum which was given Masabala the son of Masani: also that besides all other things appertaining to sacrifices, should be allowed unto the King out of the City-chamber, like as to the magistrates of Rome, chuse whether he would stay and offer them at Rome or Perseus. Also that out of that fleet which rid in the harbor of Brundisium, there should be twenty gallees assigned him to use, until such times the King were arrived at the fleet which was given him. Finally, that L. Cornelius Scipio should accompany him and never depart from him, but beseech the charges both of him and his retinue about him until they were embarked and on shipboard. It is said, that the King joied wonderfully at this courtesy and kindness offered him by the people of Rome and that he would needs pay for those presents which were given him: only he commanded his son to take a gift at the hands of the people of Rome. Thus much have our Historians written as touching K. Prusias. But Polybius reporteth that this King was unworthy the Majesty which is honorable a name, for that he was wont to meet the Embassadors of Rome with his head shaven and a cap upon it: also to acknowledge and call himself the freed villan and slave of the people of Rome, and to testify so much he wore the badge and token of that degree and condition. At Rome likewise when he entered the Councel-house, he stooped down and kissed the very door-sill, calling the Senators Gods, his Saviors, yea, and to have need other speeches not so honorable to the hearers, as befit and unfitting his own person. When he had sojourned in and about the City not above thirty daies, he took his leave and departed into his own Realm.

To the Reader.

From the five and fortieth book forward, all the rest of Livy (to the great main and blemish of the Latine tongue, and no small grief of learned men) is left, even 100 books wanting five, like as those ten between the tenth and one and twentieth books, commonly called the second Decad. For as it appeared by L. Florus the Epitomist there were in all 140: and the arguments of so many remain at this day, by him collected. But if it be true that Francis Petrarch saith, Levy wrote in all 142: and as Charles Sigonius probably conjectureth, the 36 and 37 Breviaries of L. Florus be wanting of this later number. How all these complete books of T. Livius should miscarry, it is not certainly known. Some hope there is that they are but mis-cast and laid out of the way. For like as within these hundred years some fragments of the story were discovered in Mogunce: and the last five books now extant, found by Simon Grinzus in the Library of a monastery over-against the City of Worms, and dedicated by Erasmus of Rotterdam unto Charles, the son of William Lord Montjoy, in the reign of Henry the eight of famous memory K. of England, &c. so we are not to despair of the rest. In the mean time, we must make much of these brief summaries left unto us. Even as therefore I have inserted those ten Breviaries instead of the books: so I thought it not amiss (in hope that one day the very books themselves will come to light) to proceed in the rest following: and the rather for that neither he that translated Livy into the Tuscan language, nor they who have done him into French (as far as I could ever see) have taken that pains.

Of the XLVI. Book.

Eumenes came towards Rome. Now because in the Macedonian war he had carried himself indifferent between Perseus and the Romans, there passed a law in general terms. That no King might repair to Rome; so the end, that if he were excluded, he should not be reputed an enemy: nor if he were admitted, acquit and cleared of all fault. Cl. Marcellus the Consul judged the Gauls inhabiting the Alps, and C. Sulpicius Gallus the Ligurians. The Embassadors of King Prusias complained of Eumenes, for that he invaded and wasted their borders; and they informed Perseus that he had conspired with Antiochus against the people of Rome. At the earnest suit and intercession of the Rhodians, a league was contrived with them. The Censors took a review and survey of the City, wherein were enrolled and sessed 327022 Citizens of Rome. M. Emilius Lepidus was elected president of the Senat. Prolemus the King of the Egyptians was by his younger brother expelled out of his realm, but by the means of Embassadors (sent from Rome) he was restored to his Kingdom. Upon the death of Ariarathes King of Cappadocia, his son Ariarathes came to the crown, and by entreaties and mediation of Embassadors, renewed amity with the people of Rome. This book containeth besides, the wars against the Ligurians, Corinthians, and Lusitanians, fought with variable fortune: the troubles also in Syria after the death of Antiochus, who left behind him Antiochus his son, a very child. This young Prince (together with his guardian Lysias) Demetrius the son of Seleucus (who had been sent in hostage to Rome) murdered privily, because he was not yet at large and dismissed by the Romans: and so himself entered upon the Kingdom. L. Emilius Paulus who had conquered Perseus, departed the self; whose interruption and absence from the publick treasure was such, that notwithstanding he had brought both out of Spain and Macedony so great store of wealth and riches, yet when his goods were prized and sold, there would be hardly raised thereof sufficient to repay his wife her dowry. The Pomptine marshes were drawn drie by Cor. Cethegus the Consul (unto whom that charge was by lot fallen) and the same turned into firm ground.

Of the XLVII. Book.

Cneus Tremellius a Tribune of the Commons had a fine set on his head, for that he had contended in a wrongful cause with M. Emilius Lepidus the foreigner Pontife. The power and authority of the clergy Magistrates, was greater and mightier than before. A law was enacted as touching inordinate suit for offices. In the survey of the City, there were taxed in the subsidy book 328314 Roman citizens. L. Emilius Lepidus was chosen again president of the Senat. Between the two brethren Prolemes, who were at variance, there passed this accord and agreement, That the one should reign in Egypt and the other in Cyrene. Ariarathus King of Cappadocia, by the perswade plot and forcible power of Demetrius King of Syria dispossessed of his Kingdom, was by the Senat set into it again. Certain Embassadors were sent as delegates from the Senat to determine of the litigious ground between Masani and the Carthaginians. C. Martius the Consul fought against the Dalmatians, at the first unfortunately, but afterwards achieved the victory. The occasion of the war with them was this: for that they had made wast upon the Illyrians, who were allies of the people of Rome. The same nation Cornelius Nasica the Consul brought in subjection. Q. Optimus the Consul subdued the Ligurians beyond the Alps, who had spoiled Antipolis and Nicea, two Towns belonging to the seignory of the Mallians. Moreover, here are contained the adventures of many Captains in Spain, with no good success. In the 58 year from the foundation of the City, the Consuls so soon as the assemblies for election was past, and other Consuls chosen for the year following, began their office. The cause of this alteration was, because the Spaniards were entered into rebellion. The Embassadors aforesaid who had been sent to take up and decide the controversy between Masani and the Carthaginians, made report, That they had found great store of ship-timber and other matters for a navy at Carthage. Certain Pretors accused by the provinces for avarice, were condemned.

Of the XLVIII. Book.

The Censors took a review and tax of the city, wherein were reckoned three hundred four and twenty thousand polls of citizens. The causes of a third Punick war be here recorded. Upon a report that there was a right puissant army of Numidians upon the borders of the Carthaginians, conducted by Antiochobarnes the nephew of Syphax. M. Porcius Cato perswaded in an oration to proclaim war against the Carthaginians, for that they intertained such a power within their frontiers under a colour against Masani, but in truth raised against the Romans: howbeit Publius Cornelius Nasica gained him and dissuaded the matter. Whereupon ordeined it was, that Embassadors should be sent to Carthage in special to observe what they did, and whereabout they went. Who after they had given the Carthaginians Senat Senat a check, and rebuke, for that against the covenants of the league they maintained forces, and were provided of timber and other stuff for a navy, they shew sailing to conclude a peace between Malanilla and them: so at Malanilla (should) seize and part with the land in question. But Gigo the son of Amilcar, a bold and valiant man, who then was in Malanilla, notwithstanding their Sena's promise, refused to be ruled by the award of the said Embassadors: he incited them to his person's remembrance, and to war upon the Romans, that the Embassadors made first to flee and for themselves, or else they had come to a mischief. When they related (these) news at Rome, the Senat at last had bent against the Carthaginians, were now by his word provoked much more. M. Porcius Cato performed the funeral of his son, deceased in his Pretorship, with exceeding small charges, according to his ability, for he was poor. One Andronicus, who stoutly made the world believe, that he was the son of Perseus the King of Macedony, was sent to Rome. M. Enilius Lepidus, now six times chosen President of the Senat by the Consuls, gave his son in freight charge before he died, to carry him forth to Lurial in a conchunt linen clothes and the purple pal, and not to bestow in other acquiesces above one denier: saying, that the funerals of the greatest and best persons are wont to be enobled and honoured with the best of images and steller, and not with few pious expences. An inquisition there was about the practise of poisoning and Treary. Pubilia and Licinia, who were indicted for making away their husbands, put in societies before the Pretor, to be bound in goods, lands, and body for them; and under judicial process passed and their cause heard, by a decree of their kindfolk suffered death. Gullussa the son of Malanilla gave intelligence, that at Carthage there was mustering and levying of soldiers, rigging and providing of a fleet, all preparations no doubt for war: and Publius Cornelius Nafica replied against him, that nothing was to be done in such a cold way, without advice. Though good it was to send Enilius, for to see the truth of all, and upon their knowledge to certify, L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Pothumius Albinus the Consul, when they took matters with severity and rigour, and would not for favour spare any one, but press all, were committed by the Tribunes of the commons, who for their friends could obtain at their hands no release and immunity of soldiery. By cessation of the wars in Spain, which many times had been unwarily and unfortunately managed, when the City of Rome was so distressed and damned, that there could not be found any one who would so much as accept of a martial Tribuneship, or was willing to go in quality of Lieutenant: P. Cornelius Amilius stepped forth, made offer and professed, that he would undertake any kind of military service whatsoever he was laid upon him: and by his own example stirred up all the rest to the love of warfare. L. Lucullus the Consul, when Claudius Marcellus (after whom he succeeded) was thought to have quieted all the flux and nations of Celtiberia, subdued the Veeccans, Cantabrians, and other regions and nations as yet unknown in Spain. P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus Amilius the son of L. Paulus, and the nephew of Africanus by adoption, being there a mortal Colonel, slew a Barbarian challenger that defied him. But in the winning of the City Interactia, he adventured a more dangerous enterprise: For he was the first of all other that scaled and mounted over the wall, Servius Sulpitius Galba the Pretor sped bravely in a battle against the Portugals. When as the Embassadors were returned out of Africk, together with the Carthaginians Orators, and Gullussa the son of Malanilla, bringing word, that they found at Carthage both an army and also an armada: I thought it was, to put to question and debate the matter in the Senat: where Cato and other principal Senators were of opinion and gave advice, to transport an army presently into Africk: but because C. Nafica opposed and said, that he saw as yet no sign and best cause of war, agreed it was to forbear all hostility and force of arms, in case the Carthaginians would turn their navy and discharge their army: if not, then agreed it was, that the Consuls next following in place of government should propose as touching the Punick war. When the Theatre was built, which by the Consuls had been put forth to no known frame, and set up at a price, through the means of Pub. Cornelius Nafica, who inferred, that it was a piece of work, unprofitable, yet, and hurtful to the manners generally of the citizens: by virtue of an Act of Sena's demolished it was pulled down: so as the people for a long time fed on their feet to behold the purple pal. The Carthaginians at that time took arms contrary to the league, and covered upon Malanilla. But was offered they were in flight by him (who now withstood) he now was fourscore year old and could not be used to staff his meat finely without any dairy since years and to chew his bare bread still) and over and besides they desired to draw upon their head the Roman war.

Of the XLIX. Book.

The beginning of the third Punick war, in the six hundredth and one year from the Cities foundation, which within five years after it began, came to a full and small end. Much diversity there was in opinion between M. Porcius Cato whom they reputed for the wisest, and Scipio Nafica, who by the Senat was judged the best and honestest man in the City. Cato was altogether for the wars, and advised to destroy Carthage quite: Nafica contrarywise dissuaded what he could. Nevertheless, in the end, notwithstanding it was. Thus because against covenant and accord they kept a navy at sea, and had led forth an army out of their borders: also for that they entered into arms and levied war upon Malanilla, a friend and confederate to the people of Rome, and received not into their Town, Gullussa his son, who was in the company of the Roman Embassadors: war should be proclaimed against them. But before that any forces were embarked and taken the sea, the Embassadors of Utica repaired to Rome, yielding themselves and what they had. That embassy, as a special promise to the issue and event of the war, was acceptable and pleasing to the Lords of the Senat, but heavy and grievous to the Carthaginians. In Terentum a place it was in Campus Martius, whereupon the pestimes Terentins took their name, were placed exhibited to Father Dis the infernal God, according to the direction of the books of Sibylla. These had been set out one hundred years before in the first Punick war, and in the five hundredth year and one, after the City was founded. Thirty Embassadors came to Rome, by whom the Carthaginians presented their submission. But the sentence of Cato imported and prevailed, to hold fast their former determination; and that the Consul with all speed should set forward in their journey to the war. Who having passed the sea and arrived in Africk, received of them three hundred hostages, whom they had required and demanded: and also took into their hands all their armor and weapons, and what furniture of war soever they found at Carthage. They proceeded moreover after all this, to command them by warrant and authority from the L. of the Senat to build them a new Town for to inhabit in some other place, so that it were ten miles at least remote from the Sea: by which indignity offered, they provoked the Carthaginians to strife and take arms again. L. Martius and M. Manilius the Consuls, began to besiege and assault Carthage: during which siege and assault it fortune, that two Colonels unadvisedly adventured to break into the City with their cohorts, at one part thereof where the walls were neglected, and when by the Townsmen they were fore beaten and killed, by the means of Scipio Africanus they were rescued: by whom also a certain squire was delivered. Moreover, he saved the camp, against which the Carthaginians filled forth of their City to give the assault at once upon it with all their forces: by which service he above the rest won great honor. Over and besides, when as the Consul (for the other was gone to Rome to behold the dilation of Massinissa) seeing the siege and assault of Carthage took no better effect, minded to lead the army against Aldrubal, who with another power of men kept the narrow freights of a certain passage, he counselled the said Cato, first, not to give battle in a place of such disadvantage: but afterwards overweighed and born down by the opinions of the greater number (who envied as well his wisdom as virtue) he also entered into the same freights. And when the Roman army, according as he foretold, was distressed and put to flight, and two cohorts best round and involved by the enemies, he with certain small cohorts of horse returned into those freights, rescued them, and brought them away in safety. Which valour of his, even Cato (a man otherwise more ready of his tongue to find faults) so recommended in the Senate, that in these terms he gave out and said, * That all the rest who were employed in the wars of Africk, served as shadows and dead men, but Cato had true vigour and spirit indeed. The people of Rome besides, cast forth favour and good liking to him, that at the next election, most of the tribes picked him out to be Consul, notwithstanding he was by law under age. When L. Scribonius a Tribune of the Commons had promised a Law, That all the Portugals (who according to covenant and composition, yielded to the people of Rome, and yet by S. Galba were sold in France) should be restored to their freedoms: M. Cato most earnestly pleaded in the behalf of that law, and maintained it. His Oration is extant to be seen, included within his Annals. Q. Fulvius Nobilior, when he was by him shaken up and well checked in the Senat, answered in the behalf of Galba. Tera, and Galba also, seeing himself at the point to be condemned, took in his arms and embraced his own two sons: being * Pratextati, and a son of C. Sulpitius whose Guardian he was, and made such pitome and rustle move, all the while he spake in his own cause, that the foresaid law was revoked and cancelled. Three Orations of his there are to be seen two against Libo a Tribune of the Commons and his proposed Law, as touching the Portugals: and one against L. Cornelius Cethegus, in which he confessed and avowed the killing of the Portugals, encouraging near unto him: for that he knew certainly that they after their manner had sacrificed an horse and a man, and under a colour of peace, intended to set upon and charge his army. Andronicus one of base birth and the most abject lowest condition, who made the world believe that he was King Petreus his son, and thereupon changed his name and was called Philip, having made an escape and fled secretly from Rome (whether Demetrius King of Syria had sent him in regard of this his notorious lie) had many men come flocking unto him, embracing a forged and counterfeit tale of his, as if it had been a true time and report: by which means he gathered an army together, and either with the goodwill of the inhabitants, or by force of arms, seized all Macedony and held it in his hands. Now had he devised and framed the piteous in this wise, That Petreus the King had begotten him (forsooth) of a concubine: that he was committed to * one Cytherea to be fostered and brought up: to the end that if ought (should) fall out but well unto the King, in that war which he waged with the Romans, there might be yet some seed as it were and issue remaining of the Kings blood and royal race. When Petreus was deceased, he had his education at Adramyctum until he was 12 years old, supposing him to be his natural father who fostered and kept him, and not at all from what stock he was descended. Now if fell out (saith he) that the said foster father of mine lay very sick; and being at the point of death, he bequeathed at my birth and parentage. Moreover, that there was a little book given to my supposed mother, folded with the sign manual of King Petreus, which she was to deliver unto me when I came once to ripe age, and to be 24 years old: charging her most faithfully of all loves, to conceal the whole matter until that time were come: and when I was grown to that age as she said, then the book was given me, wherein mention was made of two chests of treasure left for me by my father. Then the woman, who knew full well that I was no child of her, but only so topped, bequeathed my birth unto me, who was fortune ignorant of of mine own deceit: also the woman said great woe upon me to depart out of those quarters before that Eumenes, a professed enemy to Petreus, came to the knowledge thereof, for fear to be murdered. In which respect I being affrighted and hoping, wishal to find some aid in the hands of Demetrius, went into Syria: and there first I took heart unto king, and dared openly to profess who I was, and never before: [Thus much of Andronicus this counterfeit Kings son.]

this: As C. Mancinus the Consul was devoutly sacrificing the sacred chickens clowned to live away out of their cage or coop. Afterwards, as he was about to see Spain and a shipboard for to live away into Spain; here hapnd a voice to be heard, saying, Stay, Stay Mancinus. These words in the effect to be unfortunist and heavy preages unto Mancinus, for he received an overthrow on the Numantians hands, and was turn'd clear out of his camp. And seeing no hope left to save his army, he entred in a dishonourable peace with them, but the Senat expressely revoked and annulled the same. 30000 Romans were defeated by 4000 Numantians & no more. D. Iulius made a general conquest of all Portugal, even as far as to the Ocean, by forcing and sacking their Cities and strong Towns: and when his soldiers were intreated to stop there; 'Oblivio, he caught up a banner from the port-engein, and carried it off very triumph, and by this means perswaded them to go on. Alexander Jon. King of Syria, a child not yett twenty years old at the mozt, was treacherously murdered by Diodorus his guardian or protector. Iustus Trypton, There were Physicians by corruption bribed and suborned to give it out and bear the people in hand most falsly, that the young Prince pined away with the paine of the Bladder, and whilst they would seem to cut him for it, they killed him out of hand in the very section.

Of the LVI. Book.

Decius Junius Brutus had got a fortune in the farther Province of Spain, fighting with the Galatians. But M. Aemilius Lepidus Pro-consul, for a service in his wars against the Vacci, and suffered the like treatment to that other received from the Numantians. When Mancinus the author and maker of the treaty with the Numantians, was delivered up in person to the Numantians, for to allow the people of Rome, to disengage them in conscience for cancelling the said covenant, they received him not, and would none of him. The people was numbered and taxed by the Cenforis in which survey and account they were, there were entered into their books 333000 Roman citizens. Fulvius Flaccus the Consul brought the Lusitanians in Illyricum under subjection. M. Cokinius the Pretor fought in Thracia with the Thracians, and won the battle. When by the default and error of the Captains and Commanders, the Numantians were continued still without the publick shame and dishonor of the state; the Senate and people of Rome conferred the Consulship upon Scipio Africanus, without any suit or seeking of his. Africanus when he was unwilling to accept thereof, by reason of a Law forbidding expressly, "that any man should be created Consul the second time, he had a dispensation, and was freed from the law in that behalf, like at that other in his former Consulship. There was an insurrection of bondslaves arose in Sicily, where it could not be suppressed by the Pretors and Lord Governors, C. Pulvius had the charge of that Province and service. This war began by occasion of one Eunus a bondslave and a Syrian born; who having assembled together a power of wretched peasants and country slaves; broken prisons and banes of correction, came to have assault and complete army. Moreover, Cleon also another notable slave, raised the number of 700000 villains like himself; and they both joining their forces together, waged war many times against the people of Rome and their army in both parts.

Of the LVII, Book

Scipio Africanus laid siege to Numantia: and whereas the army was grown to be corrupted through idleness, riot and loose life, he reclaimed the same, and reduced it unto a most strict and severe kind of military discipline. For he cut off all the means and occasions of delight from his people: he set packing away two thousand axes and adze, that followed the camp: he bid the soldiers hark to work every day: he forced each one to carry on his shoulder corn for thirty days; and seven good hawks besides an eagle, palladium, As if he died one of them to go heavily under his load: he would say thus under him, Sirrah, when you have the skill to empale your self with your sword point, then cease to carry pales, but not before. When he saw another practise to wield very narrowly a little light fly buckler, he commanded him to bear a target of a bigger size and weightier than ordinary, as finding fault that he knew better how to hold his shield for defence of his own body, than to handle his sword for offence of the enemy. Met he with a soldier on his back and side: If he were a Roman, up he went and was well beat and saddled with vine-windings by the centurion: if a stranger, flogged and jerked he was with birchen rods by the Lictors. And so severely all the pack-borne and other labouring folk he caused to be sold: because if they should not cease the soldiers of their carriage. Well, many a time he bare himself worthily in fight and had a fortunate hand against the enemies that sallied forth again. Him, The Vaccæans were freights besieged: and after that they had killed their wives and children, they slew their own selves upon them. Scipio, at what time Antiochus King of Syria had sent him most brave and stoutly present, Scipio, at what time of the field were wont to conceal the gifts of KK, he avowed the accepting of them in open sight of all men, except at the very Tribunal seat. And when he had so done, he commanded the treasurers to receive all, and enter in his book of receipts for the state; promising out of that stock to reward the hardest men and most valiant knights, who he had buckled and invincible Numantia on every side, and saw the enemies driven to great distress for hunger. he forbade expressly to kill any of them that went forth of the Town to beg and pursue, villains. Saying, That the more they were in number, the sooner they would consume and spend up the corn which they had,

Tiberius Sempronius Gracchus, a Tribune of the Commons, when he promoued an Agrarian Law, by which no man should hold and occupy above five hundred arpens or acres of the City Lands; seeing the Senate and order of Gentlemen to storm against it, grew into such heat of choler and furious rage, that instantly by an act made, he deprived of Tribuneship himself, M. Octavius his Colleague, for maintaining the cause of the aduerser part; and without, care, created himself his brother C. Gracchus, and App. Claudius his own wife's father, Tribunes by commissaries for dividing of the said lands. He promoued also and published another Agrarian Law, by vertue whereof if any man encroached farther, and more abominably flint and proportion, the same Tribunes and none but they should sit down and determine, how far forth the common grounds and the priuim lands should reach. Afterwards, when three fold to be less ground than should be diuided, he p-posed that without the offence of the common people (because elsewhere he had stirred up their appetites for hope greater matters) he would prefer a Law, That amongst all citizens, by vertue of the Law Sempronius ought to receiue lands, the more which he thought fit to see King Attalus should be diuided. Nowe this Attalus the King of Pergimus and son of Eumenes, had left behind him, the people of Rome his fall heir of all that he had. To be Seene upon this so many indignities offered by Gracchus, was highly displeased, and Pub. Mucius the Consul about the self: who after he had intreated in the Senat against him, was by him haled forth before the people, and accused into the Commons, howbeit he declaimed against him once again openly from the Rostra; when Gracchus would haue been chosen Tribune of the Commons a second times, by the aduice and procurement of P. Cornelius Nasica, the chief priest and noblest fiew him in the Capitol. He caught his first knock with the broken peeces of the Tribunes poet. And he among others stun in that iudicious judgement, was neuer committed to the earth, but thrown into the river. Moreover, this book containeth the story in six, fought against the fugitive slaves with variable fortune a dozen.

Of the LIX. Book.

THE Numantians forced by great extremities, and of fsumine especially, murdered themselves in confusion by turns. After the City was won, Scipio Africanus rased and destroyed it wretely, and over it triumphed, in the fourteenth year after the ruin of Carthage. P. Attilius the Consul dispatched and called the war in Sicily, with the foresaid fugitive, Arritonicus the son of King Eumesus, invaded Asia and held it to his own use; whereas by the last will and testament of King Attalus, it was legaceth as a legacy unto the people of Rome, and ought to have been freed. Against him P. Licinius Stur was the Consul and Archibishop besides: (Asking never done or seen before) took a journey with an army of Italy, and in a battell was overthrowen and lost his life. M. Porpenna the Consul overcame Attitonicus, and receiveth him by surrender. Q. Pomponius and Q. Metellus were elected Consors, the first Commons that ever both together attained to that dignity. A review was taken by the Consors; there were numbered 36883 citizens, besides orphans and widows. Q. Metellus the Consor gave his advice and opinion; that all men should be compellid to singe wives, for the breeding of children. His Oratorical purpose is extant which Augustus Cesar, at what time as he went in hand to joy in marriage, all the three states and degrees of the City cheered in the Senat, as if it had been panned to sit there times wherein we now live. C. Atilius Labeo, a Tribune of Commons, commanded Q. Metellus the Consor (who in the review and new chaise of the Senatior did him that disgrace as to leave him out) to be pitched headlong from the rock Tarpeibus the rest of the Tribunes assisted the Consor for all that ever they could, that this commandment should not be executed. When Carbo, a Tribune of the Consors, did shew, that it might be lawful to create the same man Trib. of the Commons so often as one would; P. Africanus disjoined this law in a swift grave and prayd Orator wherein he said these words especially. That he judged Tib. Gracchus to have beenfully slain by his desert. Gracchus on the other side mayntained the law, and pleaded that it might passe; but Scipio imported and previled in the end: If this book, are related the wars between Antiochus king of Syria, and Phaeates king of the Parthians; at also the troubles of Egypt, which flood as then in no letter term. Ptolemee furnished Evierarches, for his exceeding cruelty gave hateful and odious to his own subject; and when the people had set on fire and burned his royal palace, he fled by stealth into Cyprus: and when the kingdom was by the people made over to his sister Cleopatra, whom (after he had deflowered by force her daughter), a virgin, and took her to wife) he had turned away in great displeasure and malice: unto her he killed the son he had by her, in Cyprus, and sent unto the mother the head, hands and feet. Certain seditions were raised by the Triumvirs, Fulvius Flaccus, C. Gracchus, and L. Carbo, who were created for the defence of land. Against whom P. Scipio Africanus made resistance; but being in perfect health, strong and lusty, he went home, to his house as it might best stand, and was found dead in his bed-chamber the next morning. His wife Sempornia was deeply grieved that he given him a cup of poison; and reasouned especially, because (he was sister to the Gracchi, between whom and Africanus there was great love and amity) Hence, there was no question and freight enquiry made how he came to his death. When his head was so laid the Triumvirs followed beforehand, brake forth into a fight and hot fire. C. Sempornius the Consul fought against the lapidist, but unfortunately, but soon after he made amends for that loss received, with a victory achieved by the special valor of C. Iulius Brutus, the same man who before had conquered Portuall.

Of the LX. Book.

Aurelius the Consul subdued the Sardiens, Fulvius Flaccus was the first man that vanquished the Ligurians beyond the Alps, being sent to aid the Massilians against the French Saltyes, who lay force upon the borders of the Massilians, and spoiled them. Lucius Optimus the Pretor received under his subjection the Fregellans who had revolted, and destroyed the Town Fregella. Here is reported a pestilence in Africa, by an exceeding multitude of sculls, killed and lying dead after war upon the ground. A survey was taken of the City by the Consuls, wherein were numbered 390736 citizens. C. Gracchus, brother of Tiberius, a Tribune of the Commons, but of the twins more eloquent, preferred certain dangerous laws: and among these, one touching grain, namely that the Commons should be served in the market at the rate of one half, and a third part of. Also, a Modus: another concerning division of lands, the same which his brother before him had published, and a third (whereby he meant to corrupt the order of Gentlemen, which then accorded with the degree of Senators) namely, that from out of the Gentlemen, 600 should be taken into the Senat: and forasmuch as in those days, there were but 300 Senators, these 600 Gentlemen should be entering into the said three hundred, it then was said, that the order of Gentlemen should be double in number to the Senators, and twice as strong. This Gracchus having continued his Tribuneship another year, by proposing still the Agrarian laws, provided, that many Colonies more should be planted in Italy, and one besides, upon the very plot of ground where Carthage lately destroyed. And last, and there himself (chosen Tribune) therefore erected a Colony. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Q. Metellus against those Balares Islands, which the Greeks call Gymnetia, because the people go naked all the summer time. But Balares they be named either of flinging darts, or of Balares the companion of Hercules, whom he left behind there, at what time, as is related to Ceryon. Also, the troubles in Syria be here reported, wherein Cleopatra first her husband Demetrius and his son Seleucus: taking great indignation, that when his father was by her killed, he without her warrant had taken the diadem upon him.

Of the LXI. Book.

Caius Sextius the Pro-consul, after he had conquered the nation of the Saltyes, built the Colony Aquæ Sextie: so called of the plentiful abundance of waters, by reason of springs both hot and cold, and so of his own name. C. Cominius the Pro-consul fought fortunately against the * Allobroges, near the Town Vindalium. The cause why he levied war against them was, for that they had received and relieved by all means they could, Teutomalus the King of the * Salvi, when he fled unto them, and waited at the territories of the * Hdunians, who were the allies of the people of Rome. C. Gracchus, after he had born his Tribuneship with much sedition, and kept the Aventine hill with a multitude of the Commons in arms, was by L. Optimus the Consul (who by virtue of an act of Senat had put the people in arms) distressed of his bold and staid, and together with him Fulvius Flaccus a Consular man, his officer and companion in this furious outrage. Q. Fabius Maximus the Consul, and nephew of Paulus, won a field of the Allobroges, and Bitutius King of the Avernii. Of Bitutius his army were slain a hundred and twenty thousand. And when himself in person was gone to Rome to satisfy the Senat, he was committed toward in Alba for that it seemed dangerous and hurt full to the peace, for to send him back again into France. Also there passed a decree, that Congentatius his son should be apprehended and sent to Rome. The Allobroges submitted and were received. L. Optimus being accused before the body of the people by Q. Decius a Tribune of the Commons, for imprisoning certain citizens uncondemned, was acquitted.

Of the LXII. Book.

Caius Marcius the Consul vanquished the Stonii, a people dwelling upon the Alpes, Micipsa King of the Numidians died, and left the Kingdom unto his three sons, Adherbal, Hyemphal, and Jugurtha his brothers son, whom he had adopted for his own child. L. Cæcilius Metellus subdued the Dalmatians. Jugurtha levied war upon Hyemphal his brother, overcame him in fight, and slew him: Adherbal his third brother, he drove out of there land, but by the Senat of Rome restored he was again. L. Cæcilius Metellus, and Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus the Consuls, deprived 32 Senators of their place and dignity. Besides, this book containeth the troubles of the Syrian Kings.

Of the LXIII. Book.

Caius Porcius the Consul fought with the * Scordisci in Thracia, and lost the field. The Consuls took a survey of the City: in which were enrolled 394336 of Roman citizens. Æmilia, Licinia, and Marcia, three vestal virgins were convicted and condemned for incest. The manner how this transgression was committed, detected, judged, and punished is here set down. The * Cimbrians, an huge and mighty nation, invaded Illyricum and put it to the wast: by whom Papirius Carbo the Consul was defeated, both he and his army. Livius Drusus the Consul, warred in Thrace upon the Scordisci, (a people descended from the Gauls) and won much honour.

Of the LXIV. Book.

Adherbal warred upon by Jugurtha, was within the City Cirra besieged, and by him slain, notwithstanding the commandment of the Senat to the contrary. For which cause war was proclaimed against Jugurtha himself. Calpurnius Bestia had the commission and charge to manage this war: who made peace with Jugurtha, without warrant from the people and Senat. Jugurtha being cited and called forth under safe conduct, to appease and bewray the authors of his plots and designs, for that the voice went, that he had bribed and corrupted with sums of money many of the Senat, came to Rome: where he was in trouble and jeopardy for a murder committed upon the person of a certain Prince, called Maffia (who seeing him to be hated of the Romans, sought for his kingdom) whom he slew at Rome. Being commanded to answer for his life in regard of this murder, he secretly fled, and he departed from the City, under (by report) these words, O corrupt City and false sale: how soon will it perish, if it may meet with a champion? A. Pothumius a Lieutenant General, after he had likewise fought an unfortunate battle against Jugurtha, amended the matter full well by making an ignominious and dishonourable peace with him, which the Senat judged not meet to be observed and kept.

Of the LXV. Book.

Quintus Cæcilius Metellus the Consul, in two battles discomfited Jugurtha and over-ran all Numidia. M. Jun. Syllanus the Consul, fell unluckily in a battle fought against the Cimbrians: whose continual demands of the Senat a place of habitation and lands to occupy were denied. M. Minutius Proculus had good success in fight against the * Thracians. L. Cælius the Consul together with his host, was defeated and cut in pieces in the borders of the Allobroges by the French Tigrinus, a country of the * Helveticans, who had divided themselves and were departed from the rest of the State. The soldiers remaining alive after that overthrow, capitulated with the enemies for safety of their lives, to put in pledges for to part with the one moiety of all that ever they had unto them.

Of the LXVI. Book.

Jugurtha driven out of Numidia by C. Marius, had the help and aid of Bocchus King of the Moors: but when the power of Bocchus also was defeated in battles, and himself unwilling to maintain the war any longer (so unfortunately begun) Jugurtha was overcome, and delivered up to C. Marius. In which exploit the service of L. Cornelius Sylla treasurer unto Marius, was singular above the rest.

Of the LXVII. Book.

Aurelius Scaurus lieutenant to the Consul, was with his army overthrown by the Cimbrians, and himself taken prisoner. When by them he was called forth to council (at what time as they intended to avoage into Italy) in which he seemed to fright them for passing over the Alps, saying, That the Romans might possibly be overcome: he was by Bolus their King, a proud and fierce prince, killed. At the same time heads Cn. Manlius Consul, and Q. Serv. Cæpio, Pro-consul received an overthrow in the field and lost both their camps. slain there were 8000 soldiers of porters, scullions, launders, and such followers: of the camp besides 40000. By the verdict and censure of the people of Rome Cæpio (through whose ribs the loss and overthrow happened) was condemned: and he was the first after K. Tarquin whose good were confessed: and finally deprived he was of his government. In the triumph of C. Marius, Jugurtha with his two sons was led before his chariot: and afterwards murdered in prison. Marius entered into the Senat, with his triumphal mantle of estate, which never any man before him had done, and for fear of the Cimbrians war be continued in his Magistracy many years together. To his second and third consulship he was chosen absent, and he attained to be Consul the fourth time: which he gained for after he dissembled the contrary. C. Domitius was by the suffrages of the people created the chief Pontiff. The Cimbrians having laid waste all the parts about the river Rhodanus and the mountain Pyreneus, passed over into Spain through the streights: where after they had spoiled many places, they were by the Cætharians chased away: and being returned into France, they joined with the * Teutons, a warlike nation.

Of the LXVIII.

Marcus Antonius the Prætor persecuted the rovers at sea, and chased them as far as into Cilicia. C. Manlius the Consul manfully defended the camp, assailed with all most forcible means by the Teutons and * Ambroses. Afterward in two battles: one after another about Aquæ Sextie he utterly defeated those enemies: where by he port more slain 100000 and 90000 taken prisoners. Marius in his absence was created Consul now in his first time: and when a triumph was offered unto him, he deferred and put it off, until he had made a full and full conquest of the Cimbrians. The Cimbrians repelled and drove from the Alps Q. Catulus the Pro-consul, who had first the narrow gullet of the Alps, and kept a Castle highly mounted over the river Athelais, which he now at abandoned: and when by their colour they had cleared the passage, they pursued the Pro-consul with his army, and passed over into Italy, where in battle they were overthrown by the same Catulus and C. Marius, who had joined their forces together. In which (they say) 140000 men were slain, and 60000 taken prisoners. Marius was honourably received at his return with a general accord of the whole City: and whereas two triumphs were offered unto him, he was content with one. The principal peers and nobles of the City, who long time before had envied him as a man newly start up, joined and advanced to great honours, confessed now that the common-weal by him was preserved. Publius Metellus for murdering his own mother, was the first man fowed up in a leather bag and so thrown into the sea. Here is recorded how the sacred shield Ancilia stored of themselves with a great variety of noise before the Cimbrians war was finished. Finally, this book comprehendeth the wars between the two Kings of Syria.

Of the L. XIX. Book.

Cneus Apuleius Saturninus, by the help of C. Marius, and by occasion that A. Nonius his competitor and concurrent was by his soldiers slain, was by forcible means created Tribune of the commons; and here the Tribuneship as violently he got it. And when he had proposed an Agrarian law and passed it by force, he arrested Metellus Numidicus to answer at a day, for that he had not subscribed and sworn to the said law: who being maintained and defended by the Citizens of the better sort, because he would give no occasion of unseasonable debates and civil contentions, went in voluntary exile to Rhodes: and there he employed his time in reading of books, and giving audience to great and famous men. After he was departed, C. Marius the captain and author of that sedition, who now had purchased a sixth Consulship by a large money scambled amongst the tribes, proclaimed him as excommunicated and interdicted from fire and water like an outlaw. The same Apuleius Saturninus, Tribune of the commons, C. Memmius in his white gown standing to be safe, for that he feared him above all others, drew his proceedings: whereupon the Senat was exceedingly moved in the cause and behalf of C. Memmius: and when C. Marius a man by nature mutable and in his counsel variable, one who ever loved to be on the better side of the hedge and to band with the mightier, was not able to bear him out and protect him, the said Saturninus together with Glauca the Prator and other his complices in that outrage, being by one Rabirius, Q. Cecilius Metellus was recalled out of banishment with exceeding great love and favour of the whole City. Manius Aquilius the Pro-Conf. dispatched and ended the slower-war raised in Sicily.

Of the L. XX. Book.

Vhen Manius Aquilius should plead his own defence, or answer in case of extortion, he would not himself interest and create the favour of the Jury. But M. Antonius his advocate who pleaded for him at the bar, for his come down with his breast, to show the honourable scars received in the front of his body: which being by the Judges seen, they made no doubt, but acquit him. Of this thing Cicero is the only author. Didius the Pro-Conf. managed his wars against the Celtiberians happily. Ptolemaeus K. of Cyrene, surnamed Apion, when he died, left the people of Rome his heir: and the Senat decreed that the cities of his realm should be free. Ariobaranes was restored to his kingdom of Cappadocia by L. Cornelius Sylla. The Persian embassadors sent from their K. Artaces came unto Sylla, to treat and sue for amity with the people of Rome. P. Rutilius a man of uncorrupt and innocent life, who (being lieutenant under L. Mucius the Pro-Conf.) had defended Asia from the wrongfull dealings of the Publicans or common farmers (being odious to the order of knight-hood or gentlemen of Rome, who saw as Judges had the jurisdiction in their hands) was condemned for extortion and banished. C. Geminius the Prator fought unwarlike against the Thracians. The Senat would no longer abide the unwarlike and small offices committed by the gentlemen in exercising of their jurisdiction, and therefore began by all means possible to endeavour for to reduce and translate their prerogative again to themselves: which enterprise M. Livius Drusus a Tribune of the commons stood in their behalf: who to gain more strength to the cause, raised the commons by proposing unto them a large sum, Moreover in this book are comprised the stirr and troubles of the Kings in Syria.

Of the L. XXI. Book.

Marcus Livius Drusus, a Tribune of the commons, for the better maintenance of the Senat's cause, which he had undertaken, solicited the allies and the nations of Italy, upon hope they were enfranchised citizens of Rome: by whose assistance having gone through by strong hand, with the Agrarian and Frumentarian laws, he obtained also the foresaid law Judicials, in this manner. That all judgments should pass indifferently and equally by Senat and Gentlemen. After this, when the freedoms of Rome promised to the allies could not be compounded and performed, the Italians in a chase and heat of choler began to complot how to revolt: whose conventicles, conspiracies, and orations delivered in the assemblies and diets of their Princes, are in this book reported: In regard whereof, Livius Drusus became banished even to the Senat, as the author of a social war, and in his own house was murdered, but by whom God knoweth.

Of the L. XXII. Book.

The Italian states revolt, namely, the Picentes, Vestini, Marsians, Pelignians, Marrucians, Samnites, and Samnites: The Picentes first entered into arms and began the war. Quintus Servilius the Pro-Conf. was slain in Akulum, together with all the Roman citizens which were in that town: whereupon the whole people of Rome put on arms and soldiers' coats. Servius Galba being surprised by the Lucens, escaped captivity by the means of one woman, in whose house he took up his lodging. Eternia and Alba, two Colonies, were by the Italians besieged. After this, there are reported the aids of the Lucanes and other foreign nations sent unto the people of Rome: moreover, the expeditions and alternative winning of cities, as well by the one side as the other.

Of the L. XXIII. Book.

Lucius Caesar the Cof. in a battell against the Samnites went down and had the worst. Nola the colony fell into the hands of the Samnites, together with L. Porcinius the Prator, who there was slain. Many more nations revolted to the enemies, for that P. Rutilius the Consul had fought with less against the Marsians, and lost his life in the battell. C. Marius his lieutenant had a better conflict with the enemies in the end and upon. Servius Sulpicius vanquished the Pelignians: Q. Capio, another lieutenant of Rutilius, who having been by the enemies besieged, had sallied forth upon the enemies and got the upper hand: for this good success he was made equal in government and command with C. Marius. But hereupon he grew to be too rash, and being over-taken by an ambush of the enemies was slain, and the army defeated. L. Caesar the Consul won a field of the Samnites: for which victory the soldiers coats were laid off again at Rome. Yet because the fortune of the field would show her self variable, the Colony Effer-

dia

nia, together with M. Marcellus, was taken by the Samnites. On the other side, Marius in a battell vanquished the Marsians, and slew Hermianus the Prator of the Marrucians: Q. Cecilius overcame the Salvi in that rebell in the Province of Gaul beyond the Alps.

Of the L. XXIV. Book.

Cneus Pompeius discomfited the Picentes in battell and had them besieged: for which victory he entertained purple robes, with other ornaments and badges of the Magistratus were taken up again and put on. C. Marius fought against the Marsians with doubtful event. The Libertines then and never before began to serve in the wars. Aurel. Plotius the lieutenant in a battell overcame the Umbrians: likewise L. Porcius the Prator vanquished the Marsians, when as both these nations had rebelled. Nicomedes was placed again in the kingdom of Bithynia, and Ariobaranes of Cappadocia. Cn. Pompeius the Cof. overthrew the Marsians in a picnic field. When the City was deeply engaged and plagued in debt, A. Sempronius Aelilius the Prator, because he gave sentence respectively in the favour of the debtors, was slain in the market-place by their creditors the upurers. Moreover, this book cleareth the invades and incursions of the Thracians into Macedonia together with their wasting of those parts.

Of the L. XXV. Book.

Aul. Posthumus Albinus a lieutenant General, being Admiral of the fleet, was upon an infamous imputation of betraying his soldiers massacred by his own army. L. Corn. Sylla, a lieutenant, overthrew the Samnites in fight, and won two camps of theirs. Cn. Pompeius received the Vestini upon their submission. L. Porcius the Cof. after fortunate success in battell, and that he had sundry times discomfited the Samnites, as he assailed to force their camp left his life: a which accident gave away the victory of that battell to the enemy. Colconius and Lucius overcame the Samnites in battell, when Marius Egnatius, a most noble and renowned commander of the enemies, and had many of their towns surrendered up into their hands. L. Sylla tamed the Hirpini, and defeated the Samnites in many battells: and certain States submitted unto him: who having achieved so worthy and brave exploits before his Consulship (as seldom any other man besides the like) repaired to Rome for to sue to be Consul.

Of the L. XXVI. Book.

Aulus Gabinus a lieutenant, having fought fortunately against the Lucans and won from them many towns: as he laid siege to the enemies' league, was cut off and slain. Sulpicius in quality of lieutenant had the execution of the Marrucians, and the surrender of that whole nation. Cn. Pompeius the Pro-Conf. took the submission of the Vestini and Pelignians. The Marsians likewise having been in certain battells quelled by L. Muræna, and Cæcilius Pinna lieutenants, craved peace. Afulum was won by Cn. Pompeius: and the Italian people by Mamerus Æmilys the lieutenant were put to the sword. Silo Popedius, General of the Marsians, and the author of the villany, was slain in battell. Ariobaranes of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes of Bithynia were driven both out of their kingdoms by Mithridates King of Pontus. Last of all this book discourseth of the incursions and spoils that the Thracians made in Macedonia.

Of the L. XXVII. Book.

Vhen P. Sulpicius a Tribune of the Commons, by the advice and instigation of C. Marius had promulgated certain pernicious laws, that the banished should be restored, and new Citizens together with Libertines be voted into Tribes: also that Marius should be chosen General against Mithridates King of Pontus: and when he offered violence against Q. Pompeius and L. Sylla the Consuls, who contradicted his proceedings: and had slain the son of Pompeius the Consul, who had married Sylla's daughter: then L. Sylla Consul entered Rome with an army, and within the very City fought against the adverse side of Sulpicius and Marius, and drove them forth: of which faction twelve were by the Senat judged enemies, and amongst them C. Marius both father and son. As for P. Sulpicius, when he learned a certain farm-house of the country, was betrayed and betrayed by his own bond-servant: and so plied forth from thence and killed. The slave, because he might seem to be rewarded for revealing his Master according to promise, was manumitted and set free: but for his wicked treachery in betraying his own Master, he was thrown down the rock Tarpeia. C. Marius the son crossed the sea into Africa. C. Marius the father lay hidden amongst the marshes of the Minturnians, and was plucked out from thence by the townsmen: and when a certain bond-servant and a Frenchman born, was sent to kill him, he was so affrighted at the Majesty and countenance of so brave a man, that he went back and would not do the feat: whereupon Marius was embarked as the charges of the City and carried into Africa. L. Sylla reformed the State of the City, and drew out from thence inhabitants to people the Colonies: Q. Pompeius the Cof. took his journey to receive the army of Cn. Pompeius the Cof. and by his counsel was slain. Mithridates King of Pontus, seized upon Bithynia and Cappadocia: drove out Aquilius the lieutenant, and with a mighty army invaded Phrygia the Province of the people of Rome.

Of the L. XXVIII. Book.

Mithridates held Asia with his garrisons: he cast into prison Q. Oppius the Pro-Conf. and likewise Aquilius the lieutenant. Also by his commandment, all the Roman Citizens to be found in Asia, were in one day massacred. The City Rhodes, which only continued true and kept allegiance, he assaulted, but being in certain battell at sea overcome, he gave over and retired. Archelaus a chief governor, and commander under the King, saved Greece with an army, seized upon Athens and held it. Moreover, this book containeth the fearful troubles of certain Cities and Islands: whilst the Italian Colonies endeavoured to draw their states, some to side with the King: others, to take part with the Ro-

Lucius Cornelius Cinna, at what time as by force and arms he published dangerous laws, was thereupon by his Collegue Cn. Octavius, driven out of the City with six Tribunes of the commons; befidel and being thus deprived of his rule and authority, he became commander of Ap. Claudius his army by corruption; and joining with C. Marius and other banished persons; out of Attick he marched in the same manner against the City of Rome. In which war, it turned that two brethren, the one of Pompeius his army, and the other of Cinna's, encountered in fight and knew not one another. Now when the conquest was in disarming and spoiling him whom he had slain, he saw what he had done, and took knowledge that it was his brother: whereupon he fell into an exceeding piteous fit of weeping and lamentation: made a funeral fire for his brothers corps, stabbed himself through thereupon, and in the same fire was burnt and consumed to ashes. Now whereas these civil wars might have been suppressed in the beginning, such was the fraudulent dealing of Cn. Pompeius, who seeming to maintain both parties, gave strength to Cinna, and set not to his helping hand before that the Nobler side went down: such also was the fauour and coldness of the Consul, that Cinna and Marius took heart and grew strong: and so with four armies, whereof two were committed to the conduct of Q. Sertorius and C. Carbo, they invaded the City of Rome. Marius won by force the Colony Ostia, and most cruelly ravaged it;

Of the LXXX. Book.

The Italian nations were by the Senate enfranchised, and obtained the freedom of Rome. The Senators who only continued in arms banded again with Cinna and Marius: By them was Plancius slain and his army defeated. Cinna and Marius together with Carbo and Sertorius were possessed of Janiculum, and being a scornful and repelled by Octavius the Consul, retired and departed. Marius fortified and laid desolate Antium, Aricia and Lanuvium three Colonies. When as now the nobility and Lords of the Senate had no hopes at all left to withstand the contrary faction; by reason of the cowardice and treachery as well of souldiers as leaders, who upon corruption either would not fight at all, or else went over to the adverse part: Cinna and Marius were received into Rome: who as if it had been an enemy City forced by assault, made havoc of all with fackage and massacres. In this garb Cn. Octavius the Consul lost his life, and all the nobility of the other side were murdered: and among the rest, M. Antonius most eloquent Orator, and C. Cælar: whose heads were set upon the Pulpit Rottra. Young Crassus the son was by the horsemen of Fimbria killed: and Crassus the father, because he would not endure any indignity unworthy his virtues, fell upon his own sword. Without any assembly or election at all, Cinna and C. Marius declared themselves Consuls for the next year: and the same day whereon they entered into their Magistracy, Marius caused Sex. Licinius a Senator to be thrown down the rock Tarpeia: and after many wicked and heinous outrages committed upon the Ides of January, he departed on his flight: a man whose crimes (if they were weighed together with his virtues) hardly could be determined, whether he were in a better souldier, or in peace a more dangerous Citizen. For the Commonwealth which he in his armour saved, the same in his long gown he overthrew: first, with all manner of cofferage and deceit: and lastly by plain hostility and force of arms.

Of the LXXXI. Book.

Lucius Sylla straightly beleaguered Athens, which Archelaus a governor under King Mithridates held with a garrison: and after much toil and labour won it. To the City he granted their liberty again, and restored unto the Citizens all that was their own. Magnesia the only City in Asia that remained true and loyal was most valiantly defended against Mithridates. Over and besides, here ye shall read the exploits performed by the Thracians in Macedonia.

Of the LXXXII. Book.

Sylla vanquished inattel the power of King Mithridates, which having kept Macedonia in obedience, was now come into Thracia. He slew one hundred thousand enemies, and was Master of the Camp. afterwards, when the war was renewed, he discomfited and defeated quite the Kings whole army. Archelaus together with the Kings fleet yielded to Sylla. L. Valerius Flaccus the Consul and companion in government with Cinna, being sent to succed Sylla: was (for his covetousness) so odious unto his army, that he was slain by C. Fimbria his own lieutenant, a most audacious and desperate person: and so the conduct and command of the army was transferred to Fimbria. Moreover, here is recorded what Cities in Asia Mithridates won: how cruelly he spoiled and vexed the Provinces: and how the Thracians made raids and invasions into Macedonia.

Of the LXXXIII. Book.

Caius Fimbria after he had discomfited certain forces of Mithridates upon the City Pergamus, befeigned the King there, and mustered but a little of taking him prisoner. The City Ilium, which stood out and refused itself to the behest and devotion of Sylla, he forced and destroyed, and the greatest part of Asia he recovered. Sylla in many battels defeated the Thracians. When L. Cinna and C. Papyrius Carbo who for two years together were Consuls of their own making, prepared war against Sylla: by the means of L. Valerius Flaccus the President of the Senate (who made an Orator in the Council-Halls) and those who loved concord and sought for amity, effected it was in the end, that Embassadors should be sent unto Sylla to treat about a peace. Cinna was murdered by his own souldiers, whom he forced against their will to be embarked and to take a voyage against Sylla: by which occasion Carbo alone bore the Consulship. Sylla being passed over into Asia, made peace with Mithridates upon this capitulation, That the King should quit these Provinces, namely, Asia Bithynia, and Cappadocia, Fimbria being forsaken by his army, which revolted unto Sylla, gave himself a fore wound and yielding his neck unto his own bondage, obtained this favour at his hands, as to dispatch him outright.

Of

Sylla returned this answer unto the Embassadors sent unto him from the Senate, That he would be ordered by them in case these Citizens who (upon the hard usage of Cinna) stood unto him, might be restored. The Senate thought this a reasonable condition and just demand: but by means of Carbo and that faction, who made reckoning that war would be more commodious unto them, there ensued no agreement and accord. The same Carbo when he was minded to exact hostages of all the towns and colonies of Italy, thereby to bind them upon their allegiance against Sylla, was by a general consent of the Senate crossed and rubicited. The new enfranchised Citizens, by virtue of an act by the Senate granted, were allowed the privileges of their souldiers and voices. Q. Metellus Pius, who had sided with the nobility, whilst he lived was in Attick, was by C. Fabius the Praetor discomfited: and by the faction of Carbo and those that followed the part of Marius, an act of Senate passed. These all armies and forces whereof ever should be called and discharged. The Liberians were distributed indifferently throughout the five and thirty tribes. Besides all this, here is specified the preparation of war which was raised against Sylla.

Of the LXXXV. Book.

Sylla crossed the sea with an army over into Italy: and when these Embassadors which he sent to treat for peace were by the Consul C. Norbanus still entreated, he overcame the said Norbanus in a battel. And when he was about to assault the camp of L. Scipio the other Consul, with whom he had travelled and assailed all means to conclude peace, and could not compass it: the whole Army of the Consul in general, being solicited by souldiers whom Sylla had sent out under-hand to that purpose, turned their engines unto him, and followed him standard, Scipio, when he might have been killed was let go. Cn. Pompeius, the son of that Cneus who was Alculum, enrolled an army of vol-untaries, and came unto Sylla with three legions: unto whom also the nobility all and whole ranged themselves: so as abandoning the City they repaired to the camp. Finally, in this book report is made of the expeditions performed by Captains of both sides throughout all Italy.

Of the LXXXVI. Book.

That year wherein C. Marius (the son of C. Marius) was by forcible means and strong hand created Consul before he was twenty years of age; G. Fabianus Attick was burnt quick in his own parition for the bloody cruelty and greatly accused. L. Philippus, lieutenant unto Sylla, seized Sardinia, after he had discomfited and slain Q. Antonius the Praetor. Sylla contracted a league with the States of Italy, to put them out of fear that he would not benevolence of their freedom of Rome and liberty of souldiers lately granted unto them. In like manner, upon offered confidence (that he had already of undoubted victory, he commanded all those that were in Rome and referred unto him for jurisdiction, to adourn their appearance in court, and to appear at Rome. Whilst the City yeoman divided and distracted two ways, L. Damasippus the Praetor, having according to the bold and pleasure of C. Marius the Consul, gathered the Senate together, massacred all the nobility of the City. One of which number Q. Mutius Scevola the arch-Pontifex, as he stood in the very porch and doorway of Vettians Temple murdered. Besides this book containeth the war ventured by L. Muræna against Mithridates in Asia.

Of the LXXXVII. Book.

Sylla after he had discomfited and overthrown the army of C. Marius, near a place called Sacriportus, befeigned him within the town Praeneste. The City of Rome being recovered out of the hands of his enemies, and when Marius made an offer to rally forth he repelled him. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits achieved by his lieutenants, with the like fortune of that side in all places.

Of the LXXXVIII. Book.

Sylla after that he had defeated and put to the sword the army of Carbo at Clusium, Faventia, and Fidentia, chased him forth of Italy. With the Samnites, who alone of all the Italian nations had not yet laid down arms, he fought one final battel, and vanquished them near the City of Rome, even before the gate Collina: and thus having recovered and got into his hands the absolute managing of the State, he compelled and bound this most goodly and beautiful victory with the sunless cruelty that ever man committed. He cut the throats of 8000 in the great bathly called Villa Publica, even those that had yielded themselves. He set up the scale of proscription and outlawry. The City of Rome and all Italy through out filled with massacres. Among these he caused all the Praenstins, disarmed as they were, to be slain. Marius, a Senator by a King, he killed in this manner, by breaking his arms and legs, by cropping his ears, and digging out his eyes. C. Marius befeigned within Praeneste by Lucretius Aella and that side with Sylla: when he sought means of evasion by a mine under the ground, seeing how he was environed by the army, flew himself within the said mine: for perceiving that he could not escape, he and Pontius Telesinus, that accompanied him in this flight, ran one at the other with their drawn naked swords: and when he had killed him, and was himself hurt, he found so much kindness at his slaves hands as to make amends of him quite.

Of the LXXXIX. Book.

Lucius Butus sent from Cn. Papyrius Carbo, who was arrived at Corcyra in a spher boat to Lilybæum, in effect to see whether Pompey were there: being compassed a d-bemoed in round about by those vessels which Pompey had sent out, turned his sword point to his body, and set the point of himself at assault within the boat, and so bending forward with the point of his body was perc-divorced and disengaged. Cn. Pompeius sent by the Senate with full commission of fruits and command, Cn. Carbo prisoner, who was arrived to the Islands Corsica, and flew him, who kept a private and weeping: for a woman, whom he should die Sylla become Dictator, and that which never any man had done before him: kept his port abroad with 24 Mithridates or Leaders going before him with their rods and axes. He altered the State, and

and in that innovation established it. The Tribunes of the Commons he abridged of their authority, and wholly deprived them of their power to prefer and establish laws. The College of the Pontifices and Augurs he amplified and augmented to the number of 15. The body of the Senate he supplied out of the order of Gentlemen. The children of those who he had proscribed and outlawed he disabled for being eligible to any honorable office, and of their goods made part sale, whereof at first he seized much by violence and had it away. A mighty mass of money he raised thereof, amounting to a hundred and fifty millions of Sesterces. He commanded Q. Lucretius Ocellus to be killed in the very Forum of Rome, for that he presumed without his leave and licence to sue for a Consulship: and when the people of Rome were highly offended at this indignity, he assembled them to a public audience, and before them avowed the fact, and took it upon him. Cn. Pompeius in Africk vanquished and slew in battell Cn. Domitius, one of the proscribed outlaws: and Hirtius King of the Numidians, who prepared to levy war. He being but four and twenty years of age, and no better at yet than a gentleman of Rome (a thing that never any man attained unto) triumphed over Affrick. C. Norbanus, a man who had been Consul, and now proscribed and outlawed, was apprehended in the City of Rhodes, and thereupon slew himself. Mutius likewise one of them that were outlawed and out of protection, being come privily disguised with his head covered to the back door of Bostia his wives house, was not let in, for that she said he was an outlaw: whereupon he took the stab at his own hands, and with his own heart blood bespattered the door of his wives house. Sylla recovered and won again Nola in Samnium. He brought seven and forty legions into the lands conquered from the enemies, planted them therein, and divided the grounds amongst them. He besieged the town Volaterræ, which yet stood out and bare arms, and at length upon surrender got it. Mitylene also, the only City in Asia, (which after that Mithridates was subdued maintained war) was fired and raised down to the ground.

Of the XC. Book.

Sylla depaupered this life, and about his hour was done unto him by the Senate, that he was entered in Mars field. M. Lepidus going about to cancel and abolish the acts of Sylla, raised new war: and by Q. Catulus (his companion in government) was driven out of Italy: and when he prepared to wage war (but to no effect) in Sardinia, there he perished and came to his death. M. Brutus who held Lumbardy, was by Cn. Pompeius slain. Q. Sertorius, another proscribed out-law, levied a great war in the northlands of Spain. Lucius Manlius the Pro-Consul, and M. Domitius a lieutenant, were in fight overcome by Hercules the treasurer. Moreover, this book containeth the acts performed by P. Servilius the Pro-Consul against the Cilicians.

Of the XCI. Book.

Cneus Pompeius, being as yet but a gentleman of Rome, was sent with full commission of Consul command against Sertorius. Certain Cities had Sertorius won by assault, and brought under many States to be his devotion. Ap. Claudius the Pro-Consul overcame the Thracians in divers and sundry battels. Q. Metellus the Pro-Consul defended and slew L. Hirculeius the treasurer of Sertorius, with all his army.

Of the XCII. Book.

Cneus Pompeius both here fought with Sertorius in doubtful events, so as of both parts, one of the wings and points of the battell had the better hand. Q. Sertorius overthrew in fight Metellus and Perpenna with two armies. Pompeius defers to carry away his part in that victory, entered into the field, but made no saving game of it. Afterwards Sertorius was besieged within Calagurum, by daily and continual sallies forth, gave the enemies that lay in siege within as good as they brought. Over and besides, herein are contained the deeds achieved by Cn. Pompeius in Thrace against those Dardaniens, together with sundry cruel and bloody parts played by Q. Sertorius, even with those of his own side. For many of his own friends, and such as were with him outlawed, upon imputations of treason pretended against them, he put to death.

Of the XCIII. Book.

Publius Servilius, the Pro-Consul in Cilicia, subdued the Isaurians, and won certain towns of the Pirars. Nicomedes King of Bithynia at his death made the people of Rome his full heirs, and his kingdom was reduced into the form of a Province. Mithridates contrived a league with Sertorius, and waged war against the people of Rome. Herein is shewed the great preparation of war that the King made as well by land as sea, and how he fixt upon Bithynia. M. Aurelius Cotta the Consul was in battell vanquished by the King at Chalcedon. Moreover, this book containeth the exploits of Pompeius and Metellus against Sertorius, who in all warlike feats and martiall prowess was equal unto them, whom also he raised from the siege before the town Calagurum, and compelled to go into divers countries, Pompeius into the farther Province of Spain, and Pompeius into Gallia.

Of the XCIII. Book.

Lucius Lucullus the Consul fought against Mithridates, and in horse-service had the better hand of him. Certain rode he made with good success, and when his soldiers called hard upon him for help, he said them from mummy. Deiotarus a tetrarch of Gallogracia, defeated the captain of K. Mithridates who levied war in Phrygia. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate achievements of Pompeius against Sertorius in Spain.

Of the XCV. Book.

Caius Curio the Pro-Consul vanquished and subdued the Dardaniens in Thrace. Threescore and fourteen sword-players of Capua fled out of the fence-school of Lentulus at Capua: who having gathered together a number of slaves, and hired bonds raised war under the leading of Chrylus and Spartacus.

tacus, and vanquished in plain field, Cl. Pulcher a lieutenant, and P. Vatinius the Prætor. L. Lucullus the Pro-Consul with the famine and the sword together tamed and subdued the host of Mithridates at the City Cizicus: and when they had chased him out of Bithynia: after many overthrows in war, and misfortunes of shipwreck at sea, wherewith his heart was grieved, he compelled him to flie into Pontus.

Of the XCVI. Book.

Quintus Attilius the Prætor defeated and flew Chrysius the captain of the fugitives, and with him 20000 men. Caius Lentulus the Consul received assault and overthrow at the hands of Spartacus. He also overcame in fight Lu. Gellius the Consul and Quintus Arrius. Sertorius was at a banquet slain by Manius Antonius and M. Perpenna with other conspirators in the eight year of his dukedom. A captain and brave warrior he was. He fought with Pompeius and Metellus, two famous Generals and Commanders. Many a time he saved his own, but more often he went away winner, booty, in the end he was abandoned and betrayed. The foreign command of that side was made over to Marcus Perpenna, whom Cn. Pompeius vanquished, took prisoner, and slew: so about the tenth year after the war began, he recovered Spain. C. Cassius the Pro-Consul, and Cneus Manlius the Prætor were foiled by Spartacus in the field, and that war was committed over to the managing and conduct of M. Cassius the Prætor.

Of the XCVII. Book.

Marcus Crassus the Prætor first fought with a power of the fugitives aforesaid, consisting of French-men and Germans, and won the better: for he slew 35000 enemies, and their captain Granicus. After that he waged against Spartacus, killed him also, and 40000 with him. Manius Antonius the Prætor maintained war unfortunately against the Cretensians, and by his death it took an end. M. Lucullus the Pro-Consul brought the Thracians under subjection. L. Lucullus had the upper hand in a battell of Mithridates in Pontus, and slew above 60000 enemies. M. Crassus and Cn. Pompeius were created Consuls, and Crassus immediately out of his Prætorship stepped to that dignity. So Pompey was a gentleman of Rome and no better advanced thereto, even before he had born the office of Treasurer. They restored again the Tribunes power and authority, by the means of Aurelius Cotta, the prebeminence of judges also was translated unto the Gentlemen of Rome. Mithridates, seeing his own estate lying in danger, fled unto Tigranes King of Armenia for succour.

Of the XCVIII. Book.

Machares the son of Mithridates, King of Bosphorus, was by L. Lucullus received into amity. Cn. Lentulus and L. Gellius the Consuls administered their office with great severity and rigour, and disposed 60 from Senators dignity: they also held a review and purged the City. Enrolled there were 450000 Citizens of Rome. L. Metellus Lord Prætor in Sicily fought fortunnally against the pirates and rovers. The Temple of Jupiter in the Capitoll, which by fire had been consumed, was re-edified by Q. Catulus, and dedicated anew. L. Lucullus in Armenia discomfited in many battels Mithridates and Tigranes, with a mighty power of both Kings. Q. Metellus the Pro-Consul having the charge of the war against the Candians, besieged the City Cydonia. C. Triarius, a lieutenant under Lucullus received a foil. Mithridates in fight, Lucullus was impeached and laid for pursuing Mithridates and Tigranes cause, that he could not accomplish his victory by occasion of a mutiny among his own soldiers, who would not follow, because the Valerian legions forsook Lucullus, alleging that they had served their time fully out.

Of the XCIX. Book.

Quintus Metellus the Pro-Consul forced by assault Gnolus, Lyctus, Cydonia, and many other Cities (in Crete) L. Roicus a Trib. of the Com. pulled a law, that the gentlemen of Rome should be allowed the 14 next seats in the scaffolds of the Theatre, to behold the games and plays. Cn. Pompeius being commanded by a law promised unto the people for to pursue the rovers aforesaid, who had departed and cut off all commerce for corn and vituals, within 74 daies rid the sea of them quite, and after the war with them finished in Cilicia, he received them upon submision, and gave them Cities and lands to possess. Moreover, this book containeth the worthy exploits of Q. Metellus against the Cretensians. The letters also of Metellus and Cn. Pompeius, sent from the one to the other: in which Metellus complaineth that Pompeius by sending his own lieutenant into Crete, to receive the surrender and homage of the Cities there, annulled and passed by the glory of those acts which he had achieved. Pompeius again rendereth a reason thereof, and alledgeth that he sought to do.

Of the C. Book.

Caius Manilius, a Trib. of the Com. preferred a bill, to be exceeding displeasure and indignation of the nobles, that the war against Mithridates should be assigned to Pompey. His speech to the people imported and was effectual. Q. Metellus having subdued the Cretensians, gave laws unto that Island which whilst that time enjoyed freedom of State. Cn. Pompeius went his journey for to levy war against Mithridates, and with Phraates, King of the Parthians, he renewed the league. In a battell performed by horse-service he overcame Mithridates. Also herein is contained the war, first between Phraates King of the Parthians, and Tigranes King of the Armenians: afterwards between Tigranes the son and his father.

Of the CI. Book.

* Or Boiporus.

C. Neus Pompeius vanquished Mithridates in a battell fought by night, and compelled him to flee Boiporus. He received Tigrares upon his submission; and when he had taken from him Syria, Phznicia, and Cilicia, he gave him again the kingdom of Armenia. Their conspiracy, who having been condemned for the inordinate and ambitious suit of the Consulship, were confederate to kill the Consul; was surprised and doleful. Cn. Pompeius following the chase after Mithridates, entered into far remote countries and unknown nations. The Iberians and Albans who would not grant him passage, he overcame in battell. Over and besides this book beweth how Mithridates fled by Colchii and Heniochi, and what his sirs were in Boiporus.

Of the CII. Book.

* He had so ordinarily used a possible Antidote on the reserved called now Antidote, that the poison would not work.

CN. Pompeius reduced the realm of Pontus into the form of a Province. Pharnaces the son of Mithridates made war upon his own father, by whom Mithridates was besieged within his own royal Court and Palace. When poison was drunk, and seeing it was not so effectually and strong enough to dispatch him, he was killed by a French soldier, named Bitarnus, whose helping hand he requested for to rid him out of the world. Cn. Pompeius subdued the Jews: their famous Temple of Jerusalem, which untill that day never had suffered abuse and violence, he forced and won. Catiline, by occasions both had twice suffered a repulse in suing to be Consul, conspired together with Lentulus the Prator, Cethegus, and many others so massacre the Consuls and the Senat, to set the City on fire, and to subvert and overthrow the State of the Commonwealth. And to this purpose he levied an army in Tuscany. This treason and conspiracy was by the industry of M. Tullius Cicero detected and found out. Catiline was banished the City. The rest of his complais and adherents every one suffered death accordingly.

Of the CIII. Book.

* Of the god-deis Rome.

Catiline, together with his army, was by C. Antonius the Pro-Consul defeated and slain. P. Clodius was accursed for entering (in the habit and apparel of a woman) that Chapel which was not lawful for a man to go into, and notwithstanding he had committed adultery with the archpriestess wife, yet he was acquit and went clear away. Cn. Pompeius the Prator vanquished at Solone the Allobroges, who had rebelled. P. Clodius lost the nobility, and ranged himself with the Com. C. Cesar subdued the Portugals. At what time as he was in election to be Consul, and went about to invade and make havoc of the C. W. there arose a conspiracy among three of the most principal personages of the City, Cn. Pompeius, M. Crassus, and C. Cesar. The Agrarian laws were by Cesar the Consul published with great strife and contention: the Senat was unwilling thereto; but by the other Cef. M. Bibulus they passed. C. Antonius, Pro-Consul in Thracia, sped but badly in his war-affairs. M. Cicero was banished the City by virtue of an act promulged by P. Clodius Tribune of the Commons, for that he had put to death certain Roman Citizens unwearied. Cesar made a voyage into the Province of Gaul, where he subdued the Helvetians, a vagrant and wandering nation in those daies, who seeking a place to inhabit, intended through the Province of Cesar to travel into * Narbo. Moreover, it containeth the situation of France. Pompeius triumphed over the children of Mithridates, also over Tigrares and his son, and by one voice and general consents of the whole assembly was saluted by the name of * Magnus.

Of the CIV. Book.

The forepart of this book compriseth the site and description, together with the manners of Germany. C. Cesar at what time as he led his army against the Germans, at the request of the Helvians and Segna: tians, whose territory by them was possessed, and who under the conduct of Ariovitus were come down into France, by an Oracion to his army shaid the timorous disposition of the soldiers, which arose upon the fear they had of new and strange enemies, vanquished the Germans in plain fight, and drove them clean out of France. M. Cicero by means of Pompeius (who among others made an Oracion in his behalf) and of T. Annus Milo, a Tribune of the Commons, who likewise pleaded his cause, was with the exceeding joy of the Senat and all Italy called home from exile. Cn. Pompeius had commission for five year space, to look unto the provision of corn and victuals. Cesar overcame in fight the Ambians, Suesians, Peromandans, Atrebaues (nations all of the Belge) of whom there was an exceeding multitude, and received at length yielding to his protection. Afterwards he fought with passing great heat and jeopardy against the Nervii one of the foresaid States, and in five utterly destroyed and extinguished their whole generation: for they had waged war so long, that all of 60000 armed men were there remained but 300, and of 95 of their Noblemen three only escaped and no more. There passed a law for to reduce Cyprus into the form of a Province, and to confiscate the Kings treasure: by virtue whereof, the managing of that affair was committed to C. Caro, Ptolemus King of Egypt suffered many wrongs and injuries at his own subjects hands, and being by them expelled out of his kingdom came to Rome. C. Cesar in a battell at sea vanquished the Venetians, a State and City seated in the very Ocean. Last of all, it reporteth exploits by his Lieutenants performed with like good fortune.

Of the CV. Book.

At what time as the assembly for election of Magistrates might be holden, by reason of the negatives and inhibitions of C. Cato a Trib. of the Com. the Senat generally in token of sorrow put on mourning weeds. M. Cato in his sute for a Pratorship suffered a repulse, and Vatinius was preferred before him. The same Vatinius when he would have impeached the law, whereby were granted to the Cof. the Provinces for five years, unto Pompey the government of both Spains, unto Crassus Syria and the Parthian war, and unto Cesar France and Germany, was by C. Trebonius a Tribune of the Commons, and the first maker of the said law, committed to prison. M. Gabinius the Pro-Consul established Ptolemus again in the kingdom of Egypt, and disfeized Archelaus whom they had set up for their King. Cesar after he had vanquished and put to sword the Germans in France, crossed over the Rhene, and subdued that part of Germany which is next thereto: which done, he sailed over into Britain with much trouble and damage, by reason of the cross and contrary winds while he was at sea; and he sped little better, when he was there: but after he had slain a mighty great number of men, he brought into subjection the rest of the Island.

Of the CVI. Book.

Julia daughter to Cesar and wife to Pompeius departed this life, and had this surpassing honour done. Unto her by the people, as to be entered in Mars field. Many of the States of France revolted by the leading of Ambiorix a Duke of the Eburons, by whom Cotta and T. Aurunculeius the lieutenants of Cesar were by an ambuscado surprised and environed, and by means thereof they and the armies wherof they had the conduct were put to the sword. And at what time as the camp of the other legions also was besieged, assailed, and with difficulty defended, and among them Q. Cicero, who was Lord President of the Treveris: the enemies were by Cesar himself in person overthrow in fight. M. Crassus intending to war upon the Parthians passed over the river Euphrates, and being vanquished in battell wherein his son was slain, after he had rallied the broken ends of his army, and retired them to a little hill, he was trained forth by the enemies (whose Captain was Surenas) to a parley and treaty of peace, and thereupon attacked: but because he would not suffer any indignity and villany alive, he made resistance, and in that struggling of his was slain, and there an end of him.

Of the CVII. Book.

C. Aulus Cesar having vanquished the Treveris in Gaul, passed over the second time into Germany, but finding no enemy there to make head, returned into France, where the Eburons and other Civis which had conspired, he overcame, put their King Ambiorix to flight, and followed him in chase. The body of P. Clodius slain in the high way Appia near Boville by T. Annus Milo a competitor of the Consulship, the Commons of Rome burnt in a funeral fire within the Curia Hostilia. By occasion of a sedition and variance between two Candidates for a Consulship, namely, Hylcius Scipio, and Milo, who with voice and arms tried the issue by the ears, Cn. Pompeius was sent out of the Senat to suppress such enormous debates. Created Consul he was the third time in his absence, and which prerogative no man ever had before without Colleague. A commission was granted forth to sit upon the death of Pub. Clodius, by virtue whereof Milo was judicially condemned, and had his judgment to be banished. A bill was proposed, that C. Cesar notwithstanding he was absent should be accepted of in the election of Consuls, albeit M. Cato was unwilling thereto, and gain said it. Moreover, this book containeth the warlike acts attributed to C. Cesar against the Gauls (who generally in manner revolted under the leading of Vercingetorix the Avernian: also the painful sieges of certain Cities, and namely, of * Avaxium in * Bituriges, and * Gergovia in Auvergne.

Of the CVIII. Book.

C. Aulus Cesar vanquished the Gauls at * Alexia, and received of the Cities in France which had been in arms, into his protection upon their submission. C. Cassius the transjurer M. Crassus put the Parthians to the sword, who had passed over into Syria. M. Cato sued to be Consul, and had the repulse, and Ser. Sulpicius with M. Marcellus were created Consuls. C. Cesar subdued the * Bellovaci, and other States and Cities in France. Also it containeth the strife and debate between the Consuls, and their sending of a successor to C. Cesar. For M. Marcellus the Consul was earnest in the Senat, that Cesar should come to stand for a Consulship, considering that he by a law made in that behalf was to govern his provinces unto that time of his Consulship. Last of all, the martial deeds of Mar. Bibulus in Syria are here reported.

When there passed a day of the Senate, and we were told that Cæsar should be employed to succour Cæsar, M. Antonius and Q. Catullus, and other Tribunes, were then by their negation and inhibitions they seemed to resist, and say that they were expelled the city; and a commission was directed by the Senate to the Consuls, and to C. Pompeius, in this form, To see that the Commonwealth suffered no damage. C. Cæsar intending to perform his adversary, came with his army into Italy. Commius together with L. Domitius and L. Lentulus he took prisoners, and sent them again; but C. Pompeius, and the rest of that side he utterly chased forth of Italy.

Of the CX, Book.

Cains Caesar besieged Massilia, which had shut the gates against him: who leaving C. Trebonius and D. Brutus at the siege, took a journey into Spain, where he received upon his arrival Lucius Afranius and C. Petreius, two lieutenants of Pompeius, together with seven legions at Ilerdia, and dismissed them all with no harm done unto them. Vatro alse a lieutenant of Pompeius, together with his army came under his obedience. The Gaditani were enfranchised and gave the City unto. The Massiliani after two overthrows in sea-fight, and a long siege which they had endured, submitted at last and were at the devotion of Caesar. C. Antonius a lieutenant of Caesar fought an unfortunate battle against the Pompeians, and in Illyricum was taken prisoner: during which time the inhabitants of Optigerum beyond the river of Padus (who were the auxiliaries of Caesar) seeing their chained bridge of boats and others lacking up and fast fast within the enemies ships rather than they would fall into the hands of their enemies, ran one upon another, and died every one. C. Curio a lieutenant of Caesar in Affrick, after he had fought against Varns a captain of the Pompeians, was together with his army defeated, and cut in pieces by Julius King of Mauritania. C. Caesar passed the sea over into Greece.

Of the CXL Book.

CAIUS Cæcilius Rufus the Prætor going about to raise commotions and seditions all thre over he could win in the City, and having solicited the commons upon the hope of cancelling all debts, was first deposed from his Mag. stry, and after driven out of the City. Then he bawled with Multobis nomen, who had levied a power of offensive and defensive: but both of them in this preparation of war came first to their people and were slain. Cleopatra queen of Egypt was by her brother Ptolemy expelled out of her kingdom. By reason of the avarice and cruelty of Q. Cætilius the Prætor, the Cædianes in Spain, together with two Varian legions, revolted from Cæsar and his side. Cn. Pompeius was besieged by Cæsar at Brundisium: but having now his fences with the guards thereon belonging, and that with great loss of the adverse part, he was delivered from the siege. But after the war was translated into Thessaly, he was at Pharsalia in a battell overthrown. There he remained still within the camp Cicero, who was by name framed for nothing more nifty than war. Cæsar pardoned all those of the adverse part, who after his victory submitted themselves to his mercy.

Of the CXII. Book.

Herein is related the fearful condition of that side which was vanquished, and how they fled in sundry parts of the world. en Pompeius being arrived in Egypt, by the commandment of Ptolemus the King, as yet an infant under age, and persuasion of Theodoros his teacher and schoolmaster, who might of all other over-rule the King's will; also one Phortius, was killed by the hands of Achillaus, who had a warrant to execute that task, even in the very barge before he was landed. But Cornelia his wife, and Sextus Pompeius his son fled back into cyprus, czar three daies after the said fall victory pursued Pompeius: and when Theodoros presented unto him his head, and fignet of his finger, he was displeased in his heart and wept withall. He entered Alexandria without any danger, notwithstanding the troubles and barbarity therein, czar was created Dictator. He restored cleopatra unto the kingdom of Egypt: and when Ptolemus made war by their advice and counsell who moved him to murder Pompeius, czar vanquished him with great peril and hazard of himself. At Ptolemus's fled, his vessel wherein he was embarked, was grounded in Nilus, and there stuck fast. Besides, his book sheweth the painful and toilsome journey of Marcus caesar with his legions, in Affric through the desert wilderness: and the war which en Domitius fortinately managed against Phaartes the Parthian King.

Of the cXIII. Book.

WHEN the fide of Pompeius beat gathered heart and strength in Affrick; he sovereignly committed thereof was committed to P.Scipio; for Mato who before had equalled rest and confusion with him gave place and yielded his right. Now when it was that day that he saw the fate of his father and sister ruin of Utica; for that the City was so enclosed and favourable to exilar; while M. Cato stood fast in this point; hat it should not be defrayed; and Juba [the K.] was earnest to have it raised: the great heat and keeping thereof was committed unto Cato. The sin of Pompey the great, having levied forces in Spain (he could stand and loathing where, neither Africaine nor Pertrice were willing to undertake) made forth war upon exilar. Pharnaces King of Pontus and son of Mitridates, rendering no time of war

Of the CXIV, Book

Cælius Bassus a gentleman of Rome, and one of Pompeys fide, levied war in Syria. Sextus Cæsar was both foraker by the legion whiche revolted and went to Bassus, and also flatterer. Cæsar vanquished Septio the Syrian, Afranius, and Juba, near Tapios, and forced their camp. Cato hearing thereof, wounded him self at Utica: and when his son came between and stood his hand, his hurt was dressed, but in the very cure, the wound was newly lanced again, he yielded up his breath and died, in the 49 year of his age. Petreus killed Juba and himself. P. Scipio in his ship was fether round, and at his death, which he took manfully, uttered a brave speech: for when the enemies made search and enquiry what was become of the General, The General (quoth he) is well, Faulus and Afranius were slain. Cato's son had his pardon, Brutus, a lieutenant of Cæsar vanquished the Belovans in France that rebelled.

Of the C X V. Book.

Cæsar rode in four triumphs over France, Egypt, Pontus, and Africa. A solemn feast he made, and exhibited unto the people (view of all sorts, Motto M. Marcellus a man of Confulary dignity, at the request of the Senat he granted leave to returne whith Marcellus could not enjoy the benefit of his grace and favour, by reason that he was murdered at Athens by Cn. Magnus Chilo, his own client and vassall, Cæsar also held a review of the City, wherein were enrolled 150000 Citizens, whereas before there had been numbered 400000. See the calamity of civil war. He took a voyage into Spain against Sex. Pompeius: and after many rades and expeditions on both sides made, and some cities forced, in the end he obtained one final victory for all before the City Munda, but with exceeding perill and danger. Sex. Pompeius escaped and fled.

Of the CXVI. Book.

Cælius Cæsar triumphed a fifth time over Spain. When many honours and rights were excellent, were by the Senat ordained for him, and, namely, among the rest, to be called Pater Patriæ; so he sacrificed and intreatable; and withal to be Dictator for ever; he gave occasion to be envied and misliked. In such that when the Senat bestowed upon him these honourable titles, at what time as he (as before the Temple of Venus Genetrix) rose not up nor gave entrance unto them: second for that when Mar. Antonius the Coj, and his Collegue ran among the Lepidus, he laid upon his ivory chair of estate the wreath of wisdom which was by him set upon his head: thirdly, because he deprived from their authority Epitaphius Marullus and Cæcilius Flavus, two Tribunes of the Commons, who went about to bring him into bondage; if he affected and sought to be King. Upon these causes, a conspiracy was contrived against him, whereof the principal heads were M. Brutus, C. Trebonius, and C. Cassius, also one of his own side D. Brutus; by whom he was massacred in the court of Pompeius, and received 33 wounds: and by these murderers was the Capitol seized and held. But after that the Senat had passed a decree to forget this murder, the conspirators forced aid, having received for their security the children of Antonius and Lepidus, as hostages, came down from the Capitol. By the last will and testament of Cæsar, C. Octavius (his first son) was made his half heir, and adopted into his own name. The body of Cæsar being brought into Mars field, was by the Com. Burgh in a funeral fire of the Rolla. The honour and dignity of Dictatorship was for ever abolished. Chameaces a person of soft-wile and base condition, avowed himself to be the son of C. Marius; and whilst he raised a sedition among the credulous common people, was cut off and killed.

Of the CXVII. Book.

Caius Octavius from out of Epirus repaired to Rome: for Cæsar had sent him thither before, when he minded to make war in Macedonia, where he was received with good tokens and fortunate presages, and with all took upon him the name of Cæsar. In this confusion of state and tumultuous trouble of all things, Lepidus attained by death to the high self pontifical dignity. But when M. Antonius the Consul threatened himself most lordly and proudly in his place, and by force published a law at touching the exchange of the Provinces; and withal offered much wrong and abuse to Cæsar, when he made request that he would assist and stand with him in revenge of those that murdered his uncle: Cæsar to the end that he might make both himself and the common-wealth strong against him, raised and excited the old soldiers that he had before placed in Colonia; The fourth legion also, and that called Matia, fell from Antonius and turned their ensigns to Cæsar. After this, more befides (by occasion that many through the cruelty of A. Antonius were murdered every where in their tents) became they were: one possessed, & evaded him him and draged to Cæsar. D. Brutus purposing to stop Antonius at the place Idajuntino Lombardy, seized upon Mutina with an army. Finally, this book declareth the running to and fro of those on both sides to be possessed of the Provinces and the preparation for war.

MARCUS BRUTUS in Greece (under a pretence of maintaining the state, and enterprising war against Antonius) possessed himself of the army whereof Vercinus had the conduct together with the Province. Mito Cæsar, who first took arms in defence of the C. W. the government and command of a Pro-Prætor was granted, with the Prætorian ornaments and ensigns thereto belonging, and withal, he had this addition to be reputed Pro-Prætor. M. Antonius besieged D. Brutus in Mutina. Certain Embassadors were sent unto him from the Senat as concerning peace, but little availed they in the treaty and conclusion thereof. The people of Rome generally took them to arms and soldiers both. Brutus in Epirus subdued C. Antonius the Prætor together with his army.

Of the CXIX. Book.

CNEUS TREBONIUS was by the guilefull practice of P. Dolabella, slain in Asia: for which said Dolabella was by the Senat judged an enemy to the State. When Pania the Cof. was at the point to lose the field against Antonius, A. Hirtius the other Cof. came with his army to the rescue, discomfited the forces of M. Antonius, and so made the fortune of both parts alike and equal. Afterwards, Antonius being vanquished by Hirtius and Cæsar, fled into France, and joyned unto him M. Lepidus with the legions which were under him. Both he and his they who were within his holds in garrison, were by the Senat assailed. Aulus Hirtius, who after his victory was slain within the camp of the enemies, and L. Pania, who died of a wound received in an unfortunate fight, were both buried in Mars field. To C. Cæsar the very Captain of the three now remaining alive, the Senat was not so kind as they ought to have been: for leaving order and that D. Brutus (who by Cæsar had been delivered from the siege at Mutina) should himself make no thankfull remembrance of Cæsar and his soldiers, as was meet and requisite. For which discomfiter, C. Cæsar (being reconciled to M. Antonius by the means and mediation of M. Lepidus) came to Rome with an army: and when they were fore dismaied at his coming, who had before treated him so unkindly, created conflict he was (with Q. Pordius) being but nineteen years of age, not full twenty: for he wanted one day, as Velleius Paterculus saith.

Of the CXX. Book.

CÆSAR now Consul, proposed a law for an inquisition to be made of them by whose means his father Cæsar was killed: and by vertue of that law, M. Brutus, C. Cassius, and D. Brutus were condemned and condemned in their absence. When together with M. Antonius, Aulus Pollio also, and Minutianus Placidus had signed their names, and thereby much strengthened and augmented their forces. D. Brutus whom the Senat had sent with commission to pursue Antonius, being now forlorn of his confidants and friends, was at the commandment of Antonius (into whose hands he fell) killed by one Capenis a Burgonian. Cæsar contrived a peace with Antonius and Lepidus, wherein it was capitulated between them, that these three should for five years have the sovereignty over all, only to set in order and publish the state of the common-wealth: to wit, himself, Lepidus, and Antonius, and each of them prescribe and outlaw their own adherentes and enemies. In which prescription were contained the names of very many Gentlemen of Rome, and one hundred and thirty Senators, and amongst the rest, M. P. Paulus the brother of M. Lepidus, L. Cæsar the uncle of Antonius by the Mother, and M. Cicero, formerly Poppius, a legions soldier, in the 63 year of his age, whose head and hands were set upon the Rostra. Moreover, this book sheweth the death of M. Brutus achieved in Greece.

Of the CXXI. Book.

CASSIUS who had in commission from the Senat, to pursue by force of arms Dolabella, judged an enemy to the Common-wealth, being born out by the authority and warrant of the State, possessed himself of Syria, and became Master of three armies which were in that Province. He besieged Dolabella within the City of Laodicea, and put him to death. C. Antonius was likewise taken prisoner, and by commandment from M. Brutus slain.

Of the CXXII. Book.

MARCUS BRUTUS had but bad success in fight against the Thracians. After that all the Provinces beyond seas, and the armies, were under his hands and Caius Cassius: they complained both together at Smyrna, what course to take for the same war. Publicola the brother of M. Messala they vanquished, and yet by common consent they pardoned him.

Of the CXXIII. Book.

SEXTUS POMPEIUS the son of Magnus, assembled together out of Epirus a number of outlaws and banished persons, and having a long time with his army robbed only by way of prey, and seized as yet upon the possession of no piece upon the land, first seized Messina, a town in Sicily, and afterwards the whole Province. And after that A. Pompeius Bibulus the Prætor there, was by Pompey slain: he the said Pompey in a battell at sea vanquished Q. Salvidienus, a Lieutenant of Cæsar. Cæsar and Antony with their armies sailed over into Greece, with intent to wage war against Brutus and Cassius, Quinquus Cornificius in Affrick overcame in plain fight T. Sestius, the Captain of the Cassian faction.

Of the CXXIII. Book.

CAIUS CÆSAR together with Antony fought at Philippa with variable fortune against Brutus and Cassius, but such fort as the right points of both battles had the better, and each of them won the other's camp. But the death of Cassius was it that turned the ballance and made the difference: who being in that point that retreated and went down, supposed that the whole army and main battell was discomfited and so killed himself. In another conflict afterwards, M. Brutus also was overcome, and there ended his life: for he intreated Strato (that accompanied him in his flight) to set his sword point to ward his, and so he ran upon it. The same did some forty more of the principall Romans: among whom was Q. Hontenius likewise slain.

Of the CXXV. Book.

CAIUS CÆSAR left Antony (for to his share fell the Empire of some Provinces beyond sea) and retired into Italy. He divided lands among his old soldiers. The mutinies of his own army by occasion that the soldiers were seduced by Fulvia the wife of M. Antonius and rose against their Generall, he repressed with exceeding danger and jeopardy. L. Antonius the Cof. and brother to M. Antonius, by the treacherous counsel and persuasion of the said Fulvia, made war upon Cæsar: and having procured those nations to side and take part with him, whose lands had been made over and assigned to the old soldiers, offered aid: and with all discomfited M. Lepidus, who with an army had the government and guard of the City, turned perforce by way of hostility into Rome.

Of the CXXVI. Book.

CAIUS CÆSAR when he was but three and twenty years of age, besieged L. Antonius in the town Perusia: and when he made sundry offers to sally out and break forth, he repelled and chased him back, yea, and for very hunger forced him to yield and come under his obedience. As for Antony himself and all his soldiers, he pardoned, but Perusia he reposed and destroyed. Finally, after he had brought all the armies of the adverse side to submit and to stand to his mercy, he finished the war without effusion of any blood.

Of the CXXVII. Book.

THE PARTHANS, under the conduct of Labienus, who had taken part with Pompey and that side, invaded Syria: overcome Didius Saxe, the Lieutenant of M. Antonius, and held all that Province to their own use. M. Antonius being solicited by the instigation of his wife Fulvia to make war against Cæsar, put her away, because she should be no let hindrance to the accord and agreement of the three rulers in their Triumvirate. Then made he a peace with Cæsar, and took to wife his sister Octavia. Q. Salvidienus who completed mischief against Cæsar, he detested and bewrayed: who being thereupon condemned, wrought his own death. P. Ventidius a Lieutenant under Antonius, overcome the Parthians in battell, and chased them forth of Syria, having before slain their Leader Labienus. When as Sextus Pompeius held Sicily, and being a near enemy and ill neighbour, to Italy, standeth betraying of own and vituals by sea: upon request Cæsar and Antony made peace with him for this consideration, that he should govern Sicily as his Province. Also herein are set forth the troubles and wars of Affrick.

Of the CXXVIII.

WHEN SEXT. POMPEIUS insisted the sea again with robbery, and piracy, and would not make good and maintain that peace, which he had accepted of Cæsar, he was forced upon necessity to undertake war against him, and in two naval battells fought with doubtful event. L. Ventidius a Lieutenant of M. Antonius, vanquished the Parthians in Syria and slew their King. The Jews also were by Antonius Lieutenant subdued. Herein besides, is set down the preparation for the Sicilian war.

Of the CXXIX. Book.

SUNDRY battells were fought at sea against Sext. Pompeius with variable issue: so as, of Cæsar two shippes, the one which was conducted by Agrippa, got the better hand: but the other by Cæsar himself had the overthrow: and the soldiers being set ashore, were in exceeding great danger. But afterwards Pompeius was defeated, and thereupon fled into Sicily. Marcus Lepidus crossed the sea from out of Affrick, pretending to take part with Cæsar in his wars to be made against Sext. Pompeius. But when Cæsar showed upon him also, he was abandoned of his army, and being content to resign up the honour and dignity of the Triumvirate, obtained life. M. Agrippa was by Cæsar rewarded with a naval crown, an honour to no man ever granted before him.

Of the CXXX Book.

Marcus Antonius, in his rising time with Cleopatra, entered into the Province of Media with eighteen legions, and sixteen thousand horsemen, leaving war upon the Parthians, and shut up the last two of his legions, seeing nothing prosper well on his side, he retired back. But still the Parthians followed him in chase: whereupon in exceeding painful haste and great peril of the whole army, he returned into Armenia: so as in 27 daies he fled three hundred miles. About 8000 men he lost by tempestuous weather. But he was himself the occasion that he suffered this damage, because he was so weary and weary, the Parthian war which unfortunately he entered into, he would not enter in Armenia, for he had made to him love Cleopatra.

Of the CXXXI Book.

Sex Pompeius having once submitted himself he was in the protection of M. Antonius, and when they war against him in Asia: but by his Lieutenant he was surprised and taken. Caesar, being the victor of the old soldiers, which with great mischief was begun: he subdued the Tapides, the Dalmatians and Pannonians, Antonius having upon his word and promise of safety and protection trained into him Artavasdes the King of Armenia, commanded him to be led up fast in front, and gave the kingdom of Armenia to his own son, which he had by Cleopatra: for now by this time he began to grow weary of his wife, upon whom long before he was enamoured and doted in love.

Of the CXXXII Book.

Caius Caesar subdued the Dalmatians in Illyricum. When M. Antonius for the sake of Cleopatra (who bare him two sons, Philadelphus and Alexander) would neither return to the City of Rome, nor after the time of the Triumvirate resign up that dignity and government, but prepared for war which he meant to levy against Rome and Italy: and thereby to advance a mighty power, as well of success as of love: and withal, had renounced the marriage with Octavia, Caesar's sister, and sent her a letter of divorce, and so put her away: Caesar thereupon, with an army sailed into Epirus. The battles followed, and the losses, wherein Caesar had the upper hand, he here related.

Of the CXXXIII Book.

Marcus Antonius was with his fleet overcome at Actium, and thereupon fled to Alexandria: where being by Caesar besieged, and in utter despair of recovering his former state, but moved especially by a false rumour that was spread, how Cleopatra was killed he slew himself. When Caesar was now Master of Alexandria, Cleopatra his wife because she would not fall into the hands of the conqueror, willingly procured her own death. Caesar upon his return to the City of Rome, had the honour of triumphing the one over Illyricum, another for the victory at Actium, and the third in regard of Cleopatra. Times when he had fought all civil wars which had continued 23 years. M. Lepidus, the son of Lepidus the Triumvir, conspired against Caesar, and whilst he went about to make war, was prevented and slain.

Of the CXXXIV Book.

Caius Caesar having set the State in good order, and reduced all Provinces into one certain form, was succeeded also Augustus: and the month Sextilis to honour his name was likewise called. Whilst he was in expedition at Narbonne, he took a review of the three Provinces of Gaul, which his father (Caesar) had conquered. The way which M. Crassus made against the Bosphorians, Massians, and other nations, is here related.

Of the CXXXV Book.

The war which M. Crassus levied against the Thracians, as also which Caesar made upon the Spaniards is here set down, likewise how the Salassians, a people inhabiting the Alps, were utterly subdued.

Of the CXXXVI Book.

Rhetia was conquered by Tiberius Nero, and Drusus his wives son. Agrippa Caesar's son in law died: and by Drusus was the general revenue and tax taken.

Of the CXXXVII Book.

The Cities of Germany situate on either side the Rhene, are by Drusus besieged and assailed. The tumult and insurrection which arose in France, by reason of the forced review or tax was suppressed. An altar was erected unto Divus Caesar at the confluent of the two rivers, Arar and Rhodanus, and a Priest was created to offer thereupon, one C. Julius Vercondaridubus an Helvian.

Of the CXXXVIII Book.

Here is shown how the Thracians were by L. Plo called, likewise how the Theruci, Temachate, and other nations of Germany beyond the Rhene, were subdued and brought under by Drusus. Octavia the sister of Augustus departed this life, having buried before, her son Marcellus: whose monuments still remain, namely the Theatre and gallery bearing his name, as if they had been dedicated by Marcellus.

Of the CXXXIX Book.

The war which Drusus managed against the nations beyond the Rhene is here reported. In which war the chief persons that fought were Senechtus and Anecius, Tribunes of the Nervian State. Nero the brother of Drusus subdued the Dalmatians and Pannonians. Peace was contracted with the Parthians: and upon capitulation the military engines were delivered up again to their King, which first under the conduct of Crassus, and afterwards of Antonius were lost, and by them taken.

Of the CXL Book.

In this book is related the war which Drusus fought against the Cities and States of Germany beyond the Rhene. Himself fell from his horse and broke his leg, by reason that his horse fell thereon: upon which fracture he died thirty daies after. His corps was by his brother Nero (who being sent for upon the news of his sickness, rode in post brought through to Rome, and bestowed in the tomb of C. Julius. Praised he was by Caesar Augustus his father in law, and at his funeral for a small space of time, was attended with many honourable names.

To the Reader.

The history of Titus Livius, as it was by him passing well penned otherwise, and none thereto in Latine comparable: so in the calculation and date of times, which they call Chronology (a singular light to give direction in a story) is it somewhat defective and unlike himself, so as he cannot be praised without exception. But in main consider the huge volumes which he wrote and namely, in his declining age; the variety and disagreement of former authors whom he followed, who before him failed also in this point, and whereof he much complaineth; he is to be pitied and pardoned if his meanness failed somewhat in this behalf. For where shall we find a man that is in aetate senex, omnique ex parte beatus? And indeed if we weigh the thing aright, as it was a profection by it felt, and required a whole man: so many trammelled therein alone, and they that performed well but it only, deserved high thanks and commendation. And to let many others pass, how worthily is T. Pomponius Atticus praised by Cicero his friend, for digressing the head Magistrates of 700 years in one book: As for Verrius Flaccus, who lived in the time of Augustus Caesar, he collected a catalogue and register of the chief Rulers of Rome, how they were chosen successively, and how they governed from time to time: which as becaused to be cut and engraven in a marble wall within the Capitol for a perpetual memory to posterity, so thereby he deserved also to have his own statue erected near the Temple of Vesta, for an everlasting memorial of so great a benefit. But what is there so durable that time watcheth not? What so conspicuous and evident, but troublesome daies may overwhelm and hide in oblivion? Thus amidst that havoc which the Goths and Vandals made in Italy, there remained not one fourth part extant of Livens history: thus in that general confusion of Rome, these records of Verrius Flaccus were defaced, broken, and buried deep under the ruins of the Capitol and other stately edifices. But the revolution of times as it hath brought to light again some reliques of Livy: so it hath discovered also the marbles of Verrius for in the time of Paul the third, Pope of Rome the fragments of the said stones were dugged out of the ground between the Roman Forum, and the broad street Via Sacra: brought forth also & laid abroad in the Capitol to the view of the world. To which as the true touch-stone certain learned men of late daies have laid to their own labors in that kind, namely, Bartholomew Marlian of Milan, Onuphrius Panvinus of Verona, Charles Sigonius of Modena and Francis Robertellus of Udine: and comparing the same as also the annals gathered by H. my Glareanus beforetime, with the foreaid antiquities of Verrius late found, have recovered much light to the history of Livy, and luppied his wants in that behalf. I thought it not unfit therefore to gratifie my countrymen in some measure this way also, and deliver the same in English which I found annexed to the best editions in Latine, as followeth.

CHRONOLOGIE

HISTORY OF TITUS LIVIUS,

Compiled according to the Tables and Records of Verrius Flaccus in the Capitoll, and set out with most profitable Notes, shewing the variety and disagreement of Authors about the names of the Roman Consuls.

The causes of dissent and repugnance in Historiographers, as touching the computation and relating of the years from the foundation of the City of Rome.

In: we intend to set forth a Kalender or Register of the Consuls mentioned in the History of Livius, which by reason of uncertainty, obscurity and discordance of the times is so dark and intricate, that not only the learned and most experienced Historians of our age, but the best writers of the Roman story in ancient time very often complained thereof: we think it not impertinent to our purpose, briefly to search into the causes of this dissent: which being once known, we may follow that account of the times, which seemeth to accord best with the Historical truth, and to be grounded upon the authority and testimony of the most authentick and approved writers. For seeing that an History (as Cicero hath most truly said) is the witness of times; what is more unfitting for it, than to mislead and want that which is the chiefest point therein, and without due and diligent reckoning made, to be ignorant what was first and what was last done? It seemeth therefore, that of this diversity in the account and computation of the Roman Consuls, there be three especial causes.

The first is, for that the year in which the first Consuls entered into that Magistracy, is by the Roman Historiographers, not after one sort but diversely let down. For Dionysius (a most diligent writer of the Acts of Romans) in his first book, in the end of the fourth and beginning of the fifth, reporteth, that the KK. reigned 244 years: which also is collected out of the yearly computation gathered by Varro and approved by the authority of others. For Messala reporteth, how upon the expulsion of the KK, which happened in the 244 year after the foundation of the City, the Romans were ruled under the yearly government of Consuls. To which opinion Livy also subscribeth in the end of his first book, saying, that the regiment of KK. continued 244 years from the foundation of the City, unto the freedom and liberty thereof. But Ennius in his first book writeth that the seven Kings reigned in Rome 243 years: which account agreeth with Sex. Rufus in his abridgement. In which variety this is to be observed, that these two last named, reckon the years only of every Kings reign, and out of the whole and gross sum leave out the year of the interregnum, which Dionysius, Livius, Messala, and the rest inter between, and that right truly and upon good reason: for after the death of Romulus, the interregnum continued one year. Consider then and examine the thing diligently, and ye shall find, that in reckoning the years of every Kings reign in severall, Ennius and Sexus Rufus both, attribute as many years to the Kings government, as Dionysius, Livy, and the rest: so that this difference is not much. But otherwise there be (as Ennius hath delivered in his Chronicles) who write, that the KK. reigned but 243 years, and take the interregnum withall: whose judgment, Orosius, Jornandus, and Bede seem to follow. For Orosius in the fifth chapter of his second book recordeth, that Ennius the Consul in that very year, namely the 244, put his own sons to death. The Kings reigned not precisely to many years just, but, for that some (and namely, Romulus) went over some months and daies, Dionysius and Livius reckoned them for a full year, and laid it to Tarquinius Priscus: but the other above-named, together with Ennius, left out those odd months and daies (because they made not up a compleat year) and assigned but only seven and thirty years to the reign of King Priscus. To this may be added another reason of the like nature: namely, that as divers authors have doubtfully reported the year, so they are more certain of the month and day on which the first Consuls began their government. For Plutarch in his Problems writeth, that they entered upon the first day of January: but Macrobius in the first book of his Saturalia and seventh chapter, seemeth to imply that they took their Consuls place the first of June, saying, (according to the opinion of others) That June took the name of Junius Brutus: for that in this month, and namely, upon the first day thereof (according to a vow whereto he was obliged by the banishment of Tarquin) he solemnized a sacrifice to the goddess Ceres upon mount Calvus. Others

Others again write, how this happened the 24 of February: grounding herein upon the old antiquities and records of stone, together with the testimony of Ovid, who in the second book of his Kalendar thus writeth:

King Tarquin with his sons then fled: The Consuls yearly begin.

The sovereign rule at Rome: since that, no King ever reigned there.

Some there are besides of opinion, that they entered the first day of July: and of their mind seemeth Jacchimus Perennius to be, in his third book of the Greek Magistrates. In this repugnancy therefore of opinions, very doubtful it is which to follow. As for that old Plutarch, it hath long since been clearly and learnedly confuted by two great and excellent clarks, Oppianus Patavinus and Sigismund: since it is plain that it was the six hundred year from the foundation of the City, and not before, that the Consuls began their government the first of January. But in setting down the certain day, they themselves are not well agreed. For Sigismund after Marlianus inclineth this way and saith, That the first day of the Consuls government was the six and twentieth day of May. But Perennius thinketh that the first Consuls were created the 26 day of February. And this diversity is found not only in the day when the first Consuls took their government, but also in the time after ensuing. What was the usual day of any month whereon the Consuls were wont to begin their Magistracy, a man can hardly find any certainty before the six hundred year from the Cities foundation. In the four and fortieth year verily after the Kings were exiled the first day of July, as Livy writeth, was the ordinary day for yearly Magistrates to take their place: but how many years following, that order continued, or at what time it was changed, he shewed not before he came to the three hundred and two year, and then he saith in his third book, That the thirteenth of May was the ordinary day for Magistrates to begin their government. Thus much at leastwise we may collect by him (when he saith that this time was solemn) that he meant not two or three years only, but many. For that is properly called solemn, which is by law usually observed. Again, we read a little after the beginning of the fifth book, that this time also was altered: for whereas the first day of December was the usual time that Magistrates began to execute their office, he saith, that it was changed, in these words, The principal Nobles and Lords of the Senat, were it upon the default or the infirmity of their Generals (that to shame all an overthrow was received) joined and advised, not to expect and stay for the ordinary time of the election, but presently to create new military Tribunes in Consuls authority, who should enter into their government the first day of October. &c. Which opinion of theirs imported, and the whole scheme accorded to it: whereupon the other Tribunes gained it. But Sergius and Junius withstood this Act of the Senat, and denied flatly to resign up their dignity before the eleventh of December, the ordinary day of taking their oath and beginning their Magistracy. And a little after within one page, he sheweth that the usual day of entrance into government was altered from the eleventh of December to the first of September, saying, When this speech was received with a general applause of all men, and that the Nobles and Lords of the Senat &c. But this day was kept but a few years. For about six years after, he saith, by occasion that both Consuls lay sick it was ordained that the first of July should be the ordinary day. And this also I find was changed to another, whatsoever it was, for named it is not: and therefore uncertain. But this happened in the four hundred and thirteenth year after the Cities foundation: as Livy about the beginning of the eighth book sheweth in these words: And when the Consuls were commanded to resign up their Magistracy before the time, to the end that new Consuls might the sooner be created, against foretold troubles of war, &c. For in these words [The sooner, &c.] he declareth that the usual day of entrance into government was then changed. But as it is not certainly set down what day this was: so the other was as well known: for soon after, and namely, the eighth year following it was appointed, to wit, the first day of July. Immediately therefore (quoth he) the new Consuls, Lucius Emilius Mamercus and Cn. Plautius were enjoyed that day (even the first of July) on which they began their office, to agree and part between themselves their Provinces. As for the month, wherein for the most part the assembly for election of Magistrates was holden, were it was February: like as the thirteenth of March was ordinary for them to begin their government. For this day held aloof, during the second Punic war and the Macedonian, and longer than so. Thus Livy testifieth in many places (which to quote is needless) as in the sixth book of the second Punic war, and in the beginning of the first book as touching the Macedonian. By which, who seeth not that there is great variety in the month and day both, whereupon the Magistrates were wont to begin their rule? But whereas all the certainty in computation and account of the time dependeth upon a precise exact, firm, and settled reckoning of years, months, and daies: and seeing that in Livius story it is neither expressly shewed, what year, month, or day, the Magistrates began their government, nor precisely noted when the reckoning altered: considering also that nothing therein is more wavering and inconstantly delivered than the very usual day of entering into Magistracy: what marvel is there, if authors dissent so much about the computation of the times? whiles one beginneth at this month, another at that: whiles some, I say, ascribe these Magistrates created to this year, others attribute the same to another?

Thirdly, there being great difference between Dionysius and Livy, as well about the reckoning of the times and years, as the acts and affairs that therein passed; all seemeth to have risen hereupon, that the purpose of Livy was not to deliver exactly the acts and occurrences of great antiquity which happened in the State of the people of Rome, and which by many writers aforetime had been most diligently set down and penned to posterity: but to record and write those things especially, which from the time a little before the second Punic war had been achieved by the people of Rome, unto the age wherein himself lived. But because as Polybius most wisely and pitifully writeth) a general story cannot be understood by particular registers; and for that an Historiographer study & endeavour ought to be employed rather in an universal treatise, than in particular discourses: therefore, left to great a piece of work as his, wanting a beginning, should remaine & imperfect in the format 20 books he lightly & briefly ran over the deeds of the people of Rome from the foundation of the City, unto the beginning of the second Punic war: But Dionysius professing purposely to describe the ancient monuments of the Romans, thought it his part to overpass and omit nothing worthy of remembrance, but most curiously and exactly hath delivered all things pertinent, either to the calculation of the times or discourse of affairs; inasmuch as those things whereof Livy hath scantily made 3 books he hath declared at large therein. Hereupon if a man read in Dionysius, the ancient beginning and original of the Roman Empire, and examine well the times how they are by him digested & compare the same with the brevity in Livy, no doubt he will prefer the diligence of the former before the overhastiness of the later. But if the indifferent reader consider the purpose and intent of them both, he will yield unto either of them their due praise: & whereas Livy making hable to other matters, hath either left pass or more slightly handled some things, he will judge him worthy rather to be excused than reproved for.

To these three caules above rehearsed, others also might be adjoynd: namely, the ordering of the years by Romulus, and the variety as touching that year wherein Rome was founded: but it may suffice only to touch these & point unto them with the finger. Howbeit, this we think good to advertise and admonish the reader by the way: that albeit in the digesting and reckoning of the Coss, we have let before our eyes to follow the marble tables and monuments of Verrius Flaccus, and according therunto have framed and applied the computation of the years: yet that year before the 250 as also the other, which Verrius rejected, we have inserted with the rest, that our account might fall out just with the sum of the years, as they are collected by Varro. Which, before us, Onuphrius Panvinus a most learned man hath done in his Kalender, thinking that the year which Verrius and they that followed him rated out was the 423, and therefore he hath put it to the rest without Consuls, according to the Capitoline records.

Of the computation of times usually observed by the Romans, and of the year of the Cities foundation.

The calculation of years was taken and observed by men in old time divers and sundry waies. The Achazans (as we read) received it from the revolution of the stars: the Argives from their women Priests: as for example, if Chrysis a year were chief Priest to offer sacrifices, they counted the number of years from the said Chrysis. But many have derived and searched the cause and consequence of their ads and affairs, from the years before Tr. was built, or else after the winning thereof. Howbeit, from the 468 year after the captivity thereof, by occasion of the Olympian games, which Hercules first instituted in the honour of his great grandire by the mothers side and which by his son Iphiclus (or Iphimus, as some will have it) were renewed that year from that time (I say) they began to number the years by the Olympiads, especially amongst the Grecians, whose story (as Eschylus affirmeth) is not of any credit but from the time of the first Olympiad. The Hebrews (like a other nations in the East) received the denomination and reckoning of the years from their KK. The Athenians from their Epynomi (as they called them) but that in their Archæologia, [that is, the election of their Magistrates] which were wont to hold for certain daies about the beginning of the year, they counted in this wise, καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀρχαίων τῶν δυνάστην ἐκ δυνάστη i.e. the tenth or eleventh of the first Prytanies. And heretofore it seemeth that the name cometh τῶν πρυτανείων, as it from thence, their acts received both the time and also the name. After the example of the Athenians and others, the Romans reckoned their daies, made their Kalender, and registred their acts by such and such Consuls: noting thereto otherwhiles the year from the Cities foundation. But about it there is much more diversity in authors, than about that wherein the first Consuls took their government. And seeing the clearing and declaration of that point is not impertinent to this place, briefly we will rehearse the opinions of authors as touching the time when the City of Rome was founded.

To begin therefore at them, who (according to the common received opinion of others) have written longer ago and further off. Timæus Siculus (I know not upon what reason induced) hath recorded, how the City was built by Romulus much about the time that Carthage in Affrick by the Tyrians, namely in the 38 year before the first Olympiad.

L. Cincius (a Senator of Rome by calling) saith it was in the fourth year of the twelfth Olympiad. Q. Fabius Pictor (a most ancient writer of the Roman story and of greatest credit) attributeth it to the first year of the eighth Olympiad.

Pollux Megapolitanus and Dionysius Siculus quote the second year of the 7 Olympiad. Appollodorus, Q. Lutatius Catulus, Cornelius Nepos, Erastus heretofore, M. Porcius Cato, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, and Theophilus Amaseus, name the first year of the 7 Olympiad.

M. Verrius Flaccus, the avoucher of the Capitoline records, T. Livius, C. Julius Solinus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and others, will have it to be the fourth year of the 6 Olympiad.

L. Tarquinius

L. Tarquinius Firmanns, M. Terentius Varro, T. Pomponius Atticus, M. Tullius Cicero, Augustus Caesar, S. Plinius Secundus, Plutarchus Charonius, Domitianus Caesar, Augustus, P. Cornelius Tacitus, Callistus Dio, A. Gellius, L. Septimius Severus, Augustus, Confortinus, M. Julius Philippus Augustus, Ensephius Pamphilus, Cassiodorus, Entropius, Paulus Orosius, Paulus Diaconus, Langobardus: and after the time of C. Caesar Dictator, the common opinion of the people of Rome (which we also go by) will have the City to be founded the third year of the six Olympiad.

But by what motives and reasons each one of these authors is induced, & whereby they would seem to confirm their several opinions, needles it is in this place for to declare: both because the speculation hereof pertaineth properly to another profession, and also for that (besides Plutarch in Romulus, Solinus in the 1. chapter of his Polyhistor, and Camerius in his annotation thereupon) the question hath been so thoroughly handled by Onuphrius Panvinus in the first book of his Kalender, that the thing requireth no further examination.

Now for the day on which the foundation of the City of Rome was laid by Romulus, it was the eleventh day before the Calends of May, called Parilia or Palilia. Now was this a festival day to Pales, the goddess of shepherds, celebrated by the said shepherds upon the eleventh Calends of May, in the fields and country villages, for the chasing away of wolves, for the preservation of their ship and cattell from diseases, or for the life yeaving and bringing forth their young: whereupon they were called Parilia. Of this matter writeth Propertius in his fourth book, in this wise:

A festi there was, Palilia, our fathers did call,

And on that day they first began, for Rome to build a wall.

Ovid also in the fourth book of his Fasts:

A time full meet they chose, with pough the plot to mark,

Dame Pales was hand, and so began the work.

The same is avouched by M. Tullius, Plutarch, Solinus, and others. And that these Palilia were solemnized ordinarily the eleventh day before the Calends of May, appeareth as well by the old marble Calendars, as also by the same authors before rehearsed.

Of the first sovereign Magistrates of the City of Rome, namely, of the KK, who were in number seven.

ALL sorts of policies and governments in a Common-weal which are set down and named by ancient Writers, the City of Rome (were it by the fatal course of destiny or upon some troubles in the State) hath received and endured every one: so as no Common-weal in manner there can be found, wherein they succeeded to one after another, as they did in the very City of Rome. For in the beginning, the KK ruled it: but when they for their excessive outrage and inordinate lust exercised upon their Citizens and subjects, were deposed and expelled, the Coss. (and after them the Tribunes military in Coss. authority) held the sovereignty. But in process of time, when this frame and form of Common-weal (simply the best) was by the outrage of the two Gracchi (Saturninus and Drusus Tribunes of the Commons) put out of joynt and troubled, noist such time as their power and authority was by Syllent in twain, and the Commons diseized of their lands and killed: then the administration of the Common-weal was restored again to the Nobles and principal persons of the City. But at length, when it was oppressed again by the civil war of Pompey and Caesar, the sovereign rule of the State was devolved upon the Empire of Caesar alone: wherein, being first shaken a few years before, through the wicked insolency and lust of the three Triumvirs, it continued until the time that it fell to utter ruin. We therefore will briefly go through all these sorts of government, in that successive order as they followed one after another, and first begin with the KK.

Romulus the first King of the Romans, reigned 37 years.

Romulus, the founder of the City, reigned 37 years: for to many Livy assigneth unto him. Likewise Dionysius in the first book, which he repeateth also in the second: and Plutarch in Numa dissenteth not from them: howsoever in Romulus, he writeth, that he departed this world in the 37 year of his age. Solinus in like manner rehearsing his worthy acts attributeth unto his reign 37 years. Only Entropius in 1. book 4. chap. alloweth unto him 39 years: but Plutarch thinketh very well that the Copy is corrupt. This Prince having reigned (according to the more common received opinion of authors) 37 years: in which time, he laid the first ground-work of the Roman Empire, with excellent laws and ordinances, and established both civil and also military discipline, departed this life upon the Nones of July, which day was called afterwards, Nonæ Caprotinae: by occasion that he in musing and reviewing his army at the lake of Capra, was conveyed out of mens sight: whereupon the people fled as amazed at the sudden death of their King, as Plutarch & Dionysius do witness. This Romulus after his deification was named, Quirinus, of Apollonius, which surname Ovid in his Kalender giveth. these reasons, Sive

A Spear, old Sabinus Quirinus call'd, which Romulus us'd in fight :

This martial man a god became, and so Quirinus high;
Quirites, since his subjects liege, their King this name might give :

O, else the Curius, whom he brought with Romulus to us to live.

That he was bafe born, and could not avouch his own father, beside other writers, Plutarch especially affirmeth in his Theses. Howbeit, the old opinion went current, that he was by Mars begot in flesh of a vestal virgin, Ilia, Rhea, or Sylvia, for so many names there go of her; and that first he was called Romulus, of Roma, which signifieth a seat or pap, and afterwards
by way of flattery, Romulus.

Interreges.

FOR one year after the death of Romulus the nobles fell to variance & strove who should be K, but by reason that no one person excelled above the rest in that state so newly founded, there grew several factions & debates in their head-corporations. They who were delcnded from the Sabins (because after the death of Tar-quinus none of them reigned with Romulus in equal society) were desirous to have a K, created out of their body, because they would not forgo their hold and possession in the Empire.
But the old Romans could not away with a stranger-King. Howbeit, as different as they were in affections, all were willing to set up a K, as having not tasted yet the sweetness of liberty. The Peers moreover mightily feared, by reason that the neighbour States bordering round about were provoked against them, I left some foreign force might assill their City left thus without a sovereign government, and the army without a leader. Whereupon the two hundred Nobles agreed among themselves to enter into an association of rule, and made ten Decuries; and in every Decury created one to have the sovereignty over the rest. These Senators were then 100 in number, as Livy saith, and according to Plutarch a hundred and fifty. But Dionysius writeth, that the c were two hundred of the Sabins & as many Romans. After this they call lots and their Decury unto whom the lottery first fell, ruled the City: howbeit, not all of them at once, but one alone had the regall ornaments, and the Lotiors going before him.
Five daies he governed and no longer: and so by this order in courfe the nobles of every Decury governed the City fifty daies. For after five daies determined, he whose lot was first to govern in that Decury, delivered up unto the second, the imperial dignity together with the ensigns thereof: and he again, when his five daies were expired, unto a third, and so to the fourth. Thus when these ten first Interreges had pass'd one yodaies, a second Decury of Senators in like manner ruled the City other 50 daies; and thus they went round through all until they had fulfilled a years space in this regency. This government was of the thing it self called Interregnum, which name it still retained afterwards, and the men likewise were named Interreges. In this year therefore was the Magistracy of the Interreges first devised among the Romans. And not only after the death of Romulus the State was ruled by Interregency, but also after the decease of Numa, Tullius, and Ancus Kings. In like manner during the time of the free State and Common-weal, after the time of yearly Magistrates expired, the said government took place very often, before the creation of new: for they held the assembly for elections, wherein new governors were by the people created. Now the office and charge of this interregent was, during the time of his regency (which ordinarily pass'd not five daies) to execute all those functions in the City which belonged either to KK, or Coll, namely, to minister justice, to rule the Common-weal, to hold a Senat, and there to propound the affairs of State, and lastly, to summon the general assembly for chusing new Magistrates. As touching the beginning of Interregency, Dionysius in his second book Livy in his first Plutarch in Numa, Sex, Rufus, Ensepius and other old writers, have written at large.

Numa Pompilius, the second K, reigned 43 years.

ONE year of Interregency being thus accomplished, the people of Rome thought this a grievous and heavy manner of government; and the Commons grumbled that their servitude was manifold more than before, as having two hundred Lords over them instead of one. Which when the Senators perceived, they agreed at last upon this point, That the old Senators should create a King, whom they would, to be one of their own body and degree. Whereupon Numa Pompilius (for that in justice & wisdom he excelled all others) was called out of Cavara a City of the Sabins, to be their King. That he reigned three and forty years, all accord, save Ensepius, Ensepius, and Cassiodorus (late writers) who let down but one and forty, as Onuphrius and Sigismundus have observed. Of this K, Dionysius in the second book, Livy in his first, Solinus in his second chapter, Plutarch Plinius and Ensepius in his life: in like fort Valerius Maximus have delivered much in record. He died not much above the age of 80 years, as Plutarch writeth: for born he was (as he himself) the same day whereon Romulus laid the first foundation of the City, namely, the twelfth Calends of May. Now for the name of Numa, some say it was the forename of Pompilius. But out of Sextus Pompeius it appeareth, that neither Tullius nor Numa were fore-names, as also by this conjecture, for that the sons of Numa are by Dionysius called by other sundry names divers from the family. Some thought therefore that Numa, Ancus, Aratus, Volusus, Drusus, Junius, Manlius, and certain other (names were at first forenames, as Marcellus in his Annals hath very well noted.

Tullus Hostilius, the third King of Rome,
reigned 32 years.

Numa being deceased, the Interregency took place again: during which time an Ad of Senat pass'd, wherein by the approbation of the Commons and advice of the Nobles, Tullius Hostilius was created the third K, of the Romans, in the 82 year after the foundation of the City. Who having raised Albanus, commanded the Albanos be translated to Rome. Their Commons he made free denizens, and the principall Nobles he took into the order of Senators. After Numa he reigned 32 years, as all writers most constantly affirm. He perished, as Dionysius writeth, by occasion that his house was on fire, wherein his wife and children and all their household besides were consumed and burnt.
Some say, that his palace took fire by lightning through the ire of the gods, for that he had forgot some sacrifices and holy rites: others write, that it was occasioned by the treacherous practise of Ancus Martius, who reigned next after him. Of him Dionysius writeth in his 3 book:
That he carried before him the name of Hostus it appeareth by this, that both his father and grandire bare the said name. A Prince he was, but only far unlike to Numa, but also more ferce and stout than Romulus.

Ancus Martius, the fourth King of Romans,
reigned 24 years.

King Tullius being departed this life, there was an Interregent by the Nobles declared, who held the assembly for election in the 114 year from the foundation of the City: wherein the people created Ancus Martius the fourth K. of the Romans, and the Senators approved the same. He built Hostia a town 16 miles distance from the City of Rome; and fought seven battles, Livius, Dionysius, and Solinus say, that he reigned 24 years: but Ensepius, Ensepius, and Cassiodorus, 23. What death he died, neither Livy in his first book, nor Dionysius in his 3 do let down: notwithstanding that by them his noble acts are let out at large. Now Ancus (as Sex, Pompeius hath reported) is he called, who bith an arm bowing inward, so as it cannot be put straight forth.

Tarquinus Priscus, the fifth K. of Romans,
reigned 38 years.

His Tarquinus being left by Ancus (when he died) guardian to his children, was the first that ambitiously intercepted the kingdom to himself: he sent the sons of Ancus, during the time of Interregency, out of the way, as it were to hunting, and made an oration unto the people to win their hearts & affections to him:
and to with the suffrages of the people, and authority of the Nobles, he was by the Interre-gent declared K, in the 170 year after the foundation of Rome, and in the 41 Olympiads. This noble Prince as well for warlike prowess as peaceable policy and government, at the length (being above fourscore year old) was forelaid by the secret trains of of the two sons of Ancus

Martius, in the eight and thirty year of his reign, according to Livy and Dionysius, whose judgment we follow: or in the 37, as Solinus, Mellus, Ruffus, Ensepius, Cassiodorus, Ensepius, and Bedae write: like as we have before shewed. Priscus he was furnished afterwards, becauhe lived before Tarquinus Superbus, saith Sex, Pompeius, unto whom accord Dionysius and Laurentius Valla: who writeth, that the addition of Priscus was given unto him, not by men of that time wherein he lived, but by the age following. But Livy sheweth plainly that he had the surname of Priscus given him, even then when he came first into the City, because he was born before Superbus. He also was called Lucretius, and was the son of Demetrius the Co-sinthian, descended from the family of the Enchiades.

Servius Tullius, the sixth K. of the Romans, reigned four and forty years.

AFTER Priscus Targinius was slain presently Servius Tullius was the first that (without any election of the people, yet with the general consent of the Nobles) took upon him the Roman kingdom, in the year from the foundation of the City 176. Concerning whose conception, we must not let pass that which Pliny writeth in the 36 book after this manner.
During the reign of Tarquinus Priscus, their appeared suddenly the gentill member of the maulicine sex upon the heath where the fire was kept, & thereupon presently a captive woman and bond-servant of Tarquinius the Queen, named Orcisfa, sitting there by the fire side, conceived and was with child; and so was Servius.
Tullius born, who succeeded in the kingdom.
Afterwards as the boy lay asleep within the Ks. palace, his head was seen on a light fire, and supposed he was the son of the familiar Lar of that house. In which regard, he instituted first the Compitalia and plaies to the Lari. Concerning his birth, Plutarch hath written more in his book of the Romans fortune. By the crafty and subtil device of his wives mother Tarquinius, he attained to the Crown in the fourth year of the first Olympiads, and reigned 44 years: but by the villanous complot of Tarquinus his son in law, and Tullia his own daughter and Tarquinius wife,
he was most impiously slain in the very street;
which thereupon was called Sceleratus. As touching the years of this Kings reign, some controverfie there is among writers: for Livy, Dio, onysius, and Solinus (whom we have followed) write, that he reigned 44 years: but Maffala Cornelius, Sex, Ruffus, Ensepius, Ensepius, Cassio, dorus, and Bedae 34, and not above. Howbeit, in adding those ten to the reign of Tarquinus afterwards, they hinder not this gross sum and computation of the years: for they let them down 35, which Livy, Dionysius, and Soli, nius, make but 25. This K. took the name of Ser, vinus, by occasion of his own fortune, for that his mother Orcisfa a captive, but a most beautiful and wife woman of Corniculum a bare him during her bondage: but Tullius he was called, by the name of his fathers kindred, as Dionysius writeth.

wrieth in his fourth book, reckoning up many acts by him achieved.

L. Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh King of Rome, ruled 25 years.

IN the two hundred and twentieth year after the foundation of the City, L. Tarquinius the younger, having killed Servius Tullius, entered upon the Roman kingdom with force of arms, nor by Interregent, nor yet any right of law. Superbus he was named for his cruel demeanour, in that he forbade to commit to earth the dead corps of his father in law by him murdered: giving out that Romulus likewise died and lay unburied. He was the son of L. Tarquinius Priscus the King; as Q. Publ. An. Gellius, Licinius Macer. Verrinus Flaccus, and Livius have written. Howbeit, Dionysius out of L. Piso in his Annals, by most strong reasons disproveth their error, and by the certain computation of the years sheweth how it cannot possibly be so, but rather that he was the son of Priscus. Five and twenty years he reigned according to Livy in his first book. Dionysius in his fourth, and Solinus in his Polyhistor. But Cassiodorus, Eusebius, Eutropius, and Bede, allcribing unto him five and thirty years, adding unto his reign those ten years which they took from Servius Tullius, and thereby giving occasion of error to the later writers. Of him Dionysius, Livy, both the Plinies, Gellius, Macrobius, and Eutropius, have written much. Collect then, into one sum the year of these Kings reign, and thereof will arise the number of two hundred forty four.

Of the first Elections of Consuls.

THIS is the second change of the Common-weal, by occasion that Superbus the King, as well for his insolent and proud government, as for the villany offered by Sextus the Kings son to Lucretia, was expelled, and liberty recovered: whereupon the sovereign government year by year was committed to two men, who first were named Prators, for that they were over the people: then Judges, because they decided their controversies: and lastly, Consuls, in that they advised and provided for the good of the Common-weal: as Cicero in the third book of Laws declareth in these words: Let there be two invetted in royaill governments; and of ruling, judging, and counsell-giving, be they called Prators, Judges, and Consuls: let them also have the sovereignty of command in war. Now the first Consuls or Prators were created by Sp. Lucretius (father of Lucretia, and Interregent for the time) in a generall assembly by the voices of the Centuries, according to the commentaries of Servius Tullius the King. The first Consul had all the rights, prerogatives, and regal enigns of the KK, this only provided, that both of them should not have the rods and axes carried before them, for fear of preventing any terror to the people. Both of them were chosen out of the Patritii: which for this intent I advertise the Reader of, that the progress of the Common-weal might be known; seeing that in process of time they came to be created out of the Commons also. Moreover, as concerning the year month, and day, when as the first Consuls entered their government, something were to be laid in this place: but because we have spoken before of the variety and dissention of Authors thereabout: therefore leaving pass these circumstances, proceed we to the very Consuls, who by the testimony of all writers were first chosen: namely,

245
L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarquinius Collatinus.

IT is recorded by all writers, that L. Junius Brutus, and L. Tarq. Collatinus were the first Consuls or Prators of the Roman people: who in the end of the 244 year since the foundation of the City and upon the first day of March (after the Tarquins KK, the father & the son were expelled the City) in an assembly of the Centuries were solemnly pronounced and declared Consuls. But after that Brutus had compelled his Colleague Tarquinius to resign up his Consulship, either because he was suspected for the affinity and name of the Tarquins (as L. Piso in Gellius the 15 book and 29 cap. Livy, Plutarch, and Cic. 2. Offic. do write:) or by occasion of a variance between Brutus and Collatinus about the execution of Collatinus his sisters son, (as Dionysius reporteth) he was elected in his place Pub. Valerius Volusus the son of Volusus whose helping hand he had used especially in banishing the KK. Of whose Consulship, Plinius in the third book, Dionysius, Livy, Valerius Max. 4. book 4. chapter. Plutarch in Poplicola, and Pliny 36 book, chap. 15, have made mention. But Valerius, after that Brutus in his Magistracy was slain by Aruns the son of Superbus (for the King his father had levied war against the Romans) in a general Court of all the Centuries, took unto him for his companion in government, Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus the father of Lucretia; and to him (being the elder) submitted the prebendence of sovereignty. And soon after, within few daies upon his death, (for he was very aged) bequeathed unto him M. Horatius Pulvillus for his Colleague in the Consulship. The said Valerius was called Poplicola, for that during his Magistracy, he enacted certain laws very popular, and namely, concerning the appeal from the Consuls to the people, and the receiving of the state-government from the said people, as Livius Livius and Dionysius do witness. In the vulgar books, as also in the old written Copies (whether by error or of purpose) was not we read his name evermore Poplicola, but still in one and the same signification. Only the letters are a little altered, which otherwise have much affinity one with another, as Quintilian writeth; namely a with u, and y with e. For in antique titles and inscriptions you shall read often Poplicola for Publicus. To conclude therefore, in the first year after the Kings were expelled, Collatinus was the elder, L. Junius Brutus, and Pub. Valerius, Sp. Lucretius Poplicola, and M. Horatius Pulvillus.

P. Valerius, II. T. Lucretius.

THE Consulship of these two is recorded likewise by Dionysius, Eutropius, and Cassiodorus, Omphrius Papius, given unto Lucretius the surname of Tricipitinus, both for that it was a peculiar addition to that house; and also, because by an ancient Chronologer in the records of Cassianus, he is named Tricipitinus. Now for Plinius the Etymology thereof according to Sextus, is twofold: For some call him Pop, who hath been brought up at the public charges; others againe name him Pop, who was a ward before he had his name given him.

P. Lucretius, P. Valerius Poplicola.

LIVY calleth this Lucretius by the surname of Pop, but other books of Titus, Dionysius writeth, that P. Valerius Poplicola the third time, and M. Horatius the second time were Consuls. Plutarch speaketh of the third Consulship only of P. Valerius, Omphrius and Sigeonius follow Dionysius. As for Cassiodorus, he leaveth out altogether the Consuls.

Sp. Lartius, T. Herminius.

AFTER Poplicola the third time, and Pulvillus the second time Consuls, Dionysius hath placed Sp. Lartius and T. Herminius. The same doth Cassiodorus. And the book noted by Cuspinian, under an unknown author, hath in it thus written, Poplicola I I I & Pulvillus; Ruffo & Aquilino; Valerio & Tiberio. Livy omitteth the Consuls and in their place putteth down M. Valerius, and P. Postumius: But as Sigeonius thinketh, the fault is in the writers of the book.

But that this year should necessarily come between Omphrius thinketh, according to the book of M. Tullius Cicero entituled Brutus and certain it is, that Verrinus Flaccus in his Capitoline tables hath not rejected these Consuls. Now this name Lartius is derived of Lars, and so ought it to be written, and not Lartius, as corruptly it is to be seen in some Copies of Livy and Dionysius. As for the surname to Herminius, Omphrius upholdeth it to have been Egurinus, both for that the mention of that surname appeareth in a fragment of the Capitoline murals, as also because of what family else it should be, no writer ever hath delivered. This Sp. Lartius was the brother of Titus Lartius the first Dictator, as writeth Dionysius.

M. Valerius, P. Postumius.

PLUTARCH, as also Dionysius and Livius writeth, that this M. Valerius was brother to M. Valerius Publicola, and therefore truly is he said to be the son of Volusus. Postumius for his surname had Nukertus. Witteus Zonarus together with Plutarch in Poplicola, and Dionysius in the fifth and sixth book, still Dionysius calleth the brother of Quintus, where he treateth of the Consular Embassadors sent unto the Command in the year 260. This Postumius, as Omphrius teacheth, was by old authors written without the apostrophe (h) either because of Popia Popliana, and Postumius, and to Postumius is derived, or for that in old time they wrote amius without the said (h). Now is he called Postumius who was born last, as Celsus, Witteuseth in his commentaries of ancient readings. Howbeit lawyers pronounce the word with the apostrophe, and call by that name him only, who was born after his fathers death; and with them accord Varro, and Plutarch in the life of Sulla.

P. Valerius I I I I I. T. Lucretius.

DIONYSIUS, Livius, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus report, that for Consuls this year, But the registers of Cassianus deliver unto us Poplicola the fourth time, and Tricipitinus, Valerius Maximus in the fourth book and fourth chapter writeth thus, Valerius Poplicola the first in his Consulship with Brutus, and the same man bare three Consuls afterwards, to the great contentment of the people.

Agrippa M. Annianus, P. Postumius.

DIONYSIUS hath for Consuls this years Agrippa M. Annianus, Lucius, and L. Postumius the second time, Livy, Cassiodorus, Cuspinianus book, and the Greek records disagree not from him. Valerius Max. 4. book, 4. cap. corruptly calleth him M. Menenius Agrippa. Now Agrippa are they called, who are born into the world with extraordinary throws & birth-travels of their mothers, namely, not with their heads, but their feet forward, against nature.

252
Opter Virginis, Sp. Cassius.

LIVY, Zonarus, and Cassiodorus, name these Consuls barely thus. Dionysius yet is more liberal, calling Sp. Cassius, M. Caelianus, and Opter Virginis Tricipitinus. But whom Dionysius calleth inceditor, Cicero in his Latinus termeth Cassius Becillimus. And Cuspinianus Kalender Viscellus. For first of Viscus cometh Visellus, and so from thence they derive Viscellinus. Opter (to note that by the way, as Sex. Pompeius saith) is he; whose father died before his grandire, And the word foundeth thus much, as it were before after his fathers death; or because he taketh his grandire for his father.

253

Posthumius Cominius, T. Lartius.

Livy, Dionysius, Zenerius, and Cassiodorus name these simply thus. But Cyprianus Kalender, giveth to Posthumius the surname Arunculus to Lartius Ruffus. And those whom Cyprianus book nameth Ruffi, the Greek registers by another word, but to the same fence, call Flavi.

254

Ser. Sulpitius, M. Tullius.

Livy and Cassiodorus allow to these no surnames at all. The Sicilian Records give to Sulpitius the addition of Cominius, like as the Kalender of Cyprianus; and to Tullius of Laurens; as also doth Dionysius, who writeth, that Manius Tullius died in the time of his Magistracy, and that in his place there was none substituted, because the year was wearisome at an end. Of this M. Tullius, Cicero speaketh in his Brutus, saying, As if I should avouch my self to be defended of M. Tullius the Patritian, who in the tenth year after the expulsiō of the K.K. was Col. with Ser. Sulpitius. This surname Manius, as Sext. Pompeius saith, cometh hereupon that some one was born manus, i. e. in the morn, like as Lucius, who entered into the world by daylight. And in another place, this Manius (qd. he) consecrated the field Nemorensis, from whom many noble and famous men sprang, and continued many years. Whereupon arose the Proverb, Mani Ma in Aricia, i. e. there be many Mani at Aricia. Moreover, he was called Servius, who came of parents (either both or one at least) whilst they were in bondage, or else, who when his mother was dead, lived still in her womb, and so was saved.

C. Veturius, T. Ebutius.

The forename of this Veturius or Veturinus in some Copies of Livy, as Marlian sheweth in his annals of Coss, is Caius; in other Cornelius; in Cassiodorus, Lucius; in Dionysius Publius; who also nameth Veturius, Geminus; and T. Ebutius Helas; and in some place Uanabas, but faultily; for the Latine writers also affirm his surname to be Helas. The Greek Records likewise have Helas and Geminus. Moreover they that write him Veturius, imitate the ancient manner of putting, i. e. as when they call men Fufius, V. Iulius, and Papilius. But they who call him Veturius follow the latter usage. Of this matter Livy speaketh in the year 292.

Q. Cladius, T. Lartius.

Thus say Livy and Cassiodorus: but Dionysius nameth T. Lartius, Flavius; and Q. Cladius, Siculus: to whom accord the registers both of Cyprianus and Sicily. This T. Lartius is the same as appeareth by Dionysius, who before was Col. and therefore is his surname Flavius rightly added. The house of the Cladii as also of the Iulii, Servilii, Geganii, Viriatii, and Quintilii descended from the Albans first, as Dionysius writeth.

257

An. Sempronius, M. Minutius.

Thus Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us these Coss. But Cyprianus registers and the Sicilian, surname them Atracini and Angurini. And Dionysius nameth them A. Sempronius Ebutius, and M. Minutius Angurinus, albeit he maketh no mention of Angurinus, but in the second Consulship of Minutius, as for Anus, he was so called, who being new born, was nourished and fostered by the gods.

An. Posthumius, T. Virginius.

Thus are these Coss. set down by Dionysius, Livy, and Cassiodorus. And to them verily the Greek records put to the surnames of Albus and Calimontanus. But the book of Cyprianus ad des Regilenses & Tricostus besides: so that by him they are thus written, An. Posthumius Albus Regilensis, and T. Virginius Tricostus Calimontanus.

259

App. Claudius and P. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus record these for Coss. this year. The registers as well of Cyprianus as Sicily, Sabinus and Priscus: But Dionysius more fully, App. Cladius Sabinus, and P. Servilius Priscus. This App. Claudius was the top of the Claudian kindred, first named, Albius Cladius, and afterwards, App. Claudius: who from Regillus, a City of the Sabins (whereupon he was called, Sabinus Regilensis) came to Rome in the two hundred and fiftieth year after the foundation of the City, and was ranged among the Patritii, as Livy, Dionysius, and Suetonius in Tiberius make report. This man was grandfire to that App. Claudius the Decemvir. As touching his forename, there is some difference: whereof ye may see Onuphrius and Marlianus in their Kalenders.

260

A. Virginius and T. Veturius.

These are thus set down by Livy and Cassiodorus, as here they be named. Dionysius writeth them. An. Virginius Montanus, and T. Veturius Geminus. The register of Cyprianus, barely Montanus and Geminus. The Sicilian, Calimontanus and Geminus. Montanus and Calimontanus are both one, Padianus upon the Oration of Cicero for Cornelius, calleth these Consuls, An. Virginius Tricostus, and L. Veturius Cicurinus: whereby it may be understood, that both of them had two surnames, to win the one, Tricostus Calimontanus, and the other, Geminus Cicurinus: for so elsewhere other writers testifie, Cyprianus observeth, that this Cicurinus, is also called Cognatus by some writers.

Sp. Cassius and Posthumius Cominius.

So Livy and Dionysius. Of them I speaketh Cicero also in his Oration for Cornelius. But Cyprianus his books set forth unto us, Viscellinus & Aruncus. The Sicilian records, Aruncus, and Viscellinus. And that these same were Consuls together in this year, and entered upon their government the first of September, sooner then the custom was, as Dionysius writeth.

262

T. Geganus and P. Minutius.

Dionysius in the beginning of the seventh book nameth for Coss. this year T. Geganus Maximus, and P. Minutius. The same doth Livy in the second book. Cassiodorus likewise and Eutropius. Orosius also in the second book and fifth chapter, leaving out one of their surnames. But the Greek records and Cyprianus book surname them both, the one Macerianus, the other Angurinus. And these are ordinary surnames, this to Minutius, and the former to the Geganii.

263

M. Minutius, and An. Sempronius.

So Livy and Cassiodorus let them down, omitting their surnames, as also the numeral note II. But Dionysius recordeth them fully in this manner. A. Sempronius Atracinus the second time, and M. Minutius Angurinus likewise the second time. This year reckoneth Dionysius for the nineteenth, after that Poplicola the Col. published the law of appealing.

Sp. Nautius and Sext. Furius.

After An. Sempronius and M. Minutius Coss. Dionysius bringeth in to succeed them, Q. Sulpitius Camerinus, and Sp. Lartius Flavius the second time. Cyprianus registers, Cornutus and Flavius. The Sicilian, Camerinus and Flavius. Moreover, Cornutus is an ordinary surname to the Sulpitii, as may be gathered out of the Capitoline tables of stone. And that these Coss. are not to be left out, either according to the account of the Capitol, or to make up and digest the sum gathered by Varro, appeareth by the Triumph of P. Valerius, which would not tall to the year 279, if we should deduct these Coss. out of the Kalender.

265

T. Sicius and C. Aquilius.

Next after the former Consuls, theretofore according to Dionysius, C. Iulius Iulus and P. Pinarius Rufus Consuls. Cyprianus his records deliver unto us, Iulus and Mamerianus: But the Greek, Iulus and Rufus. And that Mamerianus is a surname to the Pinarii, appeareth by another place. These Consuls Livy overpasseth, like as the other two years before: whom they that undertook the explication of the Capitoline tables have noted, that there went Consuls for two years. So that of himself the like may be said to that which he writeth in the ninth book of Piso, in this manner [These Consuls, Piso bringeth in immediately after Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out two years, whereof we have reported that Claudius and Valerianus were Consuls in the one, and Cornelius with Martius in the other.] Whether he forgot them in the digesting of the Annals, or of purpose passed by them (notwithstanding he thought of those two couple of Consuls) it is uncertain. Moreover, the surname of C. Iulius, was transformed every where into Tullius and Tullius; but that it is to be read Iulius, both Marlianus, and also after him Panvinius sheweth. For this surname Iulus is set from Africanus the son of Ennius, and from the said surname is derived the denomination of a family; and therefore Virgilius.

The Iulian house at Rome, first came from Iulus great, a prince of name. And Livy speaking of the same in this wild faith, which Iulius, the house of the Iulii avouch for the author of their name.

Sp. Cassius. Proculus Virginius.

But to leave these things; Sp. Nautius and Sext. Furius, are by Dionysius, Livy, and Cassiodorus, ranged Consuls in this year. In Cyprianus his Annals, there is Rutilius, the surname of Nautius, and likewise Viscellinus. But in the Sicilian, Nautius and Ensus.

Servius Cornelius, Q. Fabius.

According to Livy the Consuls this year were T. Sicius, and C. Aquilius; whom Dionysius and Cassiodorus name to be T. Sicius & C. Aquilius. The surnames of these, by the Greek records and Cyprianus Kalender, were Tuscius and Sabinus. As for Aquilius, he was so called (as Marlianus observeth) who was agilis colore, i. e. of a dusky black, or brownish colour.

Livy avoucheth Consuls for this year, Sp. Cassius and Proculus Virginius; and Dionysius Sp. Cassius the second time, with Proculus Virginius. And Diadema in his eleventh book, unto Virginius addeth the name Tricostus. The Greek records, as also those of Cyprianus make mention of Rutilius and Viscellinus. Now as concerning the name of Proculus, I think they be so called, for that they were born when their parents were old, quasi, Procul atque progreffi, i. e. far step in years.

269

M. Fabius, L. Valerius.

Dionysius in the said 1 book, declareth Q. Fabius Vibulanus, and Servius Cornelius Cossus, for this years Consuls. The same do Dionysius Livy, and Cassiodorus saying that they leave out the surname. But as touching the surname of Cossus, (that ye may be relieved) men were named Cossus in the old time, who had rived and wrinkled bodies, like to the wood-worms breeding in trees, called Cossus. Plinius in his 17 book and 24 chap. saith: Rhyet and wantonness hath brought up the use at the table of the daintier wood-worms breeding in oaks. Hereupon Saint Hieronymus against Jovinian: In Pennis (quoth he) and Phrygians it is counted high and delicate fare to eat Xyl phagion for to be called thole plump and fat worms which came of rotten wood, and among them are reckoned to yield a great revenue and commodity to the housekeeper. Of them the Romans took their names of Cossus, Cossius, Cessinus, and Cossianus.

Q. Fabius, C. Julius.

Livius Emilius the son of Mamercus, and C. Cato Fabius the son of Cato, for by Dionysius recorded the Consuls of this year. Livy and Cassiodorus approved the same. Dionysius likewise, saying that he addeth to L. Emilius the surname of Mamercus: but they leave out the fore names of their fathers. The Greek records have Mamercus and Fabius. As for the surname of Mamercus Dionysius giveth it unto Emilius himself in the third Consulship. Moreover, Sex. Pompeius affirmeth, that the kindred Emilia took name of Mamercus the son of Pythagoras the Philosopher, who for his singular humanity, was surnamed Emilius. But as he saith Emilius is a name and not a surname. Now was this Emilius the son of Mamercus, as witnesseth Dionysius.

271

K. Fabius, Sp. Furius.

Dionysius hath for this years Consuls Mamercus Fabius Vibulanus, and L. Valerius Potius. Dionysius, Livius, and Cassiodorus, M. Fabius and L. Valerius. The Greek records, Fabius and Papirius: and finally Cassianus book Fabius and Potius.

M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius.

Dionysius reasoned together in the Consuls M. Fabius, C. Julius and Q. Fabius. Livy and C. Cassiodorus, Q. Fabius and Cn. Manlius. The Sicilian registers and Cassianus book Fabius and Potius.

273

K. Fabius, L. Virginius.

Dionysius writeth, that C. Fabius the second time, and Sp. Furius the second time were Consuls this year: but Livy and Cassiodorus put in head of them, Q. Fabius and C. Junius. The Sicilian registers, as also Cassianus, Julius and Fabius.

L. Emilius, T. Servilius.

By the testimony of Dionysius, there follow. Bed Consuls next after, M. Fabius the second time, and C. Manlius. But Dionysius, Livy, and Cassiodorus, deliver unto us M. Fabius and Cn. Manlius for Consuls. The Greek records, name Fabius the second time: and Comacinius, Cassianus book hath Vibulanus the second time. The Capitoline stone theweth Cn. Manlius the son of Publius.

C. Horatius, T. Manlius.

Fabius Cassiodorus, Dionysius and Dionysius, make report of Cato Fabius to have been Consul this year with T. Virginius: but the Sicilian registers, Fabius with Rutilius. Dionysius noteth that Cato the brother of the Consul, who gave him his place, was a third Consul this year. And Livy saith, that T. Virginius Rutilius died in time of the pestilence the 290 year.

276

A. Virginius, Sp. Servilius.

According to Livy, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, the Consuls this year were L. Emilius and C. Servilius: but Dionysius nameth L. Emilius Mamercus with C. Cornelius Lentulus the Sicilian registers, Emilius with Esquilinus. Another fragment of the Capitoline stone, only Strabon Abala: with Esquilinus subjoined in his room. Moreover, Mamercus (as Sex. Pompeius writeth) is an Oscan fore-name: who also reporteth, that the House Emilia was so called of Mamercus the son of Pythagoras the Philosopher, who for his paising courtie was surnamed Emilius.

277

C. Nautius, P. Valerius.

Livius, Cassiodorus, Dionysius, and Dionysius, put down for Consuls T. Manlius and C. Horatius. As for Dionysius, he added unto Horatius as the surname of Pulvillius: and the Capitoline stone surnameth Manlius, Lamius. And even so both in Cassianus Kalendar and the Sicilian registers, are to be seen Lamius and Pulvillius. Of these Consuls maketh mention in the 17 book and 12 chap. but not without fault.

278

Livius, Cassiodorus, and Dionysius, set down for Consuls A. Virginius and Servius Servilius. Dionysius, A. Virginius Triclusius, and C. Servilius Strabon. In Cassianus his Kalendar, Virginius, for his surname hath Rutilius: and the Capitoline stone giveth Strabon to Servilius: the Sicilian records have both.

279

L. Emilius, Opter Virginius, or, Papius Julius.

Livius and Cassiodorus nominat for this years Consuls P. Valerius and C. Nautius. Dionysius, P. Valerius Papicula and C. Nautius. Dionysius, P. Valerius Papicula, and C. Nautius Rufus. The Sicilian registers thus Nautius and Papicula. Cassianus, Papicula and Rufus. The Capitol stone, having for Rufus, Rutilius: like as Dionysius before in Livius, for Rufus putteth down Flavus.

Dionysius this year nameth Consuls, L. Furius Medullinus and Manlius Vulso. Livius and Cassiodorus record L. Furius and C. Manlius. Dionysius cometh with A. Manlius and L. Pinarius. Medullinus giveth warning to read Vulso not Vulso.

App. Claudius son of Appius, T. Quintius.

Dionysius would have L. Emilius Mamercus to be Consul the third time this year, with Papirius Julius: but Livy, L. Emilius and Opter Virginius. Howbeit he saith that in some doctols be found Papirius Julius, in stead of Virginius. And them Dionysius, the Greek records, and the avouchers of the Consuls tables when the Capitol, have followed. In the fragments whereof is read Julius, which is a surname of the Julii. And therefore in the Sicilian registers, it is thus written, Emilius and Julius: but in those of Cassianus, Mamercus and Papirius. Cassiodorus hath followed Livy. Moreover, Appius is a peculiar name of the Claudii, which a citizen died of Rome called: because it was a lingers name.

Livius, Dionysius, and Cassiodorus, name for this year Consuls, L. Pinarius and L. Furius. Dionysius, L. Pinarius Mamercinus, and P. Furius Opter faultily, as Sigonius and Omnipert think. Of these Consuls M. Varo maketh mention, and Macrobius in the first book of the Strenalia.

283

T. Numicius Priscus, A. Virginius.

Dionysius saith the Consuls of this year were App. Claudius the son of Appius, surnamed the Sabinus, and T. Quintius Capitolinus. Livy leaveth out their surnames.

284

T. Quintius, P. Servilius.

Livius and Cassiodorus set down for Consuls this year, T. Emilius and L. Valerius. Dionysius

Julius, L. Valerius Papicula, and T. Emilius Mamercus. Dionysius doth Valerius the second time, and L. Emilius. The Sicilian registers yield us nothing but the bare names, Emilius and Valerius: but Cassianus, Pinarius and Adamas.

T. Emilius, Q. Fabius.

Dionysius, hath for Consuls this year, A. Virginius Montanus (whom the Greek records call Calimontanus) and T. Numicius Priscus. Dionysius, Livius, and Cassianus do conceal their surnames: and whom the Sicilian registers name Calimontanus, Cassianus calleth Montanus.

286

Q. Servilius, Sp. Posthumus.

In Dionysius we read for this years Consuls Quintius Capitolinus, and Q. Servilius Priscus. Livius and Cassiodorus, are silent for the surnames: but in Dionysius there be T. Quintius, and Q. Servilius Strabon. In Cassianus Kalendar, Capitolinus and Priscus: in the Sicilian registers, Calimontanus and Priscus.

287

Q. Fabius, T. Quintius.

Livius, and Cassiodorus match together in Consulship for this year: T. Emilius and Q. Fabius. Dionysius, T. Emilius the 11. time, and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers, Emilius & Vibulanus, Cassianus Mamercus and Vibulanus, Dionysius, Emilius Mamercus and Q. Fabius Vibulanus. This is that Fabius who afterwards was four times Consul, and was the only Fabius that survived, when the Fabii were slain at Cremona: not a child at the time of fourteen years of age, but a serviceable and an active man of his hands, (as Dionysius reporteth) and was the son of Marcus a man who had been Consul.

288

A. Posthumus Albus, Sp. Furius Fusus.

This year had for Consuls, Q. Servilius and Sp. Posthumus. As Livy and Cassiodorus report but Priscus and Albus as Cassianus saith. And by Dionysius his testimony Sp. Posthumus, Albus, and Servilius Priscus the second time: Dionysius nameth Q. Servilius Priscus the second time: but Dionysius nameth Q. Servilius & Sp. Posthumus Albus. Howbeit in the fragment of the Capitol marble, Sp. Posthumus is surnamed Albus Regillus, and not Albus, and so Macrobius thinketh it ought to be read.

289

Livius nameth T. Quintius and Q. Fabius Cassiodorus: T. Quintius the second time, and Q. Fabius the second time. Dionysius, T. Quintius Capitolinus and Q. Fabius. Dionysius, T. Quintius Capitolinus the third time, and Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time.

Still 2

L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, T. Petrus Geminus

According to the Capitoline table, Anus Posthumus; out of Livy, Diogenes, and Cassiodorus, Pub. Furius Fufus, are noted for Consuls this year. Diogenes putteth to Furius the only gentile surname Medullinus for Fufus. This A. Posthumus was the son of A. Postumius the Dictator.

P. Valerius. Serv. Sulpitius.

Livy and Cassiodorus write that there followed as Cons. this year, P. Servilius but Diogenes nameth L. Aburnius and P. Servilius Prifcus, Diogenes, L. Aburnius Etoa and Pub. Servilius Strabon. The Sicilian registers shew Prifcus and Flavinius Cuspianus, Etoa and Prifcus. The Capitoline tables exhibit unto us P. Servilius the son of Sp. P. N. i. the sons son of Publius; and furnished Prifcus.

292
C. Claudius, son of Appius. P. Valerius Poplicola.

Livy Cassiodorus, and Denis, represent unto us as Consuls this year, L. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and T. Valerius [or Veturius] Geminus; but Diogenes, L. Lucretius and T. Veturius Cicerinus, Cuspianus his Kalender, Geminus and Tricipitinus. The Sicilian Registers, Tricipitinus and Veturius; the Capitol monuments L. Lucretius Tricipitinus.

293
Q. Fabius Vibulanus III. L. Corneli. Maluginensis

Livy and Cassiodorus profess for Consuls this year, P. Valerius and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus. The Capitol marbles have P. Valerius Anianus Gallus. Of the same Consul Valerius speaketh, in his first book and fix chapter.

294

Livy and Diogenes name, P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Sabinus Consuls for this year; Diogenes, P. Valerius Poplicola, and C. Claudius Regillanus. The Sicilian registers & Cuspianus call them Poplicola and Sabinus. The Capitoline marble hath this record, P. Valerius P. F. [son of P.] Voluf N. i. the sons son of Voluf, furnished Poplicola but Livy, Diogenes, Orphus, & they that have ranged the Cons. in the capitol, have reported that P. Valerius the Consul was slain in the batel against the bondslaves who this year (under the leading of Ap. Herdonius the Sabine) held the Capitol by force; and that in his head L. Quintius Cincinnatus was substituted.

Q. Minutius, C. Horatius Pulvillus.

Livy, together with Cassiodorus, declare for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius the third time and L. Cornelius Maluginensis, Diogenes, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Didenus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus and L. Cornelius Aspinus. The Sicilian registers, and Cassiodorus Vibulanus and Maluginensis. The Capitol marble C. Fabius Vibulanus the third time.

296
M. Valerius, Sp. Virginus.

Both Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls, L. Minutius and C. Nautius, Diogenes, L. Minutius and C. Nautius the second time, Diogenes Minutius Capitulus, and C. Nautius Rutilius. The Capitol stones C. Nautius Rutilius the second time. What this surname Capitulus should mean, Sigismus and Omphrius somethie they know not, and think in stead thereof two should read Capitulus, Valerius Maximus; (5 book a chap. Of thankful persons) writeth these Consuls corruptly, Q. for Nautius, and Minutius.

297
T. Romulus, Sp. Veterius.

Livy and Cassiodorus name for Cons. this year Q. Minutius and M. Horatius Pulvillus; but herein they do amisse, as Sigismus and Omphrius suppose for the same Livy writeth, that Caius Horatius Pulvillus died being August in the year 302. Diogenes nameth L. Posthumus and M. Horatius. Diogenes Q. Horatius and Q. Minutius. The Capitol records, C. Horatius Pulvillus. And the Sicilian registers, Pulvillus and Augurinus.

Sp. Tarpeius, A. Asterius.

In Livy and Cassiodorus, and Diogenes, we find Cons. this year, [Valerius with Sp. Virginus. But in the twelfth book of Diogenes M. Valerius Laetius, and Sp. Virginus Tricipitinus. In Cuspianus Kalender Maximus and Calpurnius. In the Sicilian, Maximus and Virginus. In the of the Capitol, M. Valerius Max. As for Laetius, Plinius sheweth, that it is a surname of the Valerii. Of thebe Consuls also, Cuspianus maketh mention in his sixteenth of the places called Seculares.

299
P. Curiatius, Sext. Quinctilius.

According to Livy, Cassiodorus, and Diogenes, this year Veturius and T. Romulus entered upon the Consulship. Diogenes delivereth unto us C. Veturius Cicerinus, and T. Romulus Veturius. Cuspianus Kalender sheweth Geminus and Veturius. The Sicilian, Romus and Veturius. The Capitol records, T. Romulus son of T. nephew or sons son of T. Veturius. Of the same Romulus, Pliny also speaketh 2 book, chapter 28.

T. Minutius, P. Sestius Capitolinus.

Spirius Tarpeius son of M. and nephew of S. M. furnished Minutius Capitolinus, the Kalender of Veturius Flavens sheweth unto us for Consuls this year. Of whom, Diogenes, Diogenes, Livy, Pedanius upon Cicero his oration for Cornelius, and Cassiodorus make mention save only the surnames. Cuspianus book, and the Greek records, have Capitolinus. As for his colleague, they dissent and disagree. For Diogenes would have him to be Anus Asterius Festinus; but Diogenes Anus Terminus, Livy and Pliny, the seventh book, chapter seven and twenty, A. Eternus. Solinus chapter 4. Cell. 1. book, chapter 11. A. Therminus. Livy, Cassiodorus, A. Asterius. whom Sigismus and Omphrius follow.

301
App. Claudius, T. Geminus.

Livy and Cassiodorus likewise report for this Lycet Consuls, Sext. Quintilius and P. Curiatius. Diogenes, Sext. Quintilius and Horatius. Diogenes, Sext. Quintilius Tergeminus. The Capitol stones name him Sext. Quintilius, son of Sex. nephew of Pub. For this surname Tergeminus is common both to the Horatii and Curiatii. But Sigismus and Omphrius allow Horatius rather.

302
Sext. Quintilius son of Sextus, nephew of Pub.

To this Consul the Greek records give the surname of Varnus, and to the Capitoline tables of stone do represent him. But Diogenes, Diogenes, Livy, and Cassiodorus deliver the same man unto us without the surname. Who was his colleague, it is doubtful. For by Diogenes it is was P. Horatius; by Livy and Cassiodorus, Pub. Curiatius; by Diogenes, Tergeminus; which is the surname as well of the Curiatii, as the Horatii. Omphrius rather approveth at Curiatius.

Decemvirs Consular.

Livy and Diogenes, together with the Capitoline registers (as far forth as may be gathered by the broken fragments of the tables shew that App. Claudius and T. Geminus were Cons. elect for this year, but they reigned up the place, in regard of creating Decemvirs. Now at touching this Decemvirat, the law Tremitia brought it into the commonweal; which law A. Tremitius Arfa, a Tribune of the Commons promulgated as touching five Quinquervis to be created, who should set down laws to gage the Cons. authority. For the Commons complained, that their government was too great and tolerable, and therefore required that it might be abated and made more moderate. Which law, after he had been for six year together hotly canvassed by the Trib. to no effect in the end waxed cold again, by reason that the said Trib. obtained a grant to double their own number. But afterwards upon the occasion that Romulus and Veturius the Consulars themselves too extreme in rigor against the Com. refusing warfare, the said law was let on foot again, and suit followed more hotly then before. Whereupon when the L.L. of the Senat were doubtful what to do, at length they resolved upon this point, wherof the principal adviser was T. Romulus to create certain lawgiver, who should set down the rights and privileges both of nobles and commons. And look what ordinances by them were decreed, the same should bind both the one part and the other. The Com. agreed to this determination; and lo three Embassadors, Sp. Posthumus Albus, An Manlius Vulfus, and Serv. Sulpitius Camerinus, were sent into Greece, to learn the statutes, customs, rights, and laws of the Athenians and other Cities of Greece, and the same to bring to them to Rome. These went their embassy when Atinius and Tarpeius were Consul, and three years after returned with the said laws, whiles Sestius and Minutius were Consuls. Now when the Tribunes were instant & called hard upon them, to begin once for to make their positive laws; and now already App. Claudius and T. Geminus were elected Cons. for this year; they passed an act of the Senat (according to the advice of App. Claudius) That other magistracies should succede, and so Decemvirs be created in consular, may royal authority absolutely, without liberty of appealing from them to the people: who should choole as well out of their own customs and ordinances, as the forrain laws above said, the best & most profitable to the commonweal, and set down the rights of the people of Rome; And look what they prescribed and presented (if the Senat and people of Rome allowed thereof) that should stand in force & bind the whole body of the state for ever. When this act was approved by the Commons, the Consuls resigned and gave over. In whole trade, were chosen Decemvirs consular, namely, App. Claudius, T. Geminus, the same that gave up their Consulship; Sp. Posthumus, Serv. Sulpitius, An Manlius (those that went in embassy from the Cons. to Athens); T. Romulus, C. Julius, P. Sestius, Pub. Horatius, all men of consular calling, and such as had been Consuls before. Besides, Sp. Veturius, according to Livy, Diogenes, and Diogenes; although Diogenes called Posthumus by the name of Publius and not Spirius as Livy, and Diogenes do. Likewise Livy forceth nameth Veturius, Lucius Diogenes Titus; but Diogenes and the Capitoline stones, Spirius. These Decemvirs began their government in the 301 year after the foundation of the City, as Livy writeth, and after them Cassiodorus goeth. But the vouchers of the Capitol records, say it was the year 302; & with them agreeeth Solinus. But Varro (who Omphrius followeth) accounteth the year 303. The least in judgment and misestified justice to the people by turns every one his tenth day; on which day the said chief justice bare the sovereign port, with his 12 Lictors before him; the other nine had but one sergeante apiece to give attendance: and the singular concord among themselves, which otherwhiles was an agreement profitable when they were private, proved exceeding great equity to others.

BY this time the Commons, besides that they detested the name of Coss, no less than KK. found no mis of the Tribunes assistance; nor fought once after it, seeing the Decemvirs yeeld one unto another in reciprocal appealing. With great affection therefore and endeavour, as well of nobles as commons, there were created for this year also Decemvirs in Consuls authority absolutely without appeal. Q. Claudius the second time, Q. Fabius who had been four times Consul, M. Cornelius Maluginensis brother of L. Cornelius, who had been Consul in the year 295; M. Sergius, L. Minutius, T. Antonius Merenda, M. Rabuleius; and three likewise of the Commons, Q. Petilius, K. Dutilius, and Sy. Optim Cornicen, as witnesseth Diodorus. Dionysius and Livy; although the gentile names for the most part are by Diodorus omitted.

WHEN the more part of the former year was past, and that upon the adding of two other tables to the former ten, there remained no more to do, (in case the said tables were one in the high court and assembly of the Centuries passed) why the common-weal should have any need of the Decemvirs, in so much as the commons expected, that soon after, the solemn court and assembly foresaid for creation of Consuls should be published: then the Decemvirs without any word at all made of that election or assembly, came abroad guarded with whole troops of young gentlemen Patricians, and demeaned themselves more proudly and insolently to every man. But before the year was fully expired, by occasion of the lecherous lust of Ap. Claudius, who challenged a maiden (one of the commons daughters) as a bond-servant, according as Livy more at large writeth; and also of the commons insurrection and departing into the Aventine, the foresaid Decemvirs gave over their Magistracy: and when Q. Furius the high Pontifex called a general assembly of the tribes, ten Tribunes of the Commons were again chosen: and so at length in another assembly of Centuries for the Consuls, holden by the Interreges, created there were Consuls,

L. Valerius Potitus, M. Horatius Barbatus.

THESE Consuls Onuphrius casteth upon a third year of the Decemvirs (although Livy seemeth to dissent) to the end that he might jump with the account of the Capitol, which he supposed to be collected by Varro for by their calculation, the triumphs of these Consuls declared in the Capitol records, are engraven upon this very year, i. 304: so as it appeareth evidently, that part of this year was taken up by the Decemvirs, and part by the Consuls. Tacitus and Rufus write, that the Decemvirs continued but two years.

THESE putteth down for Consuls, Sp. Herminius and T. Virginus Calpurnianus, Cassiodorus saith, L. Herminius and T. Virginus. Dionysius writeth ad hoc ignotus. Tiber Dionysius and Diodorus thus, nasitor ignotus. Tiber Dionysius saith: the Greek records Herminius, Tricostus: whereby Onuphrius teacheth that it be corruptly written in Diodorus, Serullus for Tricostus: for Serullus was a surname of the Servili and not of the Virginii. As for his colleague Herminius, that he is to be fore-named Lars, besides Diodorus and Dionysius, Valerius also sheweth in his tenth book, where he writeth thus: The fore-name of Lars is derived from the Lares.

M. Geganus Macerinus, C. Julius.

THESE are recorded likewise to be the Consuls this year. The surname Macerinus is suppressed by Cassiodorus and Diodorus, who so nameth the other L. Julius. In Dionysius certain pages be wanting in this place, Cassius his Kalender hath for Macerinus, Matrius.

T. Quintius Capitolinus IIII. Agrippa Furius.

Dionysius and Livy both, name the Coss. of this year, T. Quintius Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius. Diodorus and Cassiodorus conceal the surname and the numeral note of four. The Greek records have Furius and Capitolinus. Onuphrius unto Furius addeth the surnames of the grandfure, to wit, Medullinus Fusus.

Al. Gentius, C. Curtius.

Livy delivereth unto us for Coss. this year, M. Gentius, and P. Crutius. Cassiodorus likewise M. Gentius and P. Crutius; but Dionysius, M. Gentius and C. Quintus; and Diodorus hath, M. Gentius and Agrippa Curtius Chilo. But as Sigonius, and after him Onuphrius have noted, it is falsely read in Livy, Crutius for Curtius; and that is proved by the authority of Varro de lingua latina: and therefore in the Sicilian registers written they are, Gentius and Curtius.

310

A. Semp. Atratinus, M. Military Tribunes in Consul authority upon whose designation Consuls were chosen in their rooms.

L. Papirius Mugillanus, L. Sempronius Atratinus.

WHEN C. Canuleius a Tribune of the Commons, had the former year published a second second law, That one of the Consuls should be created out of the Commons, (whereby the dignity of the Patricii was empaired) the nobles fearing lest the said law would pass in deed munge their heads, drew to a point; whereof C. Claudius made the first motion and was the adviser. That in stead of Consuls there should be created military Tribunes, three of the Patricii, and as many of the Commons; who being endued with Consular authority, should govern the common-weal. Also, that when their years government was expired, the advice both of Senat, and also of people should be once again required. Whether they would have Consuls rather than Tribunes consular? and look which pleased them, they should be created. These points being resolved upon and decreed, three military Tribunes were created only, all Patricii: and well enough were the Commons content therewith, because themselves were eligible and capable of that dignity. Howbeit, this regiment of theirs newly let up, stood not firmly established. For within 3 months after, by a decree of the Augurs, they resigned up their honourable place, as if there had been some error committed in their election: and then T. Quinctius Barbatus (nominated Interreges) created Consuls, L. Papirius Mugillanus, and L. Sempronius Atratinus. The Consuls are left out in the Sicilian registers. Well saith Livy therefore, that these Consuls are found neither in ancient annals and yearly records, nor yet in the Kalender of the Magistrats. But Cicero maketh mention of them in his Epistle to Papirius Pais.

M. Geganus Macerinus II., T. Quintius Capitolinus V.

Dionysius and Cassiodorus avouch these for Consuls this year. As for Dionysius, he saith that they entered in the month of December. Cassius concealeth both their surnames, and Diodorus the one, namely, Capitolinus. The Greek records have Macerinus the second time, and Capitolinus the fifth time. Zonaras nameth them Macerinus and Barbatus.

M. Fab. Vibulenus, Postumius Eburnus Cornicen.

THESE Consuls of this year, were so named, Diodorus and Cassiodorus are silent in their surnames. The Greek records have Vibulenus and Helus. Diodorus attributeth to Eburnus the surname of Helus, but what manner of addition that might be, Sigonius knoweth not, and thinketh that it should be read, i. Helus.

C. Furius Pacilus, M. Papirius Crassus.

THESE Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus are in this wise represented unto us. But by Diodorus after this sort, Q. Furius Fusus, and Manius Papirius Crassus. And by the Greek records thus, Pacilus and Crassus.

P. Geganus Macerinus, L. Menenius Lanatus.

Livy and Cassiodorus, deliver these Consuls thus fully named, Proculus Geganus Macerinus, and L. Menenius Lanatus. Diodorus, Menenius, and Proculus Geganus Macerinus. The Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Lanatus.

T. Quint. Capitolinus VI., A. Menenius Lanatus.

BY Livy and Cassiodorus, these were the Consuls for this year: but after Diodorus, T. Quintinus, and T. Menenius. According to the Sicilian rolls, Menenius and Capitolinus.

Mam. Aemilius, Q. Milit. Tribu. L. Quintus son of Cincinnatus, Q. Conf. au- L. Julus, thority.

THE Tribunes of the Commons imported and prevailed, that there should be an election holden for Tribunes military, rather than Consuls making no doubt, but in the choosing of six (for so many now by law might be created) some of the commons by making profession that they would be revenged for the death of Melius, would step into the place: howbeit the Commons created no more than three Tribunes with Consular authority, and among them L. Quintus the son of Cincinnatus. In which election, Manius Aemilius, a right honorable man and of great worth, was by their suffrages preferred before Quintinus and Julius they made the third. In like manner, Diodorus nameth three Tribunes military for this year: but in this sort, M. Aemilius Mamercus, C. Julius, and L. Quintus.

M. Geganus Macerinus III., L. Sergius Fidenas.

WHEN the Commons, together with their Tribunes were quiet, and carefully regarded the main state of the Common-weal, no question there was nor controversy, but that Coss. were chosen, to wit, M. Geganus Macerinus the third time, and L. Sergius, to saith Livy. Cassiodorus doth the same, but that he setteth down the names of the Coss. only in this wise, M. Geganus the third time, and L. Sergius, without surnames. Diodorus likewise, M. Geganus and L. Sergius, Cuspinianus Kalender, and the Sicilian registers, Macerinus and Fidenas. For this Sergius was surnamed Fidenas (as Livy reporteth) by occasion of the war which he made against the Fidenates.

M. Cornelius Maluginensis, L. Papirius Crassus.

Livy and Cassiodorus report these above-named, for this year Consuls, Diodorus nameth them, L. Papirius and A. Corn. Macerinus: but doubtless not without error, as Sigonius supposeth: for both in Cuspinianus Kalender and the rolls of Sicily, we find Maluginensis and Crassus.

C. Julius II. L. Virginus.

These Consuls are found for this year in Livy and Cassiodorus; but in Diadema C. Julius and Proculus Virginus Triestus. In Cassiodorus Kalendar and the Sicilian records, Julius and Virginus.

320
C. Julius III. or M. Manlius.
L. Virginus II. or Q. Marcius.

I find in Licinius Macer, that the same Consuls were chosen again for the year following, to wit, Julius the third time, and Virginus the second. Valerius Antias and Quintus Tuber allege for this years Consuls, M. Manlius, and Q. Sulpicius. But in these so different records of theirs, Tuber and Macer both profess to go by the linen books; and neither of them dissembleth but that the ancient writers report of military Tribunes that year created. As for Licinius, he doubteth not to follow the linen records, and Tuber cannot resolve of the truth. But among other things, which by continuance of time are unknown, this also is left uncertain. Thus much Livy. But Diadema in stead of Consuls, setteth down three military Tribunes, namely, M. Manlius, Q. Sulpicius, Proculus, and Servius Cornelius Cossus. The Greek records (following Antias and Tuber) have delivered t'us Consuls, Capitolinus and Comitinus.

321
M. Fabius Vibulanus.
Sergius Fidenas.
Marcus Feslius.
Tribunes military in Consuls authority.

The Tribunes of the Commons in their orations continually forbade the elections of Consuls: and when they had brought it to issue; that the government was at the point of interregency, they wan the mastery in the end, that the military Tribunes might be chosen with Consular authority. But reward of this victory which they shot at, namely, to have a commoner created, they obtained none: for out of the Patriiti, namely M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Feslius, L. Sergius Fidenas. Thus much Livy. Diadema likewise nameth three, but corruptly, to wit, M. Fabius, M. proculus, and L. Servilius. As for Feslius in some of the Capitol monuments, he is written Flaccinator and not Feslius, as in the common editions of Livy, whom Diadema calleth proculus.

L. Paenarius Mamercus.
L. Furius Medullinus.
Sp. Posthumius Albus.
Tribunes military in Consuls authority.

NO motion was made of Consuls election. So Tribunes military were created in Consuls authority these, Paenarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sporius Posthumus Albus:

as Livy writeth. In Diadema they are named thus, L. Furius Sp. Posthumius Mamercus.

T. Quintius [son of Lucius] Cincinnatus Pennus Julius Meno.

An act of the Senat passed, that an election of Consuls should be holden, wherein T. Quintius [son of Lucius] Cincinnatus, furnished also Pennus, and C. Julius Meno, were made Consuls, saith Livy. The same Consuls Cassiodorus also avoucheth. The Greek records have Pennus and Meno: But Diadema nameth them barely T. Quintius and Cains Julius.

L. Papirius Crassus. L. Julius.

The Tribunes of the Commons made much ado, and kept a convulsing in the City that Tribunes military in Consuls authority should be created, but could not prevail. So Consuls were chosen, L. Papirius Crassus and L. Julius. So say Livy and Cassiodorus: but Diadema nameth them falsely, Cains Papirius and L. Julius: the Greek records, Crassus and Julius.

325
L. Ser. Fidenas II. Hostus Lucretius Tricipitinus.

The Consuls this year in Cassiodorus: are L. Sergius and Hostus Lucretius: in Diadema Opiter Lucretius and L. Sergius Fidenas: in Livy L. Sergius Fidenas the second time, and Hostus Lucretius Tricipitinus. In the Sicilian registers, Tricipitinus and Fidenas. Of these Diadema maketh mention in his Epitome.

326
A. Cornelius Cossus. T. Quatinius Pennus II.

These Consuls are named by Livy and Cassiodorus for this year. But Diadema avoucheth L. Quintius and Sempronius both corruptly, as Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For in the Sicilian records are written, Cossus and Pennus: the surnames of Cornelius and Quintius. Of these Consuls Livy spake before, in the year 316.

327
C. Servilius Ahala. L. Papirius Mugillanus.

Livy and Cassiodorus, name Consuls for this year, C. Servilius Ahala, and L. Papirius Mugillanus. Diadema for Ahala putteth down Servilius: for well it may be, that Servilius was also called Ahala.

328
T. Quintius Pennus.
M. Posthumius.
C. Furius.
A. Cornelius Cossus.
Tribunes military in Consuls authority.

The Commons carried it clear, that no Consul this year were created: for four there were elected military Tribunes in Consuls authority, namely, T. Quintius Pennus immediately upon his Consulship, M. Posthumius, C. Furius, & A. Cornelius Cossus. Thus writeth Livy: and the same Diadema nameth.

329
A. Sempronius Atratinus.
L. Quatinius Cincinnatus.
L. Furius Medullinus.
L. Horatius Barbatus.
Tribunes military in Consuls authority.

These abovenamed (as Livy reporteth) were Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year. Diadema leaveth out their surnames, and L. Horatius full and whole.

330
Ap. Claudius the Decemvirs son.
L. Quatinius Cincinnatus.
L. Sergius Fidenas.
Hostus Julius Julius.
Tribunes military in Consuls authority.

These Tribunes military in Consuls authority Livy setteth down for this year. The same doth Diadema also nominate, all but their surnames, and App. Claudius whom he called Titus. Livy moreover saith, that there were two Sporius Nautius Rutili, Tribunes in those daies: but no doubt, as Onuphrius thinketh, there is some error in the copies of the book: the one of which is now the first time and a second time shall be in the year 338; the other, who was first in the year 335, and once again in the year 332. The Capitol monuments of stone have the same: but they shew that the one was but once, and the other thrice Tribune.

331
C. Sempronius Atratinus. Q. Fabius Vibulanus.

The Consuls this year created were according to Livy and Cassiodorus, C. Sempronius Atratinus and Q. Fabius Vibulanus (Diadema avoucheth them) whom Livy reporteth to have entered into government, upon the Ides of December. Of C. Sempronius Atratinus Consul, Valerius writeth six books, cap. 9. whom he saith nameth Lucius: but in the third book and second chapter, he speaketh of both, although untruly; for Q. Fabius, he nameth Q. Caninus.

L. Manlius Capitolinus.
Q. Antonius Merenda.
L. Papirius Mugillanus.
L. Sergius Scaevola.
Tribunes military in Consuls authority.

The Senat being offended with the very names of Consuls for the hatred they bare to Sempronius, commanded Tribunes military to be created with Consuls authority. And these they were, L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, and Papirius Mugillanus. Thus much Livy, in whose story the name is missing of the fourth, to wit, L. Servilius Scaevola, who in the year 339, is found engraven in the Capitol stones: Tribunes military the second time. Of these, Diadema saith not a word; in a fragment of the Capitoline marble, there is to be seen the surname of Mugillanus, belonging to L. Papirius.

T. Quatinius Cincinnatus. N. Fabius Vibulanus.

NOt only Livy, but Cassiodorus also recordeth that the Consuls this year were N. Fabius Vibulanus and T. Quatinius Cincinnatus. Diadema omitteth them: but to do not the Sicilian registers. In a fragment of the Capitol marbles, we find engraven T. Quatinius Cincinnatus Barbatus and N. Fabius. This Fabius was the son of Q. Fabius the Decemvir, who after the 300 Fabii slain in Comertus, survived and was the first of all that kindred and family surnamed Numerius: as Valerius Maximus in his 10 book; and Sextus Pompeius do report. As for T. Quatinius son he was (as Livy writeth) to that Capitoline who was Consul six times.

334
An Interregency.

VVhen the greater part of the year was spent in troubles and contentions, between the new Trib. of the Commons and certain Interregency, while the Tribunes one while would not suffer the Patriiti to go together about the declaring of an interregency, and another while impeached the Interregency that he could not pass an act of the Senat for the election of Consuls at length L. Papirius Mugillanus the Interregency, by rebuking as well the Senators as the Tribunes of the Commons, prevailed, that an assembly should be holden for choosing of Tribunes consular. So there were created Tribunes military with Consuls authority, and all Patriiti, T. Quatinius Cincinnatus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus, M. Manlius, L. Sempronius Atratinus. Thus much Livy.

335
A. Menenius Lanatus.
P. Lucretius Tricipitinus.
Sp. Nautius.
C. Sergilius.
Trib. military in Consuls authority.

Military Tribunes with Consuls authority for this year, are set down by Livy Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, and P. Nautius: for the name of the fourth is wanting; and that was C. Sergilius, son of Quintius and nephew of Cains, surnamed Aspila; who the year following, in the Capitol tables is numbered among the Tribunes consular, with the numeral note of II. So as it must needs be, that he was also first time in the year, for as much as no other fit void place left for him. Diadema nameth Sp. Patriiti.

P. Licinius Calvus, P. Manius.
T. Titinius, P. Malus.
L. Furius Medullinus, L. Publius Vulsus.

THese by T. Livius are this year named the Tribunes military. But Diodorus beareth only three, namely, P. Melius, Sp. Manius, and L. Furius. But Omniphrius thinketh that he is to be read, not L. Furius but Sp. Furius. The same author hath put to P. Licinius, the surname of Calvus, whom Livy writeth to have been the first man of the commonalty chosen Tribune military; only to take possession of the said right and interest.

355
M. Pomponius, M. Pomponius.
C. Daulius, Valerius Publilius.
Cn. Genucius, L. Atilius.

THese Diodorus sheweth for Tribunes. But Livy setteth down Marcus Pomponius to have been the only Patritian, and the rest commoners, namely, M. Pomponius, C. Daulius, Valerius Publilius, Cn. Genucius, L. Atilius. Cyprianus his book, who every year delivereth the names only of two Tribunes, hath Augurinus and Longus, surnames of Genucius & Atilius.

356
L. Valerius Potius, V. L. Furius Medullinus.
M. Valerius Max., Q. Servilius Fidenus II.
M. Furius Camillus II., Q. Sulpicius Camerinus.

All these Tribunes military for this year created were Patritii, as Livy writeth: neither discredeth Diodorus although he recite two names corruptly, to wit, maxus & yon, Spurius & atius, Plutarch in the life of Camillus maketh mention, of the said Camillus, the second time Tribune military; and the Capitoline Stone of Medullinus the third time.

L. Julius Iulus, A. Postum Regillensis.
L. Furius Medullinus IV, P. Cor. Maluginensis.
L. Servius Fidenus, A. Manlius.
IN this wit Livy reckoneth them, but Diodorus L. Servius, A. Postumius, P. Cornelius & Q. Atianus & Q. Atianus & Q. Atianus. But in those two Greek-written names, as Siganius & Omniphrius, observeth there is a foul error.

358
P. Licinius, P. F. Calvus, L. Titinius II.
P. Manius II., P. Melius II.
Cn. Genucius II., L. Atilius II.

IN this manner are these Tribunes military delivered us unto by Livy. But Diodorus names them thus, L. Titinius, P. Licinius, P. Malus, Q. Manius, Cn. Genucius, and L. Atilius. All these, but L. Licinius the son of Publius (as Livy saith) bare the dignity of Tribuneship a little before: who writeth moreover, that Genucius was slain in a battle against the Faliscians.

359
P. Cornelius Cossus, P. Cornelius Scipio.
L. Fabius Ambustus, L. F. Furius Medullinus IV.
M. Valerius Max., M. Q. Servilius III.

After the winning of Vesii, this year had the Tribunes military in Consuls authority whole above-named, Diodorus calleth P. and Ser. Cornelius both, Cossus is the rest, leaving that he concealth their surnames, he agreeth.

360
L. Furius Medullinus, V. Sp. Postumius.
C. Amylius, P. Cornelius II.
L. Valerius Poplicola, M. Furius Camillus.

Livy nameth these in this year. Diodorus, M. Furius Amylius, & Q. Postumius, but Camillus now is the third time. Siganius and Omniphrius think, that by P. Cornelius we must understand Scipio, and not Cossus. This year Camillus Tribune military, by his just dealing reduced the Faliscians to the obedience of the people of Rome; in that he sent back unto them, that schoolmaster who bestrid their children as Livy and Plutarch write. Valerius (now without some suspicion of error) writeth in his last book, that Camillus did this being Consul: whereas Plutarch saith, he was never Consul.

361
L. Lucretius Flavius, Serv. Sulpicius Camerinus.
After fifteen years (saith Livy) Cossus was created again L. Lucretius Flavius, & Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus, Diodorus and Calpurnius passe over the surnames. The Sicilian registers do shew, Flavius, and Camerinus.

L. Valerius Potius, M. Manlius Capitolinus.
Livius, Valerius Potius and M. Manlius named afterwards Capitolinus, are by Livy reported Consuls this year. Dionysius in his first book maketh mention of these Consuls, naming them L. Valerius Potius, and T. Manlius Capitolinus. Calpurnius delivereth them by the names of L. Valerius and M. Manlius, Diodorus, of L. Valerius and A. Manlius; but the Sicilian registers, of Potius and Capitolinus.

L. Lucretius, L. Furius Medullinus VII.
Serv. Sulpicius, Agrippa Furius.
M. Amylius, C. Amylius II.

By occasion that the Coss. lay sick, though good it was, to renew the government by means of an interregency: therefore after they had depose the Coss. by an act of the Senate, six Trib. military were created with Consular authority, by the Interreges: who upon the first day of July began their magistracy, as Livy saith, Diodorus mentioneth but four, namely, L. Lucretius, Serv. Sulpicius, C. Amylius, and L. Furius. As for Sulpicius, Zenarus calleth him Rufus; which surname Omniphrius also hath put unto him.

Q. Fabius Ambustus, Q. Sulpicius Longus.
The brethren of Q. S. Servilius IIII.
Fabius Ambustus, Servil. Cor. Maluginensis

THese are by T. Livius recorded for Tribunes military in Consuls authority: but Diodorus reckoneth the three Fabii, Q. K. & C. and the other three, besides Plutarch in Camillus, Gellius out of Verrius Flaccus, in his 5 book and 17 chapter: Macrobius also in his first book of Saturnals, make report of Quintus Sulpicius, a Tribune military.

365
L. Valerius Poplicola II., A. Manlius.
L. Virginius, L. Amylius.
P. Cornelius, L. Postumius.

According to Livy, these were created Tribunes military after the winning of the City: but by Diodorus, they were Pub. Cornelius, L. Virginius, L. Virginius, A. Manlius, and L. Postumius. Of these Tribunes, Macrobius speaketh in his first book of Saturnalia.

366
T. Quintus Cincinnatus, L. Aquilius Corvus.
Q. Servilius Fidenus V., L. Lucius Tricipitinus.
L. Julius Iulus, Ser. Sulpicius Rufus.

367
L. Papirius, C. Sergius.
L. Amylius II, C. Cornelius.
L. Menenius, L. Valerius Poplicola III.

THese, Livy reporteth for Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year. But Diodorus hath L. Papirius, C. Cornelius, L. Menenius, C. Servilius, A. Valerius, and Q. Fabius. Howbeit, there is wanting in Livy the name of the six Tribune, whom (out of Diodorus) Siganius and Omniphrius have set to the rest by the name of C. Cornelius. Diodorus also for Sergius hath Servilius, and Amylius for Fabius.

368
M. Furius Camillus, L. Horatius Pulvillus.
S. Cor. Maluginensis, L. Quint. Cincinnatus.
Q. Servil. Fidenus VI., P. Valerius.

THese Common-wealth came to be governed again by Camillus, a Tribune military in Cons. authority, and for Collegues were added unto him these 5 here named. But Diodorus saith that were 4 created, M. Cornelius, Q. Servilius, M. Furius, and L. Quintus. In this year when the Dictatorship was offered unto Camillus, he said there was no need thereof: and he, together with the Tribunes his Collegues, vanquished the Volscians, Antiois, & Tuscans which rebelled.

369
A. Manlius, P. Cornelius.
L. Quintus Capitolinus, L. Papirius Curior II.
T. Quintus Capitolinus, C. Sergius II.

THese hath Livy: but Diodorus saith, that four only were created namely, L. Papirius, Q. T. and L. Quintus. But of those six, A. Manlius having been Tribune military in the year 365, and who shall be a third time in the year 371, must now verily be the second time.

370
S. Cor. Maluginen. V. P. Valerius Potius II.
M. Furius Camillus V. Ser. Sulpicius Rufus II.
C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quintus Cincinnatus II.

THese Tribunes military in Cons. authority in this manner be delivered unto us by Livy: but Diodorus (as his manner is) putteth down four: Serv. Sulpicius, L. Papirius, M. Cornelius, and T. Quintus. In this year, M. Manlius attained and condemned for aspiring to be K, was thrown down headlong from the rock Tarpeia: Livy, Plutarch, and Faler.

L. Valerius IV., L. Lucretius.
A. Manlius III., L. Amylius.
Ser. Sulpicius III., M. Tribonius.

Livy rangeth these in this year, Diodorus nameth four: L. Valerius, Crispus (which is the name of Tribonius) A. Manlius, and Serv. Sulpicius, Crispus, some call Flavius.

372
Sp. Papirius, Q. Servilius.
L. Papirius, C. Sulpicius.
Ser. Cornelius IV., L. Amylius IV.

According to Livy, these were created Tribunes military in Consuls authority. The surname of Cornelius (as we have before) was Maluginensis. Diodorus writeth four: Q. Servilius, Sp. Papirius, Cornelius, & A. Manlius, but not truly.

373
M. Furius Camillus VI., L. Furius.
A. Postumius Regillensis, L. A. Manlius.
L. Postumius Regillensis, M. Fabius Ambustus.

Livy nameth these as we have placed them: But Diodorus in this wit: M. and L. both Furii, A. Postumius, L. Lucretius, M. Fabius, and L. Postumius, Plutarch also nameth Camillus Tribune military this year; wherein he vanquished the Prenestines, the Volscians, and the Tuscans also, against whom war was proclaimed, because they had served in the field under the Prenestines.

374
L. Valerius V., L. Menenius II.
L. Valerius III., P. Papirius.
C. Sergius III., Ser. Cor. Maluginensis.

THese fix are set down by Livy: but Diodorus reckoneth eight, namely, L. and P. both.

Valerius, C. Terentius, L. Menenius, C. Sulpitius, T. Papirius, L. Emilius, M. Fabius.

P. Manlius, C. Sextilius,
C. Manlius, M. Albinus,
L. Julius, L. Antistius.

After this, was the general assembly holden for the election of military Tribunes in Consuls authority, wherein were as many created of the Commoners as of the Patritii; namely, P. and C. both Manlius, with L. Julius, Patritians; and out of the Commons, C. Sextilius, M. Albinus, and L. Antistius. But Diadormus exhibiteth eight, and to these above rehearsed, he addeth C. Herennius, and P. Trebonius, Sextilius also he calleth Sextius.

376
S. Furius, P. Clodius,
Q. Servilius II, M. Horatius,
C. Licinius, L. Geganus.

Livy reporteth these for Tribunes military in Consuls authority this year: but in Livy, for L. Menenius the third time, you must read C. Licinius, as Sigonius hath shewed in his Scholia upon Livy: which Onuphrius also in his Kalender approveth. But Diadormus speaketh of no more than four: Q. Servilius, C. Licinius, L. Furius, P. Clodius.

377
L. Emilius, Ser. Sulpitius,
P. Valerius II, L. Quintus Cincinnatus,
C. Veturius, C. Quintus Cincinnatus.

These Tribunes military, the Consuls (being for ed by the might and strong hand of the great men of the City) chose all Patritians, as Livy witnesseth. The same also are named by Diadormus excepting only C. Quintus, who is called by him C. Cornelius, as for Ser. Sulpitius he was renamed Pretextatus, Zonaras nameth him Rufus.

378. 379. 380. 381. 382.
C. Licinius Stolo, Tribunes of the Commons five years,
L. Sextius.

In this year hapred the fourth change of the Roman government: for the administration of the weal publicke fell from Tribunes military in consuls authority, to the Tribunes of the commons. The authors that procured this mutation, were (as Livy reporteth) C. Licinius Stolo and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the commons, who in the former year having promulged three laws in favour of the commons and against the power of the Patritii, the first forbidding of debts; a second for alitt of lands and possessions; and the third, that there should be no more elections of Tribunes military and that one of the consuls should necessarily be chosen a commoner: seeing they could not go through with these laws, by reason of their own fellows oppositions (whom of purpose the Nobles had made for themselves) fell into an anger, and would suffer no curule Magistrats of State to be created, nor any election to be holden, but only of Aediles and Tribunes: both of commons. This deplorable estate and want of Magistrats (whiles the commons made the same Tribunes fill, who with uncessant and invincible peristance never gave over to cross the election of Tribunes military) continued in the city for the space of five years, as Livy saith. This want of Magistrats Diadormus calleth anarchia, and calleth it upon the former year, but Sext. Rufus, Eutropius, C. Aspidorus, and Zonaras write that they ruled the state not five years, but four only. Sigonius and Onuphrius in his Kalender, follow Livy and his Annals inasmuch that the capitoline writers go by. Livy also in the sixteenth book, and four and twentieth chapter, maketh mention of the year three hundred seventy nine from the foundation of the city, in which year he saith that at Rome

L. Furius, Ser. Cornelius,
A. Manlius, P. Valerius,
Ser. Sulpitius, C. Valerius.

When C. Licinius and L. Sextius the Tribunes gave over their opposition and the liberty of their negative voice, whereby the Interregent called and held an assembly for the election of Magistrats, the above-named Tribunes military, were (as Livy saith) created for this year. Diadormus nameth them thus, L. Papirius, L. Menenius, Ser. Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius, who writeth also, that after them there was another Anarchy, and when that was overpast and gone, then were created A. Manlius, L. Furius, Ser. Sulpitius, and Ser. Cornelius. But in his story, as well through his own default, as the negligence of the writers that copied out flame, there is a confusion of yearly Magistrats.

384
Q. Servilius, M. Cornelius,
C. Veturius, L. Quintus,
A. Cornelius, M. Fabius.

This year also, as Livy writeth, had these for Tribunes military in Consuls authority. But Diadormus hath Q. Servilius, C. Veturius, A. Cornelius, M. Cornelius, and M. Fabius: as for Quintus, Sigonius calleth him rather Cincinnatus than Capitoline. The rest have their warrant out of the Capitoline fragments, wherein it is thus found Cossus . . . Maluginensis . . . Cincinnatus . . . M. Fabius Ambustus. This is that M. Fabius Ambustus, who had bestowed his two daughters in marriage, the one to C. Licinius Stolo, the other to Ser. Sulpitius Pretextatus, as Livy writeth.

385
L. Quintus, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius,
L. Papirius, L. Veturius.

Livy declareth these six for Tribunes military this year, Diadormus rehearseth but three, namely, T. Quintus, Servilius Cornelius, and Ser. Sulpitius. What surnames all these carried, and with what numerall notes (signifying how often they had born the office) they are to be marked, the Capitoline fragments do shew; wherein they stand thus, Capitoline . . . Maluginensis, II, Prætextatus, III, Sp. Servilius Strabatus, L. Papirius Crassus, L. Veturius Crassus Cicerinus.

Two Dictators without any curule Magistrats of State besides.

Presently in the very beginning of the year, they proceeded to put it to the trial of small lites, what should become of the foresaid laws propoied by Licinius and Sextius. When the tribes were called to give their voices, and the publishers of the laws were not hindered by the negatives of their Colleagues coming between: the Nobles began then to quake for fear, and in all haste betook them to their two last helps and means of refuge, the sovereign and absolute government, and the principal Citizen and greatest man of all others. Resolve they did to nominate a Dictator, and Marcus Furius Camillus was the man: who took unto him for General of the horfemen L. Emilius. But when the Captains and ring-leaders of the Commons dealt very bitterly and roughly against Camillus, he (as Livy writeth) resigned up his Dictatorship. Plutarch also testifieth the same: who likewise avoucheth the cause thereof, which Livy goeth about to disprove. But both Livy and Plutarch do affirm, that in the room of Camillus thus giving over his place, there was a second Dictator created. Livy saith, it was P. Manlius. Plutarch suppresseth his name: but they agree both, that C. Licinius was the General of the horfe. Howbeit, they mean not both, one and the self-same man. For Livy saith and that truly, that it was he who had been Tribune military in Consuls authority before: But Plutarch nameth him, who was the author of the sedition and of the new laws: wherein he faulteth, For the Captain of the foresaid sedition, was this year also made Tribune of the Com, the ninth time: but Tribune of the Com, and General of the horfe at one time he could not be. And therefore Onuphrius thinketh him to have been the son of P. Licinius Calvus military Tribune, and who had to his grandfather that Pub. Licinius, who of the Com, was the first Tribune military. Of this, see more in his Kalender.

A. Cornelius II, M. Cornelius,
L. Veturius, M. Geganus,
Julius P. Manlius, P. Valerius V, I.

Livy exhibiteth these Trib. military before named for this year, whom Diadormus exhibiteth. Their surnames, together with the notes signifying how often they had born this honourable dignity, are thus expressed in the Capitoline fragments, Cossus II, . . . Maluginensis II, . . . Maccarius, L. Veturius, Crassus Cicerinus II, . . . P. Veturius Petitus Poplicola, VI, P. Manlius Capitolineus II.

L. Sextius, L. Emilius.

When L. Sextius and C. Licinius, Trib. of the Com, now chosen the tenth time, were more and more eager and instant in the publishing of their laws, in the end the authority both of Dictator and Senat, was conquered by the strong hand of the Tribunes. For they prevailed notwithstanding all the Nobility was against it, that there should be holden a solemn assembly for election of Consuls: and that, (by vertue of their laws which they carried clear before them) the one of the Consuls should be a Commoner. By which means, L. Sextius was the first Consul created from out of the Commons. But when the nobles denied flatly to approve the same by their assent, inasmuch as the Commons were at the point of insurrection and ready to leave the City: the difford and dissention was at length taken up and appeald by the mediation of the Dictator: and as the nobility was content to yield unto the commonalty a Consul, so the Commons granted unto the nobles one Praetor or Lord chief Justice within the City, and him to be created from out of the Nobility. Granted also unto them now first it was, that two Aediles Curule should be chosen out of the Patritii. The Commons conferred the Consulship upon L. Sextius (by whose law it was first obtained) and for companion in government he had L. Emilius Mamercus. Thus much Livy and Plutarch: who altogether with Aspidorus put down for Cossus, L. Emilius a Patritian, and L. Sextius a Commoner. The same, Diadormus nameth L. Emilius Mamercus, and L. Lutatius. Now this Lutatius is the surname of Sextius, as appeareth in a table of record in the Capitoll, wherein the consuls are thus to be seen, Mamercinus & L. Sextius Sextimus Lutatius: as also in the Sicilian registers they are called Mamercinus and Lutatius. In the book entitled De viris Illustribus of famous men, we find written that it was not L. Sextius, but C. Licinius Stolo, who was the first consul chosen out of the commonalty.

389
L. Gentius, Q. Servilius.

Diadormus, Livy, and Aspidorus shew unto us for consuls, L. Gentius and Q. Servilius: Of whom Orosius also and Eutropius make mention. According to the records of the Capitoll, the cof. in his first consulship is thus written: Q. Servilius son of Q. nephew of Quintus Abolus together together with L. Genucius, but in the second, the son of M. nephew of Cn. (surnamed Ammentinus). In the Sicilian registers they are written Genucius and Cursius, but corruptly, as Signonius thinketh.

C. Sulpitius Peticus, C. Licinius Stolo.

These be the Consuls reported by Livy and Cassiodorus, Diodorus concealeth their surnames. Valerius Max. in his second book and first ch. maketh mention of them, and so doth Plutarch in his problems. But he whom all other writers name Stolo, the Capitoline records nominate Calvus: as also the Sicilian, which deliver their surnames Peticius and Calvus.

391

L. Aemilius Mamercinus II., Cn. Genucius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare these for Consuls: whom Diodorus in his sixteenth book nameth Cn. Genucius and L. Aemilius. In the Capitoll tables in this manner they be let down, Mamercinus II. and Cn. Genucius son of M. and nephew of M. Ammentinus. But in the Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Stolo.

Q. Servilius Ahala II., L. Genucius II.

Diodorus nameth the Consuls of this year, Q. Servilius and Q. Genucius. The Sicilian registers, Ahala and Genucius. Livy and Cassiodorus, Q. Servilius Hala and L. Genucius. These are they who three years before were matched together in the same government.

393

C. Sulpitius, C. Licinius Calvus.

These are by Livy recorded Consuls this year. Cassiodorus writeth them thus, C. Sulpitius II. and C. Licinius. Diodorus in this wife, C. Sulpitius and C. Licinius. Signonius suppoeth they be the same, who three years before were Collegues. The Sicilian registers give unto Licinius the surname, not of Calvus as before, but of Stolo: and Sulpitius they surname Peticius.

394

C. Patellus Libo, M. Favius Ambulstus.

Livy, and Cassiodorus write the Consuls for this year were, C. Patellus Balbus and M. Favius Ambulstus. But Diodorus, M. Favius and C. Patellus, corruptly for Patellus. The Capitoll writers give them surnames divers from Livy: for they call Libo Vipulanus; but he Balbus. And the Sicilian registers go with those of the Capitoll.

395

M. Popilius Lanatus, Cn. Manlius.

Livy and Cassiodorus name this year Consuls in this sort: but Diodorus calleth them, M. Popilius Lanatus, and Cn. Manlius Imperatorius. This was the first man of the Popilii, surnamed Lanatus. The reason of which name Cicero reddereth in his book Brutus, saying, M. Popilius being Consul, and at the same time offering sacrifice in his robe called Lana, for that he was Flaminio Carmen: upon news brought unto him that the commons were up and risen in a commotion against the Nobles, came in that attire and habit as he was into the assembly: and what with his authority of countenance, and what with his eloquence of speech, appeased the sedition.

C. Fabius, C. Plantius.

Livy and Cassiodorus have these above-named for the Consuls this year: but in Diodorus they are named M. Fabius and C. Plotius. In the Capitoll records, M. Fabius and C. Plantius Proculus.

397

C. Martius, Cn. Manlius.

Diodorus, Livy, and Cassiodorus name the Consuls of this year, C. Martius and Cn. Manlius. This Cn. Manlius was Consul the first time, two years before. Cicpinus book and the Greek records have Rutilus and Capitolinus.

398

M. Fabius Ambustus II., M. Popilius Lanatus II.

This years Consuls are with these names entituled by Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus leaveth out their surnames and the numeral notes. Cicpinus book and the Greek records, let them thus down, Ambustus II. and Lanatus.

399

C. Sulpitius Peticus III., M. Valerius Poplicola.

In the four hundred year from the foundation of the City, and the thirty five after that it was by the Gauls won, the commons after eleven years did forgo their hold of the Consulship, and upon an Interregency, both Coll. of the Patritii entered into government, to wit, C. Sulpitius Peticus III., M. Valerius Poplicola, as Livy saith. The same Consuls Diodorus, Cassiodorus, and the Sicilian registers, do report. But why the account of time made by Livy, disagreeeth from this reckoning, Signonius and Omnipontius in his Kalendar do give a reason.

M. Fab. Ambustus III., T. Quintus, or M. Popilius.

In this year also, according to Livy, both Coll. were Patritii, namely, M. Fabius Ambustus the third time, with T. Quintus: although he writeth, that in some Annals instead of Titus Quintus, he found Marcus Popilius as Consul. With Livy accordeth Diodorus, and Cassiodorus, Solinus also: who in his forty one chapter out of Cornelius Nepos writeth, that Alexander was born when M. Fabius Ambustus, and T. Quintus these Capitoline were Consuls. Cicpinus book leteth forth Ambustus and Capitolinus. But these Consuls and those that follow are in the Sicilian registers concealed.

401

C. Sulpitius Peticus III., M. Valerius Poplicola III.

Both Consuls created this year were Patritii, and namely, those who are here set down, after Livy and Cassiodorus. Diodorus omitteth both their surnames, and also the numeral notes, and letteth after the former Consuls, M. Valerius and C. Sulpitius.

P. Valerius Poplicola, C. Martius Rutilus.

To L. Valerius Poplicola was given in fellowship of government this year, C. Martius Rutilus of the commons, as Livy saith. These Cassiodorus calleth P. Valerius and C. Martius Rutilus: the second time. Diodorus nameth them M. Fabius and P. Valerius. The Sicilian registers intermingling them confusedly with those of the next year, matching Rutilus and Pennus together.

403

C. Sulpitius Peticus, T. Quintus, or C. Quintus Pennus.

The Coll. for this year created were C. Sulpitius Peticus and T. Quintus Pennus. Some put to Quintinus the name Caso, others Cains. Livy and Cassiodorus name them thus, C. Sulpitius Peticus and T. Quintus Pennus: but Diodorus, C. Sulpitius and C. Quintinus.

M. Popilius Lanatus, L. Cornelius Scipio.

Livy writeth, that for Consuls this year the Commons yielded M. Popilius Lanatus, and the nobles L. Cornelius Scipio. Cassiodorus letteth them forth under the name of M. Popilius Lanatus the third time, and L. Cornelius Scipio. Diodorus nameth them, C. Cornelius and M. Popilius: and the Sicilian registers barely Scipio and Lanatus.

M. Fabius Camillus, P. Claudius Crassus.

M. Fabius Camillus the Dictator restored the nobles again to their former possession of the Consulship: and being himself for that good dementie created Consul, with the great love and hearty affection of the nobles, nominated for his Colleague, Publius Claudius Crassus. Thus saith Livy. The same Consuls are let down by Cassiodorus. But Diodorus, nameth them Aemilius and T. Quintus. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Crassus. Cicero in Clau maketh mention of these Consuls, saying, that Plato came to Tarentum, when L. Camillus and P. Claudius were Consuls: Gellius likewise book 11 chapter.

406

M. Valerius Corvinus, M. Popilius Lanatus III.

M. Valerius Corvinus being Dictator, created for Consul with the exceeding favour of the people, M. Valerius Corvinus (for that was his surname afterwards) in his absence, and being but three and twenty years old. This Corvinus had joyed with him in the Consulship from out of the commons. M. Popilius Lanatus the third time, as saith Livy and Cassiodorus. But Diodorus three years after nominateth M. Valerius and M. Popilius. In the fragment of the Capitoll thus only it is found, M. Valerius, M. F. M. N. Corvinus Consul. In the Sicilian registers Corvinus and Lanatus.

T. Manlius Torquatus, C. Plantius.

Livy and Cassiodorus nameth them for Consuls this year, Cicpinus Kalendar and the Sicilian records, Torquatus and Pennus. In a fragment of the Capitoll there is to be read the surname of Manlius Imperatorius Torquatus.

408

M. Valerius Corvinus II., C. Patellus.

These are named Consuls by Livy, and Cassiodorus: but Cicpinus Kalendar and the registers of Sicily shew for Consuls, Corvinus and Libo. As for the name C. Patellus, it is described by his Dictatorship, which (according to the Capitoll evidences) he bare in the year 440: for in a fragment (testifying his Consulship) there appeareth no more but one of his surnames Vipulanus.

M. Fabius Dorso, Ser. Sulpitius Camerinus.

These were the Consuls created for this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. Diodorus also (although not in the right place) allegeth M. Fabius and Ser. Sulpitius Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Dorso and Camerinus. Both these Consuls were Patritii, which Livy omitted.

410

C. Mart. Rutilus III., T. Manlius Torquatus II.

Livy and Cassiodorus avow these for Coll. this year. Diodorus likewise delivereth unto us, C. Martius and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers, Rutilus and Torquatus. Frontinus also in his second book of Stratagems speaketh of them.

411

M. Valerius Corvinus II., A. Cornelius Cossus. Livy and Cassiodorus both together report, that these were chosen Coll. for this year. Diodorus, Cicero in his book of Divination, and Frontinus nameth them, M. Valerius and A. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Valerius and Cossus: both of them are Patritii. But he that hath written of famous men, calleth them, Valerius Max. and Cornelius Cossus.

TITUS

412
C. Martius Rutilius IV. Q. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus declare Coff. for this year, C. Martius and Q. Servilius, Diodorus, Q. Servilius and Martius Rutilius. The Sicilian registers, Athala and Rutilius. This is that Q. Servilius Athala who was Master of the horse in the 403 year.

413
C. Plantius II. L. Emilius Mamercinus.

The Consuls that followed, were C. Plantius the second time, and L. Emilius Mamercinus, as witness Livy and Cassiodorus; but L. Emilius & C. Plantius, as testifieth Diodorus; and as the Sicilian registers say, Vennus and Mamercinus. Cuspinian Ralendar set forth for this year, Vennus the second time, and Mamercinus.

T. Manlius Torquatus III. P. Decius Mus.

This Manlius Torquatus the third time, and P. Decius Mus, bare the Consulship this year, as Livy and Cassiodorus report, Diodorus nameth them, T. Manlius Torquatus and P. Decius. The Sicilian registers, Torquatus and Manlius. Zonaras, Torquatus the third time, and Decius. Of the same Consuls Pliny speaketh in his 27 book and 5 chap. Valerius also in his 1 book and 5 chap. besides others.

415
T. Emilius Mamercinus. Q. Publilius Philo.

This Emilius Mamercinus, and Q. Publilius Philo, are by Livy reckoned Coff. for this year. Diodorus passeth over their surnames. The Greek records shew unto us, Mamercinus and Philo. As for Philo, he is described out of the tables of the Capitoll.

L. Furius Camillus. C. Manius.

Thus say Livy and Cassiodorus, Diodorus hath L. Furius and Publius, but corruptly The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Manius. The Capitoll monuments of triumphs, L. Furius Camillus, and C. Manius. Pliny in his 34 book and 5 chap. maketh mention of Caius Manius, Consul.

417
C. Sulpitius Longus. P. Elms Pais.

Livy and Cassiodorus write, that these Coff. followed, Diodorus putteth down C. Sulpitius, and L. Papius. The Sicilian registers, have Longus and Pais.

418
L. Papius Crassus. K. Dintius.

Livius Papius Crassus, and K. Dintius, were in this years Coff. as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and Diodorus also, but for leaving out the surname Crassus. In the Sicilian registers they are named, Crassus and Dintius. As touching these Consuls, Cicero in his Epistle to Papirius writeth thus, L. Papius Crassus, four years after he was Dictator, was made Consul with K. Dintius.

M. Valerius Corvus III. M. Atilius Regulus.

This year, when the Aunones that inhabited the City Cales, took arms and combined with the Sidicins, M. Valerius Corvus, a right noble General, was created Consul the fourth time, having to his Colleague (as Livy writeth) M. Atilius Regulus. Cassiodorus likewise declareth the same for Consuls: and so doth Diodorus, but that he leaveth out their surnames: which appear extant in the Sicilian registers.

T. Veturius. Sp. Posthumius.

The Dictator held an assembly for the election of Consuls, wherein were created (according to Livy) these above-named. So say Cassiodorus also and Diodorus. Zonaras nameth them Tiber. Calvinius, and Sp. Posthumius: and right well, as Sigonius thinketh: for Tiberius was the fore-name of the Veturii. The Greek records, and Cuspinian book, have Albinius and Calvinius.

Interregius, all one year.

Sigonius and Onuphrius infer this one year without Consuls, besides the account of the years, according to the Capitoll monuments, albeit they see neither in Livy, nor in any other, mention thereof; and all to make up the total sum collected by Varro. And that the said year should at this time especially be interposed, the tables of the Capitoll records do shew. For whereas in them thus engraven it is, M. Valerius Corvus Consul the fourth time, in the year of the City 419, and again L. Emilius and C. Plantius, in the year 414: to the end that these records might agree one with another, of necessity there must be put a year between. For leave out that, then both L. Emilius the Consul should fall upon the year 414, and the total sum of the year in Varro and the Capitoll tables be overthrown. That this odd year was now above all other times to be cast between, Gregory Haloander (who left in writing a Chronology of the Consuls) saw long before them: for he over-passed this year wholly, noted without Consuls. But Sigonius and Onuphrius are of opinion, that this year there was an Anarchy, and the Common-wealth without Consuls, or other Magistrates of state, by occasion of the pettience, whereof Livy writeth.

422
A. Cornelius II. Cn. Domitius.

Aulus Cornelius the second time Cof. with Cn. Domitius is by Livy and Cassiodorus set down down. Diodorus nameth them A. Cornelius and C. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calvinius and Coffus.

M. Claudius Marcellus. C. Valerius.

After this, were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and C. Valerius, as Livy and Cassiodorus report. In Diodorus also they be set down by the name of C. Valerius, and M. Claudius. Livy saith, that he findeth in the Annals, the surnames of Valerius diversly put down, namely, Flaccus and Potius. Orosius calleth these Consuls, Claudius Marcellus, and Valerius Flaccus: The Sicilian registers, Potius and Marcellus. Sigonius and Onuphrius retain their surnames, that it may seem, how to the old surname Potius of the House Valeria, this new surname of Flaccus is a later addition.

L. Papirius Crassus II. L. Plantius Vennus.

These Consuls are by Livy and Cassiodorus recited this year. Diodorus concealeth their surnames. The Sicilian registers, make them known by the names of Crassus and Vennus.

L. Emilius Mamercinus. C. Plantius.

Next to them (according to Livy and Cassiodorus) were L. Emilius Mamercinus, and C. Plantius created Consuls. Diodorus nominateth L. Papius with L. Plautius. The Sicilian registers, Mamercinus and Decianus. How both these are to be described, their triumphs upon record in the Capitoll do evidently shew. These Consuls entered upon their government the first day of July.

P. Plautius Proculus. P. Cornelius Scapula.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down [for Consuls] P. Plautius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scapula. Diodorus, P. Cornelius and A. Posthumius. The Sicilian registers, Vennus and Scipio. Onuphrius thinketh this Plautius ought to be forenamed not Publius but Caius: who in his Consulship which he bare afterwards with Appius Cæcus, was surnamed Venox (as Frontinus suppoeth) for finding certain springs and veins of water within the earth.

427
C. Plantius Proculus. Q. Publilius Philo II.

Livy and Cassiodorus match together in the Consulship for this year, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Publilius Philo. Diodorus, L. Cornelius and Q. Publilius. The Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Philo.

428
L. Papirius Mugillanus Cursor. C. Petellius.

Caius Petellius and L. Papius are by Livy, nominated consuls this year, C. Postumius

the third time, and L. Papius Mugillanus, by Cassiodorus. Solinus maketh mention of these Consuls in his five and thirtieth chapter. As for Papirius, Livy indeed surnameth him here Mugillanus, but he saith that he findeth him in other Annals by the name of Cursor. In the Greek records they be Lily and Cursor. Now as touching C. Petellius, he is to be written with the numeral note II, and not III, as Sigonius and Onuphrius do admonish. For it is not the same man who was Consul in the 393 year; but his son.

L. Furius Camillus II. Junius Brutus Scæva.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down for consuls, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Junius Brutus Scæva. Diodorus, L. Furius, and D. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Camillus and Brutus.

430

Livius Furius, unto whom the charge of Sammnis fell by lot, furnished by occasion of sickness to forgo the war there, and was commanded to nominate for the managing of martial affairs a Dictator: whereupon he pronounced L. Papius Cursor, the bravest warrior in those dates; by whom Q. Fabius Rullianus was named great Master of the horse. Afterwards, Cursor turned him out of that Mastership of horse, because without his warrant he had fought (although it were fortunately) against the Sammis when himself was out of the way and gone to Rome for to take the Auspices anew: and in his room he substituted L. Papius Crassus. Thus write Livy, Entropius, and Valerius in the second book.

431
C. Sulpitius Longus II. Q. Aemilius [L. Aulus] Cæcilius.

Livius Papirius the Dictator, before he left his Magistracy, created Consuls, C. Sulpitius Longus II, and Q. Aemilius Cæcilius. Some Annals have Aulus. Thus much Livy. In like manner the Sicilian registers have Longus and Cæcilius. But Diodorus corruptly for Aulus hath Ælius.

Q. Fabius. L. Fulvius.

Livy and Cassiodorus deliver unto us for Consuls this year, Q. Fabius and L. Fulvius; whom the Capitoll records of the triumphs name Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, and L. Fulvius Corvus. Marcellus it is therefore, that in the Sicilian registers, they are put down, Cursor and Sylla.

T. Veturius Calvinius. Sp. Posthumius.

This year Livy and Cassiodorus set forth for Consuls, T. Veturius Calvinius and Sp. Posthumius. Cicero in his third book of Offices writeth, that they were twice Coff. Zonaras calleth callect the one of them T. Calpurnius, by a familiar forename unto that house and kindred of the Veturii. The Greek records exhibit unto us Calpurnius and Albinus. Of these consuls as also of the Caudine peace, Cicero in his book of old age; Pliny also in his book of famous men, Gellius in his 7th book and 21 chap; Florus in his 1st book and 16 chap. and Orosius in his 3rd book and 15 chap. do make mention;

434

L. Pappius Cursor II. C. Publilius Philo.

L. Ioy and Cassiodorus shew for this years Consuls, Q. Publilius Philo and L. Pappius Cursor, the second time. The Sicilian registers Cursor and Philo. But that this Philo should now be third Consul, his Consulships do plainly shew.

435

L. Pappius Cursor or Mugillanus,
Q. Annius Cerecillus II.

L. Ioy saith, there is some doubt, whether L. Pappius Cursor were this year created Consul the third time, with Q. Annius Cerecillus the second time: and for his good service in war at Luceria, continued still in government; or rather L. Pappius Mugillanus, and so the surname was mistaken. Cassiodorus delivereth unto us L. Pappius and Q. Annius Cerecillus. The Sicilian registers, Pappius and Cerecillus. The monument of his triumph in the Capitoll, alloweth of Cursor and not Mugillanus. The author of that book which Cassiodorus hath set forth, following other Annals, letteth down Mugillanus.

436

M. Felsius Flaccinator, L. Plautius Venno.

Seeing that for twelve years next ensuing, we have the Capitoline tables whole and found, the less trouble we need to be at in reforming and redressing the names of the Magistrates. Both they, and also Livy with Cassiodorus represent unto us for this years consuls, M. Felsius Flaccinator and L. Plautius Venno. Diodorus calleth them L. Plotius and judex. The Sicilian registers, Venno and Flaccius.

437

C. Junius Bubulcus, Q. Emilius Barbula.
Cassiodorus putteth down C. Junius and Q. Emilius Barbula for Consuls. Livy, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Quintus Emilius Barbula. A. Rone in the Capitoll, Q. Emilius Barbula, and C. Junius Bubulcus Bruns.

438

Sp. Nautius, M. Popilius.

Next follow in order Sp. Nautius and M. Popilius Consuls, according to Livy and Cassiodorus. Rutilius and Lenax their surnames, are by Sigonius restored unto them: and the same also are to be seen in the Sicilian books of record.

L. Pappius Cursor III. Q. Publilius Philo III.

The Consuls names of this year, through the default of the writers that copied forth Livy's books, are there left out: namely, L. Pappius Cursor the fourth time, and Q. Publilius Philo likewise the fourth time: as it is written in Cassiodorus, in the Capitoll tables, and in Cassiodorus book, wherein they are named Cursor and Philo. Howbeit, in the Sicilian registers they are called Cursor and Lenax.

440

M. Petelius, C. Sulpitius.

L. Ioy and Cassiodorus report for Consuls this year C. Sulpitius and M. Petelius. But Diodorus hath C. Sulpitius and judex. The Capitoline writers, have M. Petelius Libo and C. Sulpitius Longus the third time. The Sicilian registers, Longus and aquius, but there is a fault, as Sigonius truly thinketh.

L. Pappius Cursor V. C. Junius Bubulcus.

Diodorus putteth down for Consuls this year L. Pappius fifth time, and C. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Cursor and Bubulcus. But Livy and Cassiodorus, L. Pappius Cursor V. and C. Junius Bubulcus II. Festus maketh mention also of these Consuls in his 18 book.

442

M. Valerius, C. Decius.

L. Ioy writeth that there followed consuls M. Valerius Max. and P. Decius but Cassiodorus, saith M. Valerius and P. Decius. Frontinus in his book of water-conduits, speaketh of these Consuls: whom he writeth to have been thirty years after the beginning of the Samnites war. As for P. Decius, Livy afterwards calleth Mus. The Sicilian registers have Max and Mus.

C. Junius Bubulcus III. Q. Emilius Barbula II.

We find in Livy for Consuls this year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second time: likewise in Cassiodorus. But Diodorus nameth them C. Junius and Q. Emilius. In the Sicilian registers, Bubulcus and Barbula. The same names are also in the Capitoll monuments; which be in Livy.

C. Martius Rutilius, Q. Fabius.

C. Aius Martius Rutilius and Q. Fabius be this years Consuls in Livy. But in Cassiodorus, C. Martius Rutilius and Q. Fabius the second time. Diodorus hath C. Martius and Q. Fabius the second time. The Sicilian registers shew Rutius and and Rutius. The Capitoll monuments, Q. Fabius, Max, Rutilius the second time, and C. Martius, who afterwards in his second Consulship in the 498 year, is surnamed Conferrius.

A year without Consuls, P. Pappius Dictator II.

Verrinus Flaccus interpoiseth this year also without Consuls, wherein he reporteth L. Pappius Dictator the 2 time, with C. Junius Bubulcus Bruns the Master of the horle. This year Diodorus, Livy, the Greek records, Cassiodorus book and Cassiodorus do overlap. For Livy writeth that L. Pappius Cursor was nominated by the consull Dictator, and by him C. Junius Bubulcus named Master of the horle: upon occasion that C. Martius the Cos. had no good fortune in his conduct of the wars in Samnium. This inferring of one year Onuphrius hath approved, that the computation of the years gathered by Varro might stand in force, which to the Capitoll tables putteth one year, whose judgment we also are willing to follow.

Q. Fabius, P. Decius.

L. Ioy writeth, that Fabius continued Consul this year also, for his singular good service in subduing and taming Heturia: and that he had for his companion in government Decius. Cassiodorus acknowledgeth for Cos. Q. Fabius the third time, and P. Decius the second time. Diodorus, P. Decius and Q. Fabius. The Sicilian registers Mus and Rutius. The Capitoline tables, P. Decius Max I. and Q. Fabius Max. Rutius the third time.

447

App. Claudius, L. Voluminius.

L. Ioy saith, that immediately there followed Consuls, App. Claudius and L. Voluminius, Cassiodorus and Diodorus, Appius and Volens. The Sicilian registers, App. Claudius Cacus and L. Voluminius. The Capitoline monuments have Flamma and Volens. Now whether one of these Consuls surnames be Volens or Violens, Onuphrius advertiseth us to consider. For the capitoll stone hath it alwaies written Volens. But the Greek words have Appius and Volens: as if the name were Violens.

448

Q. Martius Tremulus, P. Cornelius Arvins.

L. Ioy and Cassiodorus register for the Consuls of this year, Q. Martius Tremulus, with a Colleague adjoynd unto him, Diodorus saith Q. Martius and P. Cornelius. The Sicilian records, Tremulus and Arvins.

449

L. Posthumius, T. Minutius.
L. Posthumius and T. Minutius are reported consuls by Diodorus, Livy and Cassiod.

Cassiodorus book sheweth, Megellus and Augurinus. These Consuls, doth L. Piso put down for to succeed Q. Fabius and P. Decius, leaving out those two years wherein we have set down (as Livy writeth) that Claudius with Voluminius, and Cornelius with Martius were consuls. Whether his memory failed him in digetting of the annals, or of purpose he supposed that those two couple of Consuls were not truly recorded, and therefore overlapt them, I know not. A fragment there is of the Capitoline stone, which sheweth for this year, Megellus to be the surname of Posthumius, Tiberius the forename of Minutius, and M. of Fulvius. Now the surnames of Fulvius were curvus and Petunus as it appeareth written in his triumph.

P. Sempronius Sophus, P. Sulpitius Saverrius.

The Consuls next following were P. Sulpitius Saverrius, and P. Sempronius Sophus, according to Livy and Cassiodorus. In Diodorus they are written P. Sulpitius and P. Sempronius. In the Greek registers, they stand Sempronius and Saverrius. Pliny writeth of these Consuls in his 33 book: but Sempronius he calleth Longus. Both of them are described thus by their triumphs, appearing upon record in the Capitoll for in their Consulship there is no more to be seen but Sophus and Pablinus.

451

L. Genutius, Ser. cornellinus.

Diodorus, Livy and Cassiodorus report for Cos. this year, L. Genutius, and Ser. cornellinus. The Sicilian registers have Aventinensis and Lenulus. The Capitoline writers put unto cornellinus the surname of Lenulus.

452

M. Livius Denter, M. Emilius.

L. Ioy nameth for Consuls this year M. Livius and c. Emilius, Cassiodorus, M. Livius and L. Emilius, Diodorus, M. Livius and M. Emilius. As for the forename Emilius, Sigonius and Onuphrius do think that more credit is to given unto Diodorus, than others: especially, seeing that in Livy there is mention made the year following of M. Emilius Paulus General of the horsemen, whom they all think to be the same man that this Consul, M. Livius is written Denter in the Capitoll records, which surname Livy in another place addeth to the Livy, Cassiodorus book in like manner setteth down Denter and Pantus as the surnames of these Consuls. The Sicilian registers, Denter and Emilius.

Two Dictators, and no Consul.

This year also of two Dictators without Consuls, Onuphrius inferreth in his Kalender, howbeit directed thereto by evidence of the Capitoll fragments: to the end that the calculation of Varro might agree in all respects; which, which, if this year were over-slipped should be wholly overturned: although Diadore, Livy, and Cassiodorus dissent therefrom, and leave out this year altogether. Whereof see Onuphrius more at large in his Kalender upon this year 453.

M. Valerius, Q. Apuleius Pansa.

Immediately after M. Livius and M. Aemilius, Livy, and Cassiodorus leteth pass the year of two Dictators without Consuls, bring in M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius Pansa for Consuls. The Greek records shew Corvinus and Pansa. It seemeth that Livy by Marcus Valerius meaneth Maximus, for that he saith that presently upon his Dictatorship he was made Cof. Now that M. Valerius Max. was Dictator the year before, he writeth plainly.

455
M. Fulvius Patru, T. Manlius Torquatus.

Livy, and Cassiodorus declare for Consuls this year, M. Fulvius Patru and T. Manlius Torquatus. The Sicilian registers have Patru and Torquatus. Livy saith that Q. Fabius refused the Consulship offered unto him without any suit of his. But T. Manlius the Consul, was by lot appointed to levy war against Herrania, which took arms and prepared for war against the truce accorded upon. Now was he scarce well entered into the enemies confines, but as he exercised among men of arms, and chanced to turn about his horse upon a full carrier, he was cast from his back: whereupon (for the present) he lay for dead, and within three daies after the said fall ended his life. Then all the Centuries in general by their suffrages chose M. Valerius Cof., whom the Senat purposed to have made Dictator. Thus much Livy. By M. Valerius he meaneth Corvus, whom Cicero writeth in his book of old age, and Valerius Max. in his 7 book and 48 Chap. to have been Cof. now the sixt time, and that between this and the first there were 46 years, although Plutarch in the life of C. Marius saith, they were but 45. Howbeit all of them call him Corvinus and not Corvus.

L. Cornelius Scipio, Cn. Fulvius.

C. Nens Fulvius and L. Cornelius Scipio are recorded Consuls by Livy and Cassiodorus: but Scipio and Centumalus, by Cuspinianus book: Scipio and Maximus by the Greek records.

457
Q. Fabius Max. IV., P. Decius Mus III.

Livy and Cassiodorus alledge for Cof. this year, Q. Fabius Max. the fourth time, and P. Decius Mus thrice. The same Cof. Cuspinianus book and the Greek records delivered unto us. The author that writeth of famous men, and Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, speak of P. Decius thrice Consul.

L. Postumius, Appius Claudius.

L. Postumius a Commoner, and Appius Claudius of noble blood, were created Cof. this year: even the same men who in their former Consulship were matched together, as Livy and Cassiodorus write: but in the Sicilian registers they are found written, Claudius and Videtur. Howbeit, Cicero in his book entitled Caesetopontis, that between the two Consulships of Livy and Cicero were ten years.

Q. Fabius P., P. Decius IV.

Livy and Cassiodorus both witness, that the Cof. next following, were Q. Fabius the first time, and P. Decius the 4 time, who had been companions together already in 2 Consulats and in one Censorship. The Sicilian registers have Rullus and Mus: of which Consuls Cicero speaketh very often; Valer. Max. likewise, Plutarch also. Plutarch, Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, the author of the book of famous men, Ennius, Orosius, and others: who all report, that the Cof. P. Decius, following the example of his father, offered himself to die for the Roman legions, and by his death purchased a notable victory to the people of Rome.

460
L. Postumius Megellus, M. Atilius Regulus.

The Cof. next following, were L. Postumius Megellus, and M. Atilius Regulus, as Livy and Cassiodorus write. In the Sicilian records, their surnames are Megellus and Regulus.

L. Papirius Cursor, Sp. Carvilius.

A Free Livy and Cassiodorus, the Cof. this year were L. Papirius Cursor and Sp. Carvilius. After the Sicilian registers, Cursor & Max. A stone in the Capitol maketh mention of Papirius the son of L. nephew of P. surnamed Cursor, whom Livy writeth to be the son of Papirius 5 times Cof. Of these Cof. Pliny of Perona maketh mention in his 7 book and 60 chap. Val. Max. likewise in his 7 book and 1 chap. Vellius in his 2 book: and the same Livy in the year 456.

462
Q. Fabius Gurges Max., Decius Junius Brutus, son of Scævola.

The year following had Consuls, Q. Fabius Gurges, and D. Junius Brutus Scæva, as witness Livy and Cassiodorus. Zonaras nameth them, Junius Brutus and Q. Fabius Max. Cuspinianus Kalender, Maximus and Scæva. The Sicilian registers, Brutus and Maximus. Livy, Pliny in his 7 books, the Capitoll tables, and Zonaras, have delivered, that this Fabius was the son of Q. Max. Rullianus, who had been 5 times Cof. before. And here an end of the Consuls for the first 463

L. Posthumius, C. Junius.

Since that after this Consulship, ten books of Livy next ensuing be lost, whom hitherto we have had for the most sufficient witness of this story, so as now we are in manner destitute and deprived of the best helps of Annals, namely, Didorus, Dionysius, and Livy: from hence forward we will use principally in digetting and reckoning the years by the Consuls, the authority and testimony of Cassiodorus, the Sicilian records, and Cuspinianus book: yet will we not in the mean while reject what help soever shall be ministred unto us by others. For this year therefore Cassiodorus writeth, that L. Posthumius and C. Junius, were created Cof. whole surnames, Megellus, and Brutus Bubulcius, have not been left out so much as in Cuspinianus Kalender, nor in the Sicilian records. Livy also maketh mention of them in his 28 book, saying thus, Lu. Postumius Megellus the Interregent, was created Cof. with C. Bubulcius, by that very court and assembly which himself called and held.

464
P. Cornelius Rufinus, M. Curius Dentatus

The Cof. this year are recorded by Cassiodorus, Pub. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus for whom in the Sicilian registers appear Maximus the third time, and Mus the sixth time. But of those forenamed Cof. Cicero maketh mention in his first book, entitled Cato; Plutarchus in his first book, Valerius Max. in his first book and 3 chap. Pliny also in his 7 book and 50 chap. Now this M. Curius was called Dentatus, as Pliny writeth in his 6 book and 16 chap. for that he came into the world with teeth.

465
M. Valerius, Q. Cædinius.

Marcus Valerius and Q. Cædinius were afterwards Cof., as saith Cassiodorus. The old book of Cuspinianus putteth to them the surnames of Corvinus and Nellius: which in the Sicilian registers are overpassed. The Greek records shew unto us, Maximus and Mus: for Maximus was a surname also of the Valerii Corvini.

466
Q. Martius, P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth for Consuls, Q. Martius and P. Cornelius, Cuspinianus book and the Greek records add their surnames, Tremulus II. and Arvinius II. who had been Consuls together once before.

467
M. Marcellus, Sp. Nautius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, M. Marcellus and Cn. Nautius. The Greek records and Cuspinianus book, have Marcellus and Rutilius.

468
M. Valerius, C. Atilius.

Marcus Valerius and C. Atilius are ranged in this year for Cof. by Cassiodorus, Cuspinianus book putteth forth, Maximus and Pains: but the Greek records, Potius and Pains. Now you must think, that both Maximus and Potius are the surnames of the Valerii.

469
C. Claudius, M. Aemilius.

For this years Cof. Cassiodorus hath C. Claudius and M. Aemilius. The Greek records and Cuspinianus book, Caminus & Lepidus: whereof the former is the surname of Claudius, the latter of Aemilius.

G. Servilius, L. Cæcilius.

By Cassiodorus, C. Servilius and L. Cæcilius Metellus are placed Cof. in this year: for whereas in some copies of Cassiodorus, instead of Lu. Cæcilius, is written Cælius that is a fault: as Sigonius and Onuphrius have noted. To Servilius this Consil, the Greek records add the surname of Turca, whom they put down Cof. with Dentatus, they would say Dentatus, as both Sigonius and Onuphrius suppose. For Dentatus is a surname also given to the Cæcilius, as appeareth by Livy.

P. Cornelius Dolabella, Cn. Domitius.

Cassiodorus intereth P. Corn. Dolabella, and Cn. Domitius for Cof. Cuspinianus Kalender hath Dolabella and Calvus. The Sicilian registers, Dolabella Maximus. And some think that Maximus was the surname of Dolabella, which he seemeth to have acquired by the honour that he had won in the war against the Gauls.

472
C. Fabricius, Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in for Cof. C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: but the Sicilian registers, Luscinus and Papirius. Of them Cicero in his book Lelius, maketh mention in this manner: We see that Papirius Aemilius was familiarly acquainted with C. Luscinus: for so we have heard our fathers say, that they were two Cof. together, and companions in the censorship. Moreover, Valerius in his chap. where he treateth of Poverty, maketh mention of C. Fabricius, and Q. Aemilius Papirius. This Aemilius, Plutarch in his Parallels calleth corruptly by the name of Paulus.

473
L. Aemilius, Q. Martius.

Here followed cof. as Cassiodorus sheweth, L. Aemilius & Q. Martius unto whom Cuspinianus book and the Greek records give also to their surnames, Babula and Philippus: and the same also is evident by the records in the Capitoll of their triumphs.

474
P. Valerius, T. Cornucaninus.

Pub. Valerius and T. Cornucaninus are by Cassiodorus placed in this year for Coss. The Greek records, Cyprianus book, Florus, Orosius, and Eutropius, give to Valerius the surname of Lavinus. And Plutarch hath a Libor for M. Bibor.

475
P. Sulpitius, P. Decimus.

Next after thole, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Sulpitius Consul with P. Decimus. The Sicilian registers, have Savennius and Mus, Cicero in his 2 book entitled De Fin, and in his Tullian disputation, faith, That this Pub. Decimus was the son of that P. Decimus who vowed himself to death in the Samnits and Gauls war.

476
C. Fabricius, Q. Aemilius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls C. Fabricius and Q. Aemilius: whom Cyprianus book and the Greek records, call Lucius the second time, and Papius. That these were fellows together once before in the Consular, Cicero writeth in his book Lelius, Plutarch in Pyrrhus Gellius 3 book, chap. 8, Eutropius, and Zonaras, make report of the same.

477
P. Cornelius, C. Junius.

Pub. Cornelius and C. Junius, are rehearsed for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. Cyprianus book hath Rufinus the second time, and Brutus. The Greek records, Rufinus, Of P. Rufinus twice Coss. in his 2 book Of a perfect Orator, Valerius, in his 2 book, and 4 chap. Gellius in his 4 book, and 8 chap. in his 17 book likewise and 21 chap. and last of all Frontinus in his book of Stratagems, make mention.

478
Q. Fabius, C. Gentius.

Cassiodorus reporteth Q. Fabius and C. Gentius Consuls. The Sicilian registers have Gurgus and Clepsina. Of these Coss. Orosius maketh mention in this wife: When Fabius Gurgus was the second time Coss. with C. Gentius Clepsina, a grievous pestilence reigned both in this City, and also in the territory about it.

479
M. Curius, L. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus and Eutropius deliver unto us for Coss. M. Curius and L. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers, Dentatus and Lentulus. This is the third Consul of M. Curius, which together with Lentulus Consulship, is drawn out of the Capitol records of triumph this year.

480
Serv. Cornelius, M. Curius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Coss. Servius Cornelius and M. Curius. Cyprianus book and the Greek records, Merenda & Dentatus the third time. This M. Curius is now Coss. the fourth time, for thrice he was before. Concerning this Serv. Cornelius Merenda, Pliny relateth and writeth, that he received a princely coronet of gold at the hands of L. Lentulus the Coss. of the former year, for winning a town of the Samnits.

C. Fabricius, C. Claudius.

Cassiodorus setteth down, C. Fabricius and C. Claudius Consuls: the Sicilian records, Licinius and Canina: Cyprianus Kalender, Licinius and Cinna, Eutropius, Fabius Licinius, and C. Claudius Canina. Velleius, Fabius Dorso and Claudius Canina. Whereby it may be understood, that these Consuls were called, C. Fabius Dorso Licinius, and Caius Claudius Canina: for Dorso was an old name of the Fabii.

L. Papirius Cursor, Sp. Carvilius.

Next after them, Cassiodorus nominateth for Coss. Sp. Carvilius and L. Papirius Cursor. The records both of Sicily and Cyprianus, have Cursor and Maximus. Both these were now Coss. the second time, as appeareth by their triumphs: upon record in the Capitol. Frontinus speaketh of them in his book of water-conditions, and Livy in his 24 book.

483
C. Quintus, L. Genutius.

It is reported by Cassiodorus, that C. Quintus and L. Genutius were Consuls, Cyprianus book and the Greek records, Livy in his 17 book speaketh of one T. Quintus Janus of one leg, from whom haply this surname is drawn.

484
C. Gentius, Cn. Cornelius.

Reported there are for Consuls this year by Cassiodorus, C. Genucius and Cn. Cornelius: whose surnames were C. Genucius and Blasio, as it appeareth in Cyprianus book. This Cn. Genucius is the same, who before-time was Consul. As for C. Blasio, he is described by his Consulship standing upon record in the Capitol. The Greek records over-pais them both.

485
P. Sempronius, or after Q. Ogulphus
App. Claudius, } some, } Fabius Pictor.

After Cornelius and Genucius Consules, Cassiodorus bringeth in Pub. Sempronius, and App.

App. Claudius, and of purpose over-skippeth Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor, Zonaras, Q. Gulo and C. Fabius. Of them speaketh Eutropius saying: When Q. Gulo and Fabius Pictor were Consuls, the Picenians raised war; and by the Consuls next following, to wit, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, they were vanquished. Pliny also in his 33 book and 3 chap. When Q. Fabius (quoth he) was Consul, silver was coined and stamped for money, five years before the (second) Punic war. These Consuls, Velleius also reckoneth in his first book. But Sigenius and Onuphrius adventure us, that the book of Eutropius is very faulty in one of these Consuls, and that in lieu of Quin. Gulo, it should be read Q. Ogulphus: for of this Gulo, there is in no place besides, any mention: so as they would have, that it should be Q. Ogulphus, son of L. nephew of A. surnamed Gallus, who a little before was sent in embassy to Ptolemus. And it falleth out passing well, that they should match Ogulphus a commoner, with Fabius a Patrician. Also Onuphrius testifieth, that in the most ancient hand-written books of Eutropius, the name is found of Ogulphus. And, as both the Greek records, and also Zonaras, together with the more ancient and perfect copies of Eutropius, agree to this his judgment: so Hubertus Goltzius likewise in his Catalogue of Consuls, embraceth the same: and that which maketh most for the purpose, the old antiquities of coin-writings as much. But in the mean while this is worth the observation, that oftentimes in the most ancient pieces of money, the letter C is written for G: as for example here, Ocul, Cal, for Ogul, Galba.

286
P. Sempronius, App. Claudius.

Seeing that we settle the Consulship of the Sotomer year, in Ogulphus and Fabius Pictor, and that upon the authority of Eutropius, the Greek records, Cyprianus, Zonaras, Onuphrius, and others: we will set down for this years Consuls, P. Sempronius and App. Claudius, whom Pellerin in his first book calleth, Sempronius Sophus, and Appius the son of Cacus. The Greek records, Sempronius Rufus Sophus: and Cyprianus book Rufus. Moreover, this also Goltzius giveth us to understand, that the surname of this Sempronius is in old peeces of coin found written without an aspiration [Sophus] which is no rare thing to be seen in such antiquities: for we read in others of them, Philipus, Tampilus, Gracius, Pulcer, Triumpus, for Philipus, Tampilus, Gracchus, Pulcher, Triumpus, and such like.

487
M. Attilius, L. Julius Libo.

Eutropius putteth down for Consuls, M. Attilius and L. Julius Libo. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Libo. Cassiodorus, M. Attilius and L. Libo. And both of them are taken forth of the records of capitol triumphs.

D. Junius, 488
N. Fabius.

Cassiodorus reporteth for Coss. this year, D. Junius and N. Fabius: the Sicilian registers, Pansa and Pictor: the capitol record of triumphs, D. Junius son of D. nephew of D. surnamed Pansa, and N. Fabius son of C. nephew of M. surnamed Pictor. Upon what occasion these Fabii took the surname of Pictor, Pliny sheweth in his 35 book chap. 4. Pictor, Max. in his 4 book and 3 chap. seemeth to note and signify, that Fabius Gurgus and N. Fab. Pictor, lived at one and the same time.

489
Q. Fabius M. Cimius, L. Mamilius Vitulus.

This year also Cassiodorus passeth over. The Greek records shew, Maximus and Vitulus, Zonaras, Q. Fabius, and Aemilius (no doubt) for Mamilius, by some error and fault of the copies. Cyprianus out of some old books delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fab. Maximus and L. Mamilius. Onuphrius thinketh, that Q. Pub. Maximus Gurgus was now thrice Consul.

490
App. Claudius, M. Fulvius.

Besides the capitol monuments, Polybius in his first book maketh mention of these Consuls, Gellius also, who calleth them thus, App. Claudius brother of Cacus surnamed Caudex, and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. In like manner Livy, Paternulus, and Pliny in his book of famous men: as also Appianus, Florus, Frontinus in his 1 book of Stratagems, Eutropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

M. Valerius, M. Oracilius.

Cassiodorus and Eutropius shew unto us that M. Valerius and M. Oracilius were Consuls. Zonaras nameth Valerius Max. and Oracilius Crassus, Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian records, Max. Messala and Crassus. Of these Consuls, Ver. Flaccus Polybius, Cassiodorus, Eutropius, and Macrobius out of Varro make report: As for Macrobius, he rendereth a reason, why M. Valerius was in this government of his named Messala: and Pliny likewise in his sixth book and five and thirtieth chapter.

L. Posthumus, Q. Mamilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for next Consuls, L. Posthumus and Q. Mamilius. Zonaras nameth them, Posthumus Albinus and Quintus Mamilius. The Sicilian registers, Albinus and Vitulus: but the capitol monuments, L. Posthumus son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, surnamed Megallus, and Q. Mamilius son of Q. nephew of M. surnamed Vitulus.

L. Valerius. 493 T. Otacilius.

Polybius and Cassiodorus match together in the Consul for this year L. Valerius and T. Otacilius: (the surname of Valerius is Flaccus, and of Otacilius, Crassus, as it appeareth upon the capitol and Sicilian records, Cn. Cornelius. 494 C. Drilius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras bring in for Coss. Cn. Cornelius and C. Drilius. In like manner also Polybius, but only that in lieu of Drilius he hath Drilius. The Sicilian Registers shew Scipio and Drilius. Cn. Cornelius Scipio is surnamed also Afinus, by the capitol writers Orosius, Entropius, and Valerius in his first book chap. 10, of which surname Macrobius writeth thus in his first book of Saturnalia: The surname of Afinus (qd. he) was given to the Cornelius, for that the first of the House Cornelia having either bought land, or given his daughter in marriage, when (after the Iolemn manner) he was required to put in good sureties for security, brought into the open market place a she ass laden with money, and pawned down that presently in stead of pledges.

C. Aquilius son of M. L. Cornelius son of L.

There are nominated by Cassiodorus for Consuls, C. Aquilius and L. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers, Florus and Scipio. Zonaras, C. Florus and L. Scipio. Entropius and Orosius, L. Cornelius Scipio, and C. Aquilius Florus. Polybius leaveth them out. The Capitoline monuments agree with the Annals of Entropius and Orosius.

A. Attilius Calatinus, Q. Sulpicius.

Polybius avoucheth for these years Consuls, A. Attilius and C. Sulpicius. Cassiodorus, A. Attilius Calatinus, and C. Sulpicius. The Sicilian Registers and Cyprianus Kalender, Calatinus and Patruclus. The capitol monuments, A. Attilius Calatinus and C. Sulpicius Patruclus. Zonaras, Attilius Calatinus, and Gaius Sulpicius. Of these Consuls, Cicero, Valerius, Florus, Frontinus in his Stratagems, Pliny the younger, Gellius, and Cassiodorus make mention. But concerning the forename of Sulpicius Patruclus, the Capitoline tables disagree one from another: to wit, those that carry the records of the triumphs, from those that shew the Consulships and other magistracies: for in these latter monuments he is called Quintus, in the former Gaius. Whereby Gellius doth conjecture: that one man was not the author of both those records, namely, the Triumphal and the Consular.

Cn. Cornelius. 497 C. Attilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth unto us, Cn. Cornelius, and C. Attilius Serranus, for Consuls: but Polybius, C. Attilius. The capitol tables, C. Attilius Regulus, Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian registers, have Regulus and Blasius the second time. But how Attilius should come by his surname Serranus, Pliny sheweth in his 18 book, saying: In these daies the fields were tilled by the very hands of L. Genera themselves, and a man verily would believe thereby, that the ground joyed in a lauxat ploughshare and a triumphant plowman. Him they found a sowing, unto him they presented those honorable dignities, and so took he his surname Serranus. As concerning Blasius, all authors well need besides, approve the judgment of Cyprianus: but Goltzius suppoeth, that he was not the same man that was Consul before; and therefore he writeth him the son of C. nephew of L. without putting to the numeral note II.

Q. Cadius, L. Manlius.

The next Consuls that succeeded, were (by Cassiodorus his saying) Q. Cadius and L. Manlius. The Sicilian registers name them Valso and Cadius. Zonaras, M. Regulus and L. Manlius. Entropius, M. Attilius Regulus and L. Manlius Valso: and Polybius, M. Attilius and L. Manlius. Isidorus in his 41 book maketh mention of these Consuls. But ye must understand, that Q. Cadius died whilst he was in office, and M. Attilius was substituted in his room, and made Consul the second time; as appeareth evidently by the capitol tables, wherein it standeth thus upon record, L. Manlius Valso Longus: and in stead of Q. Cadius, M. Attilius Regulus the second time: as also by Cyprianus book, wherein is written, Longus and Regulus.

M. Emilius Paulus, Ser. Fulvius Nobilior.

Polybius sheweth for the Coss. this year, Ser. Fulvius, and M. Aemilius. Cyprianus Kalender, Nobilior and Paulus. The Sicilian registers, Paulus and Paulus. Cassiodorus and Entropius together with the Capitoline records have Ser. Fulvius Nobilior, and M. Emilius Paulus.

Cn. Cornelius. 500 A. Attilius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius report for this years Consuls. Cn. Cornelius and A. Attilius. The capitol authors write, A. Attilius Calatinus the second time, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Afinus likewise a second time. As touching Cn. Cornelius Afinus twice Consul, thus writeth Valerius in his first book: Cn. Cornelius S. Afinus, who being Consul, was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians at Lipara when he had by the Jaw law of arms lost whatsoever he had, recovered all again, and was made Consul the second time: so as, of a Consul he became a captive, and of a captive twice Consul.

Cn. Servilius. C. Sempronius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for Consuls, Cn. Servilius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian registers, Capis and Blasius. Zonaras, Servilius. Capis and C. Sempronius. Entropius and Orosius, Cn. Servilius Capis, and Sempronius Blasius. Of the same Consuls Sabinus in his 30 book maketh mention, as also a stone of the Capitol.

C. Aurelius Cotta, P. Servilius.

Cassiodorus bringeth in as Coss. C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Geminus. The Sicilian registers, Cotta and Geminus: but those of the Capitol, C. Aurelius Cotta, and P. Servilius Geminus. Zonaras, Pub. Servilius and C. Aurelius. Cicero in his book, entituled Lucullus writeth, that C. Cotta, together with P. Servilius Geminus, was twice Consul. Frontinus also in his fourth book of Stratagems, and likewise Orosius, make mention of G. Cotta Consul in Sicily.

L. Cassilius Metellus, C. Furius.

Polybius setteth down for Consuls, L. Cassilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Pacilius. Zonaras, Cassilius Metellus, and C. Furius. Cassiodorus, L. Cassilius and C. Furius. Entropius, Orosius, and a capitol stone, L. Cassilius Metellus, and Cn. Furius Pacilius. This is that L. Metellus, twice Consul and high priest, of whom Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter.

C. Attilius Regulus, L. Manlius.

Polybius placeth for these years Consuls, C. Attilius and L. Manlius. Cassiodorus, C. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius. Orosius and a capitol stone, have C. Attilius Regulus, and L. Manlius Valso, both Coss. the second time. Zonaras, C. Attilius the brother of Regulus, and L. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Regulus and Valso.

P. Claudius. 505 L. Junius.

Cassiodorus and Polybius infer for Consuls the next year, Pub. Claudius and L. Junius. Zonaras, L. Junius and C. Pulcher. Florus and Suetonius in Tiberius, put to Claudius the sumator of Polybius and Consortinus to Junius of Pachinus which also are upon record in the Sicilian and capitol tables. This P. Claudius, Cicero (in his books of Disquisition, and of the nature of gods) calleth the son of App. Cacus: but Pliny in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter, maketh him the nephew of Junius. The capitol writers maketh him with Claudius, Publius in his first book and fourth chapter, speaketh of the same Consul.

P. Scipio. C. Drilius.

For Consuls this year, Cassiodorus putteth down P. Scipio and C. Drilius. Cicero in his book Lucullus, liketh that he was twice Consul. Which also is apparent by the Capitol and Sicilian tables in which their surnames are to be seen, Geminus II, and Cotta II.

L. Cassius, C. Fabius.

It is recorded by C. Isidorus, that the Consuls of this year were L. Cassius and M. Fabius: but Zonaras nameth them, C. Attilius Metellus, and Numerius Fabius. Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian Registers, have them in this manner, Metellus II, and Attilius II. But the capitoline tables shew them thus, L. Cassius Metellus II, M. Fabius Butea II. Pliny also reporteth in his seventh book, that Metellus was twice Consul.

M. Fabius. C. Metellus.

Cassiodorus setteth down as Consuls, M. Fabius and M. Otacilius. The Sicilian Registers, Crassus and Licinius. Gellius in his tenth book and six chapter, hath P. Licinius and Q. Crassus. The capitol marble stones, M. Fabius Licinius, and M. Otacilius Crassus. Besides, Gellius in the place before alleaged, Belides likewise in his 19 Breviary upon Livius maketh mention of these Consuls: as also Suetonius in Tiberius.

M. Fabius, 509 C. Attilius.

Cassiodorus reckoneth M. Fabius, and C. Attilius, Consuls for this year. The Sicilian tables, Butea and Butea. But those of the capitol, M. Fabius Butea, and C. Attilius Butea. Of Fabius the Consuls shipwreck, Florus speaketh out of the nineteenth book of Livy.

A. Manlius, C. Sempronius.

For these years Consuls, Cassiodorus setteth forth unto us, A. Manlius and C. Sempronius. The Sicilian records, Torganus and Blasius. Cyprianus book hath Attilius and Blasius. The capitoline tables shew A. Manlius Torganus Attilius, and C. Sempronius Blasius II.

C. Fundanus, C. Sulpicius.

Cassiodorus putteth down, C. Fundanus, and C. Sulpicius for Consuls. The Sicilian writers, cap. Fundanus and Gallus. The Capitol monuments, C. Fundanus, Fundanus, and C. Scipio. Gallus. None besides make mention of them.

C. Lucius Caelius. A. Postumius.

Cassiodorus delivereth unto us for Consuls this year, C. Lucius and A. Postumius. The Sicilian records, Caelius and Albinius. Entropius, and the capitol marbles, C. Lucius Caelius, and A. Postumius Albinius.

Q. Lucius Cereus. A. Manlius.

Cassiodorus, Entropius, and Orofius shew for consuls this year, Q. Lucius, and A. Manlius. The Sicilian records, Cereus and Torquatus. They of the capitol, Q. Lucius Cereus, and A. Manlius Torquatus Atticus II. Indeed C. Lucius Cereus is named for an Ambassador by Livy in his 42 book.

514
C. Claudius Centho. M. Sempronius.

For this year there were Consuls, C. Claudius Centho, and M. Sempronius Tuditans, according to Cassiodorus and the capitol writers. The Sicilian records testify also the same furnames. Of these consuls likewise, besides the capitol writers, Cicero speaketh in his Caio and Brutus, where he calleth this year (according to the judgment of Atticus, wherto Varro also agreeth) the 514 year from the foundation of the city: as also in his first Tusculan question. So doth Gellius 17 book 21 chap. and Cassiodorus.

C. Mamilius. Q. Valerius.

Next there followed in consuls place, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, C. Mamilius and Q. Valerius: but according to the Sicilian registers, Turritius and Falco: and after the capitol records, C. Mamilius Turritius, and Q. Valerius Falco. Besides, Verrinus Flaccus and Cassiodorus, Gellius also maketh mention of these Consuls, in his 17 book and 21 chapter. So doth Cicero in Brutus: and the Tusculan questions, in which year they say, that Ennius the Poet was born.

516
T. Sempronius. P. Valerius.

For the year following, Cassiodorus hath consuls, T. Sempronius and P. Valerius. Gracchus and Falco, in Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian records, Zonaras avoucheth, Semp. Gracchus, and P. Valerius. The capitol writers, have T. Sempronius Gracchus, and P. Valerius Falco. Orofius speaketh of these consuls.

517
L. Cornelius. Q. Fulvius.
Next to them, Cassiodorus reporteth for consuls, L. Cornelius and Q. Fulvius. Zon-aras, L. Lentulus and Q. Flaccus. Entropius, L. Cornelius Lentulus, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The capitol registers give to Lentulus, the surname Candicans: and therefore in Cyprianus Kalender, they stand by the names of Candicans and Flaccus. As for the Sicilian registers, they leave them out clean.

C. Licinius. P. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, C. Licinius and P. Cornelius. Zonaras, P. Licinius and Iscomius Varus. The capitoline writers, C. Licinius Varus, and P. Cornelius Licinius Candicans. In like manner Cyprianus, who reckoneth this for the 518 year after the cities foundation: following herein the computation of Varro, Cicero, and Pliny. Cyprianus Kalender and the Sicilian registers, name them Clavdus and Varus.

519
T. Manlius Torquatus. C. Asilius.

This year had for consuls, as Cassiodorus saith, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Asilius. The Sicilian records, shew Torquatus and Bullus: but Entropius, Orofius, and the capitol Tables shew, T. Manlius Torquatus, and C. Asilius Bullus: unto Bullus. The capitol records put to the numeral note II. When T. Manlius Torquatus and C. Asilius Bullus the second time were consuls, according to Verrinus Flaccus, Entropius, Orofius, and Cassiodorus, that there was peace throughout all the empire of Rome, the Temple of Janus was shut the second time, as Plutarch sheweth in Numerius as Livy also, Velleius, Entropius, and Orofius do testify.

L. Postumius. Sp. Carvilius.

Cassiodorus nameth for consuls this year, L. Postumius and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian Registers have Albinius and Ruga. Zonaras, Postumius Albinius, and Sp. Carvilius. The capitol writers have L. Postumius Albinius, and Sp. Carvilius Maximus. That Ruga was a surname to the Carvilius, appeareth out of Gellius, who maketh mention of Sp. Carvilius Ruga, who at this time was the first that divorced his wife.

Q. Fabius. M. Pomponius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls, Q. Fabius and M. Pomponius. The Sicilian records Maximus and Maio. The capitoline writers have Q. Fabius Maximus Verrucosus, and M. Pomponius Maio. Zonaras hath Q. Fabius Max. and M. Pomponius. The surname of Maximus, this Fabius took of his grand-father, and was not himself the first of that name, whatsoever Polybius writeth in his third book.

Verrucosus

Verrucosus he was called besides of a weert upon his lip, at Plutarch witnesseth and he that wrote the treatise of Famous men.

522
M. Lepidus. M. Poplicius.

Marcus Lepidus and M. Poplicius are reputed to be Consuls this year by Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers have Lepidus and Malleolus. Zonaras hath M. Malleolus and M. Emilius. The capitol tables shew M. Emilius Lepidus and M. Poplicius.

C. Papirius. M. Pomponius.

Next after this were created Consuls, C. Papirius and M. Pomponius according to Cassiodorus, Zonaras, and Dionysius in his second book. The Sicilian registers shew Maso and Maio. But the Capitol records have C. Papirius Maso and M. Pomponius Maio. Of C. Papirius, son of C. surnamed Maso, a Pontify or Bishop, Livy speaketh in the year 540.

524
M. Emilius. M. Junius.

Zonaras and Cassiodorus exhibit unto us for Consuls, M. Emilius and M. Junius. The Sicilian registers, Barbula and Pera. The Capitol records, M. Emilius Barbula and M. Junius Pera.

525
L. Postumius. Cn. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus setteth down L. Postumius and Cn. Fulvius as Consuls. The Sicilian records Albinius and Centumalus. But those of the Capitol, and Entropius, present unto us L. Postumius Albinius and Cn. Fulvius Centumalus. Polybius nameth Cn. Fulvius and A. Postumius.

Q. Fabius II. Sp. Carvilius.

There are by Cassiodorus nominated for Consuls this year: Q. Fabius Maximus the second time, and Sp. Carvilius. The Sicilian registers Maximus and Ruga. The Capitol writers set also unto Carvilius Maximus the mark and numeral note of a double Consulship. Cicero in his book entituled Caio, likewise in his second book of Rhetorical invention, maketh mention of these Consuls, and so doth Velleius in his chapter, discoursing of the kindness and affectionate duty of children to their parents.

527
P. Valerius. M. Atilius.

There are set down by Cassiodorus for Consuls this year, P. Valerius and M. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, have Flaccus and Regulus. The Capitol records represent P. Valerius Flaccus, and M. Atilius Regulus. Gellius writeth of them in his 4 book and 3 chapter.

528
L. Apustius. M. Valerius.

Next after, Cassiodorus putteth L. Apustius and M. Valerius Consuls. The Sicilian tables, Maximus and Apustius. The Capitol monuments L. Apustius Fulgo, and M. Valerius Messala.

529
C. Atilius. L. Aemilius.

Imediately followed Consuls, C. Atilius and L. Aemilius, as Cassiodorus and Polybius do witness: whom the Capitol writers call, C. Atilius Regulus, and L. Aemilius Papius. The Sicilian registers, Regulus and Papius. Zonaras, Regulus and Aemilius. Of these Consuls also Orofius maketh mention: and Pliny in his third book and twentieth chapter, where untruly men read Paulus for Papius.

530
T. Manlius. Q. Fulvius II.

The year following had Consuls T. Manlius and Q. Fulvius the second time, according to Cassiodorus and Polybius, and as Orofius saith, T. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. Cyprianus tables, together with the Capitoline, have Torquatus the second time, and Flaccus likewise the second time, shewing the furnames only of these Consuls.

531
C. Flaminius. P. Furius Philus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, C. Flaminius and P. Furius. So doth Polybius. Zonaras nameth them Flaminius and Furius. Plutarch likewise in Marcellus. The Sicilian tables name them Flaminius and Philus. But the capitol records, C. Flaminius, and P. Furius Philus.

532
M. Marcellus. Cn. Cornelius.

Cassiodorus nameth for the next Consuls, M. Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius. Polybius, M. Claudius and Cn. Cornelius. The Sicilian registers Scipio and Marcellus. Zonaras, Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Scipio. Entropius, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio. The Capitol tables M. Claudius Marcellus and Cn. Cornelius Scipio Calvus. This is that Marcellus, who was five times Consul: and this is that Scipio, who afterwards with his brother Scipio was slain in Spain by Asdrubalus the Carthaginian.

533
P. Cornelius. M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, C. Cornelius and M. Minutius. So doth Zonaras.

was, The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Rufus. Enropius hath P. Cornelius and M. Minucius Rufus. Cuspinian book Afina and Rufus. Sigonus and Omphrius both, do think that this P. Cornelius Scipio Afina was his son, who in the first Punick war was twice consul. And verily Livy, in the year 543 maketh mention of P. Cornelius Afina, an honorable Senator, and who had been consul.

L. Veturius, 534 C. Licinius.

Cassiodorus and Zonaras exhibit unto us for consuls, L. Veturius and C. Licinius. The Sicilian registers Philo and Catulus. Cuspinian book Philo and Scavola.

M. Livius, 535 L. Emilius.

The consuls next following were M. Livius and L. Emilius, as Cassiodorus witnesseth. Cuspinian book and the Greek records shew Salinator and Paulus. Zonaras, M. Livius and Emilius Paulus. Pliny maketh mention of these consuls in the 29 book and first chap.

P. Cornelius Scipio, 536 T. Sempronius Longus.

Cassiodorus and Polybius put down for consuls P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius. Zonaras, Sempronius Longus and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, Longus and Scipio. Livy, Enropius, Probus, Orosius, and Pedanius, name them P. Cornelius Scipio, and T. Sempronius Longus. Whiles these were consuls, the second Punick war arose, as writers have delivered unto us in their chronicles.

Cn. Servilius Geminus, 537 C. Flaminius.

Then followed consuls, as Polybius, Cassiodorus, and Livy write, Cn. Servilius, together with C. Flaminius. But the two last named, as also the Sicilian registers, have given to Servilius the surname of Geminus. C. Flaminius now second time consul, with like pride as heretofore, entered into his magistracy in the Ides of March, not at Rome but at Ariminum. The same man, in neglect and contempt of the Auspicia or signs of birds, at what time as he made head and went against Annibal coming into Italy, fought a battle at the lake Thrasymenus, where his army was wholly defeated and himself lost his life: into whose place M. Atilius Regulus, who had been consul before, was substituted. Thus much out of Livy and Polybius.

C. Terentius Varro, 538 L. Emilius Paulus.

Next to them Polybius bringeth in L. Emilius Paulus and C. Terentius for consuls. The Sicilian registers, Paulus and Varro. Plutarch in Paulus, Terentius Varro, and Emilius Paulus. Livy, Cassiodorus, and others, C. Terentius Varro, and L. Emilius Paulus. Goltzius noteth, that the father of C. Terentius Varro, was one Annius, a thing by others passed over.

L. Posthumus Albinus, 539 M. Claudius Marcellus, II. Q. Fabius Maximus, III. T. Sempronius Gracchus.

Livy reporteth that the consuls elect for this year, when M. Junius the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election, were Lucius Posthumus Albinus the third time, who as then ruled the province of Gaul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus, who had been master of the horse-men; and that Posthumus before that he entered into government, was by Annibal in France environed and slain, in whole fleet M. Marcellus was subrogated consul now the second time: who upon information given by the Augurs, that his creation was not good, resigned; and commonly the Nobles gave out and said, That the Gods were not well pleased, that two commoners were then first chosen consuls: whereupon in the room of Marcellus, Quintus Fabius Maximus was chosen consul the third time. Thus write Livy and Plutarch. And for this cause it is that Cassiodorus, Orosius, and Enropius do put down for this years consuls, T. Sempronius and Q. Fabius.

Q. Fabius, IV. 540 M. Claudius Marcellus, III.

Livy, Plutarch, and Cassiodorus set out for consuls this year, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and M. Claudius Marcellus the third time. Moreover, Cicero oftentimes and Frontinus in his second book of Stratagems, make mention of these consuls.

Q. Fabius Max. son of Verrucosus, 541 T. Sempronius Gracchus, II.

Against this year were both the consuls created in their absence, namely, Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrucosus, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time: as Livy testifieth and Cassiodorus, together with the Sicilian registers. This Fabius had been Pretor the former year: and Gracchus consul two years before. These consuls Gellius nominateth out of Quadrigerius, the second book and second chapter. Likewise Cicero and Valerius, App. Claudius Pulcher, 542 Q. Fulvius Flaccus, II.

The consuls created for this year by the Dictator, were Quintus Fulvius Flaccus the third time, who then was master of the horse-men, and Appius Claudius Pulcher, who in his his pretorship was L. deputy in Sicily, as Livy, Plutarch in Fabius, Cassiodorus, and Festus in his 17 book do witness.

C. Spilpinus Galba, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus.

Vpon the receipt of certain letters, the Consuls agreed together, that Glaucius should hold the election for magistrats and see it finished, whiles Fulvius remained still before Capua. Claudius created for consuls, Cn. Fulvius Centumalus, and P. Sulpicius son of Servilius, and urnamed Galba, who before time had born no state-office of the chair. Thus writeth Livy. The same consuls also Cassiodorus doth deliver. Orosius likewise and Festus in his 17 book. The Sicilian records declare Galba and Centumalus. As for S. Sulpicius, he is named in his second consularship, as it appeareth upon record in the capitol, the son of Ser. nephew of Fabius turnamed Galba Maximus.

M. Val. Livinus, II. M. Claudius Marcellus, IV.

Livy, Sextus Pompeius, Valerius Maximus, Plutarch, Florus, Enropius, and Orosius, do present for consuls this year, M. Claudius Marcellus and M. Valerius Livinus. Now this is Marcellus his fourth consularship, as Plutarch and Livy write: but Cassiodorus saith, that he was but the third time with M. Valerius Livinus, leaving out that consularship which he bare not through, because of the error in his creation: and yet is it one of the five that he is reported to have born. Livy in the nine and twentieth and thirtieth books, writeth that M. Valerius was twice consul. In like manner, the book of Cuspinian hath for this year, Marcellus the fourth time, and Livinus the second time. And therefore Omphrius suppoeth that his first consular was in the year five hundred four-and-thirty: and the second, now. Of him Polybius and Cicero make mention.

Q. Fabius Maximus, V. Q. Fulvius Flaccus, IV.

The consuls for this year created, were Q. Fabius the fifth time, and Q. Fulvius Flaccus the fourth time, the same man who being Dictator, held the assembly for that election: as Livy and Cassiodorus do witness. The Sicilian records set forth Fabius and Flaccus. Whiles these were consuls, Cicero in his Oration against Rollus, saith that Capua was won: and yet Livy hath reported it two years before. Of these consuls Valerius also, together with Plutarch, Enropius, and Orosius have made mention.

M. Claudius Marcellus, V. T. Quintus Crispinus, 546

In the eleventh year of the Punick war, there entered into their consularship, M. Marcellus the fifth time (so ye reckon that consularship which upon an error in the creation he kept not) and T. Quintus Crispinus. So saith Livy. Plutarch also nameth Marcellus the fifth time and Crispinus. But Cassiodorus reckoneth Marcellus but the fourth time with Crispinus, passing over that faulty consular of his. Moreover these consuls are mentioned by Cicero Valerius, Plinius the younger, Probus, Enropius, and Orosius who also report that they both were forelaid and intrapped in ambush by Annibal in so much as Marcellus was presently slain in the place; and Quintus fled sore wounded.

C. Claudius Nero. M. Livius Salinator.

Vhen the LL. of the Senat cast about to see whom they should create consuls, behold, the most eminent and singular man above all others, was C. Claudius Nero: unto whom was joined as companion in government M. Livius, who many years before, upon a consular that he had born, was by the judgment of the people condemned: and almost eight years after his condemnation was by Marcus Marcellus, and Marcus Livius then consuls, reduced into the lucky. In like manner, the Sicilian Registers name for consuls, Nero and Salinator. The capitol records shew Claudius Nero, with M. Livius Salinator.

Q. Caecilius Metellus, 548 L. Veturius Philo.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the records of the capitol, exhibit unto us for consuls this year, L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Caecilius Metellus. The Sicilian registers, Metellus and Philo. Over and besides, of these consuls Cicero many a time and often, Valerius, Plutarch in Africanus, Appianus in Ibericus, Pliny in his 7 book 43 chap. do make mention.

549

P. Cornelius Scipio. P. Licinius Crassus.

Lucius Veturius Philo held the assembly for creation of Magistrats, wherein all the centuries in general, with exceeding great favour nominated Publius Scipio for consul, and to him was joined in government, P. Licinius Crassus, the supreme pontiff. Thus saith Livy. The Sicilian tables have Scipio with Crassus. The capitol records shew P. Cornelius Scipio.

Scipio, surnamed afterwards Africanus, with P. Licinius Crassus the rich, of whom Cassiodorus likewise and Cicero in Brutus do speak.

M. Cornelius Cethegus, P. Sempronius Tuditanus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do name for Consuls this year, P. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Cornelius Cethegus. The Sicilian registers, Cethegus and Tuditanus, of whom Cicero in Brutus, Plutarch, Eutropius and Cassiodorus do often times make mention. In this year P. Scipio Nasica, judged by the Senate the best man in the city, received dame Idea.

551

Cn. Servilius Capi, C. Servilius.

Livy and Cassiodorus together, with the Sicilian records and capitol monuments put unto us for Consuls Cn. Servilius Capi and C. Servilius. Of which twain Capi had been Pretor in the year 548, and Servilius in 547. This year died Q. Fabius Max; and Annibal with a sad cheer and heavy heart departed out of Italy into Africa by commandment of certain delegate Embassadors, in the seventeenth year of the second Punic war.

552

Tib. Claudius Nero, M. Servilius Geminus.

M. Arcus Servilius Geminus, and Tib. Claudius Nero were Consuls this year according to Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records, in which Servilius standeth surnamed Pulex Geminus. The Sicilian tables have Nero with Servilius. In these Consuls year, Annibal was in Africa by Scipio overthrow, and a second peace made with the Carthaginians, as Polybius, Livy, Plutarch, Appian, and Eutropius do report.

553

Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Aelius Paetus.

Against this year were created Consuls, as Livy writeth, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, and P. Aelius Paetus. So saith Cassiodorus also and Pliny in his eighteenth book and eighteenth chapter. In a broken pece of marble in the Capitol, we find Lentulus and P. Aelius: in the Sicilian registers, Lentulus and Paetus. These two were Pretors both in the year 550.

554

P. Sulpicius Galba, C. Aurelius Cotta.

Livy and Cassiodorus put down for Consuls, P. Sulpicius Galba, and C. Aurelius Cotta. This P. Sulpicius in the year 542 was first Consul; and C. Cotta two years before, Pretor. These same Consuls are to be seen in the capitol tables, but Galba and Cotta in the Sicilian.

L. Cornelius Lentulus, P. Valerius Tappulus.

This year had for Consuls, L. Cornelius and P. Valerius, as Cassiodorus writeth: but according to Livy and the capitol monuments, Lentulus and Tappulus: after the Sicilian records, L. Cornelius Lentulus and P. Valerius Tappulus. Of P. Valerius Consul, Plutarch maketh mention in Quintius.

556

T. Quintius Flaminius, Sex. Aelius Paetus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, together with Plutarch in Quintius, report unto us for consuls this year, T. Quintius Flaminius and Sex. Aelius Paetus. The Sicilian tables, Flaminius and Paetus, Pliny in his book of famous men, saith (but not without some error) that this Flaminius was the son of that C. Flaminius who was slain at Thrasymene. Where, as in deed this man was defended of the noble Patritian house of the Quintius, the other of the family of Flaminius, no better than commoners. Now this Sex. Aelius Paetus is the man of whom Cicero giveth this report out of the poet Ennius:

*Tibi Sexus Aelius in records, Catus surnam'de sit,
A worthy might for wisdomer was, a discreet man was be*

And therefore in the capitol tables he is called Paetus Catus.

C. Cornelius Cethegus, Q. Minutius Rufus.

In this year C. Cornelius Cethegus, and Q. Minutius were consuls, after Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol marbles. Their surnames only appear in the Sicilian registers. And Cicero speaketh of them in Brutus.

558

L. Enrius Porporeo, M. Claudius Marcellus.

This year had for Consuls, L. Enrius Porporeo, and M. Claudius Marcellus, according to Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records. The Sicilian annals deliver unto us Porphyro and Marcellus.

559

M. Porcius Cato, L. Valerius Flaccus.

M. Arcus Porcius Cato and L. Valerius are ranged Consuls this year, by Ferrus Flaccus, Cicero in many places, Livy, Plutarch, Pliny, Valerius, Probus, Eutropius, Orosius, and Cassiodorus.

560

P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus, II.
T. Sempronius Longinus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, the monuments both of the capitol and Sicily, match Consuls together this year, P. Cornelius Scipio Africanus the second second time, and T. Sempronius Longinus. Of them Cicero maketh mention in the oration of Cornelius accused of felony, appeareth in Pedanius.

561

L. Cornelius Merula, Q. Minutius Thermus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol authors, writeth that the Consuls chosen to succeed in this year were L. Cornelius Merula, and Q. Minutius Thermus. The said surnames are found in the Sicilian records, Probus speaketh of them in Annibal, and Frontinus in his book of stratagems.

562

L. Quintius Flaminius, C. Domitius Enobarbus.

L. Quintius Flaminius, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus were this years Consuls, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records testify. The Sicilian registers also shew their surnames.

563

M. Acilius Glabrio, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica.

The Consuls created for this year, were P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, and M. Acilius Glabrio, son of Cn. as testify Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol records, Plutarch in Quintius, and Appian in his Syriack history. In the Sicilian registers, named they are Glabrio and Nasica. In these Consuls year the same authors report, that the war against Antiochus King of Syria, and against the Ætolians, was proclaimed: which in the capitol monuments, in Patriculus, and Macrobius, we called the Antiochian, but by Florus and Pliny the younger in Cato, the Syrian war. This was the 563 year from the cities foundation, as Macrobius writeth in his first book of Saturnals.

L. Cornelius Scipio, C. Laelius.

Cassiodorus, Livius, and the capitol tables put down for Consuls this year, L. Cornelius Scipio and C. Laelius. The Sicilian registers have Scipio and Laelius. The same men Gellius in his sixteenth book and fourth chapter nameth C. Laelius son of C. and L. Scipio son of P. To Laelius Cassiodorus only addeth the surname Africanus. This L. Scipio surnamed Africanus, was brother to Africanus.

565

C. Manlius Vulso, M. Fulvius Nobilior.

Cn. Manlius Vulso, and M. Fulvius Nobilior, are nominated Consuls for this year by Livy, Cassiodorus, and the tables both of the capitol and Sicily. Manlius was Pretor in the year 557 and Fulvius anno 560.

566

C. Livius Salinator, M. Valerius Messalla.

The Consuls next following, were M. Valerius Messalla, and C. Livius Salinator, as Livy and Cassiodorus testify, together with the Sicilian and capitol tables.

M. Aemilius Lepidus, C. Flaminius.

The next Consuls, were M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Flaminius, as witness Livy, Cassiodorus, Zonaras, Strabo in his first book, the Sicilian and capitol tables. Of them Valerius maketh mention in his sixth book. This is that M. Lepidus who was the Arch-bishop, twice Consul, Cenfor, and President of the Senat six times chosen by the Censors. And this is that C. Flaminius, who afterward by Cato the Cenfor was displaced out of the Senat and disrebed.

568

Sp. Posthumius Albinus, Q. Marcius Philippus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, Eutropius and the capitol tables report Consuls for this year, Sp. Posthumius Albinus, and Q. Marcius Philippus. The Sicilian Registers name them barely, Albinus and Philippus, Valerius maketh mention of them in his sixth book and third chapter. Likewise Pliny in his 33 book and tenth chapter.

569

Ap. Claudius Pulcher, M. Sempronius Tuditanus.

For this years Consuls were Appius Claudius Pulcher, & M. Sempronius Tuditanus as Livy, Cassiodorus and the capitol records do testify. They stand in the Sicilian records by the names of Pulcher and Tuditanus.

570

P. Claudius Pulcher, L. Porcius Cicerinus.

The Consuls that followed for this year, were L. Porcius Cicerinus & P. Claudius Pulcher: witness Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Pulcher and Licinius they be called in the Sicilian records.

571

Q. Fabius Labco, M. Claudius Marcellus.

Against this year were created Consuls, M. Claudius Marcellus and Q. Fabius Labco, according to Livy, Cassiodorus & the capitol marble stones. Their surnames be found also in the Sicilian tables. Whiles these were consuls, Atticus wrote that Annibal died, as Probus maketh report in Annibal.

L. Aemilius Paulus, Cn. Babius Tamphilus.

Cn. Babius Tamphilus and L. Aemilius Paulus were created Consuls for this year, as Livy, Cassiodorus, the capitol, yea, and the Sicilian tables do testify, although these last have regard only of their surnames. This L. Aemilius is the son of that L. Aemilius, who was slain at Cannae, as Plutarch and Velleius do witness.

579
P. Cornelius Cethegus, M. Babinus Tamphilus.

Plinius Cornelius Cethegus and M. Babinus Tamphilus, succeeded Consuls this year, after Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables. Cethegus and Tamphilus they are called in the Sicilian records. Of P. Cornelius and M. Babinus conf. Plutarch make mention in Nicom. Of P. Cornelius and M. Babinus Tamphilus, Valerius speaketh in his first book and first chapter. Of P. Cornelius Lemulus, and M. Babinus Tamphilus in 11 book and 13 chapter. But Pliny in his 13 book and 13 chapter calleth the one P. Cornelius Cethegus, son of Ducius; and the other M. Babinus son of Q. (turned Tamphilus).

574
A. Posthumus Albinus, C. Calpurnius Piso.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments exhibit unto us for this year Consuls, A. Posthumus Albinus, and C. Calpurnius Piso. The Sicilian tables, Albinus and Piso. Plutarch Preter in the year 567. And Albinus anno 568. But whereas a pestilence had reigned now three years, so as it despoiled the City of Rome and all Italy, it hapned that C. Calpurnius died, not without suspicion that he was murdered by Q. Hofilia: in whose room Q. Tulvius Flaccus his father in law or mothers husband, was declared Consul.

575
L. Manlius Acidinus, Q. Fulvius Flaccus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records shew for Consuls this year, L. Manlius Acidinus and Q. Fulvius Flaccus. The Sicilian tables, Acidinus with F. Cicero. Cicero maketh mention of Acidinus a Consul, in his second book of a perfect orator. Also observed it is in the capitol monuments, that these Consuls were german brethren: and the same hath Plinius in his second book reported. And therefore it cometh to pass, that in the capitol tables L. Manlius Acidinus, is furnished also Fulvius after the manner of those that are adopted.

576
M. Junius Brunsus, A. Manlius Vulso.

Next Consuls created, were M. Junius Brunsus and A. Manlius Vulso: as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do testify. Brunus and Vulso they be named in the Sicilian monuments. This Brunus was Preter in the year 562, and Vulso in 571.

577
C. Claudius Pulcher, Tib. Sempronius Gracchus.

Caius Claudius Pulcher and Tib. Sempronius Gracchus, are matched Consuls this year by Ver. Flaccus, Livy, and Cassiodorus. Of this Gracchus Cicero speaketh in his first book of divination, and Erastus in his first of Strategem.

578
C. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, C. Valerius Maximus.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records exhibit unto us for Consuls, C. Cornelius Scipio Hispanus, and C. Valerius Maximus. The Sicilian registers, Scipio and Valerius. But when Scipio returning out of the mount Alpeus, fell into a fit of Apoplexy, and so into a dead palsy, whereupon he went to the bath at Cometa, where, by reason that his disease grew upon him, he departed this life: Q. Perillus the other Consul, created for his companion to enter presently upon the government, C. Valerius Lavinus. Thus saith Livy.

579
R. Mutius Scaevola, M. Aemilius Lepidus II.

Rofius putteth down for Consuls Lepidus and Mutius, Cassiodorus and Obsequens. M. Lepidus and P. Mutius. The Sicilian tables, Lepidus and Scaevola. The capitol monuments, P. Mutius Scaevola and M. Aemilius Lepidus II. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Livy. Cicero, likewise writeth in his discourse of Provinces: Valerius also in his first book and first chapter, that this M. Aemilius Lepidus was twice Consul.

Sp. Posthumus Albinus, Q. Mutius Scaevola.
Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumus Albinus and Q. Mutius. The capitol records, Sp. Posthumus Albinus Paulus, and Q. Mutius Scaevola. Cicero in his first book hath Paulus and Scaevola. Pliny maketh mention of these in his second book and 13 chapter. The election of the Consuls this year is lost in Livy.

581
L. Posthumus Albinus, M. Popilius Lenax.

The Coss, for this year created, were L. Posthumus Albinus and M. Popilius Lenax, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments do testify. Albinus and Lenax are put down in the Sicilian records. Whiles these were consuls, the feast Floralia was instituted first, as Ovid sheweth in his first book of his Kalendar.

582
C. Popilius Lenax, P. Aelius Ligur.

This year had for consuls, C. Popilius Lenax, and P. Aelius Ligur, as Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol records do testify. The Sicilian registers name them Lenax and Aelius. To this day had no Coss. in one year been matched together, both commoners: and this was the first time, that both consuls were created out of the commons, as is observed in the capitol monuments. After this, you shall never find the consuls both Patricii: commoners ye shall have them both twain, many a time and often: but most of all, a commoner and a Patrician, one with another.

P. Licinius Crassus, C. Cassius Longinus, M. Marcellus, C. Sulpicius.

The Consuls next ensuing for this year, were P. Licinius Crassus, and C. Cassius Longinus, as it appeareth in Livy, Cassiodorus, Orosius, and the capitol tables. For in the Sicilian records, they are named no otherwise than Crassus and Longinus. Of the very same Consuls Pliny maketh mention in his seventh book. Gellius also in his ninth book and fourth chapter. Whiles these were Consuls the people of Rome began war against Perseus King of the Macedonians, son of Philip: which Florus and Ennius, together with Orosius, call the second Macedonian war: whereof Livy and Plutarch write more at large.

584
A. Hostilius Mancinus, A. Atilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus setteth next after for Consuls, C. Hostilius Mancinus, and C. Atilius. The Sicilian registers, Mancinus and Serranus. The capitol monuments, A. Atilius Mancinus, and A. Atilius Serranus. As well the election of these Consuls as their acts, are missing in the Annals of Livy.

585
Q. Marcius Philippus, II. Cn. Servilius Capio.

Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol tables match together in the Consulship of this year Q. Marcius Philippus the second time, and Cn. Servilius Capio. The Sicilian catalogue hath barely Philip and Capio. Cicero in his books entituled Brutus and Cato, writeth that Ennius the Poet died in their Consulship.

L. Aemilius Paulus, II. C. Licinius Crassus.

The Consuls that next succeeded were L. Aemilius Paulus the second time (seventen years after his first Consulship) and Caius Licinius Crassus: witnesses Livy, Cassiodorus, and the capitol monuments. In like manner they are named in the Sicilian registers Paulus and Crassus. As touching this second Consulship of L. Paulus, Plutarch, Valerius, Orosius, Ennius, Florus, and Justinus in his 33 book do write, Plutarch addeth thus much and saith, That Paulus was threecore years of age, when he was chosen Consul the second time.

Q. Aelius Paulus, M. Junius.

Livy bringeth in for Consuls next after, Q. Aemilius and M. Junius. The Sicilian records Paulus and Pennus. Obsequens and Cassiodorus Q. Aelius Paulus, and M. Junius Pennus. Cicero likewise in Brutus speaketh of Mar. Junius Pennus, Consul with Q. Aelius. Now from this year forward, we want the compleat story penned by Livy.

Cn. Octavius, T. Manlius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens infer Consuls this year, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius. The Sicilian tables, Octavius and Torquatus. The capitol stones, Cn. Octavius and T. Manlius Torquatus. Mention there is made of these consuls in the title before Hegeus in Terence. Cicero in his first book of Final ends, and likewise in many other places, speaketh of T. Torquatus, Consul with Cn. Octavius.

590
A. Manlius, Q. C. Cossus.

Cassiodorus matcheth together consuls in this year, A. Manlius and Q. Cossus. The Sicilian catalogue hath Torquatus and Longinus. The capitol records A. Manlius Torquatus and Q. Cossus Longinus, who died in his consulship. These also had been companions together in their Pretorship, anno 586, as Livy beareth witness.

591
T. Sempronius, M. Juventinus.

Cassiodorus saith, that the consuls this year were T. Sempronius and M. Juventinus. Obsequens nameth them, T. Gracchus, and M. Juventinus. The capitol monuments shew T. Sempronius Gracchus the second time, and M. Juventinus Thalva. In the Sicilian registers, Dolabella and Thalva. But not well as it is to be doubted. Cicero, Valerius, and Plutarch have made mention of Tib. Gracchus twice consul. And that M. Juventinus died whiles he was consul, Pliny in his seventh book, and Valerius also do report.

592
P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica, C. Martius.

Cicero in his first and second book of the nature of Gods, Perrinus Flaccus, Obsequens and Cassiodorus, report for consuls P. Cornelius Nasica and C. Martius Figulus. But for that there was an error committed in their creation, and thereupon they refigined up their place, as the forefild authors witnesses together with Valerius Plutarch and Pliny: P. Corn. Lemulus, and Cn. Domitius Enobarbus, entered in their stead.

593

593 M. Messala. C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Messala and C. Fannius. The Sicilian Catalogue Messala and Strabo. The capitol records, and the title before Phormio in Terence represent unto us, M. Valerius Messala, and C. Fannius Strabo. Of these Consuls Suetonius maketh mention in his book of excellent Rhetoricians. Likewise in Cicero in Brutus, Pliny in his ninth book and fiftieth chapter, and Gellius in his second book.

594 L. Anicius. M. Cornelius Cethegus.

Cassiodorus and the title set before the Comedy Adelphi in Terence avouch for Coss. L. Anicius and M. Cornelius. The Sicilian and capitol records put surnames unto them, Gallus and Cethegus. Of Anicius the Consul, Cicero speaketh in Brutus; and of Cethegus, the six and fortieth Epitome or Breviary of Florus. In their year, it is for certain held, that L. Paullus who conquered Persens, died.

595 Cn. Cornelius Dolabella. M. Fulvius.

The year next following had Consuls, as witnesseth Cassiodorus, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers shew Dolabella and Fulvius. The capitol monuments, Cn. Cornelius Dolabella and Mar. Fulvius Nobilior. The same is to be seen in the life of Terence the poet, for there it is written, that in their year he died.

596 N. Aemilius. C. Popilius.

The Consuls next succeeding, were Marcus Aemilius and C. Popilius, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Lanat. The capitol records have M. Aemilius Lepidus and C. Popilius Lanat the second time. Of the same Censorinus maketh mention in his chapter of distinction of ages.

597 Sex. Julius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus reporteth, that the next Consuls were Sex. Julius and L. Aurelius. The Sicilian and capitol tables yield surnames unto them, Cæsar to Julius, and Orestes to Aurelius. Pliny writeth of them in his 33 book.

598 L. Lentulus. C. Martius.

Obesque and Cassiodorus record for this years Consuls L. Lentulus and C. Martius. The Sicilian catalogue Lentulus and Figulus. The capitol monuments, L. Cornelius Lentulus Lupus, and C. Martius Figulus the second time.

Cicero in Brutus speaketh of them both, And as touching Figulus twice Consul, Valerius writeth in his chapter of Wrath.

599 P. Scipio Nasica. M. Claudius.

Publius Scipio and M. Claudius are by Cassiodorus set down for Coss. The Sicilian registers have Nasica and Marcellus. The capitol records, P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica the second time, and M. Claudius Marcellus likewise the second time. Padiamus writeth, that this Marcellus was thrice Consul. And that Pub. Scipio Nasica, surnamed also Corvulum, was twice Consul and Censor besides, Cicero writeth in his Brutus.

600 L. Posthumus. Q. Opimius.

This year had Consuls, Lu. Posthumus and Qu. Opimius as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do witness. The Sicilian tables shew Opimius and Albinus. But the capitol records Q. Opimius, and Lu. Posthumus Albinus. Mention there is made of this Q. Opimius, Consul, by Cicero in his Brutus; also in the Epitome of the seven and fortieth book. Moreover, that Posthumus died in his magistracy, besides Verrinus Flaccus, Obsequens also sheweth: in whose head Man. Acilius Glabrio was chosen.

601 Q. Fulvius. T. Annius.

The Consuls next following, as Cassiodorus writeth, were Qu. Fulvius and T. Annius. In the capitol fragments they are named Nobilior and Luscus. Cicero in his Brutus saith, that Q. Nobilior son of Marcus, and T. Annius Luscus were Consuls. The Greek records and Cnipsianus book shew Nobilior and Luscus.

602 M. Marcellus. L. Valerius.

This year had for Consuls, M. Marcellus and L. Valerius as Cassiodorus witnesseth. The Sicilian catalogue representeth Marcellus and Flaccus. Obsequens exhibiteth unto us M. Claudius Marcellus and L. Valerius Flaccus. This Marcellus was thrice Consul, as Padiamus saith upon the Orator for Scaurus, and Cicero in his book of divination and destiny.

603 L. Licinius Lucullus. A. Postumius Albinus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Lucullus and A. Postumius. The Sicilian tables, Lucullus and Albinus. The broken marbles of the capitol, Lucullus and Au. Postumius son of Anides, Orestes and the Epitome 48, shew L. Licinius Lucullus and A. Post. Albinus. Cicero in his Brutus, and Lucullus both, maketh mention of the same.

604 T. Quintinus. M. Acilius.

This year had for Consuls, T. Quintinus and M. Acilius, as Cassiodorus testifieth in whom Pliny in his 7 book & 36 chap. calleth C. Quintinus and M. Acilius. Cicero in his book Cato, and the 12 book of his Epistles to Atticus nameth T. Flamininus and M. Acilius, and saith that they were created Consuls in the 19 year after the death of Ennius. The Sicilian tables have Flamininus and Balbus. The Capitol fragments, Flamininus and M. Acilius Balbus.

605 L. Martius. M. Manilius.

Cassiodorus avoucheth for the Consuls of this year, L. Martius and M. Manilius: likewise the 49 Epitome. Cicero in Lucullus maketh mention of Censorinus and M. Manilius: of Censorinus and Manilius in his twelfth book of epistles to Atticus. The same Consuls, Appianus in Lycia nameth L. Martius Censorinus and M. Manilius. In like sort Censorinus in his treatise of Nativity or Birth-day. The Sicilian tables have Censorinus and Manilius. The capitol fragments shew Censorinus and M. Manilius, son of Publius, nephew of Pub. While they were Consuls, there arose a third war between the State of Rome and the Carthaginians, as Florus in the 49 Epitome, besides Verrinus Flaccus do testify: likewise Solinus, but that he saith with Verrinus Flaccus, that it was the year 64, Cicero also in his eleventh Philippick, and lastly Entropius with Orestes.

606 Sp. Postumius. L. Piso.

Then were Consuls created, Sp. Postumius and L. Piso, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In the capitol fragments they are named A. Magnus, and Lu. Calpurnius, son of Cains, nephew of Cains, surnamed Piso Cæsonius. In Cnipsianus Kalender, Magnus and Cæsonius, in the Sicilian catalogue Albinus and Piso. As for Magnus and Albinus: they be the surnames of Postumius: like as Cæsonius and Piso, of Calpurnius. In this year the people of Rome, entered into arms against Andrius, otherwise termed Pseudo-Philippus, which they call the third Macedonian war, after Florus and Entropius.

607 P. Africanus. C. Livius.

Obesque and Cassiodorus set forth for consuls this year P. Africanus and C. Livius. In the Sicilian catalogue they are registered Seipio and Dreusus: in the capitol fragments Africanus and Aemilius, and C. Livius: the one son of M. Aemilius, nephew of Marcus, the other surnamed Dreusus. This Pub. Cornelius was the natural son of that Paulus that vanquished Perseus King of the Macedonians, and adopted by P. Cornelius the son of Serpio Africanus. Whereupon he was called Pub. Cornelius, son of Publius, nephew of P. Serpio Africanus the younger, and Aemilius, as Velleius and others do witness. His two last surnames are in the capitol records, out of which, the complete name of M. Livius Dreusus, with his addition, was framed. Of these Consuls Cicero speaketh after: likewise Valerius, Pacervulus, Appian, Plutarch, Florus, both Plinius, Entropius and Orestes.

608 G. Cornelius. L. Mummius.

Next consuls following, were Cn. Cornelius and L. Mummius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus: and according to Orestes, Velleius, Censorinus, and Cicero in the thirteenth book of epistles to Atticus, Cn. Cornelius Lentulus and L. Mummius they are named. In the Sicilian registers Lentulus and M. Mummius. In the fragments of the capitol, Lentulus and L. Mummius, nephew of Luce n. L. Mummius in this magistracy acquired the surname of Achaicus, upon a victory achieved by him in Asia, as Plutarch in Marius, and Velleius do testify.

609 Q. Fabius Maximus. L. Hostilius.

Cassiodorus this year delivereth unto us for Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus together with L. Hostilius. Cicero in Laelius, and Pliny in his five and thirtieth book and fourth chapter, nameth them Qu. Maximus, brother of Scipio, and L. Mancinus. Of this Q. Fabius Maximus Aemilius, Valerius writeth in his second book and first chapter. This Q. Fabius was the son of P. Aemilius, adopted by Q. Fab. Max. the son of Verrucolus, as Appianus writeth in Hispanensis: and therefore in the fragment of a capitol table there is to be seen the second surname Aemilius. Pliny was deceived, who in his 31 book 11 chapter calleth him Qu. Allobrogicus, brother of Scipio, who was the son of this Fabius.

610 Ser. Galba. L. Aurelius.

This year had for Consuls, Ser. Galba and Lu. Aurelius, according to Cassiodorus: those, Valerius in his first book nameth S. Sulpicius Galba, and Lu. Aurelius Cotta, whom the Sicilian catalogue sheweth under the bare names of Galba and Cotta. But the capitol fragments have Galba and L. Valerius Cotta. This is that Sulp. Galba, who being Pretor as Suetonius writeth, stirred up the war before against Cratichus, for he was a vehement Orator of whom Cicero speaketh many times. And as for L. Cotta, he it was whom afterwards being accused by Africanus, Qu. Metellus Macedonius defended. Cicero in Brutus for Murena and against Porcius, maketh mention of him. Likewise Frontinus of them both, in his first book of water conduits.

611
Ap. Claudius, Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls Appius Claudius and Q. Metellus, Orosius App. Claudius and Q. Caelius Metellus. The Sicilian registers have Claudius and Metellus. The capitol fragments shew Pulcher and Q. Caelius Macedonicus. Of the same, Frontinus speaketh in his book of water-conduits, and Valerius in his seventh book. Now this Metellus is he who being Pretor, subdued the Macedonians and Achaens, whereupon he was furnished Macedonius; whom Plinius 7 book sheweth to be the son of Lu. and nephew of Quint.

612

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Lu. Metellus and Q. Maximus. The Sicilian records Metellus and Maximus, Orosius, L. Caelius Metellus and Q. Fabius Maximus Servilius. In like manner the capitol fragments Calvus and Servilius. This Servilius is the brother german of Q. Servilius Capio, the Consul two years after (as witnesseth Appian) and the adopted son of Q. Fabius Max. the son of Verrucolus, the one out of the house Æmilia, the other of Servilius. L. Metellus is the brother of Q. Metellus Macedonicus, as writeth Valerius in his treatise of Witnesses.

Cn. Capio, Q. Pompeius.

Cicero Capio and Q. Pompeius are recounted Consuls by Cassiodorus, Velleius in his second book faith thus: Whether there were two or three houses of the Pompeii, the first of that name was Consul with Cn. Servilius. Of this Q. Pompeius, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes, writing that he was of base and obscure parentage. Him Valerius in his chapter of witnesses nameth Aulus, but corruptly through the fault of the copiers, in stead of An. F. i. the son of Aulus. In the same sort Appianus in Hispanensis nameth him Q. Pompeius Aulus for A. Filius, Cicero in his Orations against Verrus, and in that for Fonteinus, Valerius also in his chapter of Witnesses, sheweth that there were two brethren named Cneus and Quintus, both Servilii Capiones.

Q. Capio, C. Lelins.

After this were Consuls made, Qu. Capio and C. Lelins, my authors are Cassiodorus and Obsequens together with the Sicilian tables, and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits. This Lelins as Cicero in his eleventh Philippic, and Velleius do report, was the son of Lelius the Consul, anno 564, whom as Cicero in his second book of Duties and in Lelius, was the first that was furnished Wife, whereof Plutarch in Gracchus yieldeth a reason,

615
Cn. Piso, M. Popilius.

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, Cn. Piso with M. Popilius. Appianus and the Epitome have M. Popilius Lænas: but they be named M. Popilius Lænas and L. Calpurnius by Valerius in his first book, writing thus, That Cornelius Hispalus, Lord chief justice for Strangers, when M. Popilius Lænas and L. Calpurnius were Consuls, by an edict commanded all the Chaldean [Astrologers] to depart out of Rome and Italy within ten daies next ensuing.

616
P. Scipio, D. Brutus.

Publius Scipio and D. Brutus are named for this years Coss by Cassiodorus. Florus in his 55 Epitome; P. Cornelius Nasica (named Serapion in mockery by C. Curiatius a Trib. of the Com.) and D. Junius Brutus Coss. levied and muttered souldiers, &c. This Scipio was son of that Nasica who was furnished Cerealis, and twice was he Consul and Censor also, nephew to that Nasica, who by the Senat was deemed the best man in the City, and father to him that warred upon Sugurtha, as Velleius faith. This Decius Brutus, Cicero in his Brutus calleth the son of Marcius, who bare the Consulship in the year five hundred ninety seven, and in the capitol tables is called Pennus. Moreover, of these Consuls Cicero speaketh very oft, Valerius also in his 3 book, chap. 7. 5 book, chap. 3. 9 book, chap. 15: Likewise, Pliny in his 21 book, and lastly, Frontinus.

617
M. Æmilius, C. Hostilius Mancinus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens match together in the consulship this year, M. Æmilius, and C. Hostilius Mancinus. The Sicilian registers Lepidus and Mancinus, Orosius and Appian, M. Æmilius Lepidus and C. Hostilius Mancinus. Of this Consul Mancinus there remain yet some tokens to be seen in broken marbles of the capitol, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatise of Famous men.

618
P. Furius, Sex. Attilius Serranus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, P. Furius and Sex. Attilius Serranus. Cicero in his third book of Duties, L. Furius and Sex. Attilius, Obsequens, L. Furius and Attilius Serranus. The Sicilian registers Philbus and Serranus. Of this Consul Mancinus there remain yet some tokens to be seen in broken marbles of the capitol, Cicero maketh mention oftentimes of Lepidus, as well in other places as in Brutus. Likewise, Valerius, Florus, Paterculus, and Pliny in his treatise of Famous men.

619
Sext. Fulvius, C. Calpurnius.

The next consuls are set down by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, Sext. Fulvius and C. Calpurnius. The Sicilian catalogue hath Flaccus and Piso, Orosius nameth S. Fulvius Flaccus and C. Calpurnius Piso. The capitol fragments shew Piso: as for Fulvius Flaccus the Consul, mention there is made of him in the Epitome 36. Appian also in his Illyrica speaks of him, and in Hispanensis of Calp. Piso.

620
P. Africanus, C. Fulvius Flaccus.

The year following had P. Africanus and C. Fulvius Flaccus for Coss, as it is written in Cassiodorus and Obsequens. But Scipio and Flaccus in the Sicilian catalogue. The same Flaccus the capitol fragments do shew. Of this C. Fulvius, mention there is made also in the 56 Epitome: and of Africanus twice consul, by Appian in Hispanensis, by Orosius, Florus, and Valerius in his eight book.

621
P. Mucius, L. Calpurnius.

This year had consuls, P. Mucius and Lu. Calpurnius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian registers shew Scævola and Calpurnius. Velleius nameth P. Mucius Scævola and L. Calpurnius. Of these Consuls Padianus upon the Orations against Ferret, maketh mention in these words: Scævola a right learned man in the Laws, was consul with L. Piso, that year where in Tib. Gracchus was killed. In the broken marbles of the capitol he standeth by the name of L. Calpurnius Piso, furnished also Frugi, and that truly. For Cicero in one Oration against Verrus and in another for Fonteinus writeth, that he was the first of the Piones, called Frugi. This man, when he was Tribune or Provost of the Commons, made a law against the extortion of magistrates, when Martius and Manlius were consuls: he wrote also the annals of Rome, as Cicero testifieth in his book Brutus.

622
P. Popilius, P. Rupilius.

Against this year were consuls created, as Cassiodorus writeth, P. Popilius and P. Rupilius: after the Sicilian records Lænas and Rupilius. Cicero maketh mention of them in his 13 book of Epistles to Atticus, and against Ferret. Also in the capitol fragments we read of P. Popilius, son of Cneus, and P. Rupilius, son of P. and nephew of Publius, Velleius in his second book, nameth the consuls Rupilius and Popilius, Cicero in Latini speaketh of Rupilius and Lænas. And of P. Rupilius there is mention made in the Epitome or Brevari 59.

623
P. Crassus, L. Valerius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, Pub. Crassus and Lu. Valerius, Crassus and Flaccus the Sicilian catalogue, L. Valerius Flaccus and Pub. Licinius Crassus, according to Cicero in his eleventh Philippic against Antony. Of this consul Pub. Licinius Crassus, all they have spoken, who wrote of the war of Antony, this P. Crassus furnished Deat, by Cicero in his books of a perfect Orator, and in Brutus is called the brother of Scævola: whereupon Velleius in his second book nameth him Martianus, betokening thereby that he was adopted out of the house of Martius into the family of the Crassi. This man Gellius writeth in his first book and 23 chap. to have been of all others the richest man, the noblest personage, and the most eloquent Orator, the deepest lawyer, and the supreme Bishop withal.

C. Claudius, M. Perperna.

Appius Claudius and M. Perperna are matched in the Consul together this year by Obsequens and Cassiodorus. Cyprianus book and the Greek records, shew Lentulus and Perperna. This Claudius haply was adopted into the family of the Cornelii. Moreover, Cicero in his third book of Laws, and in the Oration for Plancius, calleth this man C. Claudius. This also is confirmed by an old table of stone commonly known, wherein is to be seen this inscription, C. Claudius and M. Perperna Coss. Which evidence Stiponius and Onuphrius following, named him C. Claudius and not Appius. Of this M. Perperna as many as wrote the war of Antony, have made mention, and namely, Valerius in his 3 book and 4 chap. Velleius, Strabo, Orosius, and Eutropius.

625
C. Sempronius, M. Aquilius.

This year had consuls, M. Aquilius and C. Sempronius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. But Aquilius and Tuditanus according to the Sicilian registers, C. Sempronius Tuditanus, and M. Aquilius, after Orosius. Cicero speaketh of them in his book of the nature of gods, and to his brother Quintus. Paterculus also in his second book. Strabo in his 14 book. Appian in his first book. And both of them are taken out of the triumph records in the capitol.

Cn. Octavius, T. Annius.

Next followed as consuls Cn. Octavius and T. Annius, as Cassiodorus testifieth and none but he, for Cyprianus book and the Sicilian catalogue have Octavianus and Rufus, Plutarch also writeth, that one T. Annius contended with Tib. Gracchus in a sedition. As for this C. Octavius, vine, son he was to that Cneus who was Consul in the year five hundred eighty nine.
Xxxx 2

L. Cassius. 627 L. Cinna.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls, L. Cassius and L. Cinna. The Sicilian records Longinus and Cinna. Cassianus books let out Rulla, corruptly for Ravilla, and Cinna. This L. Cassius was his son who bare the consulship in the year 599, and he was afterwards Censor in the year 629 furnished Ravilla by Frontinus.

628 M. Aemilius. L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens reckon for Coss. this year, Mar. Aemilius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Lepidus and Orestes. Conforius hath M. Aemilius Lepidus, and L. Aemilius Orestes. Cicero in Brutus, Mar. Lepidus, and L. Orestes.

629 M. Plautius. M. Fulvius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens avouch Consuls this year, M. Plautius and M. Fulvius. The Sicilian registers, Hyppus and Flaccus. Orestes and Frontinus in his treatise of water-conduits, M. Plautius Hyppus and Mar. Fulvius Flaccus. Valerius also in his discourse of Pride maketh mention of them.

630 C. Cassius Longinus. C. Sextius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens report, that the consuls following were C. Cassius Longinus, and C. Sextius. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Longinus and Calpurnius. Velleius writeth, that the colony Fabrateria was planted by Cassius and Calpurnius. Cicero in Brutus speaketh of C. Sextius Calpurnius. Entropius declareth for consuls, C. Cassius Longinus, and S. Domitius Calpurnius, not without suspicion of a fault or error.

631 Q. Caelius. T. Quintius.

Cassiodorus nomineth for consuls this year, Q. Caelius and T. Quintius. The Sicilian records Metellus and Flamininus. Entropius and Orestes. Q. Caelius Metellus and T. Quintius Flamininus. Cicero in his Oration pleading for his house, call eth them T. Flamininus and Q. Metellus. This Q. Metellus was the eldest of the four sons of Macedonicus, whom Plutarch in his treatise of the Romans fortune, calleth Q. Metellus Balaericus, of the Baleares whom in this magnificity he conquered.

632 Cn. Domitius. C. Fannius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens join in fellowship of the consulate this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius. The Sicilian records, Enobarbus and Fannius. Cicero writeth of them in his Brutus, and Pliny in his second book and 32 chapters. Three moons (qd. he) appeared when Cn. Domitius and C. Fannius were Coss, which most men called the night-stars.

L. Opimius. 633 Q. Maximus.

This year had for consuls, Lu. Opimius and Q. Maximus, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Opimius and Maximus. But Obsequens, L. Opimius and Qm. Fabius Maximus. Pliny speaketh of them in his second book, laying, About the sun there appeared an arch or bow, when L. Opimius and Q. Fabius were consuls. This Qm. Fabius Maximus is by Cicero in Brutus, Florus in his Epitome, Velleius in his 2 book, and Padianus upon the Orations against Verrus, rightly named the nephew of Paulus, and son of F. Aemilianus. And lo may Strabo, Appian, and Pliny be well reproved, for making him and his father Aemilianus, all one. The same man, as Cicero and Pliny testify, was furnished Allobrogicus, upon a victory over the Allobroges. Of this L. Opimius consul, after whose name there was a while called Opimianum, Pliny maketh mention in his 14 book and 4 chap. Plutarch also in C. Gracchus, and Velleius in his second book.

634 P. Manlius. C. Papyrius.

Cassiodorus inferreth for this years consuls, P. Manlius and C. Papyrius. The Sicilian records Manlius and Carbo. This is that Cant Papyrius Carbo, who being a Tribune of the commons when Claudius and Terpenna were Coss, was afterwards by C. Gracchus appointed for one of the Triumvirs to divide lands: who first took part with the commons, but afterwards ranged with the nobility: of whom Cicero in many other places, and namely in his second book of a perfect Orator, maketh mention.

L. Caelius. 635 L. Aurelius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens put down for consuls, Lu. Caelius and Lu. Aurelius. The Sicilian catalogue, Metellus and Cotta. Plutarch in Marinus speaketh of C. Metellus and Cotta, consuls. Which Marinus he writeth to have born the Tribuneship of the commons, when there were consuls, and to have cast Metellus the consul into prison. This is that Cotta, in whose consular year Velleius reporteth, that C. Caesar Flamia of Jupiter, was created.

M. Cato. 636 Q. Martius.

This year had for consuls Mar. Cato and Q. Martius: witnesseth Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Cato and Martius, according to the Sicilian registers. But Entropius nameth them M. Porcius Cato and Q. Martius. Valerius speaketh of of them in his first book, and Pliny in his second book 31 chap. Gellius also in his 13 book and 19 chap.

L. Lucilius. 637 Q. Marcius.

Consuls next ensuing by Cassiodorus his saying, were L. Lucilius and Q. Marcius. After the Sicilian registers, Metellus and Scavola, if ye go by Entropius, L. Caelius Metellus and Q. Marcius Scavola. Now is this that L. Caelius Metellus, who afterwards upon subduing the Dalmatians, was furnished Dalmatians, whom Plutarch in Corioli and in his book of the Roman fortune, nameth Diadematus, for that a long time he bound up his forehead with a forehead of wreath which they call a diadem, to hide an ulcer that he had there. Hereupon, when Pompeius bound up his leg with a white band or garter, It makes no matter, qd. Favonius, in what part of the body a man wreatheth the diadem: upbraiding and reproaching him for his Kinglike power, in turning a small clout or pece of cloth by that name. This is that Q. Marcius Scavola the Augur, of whom Cicero in his book Lucius, and in the first book of an Orator maketh mention.

638 C. Licinius Geta. Q. Maximus.

Cassiodorus completeth together in society of Consulship this year, C. Licinius and Qm. Maximus. The Sicilian registers name them Geta and Eburinus. Of this Q. Maximus Cicero speaketh in his Oration for Murana. That this man was of the house of the Fabii, his surname Eburinus sheweth, of whom writeth Festus in this manner: Qm. Fabius was called Pallus Jovis, surname Eburinus, of whiteness, for that his buttock was blasted with lightning. Quintilian in his third Declamation reporteth, that this Fab. Eburinus had a son uncast of his body, whom he examined at home in his house, and thereupon put him to death. The same man Valerius calleth Qm. Fabius Servilianus. As for the name of this Licinius his father, obscure and unknown hitherto, Gellius out of an old antiquity of coin hath restored it, wherein, as he saith, was written plainly, C. Licinius Geta, son of Fabius.

639 M. Metellus. M. Scaurus.

The consuls next following by Cassiodorus his report, were M. Metellus and M. Scaurus. As for Metellus, the third son he was of Macedonicus. But as touching M. Scaurus, whom the writer of the book entituled of famous persons, calleth M. Aemilius Scaurus, thus writeth Padianus, M. Scaurus (qd. he) was a Patrician indited and of noble blood. but so, as the gentry of his house, for those descents before him lay obscure, for neither father, nor grandfire, by reason of their poor estate, and for want of putting forth themselves in the world, attained to dignity in weal publick. Moreover, of him Cicero maketh mention oftentimes in his Oration for Murana and in Brutus. Valerius also in his 5 book and 8 chap. and Pliny likewise in his 2 book and 36 chap.

M. Atilius Balbus. C. Cato. 640

Cassiodorus setteth down for consuls this year, M. Atilius Balbus, and C. Cato. The Sicilian catalogue Balbus and Cato. Obsequens M. Atilius and C. Porcius. Of the same consuls Pliny speaketh in the 2 book chap. 29, and 58. Plutarch in Marinus giveth to Atilius the surname Mauius. This C. Cato is the brother of that M. Cato, who four years before was Consul, nephew to M. Cato Conforius, and Africanus sisters son, as saith Velleius. Cicero against Verrus, and in Brutus.

C. Caelius. Cn. Papyrius. 641

Cassiodorus and Obsequens set down for next Consuls, C. Caelius and Cn. Papyrius. The Sicilian registers Metellus and Carbo. Entropius, C. Caelius Metellus, and Cn. Carbo. The same men Tacitus in his book of the manners of Germans reported to have born the Consulship, anno 640 after the foundation of Rome: in which year, both he and Obsequens do report, that the people of Rome began first to war with the Cimbrians and the Teutones. This C. Metellus was the fourth son of C. Metellus the son of Macedonicus: whom, when he died, he left a man of Pretors calling, and in suit and election for to be Consul. This man got a surname by way of reproach, as Cicero testifieth in his second book of a perfect Orator. Now furnished was he Capriarius, as Plutarch saith in the Life of the Romans.

642 M. Livius Drusus. L. Piso.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for this years Consuls, M. Livius Drusus and L. Piso. The Sicilian catalogue Drusus and Piso. L. Piso furnished Calpurnius a man of Consular degree, was slain aret by the Tigurini when Lu. Cassius was Consul, as Orestes testifieth.

643 P. Scipio. L. Calpurnius Bestia.

Cassiodorus nameth this year for Consuls, P. Scipio and L. Calpurnius Bestia. The Sicilian records Nafica and Bestia. Obsequens, P. Scipio and L. Calpurnius. Sallust, Entropius, and Orestes. P. Scipio Nafica and L. Calpurnius Bestia. Of these Consuls, P. Nafica Scipio and L. Bestia Patricius likewise maketh report, lib. 1, chap. 6. Moreover, Cicero in his Brutus writeth that P. Scipio the son of Pub. Scipio furnished Serapion and fellow Consul to L. Bestia, died in his Consulship. Of this Bestia there is some mention to be seen in a capitol fragment.

644
Sp. Posthumius. M. Minutius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Sp. Posthumius and M. Minutius. The Sicilian registers Albinus and Rufus, Salustius, Sp. Albinus and Q. Minutius Rufus. Of M. Minutius Velleius and the threecore and seventh Epitome make mention.

645
Q. Metellus. M. Silvanus.

Cassiodorus saith that the Consuls next following were Q. Metellus and M. Silvanus. The Sicilian catalogue sheweth Metellus and Silvanus, Padianus and Eutropius, Qu. Caecilius Metellus Numidicus, and M. Junius Silvanus. Of them also Cicero speaketh in Brutus. This Metellus was surnamed Numidicus for the conquest of Numidia, as witnesseth Velleius.

Ser. Galba. M. Scaurus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens deliver for the Consuls of this year, Servius Galba and M. Scaurus. The Sicilian evidences, Sulpicius and Scaurus. Cicero in the Oration for Rabirius, saith that S. Galba was a man of Consular degree, when Marius was the sixt time Consul. Of M. Scaurus the Consul, Velleius and Tacitus make mention. This is that M. A. Scaurus, who being afterwards in embassy was by the Cimbrians murdered, as appeareth in the threecore and seventh Epitome.

647
L. Cassius. C. Marius.

Cassiodorus joineith in the consulship this year, L. Cassius and C. Marius. Cicpinianus book and the Sicilian records, Longinus and in his Marius, Pliny also maketh mention of them in his 10 book and 13 chap. Cicero in his oration for Plancius; Plutarch in Marius; and Cicero again in his third book of Duties, writeth, that C. Marius having taken the repulse twice for the office of Aedileship, was created consul.

648
Q. Servilius Capio. C. Atilius.

Obssequens and Cassiodorus reach consuls together this year, Q. Servilius Capio and C. Atilius Serranus. The Sicilian monuments Capio and Serranus. In this year upon the third day of January, M. Tullius Cicero was born, as Gellius in his fiftenth book and eight and twentieth chap. hath best written. Much mention there is made of these consuls in Cicero and other ancient writers.

649
P. Rutilius Rufus. C. Manilius.

Publius Rutilius Rufus and C. Manilius, are put down by Obsequens and Cassiodorus for this years consuls. This P. Rutilius, Cicero in Brutus, calleth the son of Marcus. About the other consul the Annals do vary and dilagree: some forename him C. others Cneus. Some name him M. Manlius, others Mallius or Manlius. But all this controversy is decided by an old antiquity in stone at Putcoli: the inscription whereof testifieth that P. Rutilius and Cn. Mallius were Consuls: as also the evidence of the Sicilian registers, wherein written it is Rufus and Mallius. Of this Mallius mention there is made in Cicero's Orations for Plancius and Murana: likewise in Valerius, Salustius, Tacitus, Florus, Eutropius and Orosius. That he was not only a base man and of low birth, but also without all vertue and wit, in the courie of his life also vile and contemptible. Cicero, writeth in his Oration for Plancius. Whereby it easily appeareth, that the Mallii were a kindred different from the Manlii. For of Cn. Manlius a Patrician, and that of a most noble house, Cicero would never have spoken in such terms.

650
C. Marius II. C. Flavius Fimbria.

The next Consuls are set down by Cassiodorus, C. Marius the second time, and C. Flavius Fimbria: by Obsequens, C. Marius and C. Flavius. By the Sicilian registers Marius and Fimbria: by Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius, C. Marius the second time, and C. Fimbria: Item, C. Marius and Caius Flavius. Besides, Cicero, Velleius, Valerius, Plutarch, and others speak often of these Consuls.

651
C. Marius III. L. Anrelus Orestes.

Cassiodorus reporteth for this years Consuls, C. Marius the third time, and L. Anrelus Orestes. The Sicilian catalogue, Marius and Orestes. Moreover, Marius even in his absence was elected Consul the third time, for fear of the Cimbrian war which was defeated, as Velleius, Eutropius, the Breviary, and Cicero in his Oration concerning Provinces, do testify.

652
C. Marius IV. Q. Lutatius.

Next after them are put down for Consuls by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, C. Marius the fourth time, and Q. Lutatius. The Sicilian registers exhibit unto us Marius and Caius, Plutarch and Eutropius, Caius Marius the fourth day of January, and Q. Lutatius, Caius. Of these Consuls, Cicero and Pliny oftentimes make mention.

653

C. Marius V. M. Aquilius.

Then succeeded in the Consulship by the testimony of Cassiodorus, C. Marius the fift time, and M. Aquilius. Of this C. Marius five times now Consul, Plutarch and Florus give report. And Cicero in his second book of a perfect Orator nameth M. Aquilius for the companion of C. Marius in his fift consulship. Of whom Plutarch in Marius speaketh and calleth him Publius, as also Appian in Mithridatica. Now this Marius Aquilius a Consular man, is the same who afterwards being an Ambassador, was by King Mithridates taken prisoner, and most villanously tormented and mangled.

C. Marius VI. L. Valerius Flaccus.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens shew unto us for this years consuls, C. Marius the sixt time, and L. Valerius Flaccus. The Sicilian records, Marius and Flaccus. This L. Flaccus afterwards Censor) was President of the Senat, and matter of the horiemen under Syll. Dictator. Of these consuls Cicero speaketh very often, and namey, in his Brutus, in his oration for Rabirius, against Caesar and Antonius: and also in the defence of Plancius. Pliny likewise in his second book, P. Flaccus, and Padianus upon the oration against Piso. Moreover, Plutarch, and many authors besides. In this year (upon the twelfth day of July then called Quintilis, as Macrobium witnesseth) was C. Caesar born, who afterwards, was surnamed D. Calator.

M. Antonius. A. Postumius.

Reported it is by Cassiodorus and Obsequens, that M. Antonius and A. Postumius were Consuls this year. The Sicilian registers, shew Albinus and Antonius. In a fragment also of the capitol marbles, mention there is of A. Postumius, Cicpinianus book and the Greek records, have Antonius and Albinus. Of these Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his oration to the citizens of Rome, after his return out of exile. Likewise, Pliny in his 8 book and 7 chap, where he noteth this the 655 year. Also Gellius in his 4 book and 6 chap.

Q. Metellus. T. Didius.

Quintus Metellus and T. Didius succeeded consuls next in this year, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do write. And Padianus upon the oration for Cornelius, nameth them: Capio (saith he) acquired Q. Metellus Nepos, son of Balaerus, and nephew of Macedonius, who was Consul with T. Didius. Cicero speaketh of the same man in his oration after his return.

657
Cn. Lentulus. P. Crassus.

Not only Cassiodorus, but the Sicilian registers also, do testify, that Cn. Lentulus and P. Crassus were Consuls this year: and Obsequens nameth them, Cn. Cornelius and P. Licinius. Pliny writeth of them in his tenth book and first chap. also in his 33 book and second chapter.

658
Cn. Domitius. C. Cassius.

This year had for Consuls, Cn. Domitius and C. Cassius, as Cassiodorus and Obsequens do witness. Cicpinianus and the Greek registers shew Enobarbus and Longinus. A fragment of P., Elacus his marbles. Enobarbus and C. Cassius son of Lucius, Padianus speaketh of them upon the oration for Cornelius.

659
L. Crassus. Q. Scaevola.

Lucius Crassus and Q. Scaevola were consuls next following, according to Cassiodorus and Obsequens. In a fragment of the capitol records as touching Consuls, is to be seen Crassus and Mutius. In Consortius, we find L. Licinius son of Scaevola, Cicero in his Brutus writeth that Crassus the orator bare all dignities of magistracy, together with Scaevola the high-priest, except the Tribunal of commons, and the Consulship: also that whiles they two were Consuls, Q. Pompeius pleaded the first cause that ever he undertook at the bar. Padianus upon the oration of Cicero for Cornelius, maketh mention of L. Licinius Crassus the Orator, and Q. Mutius Scaevola the arch-bishop, an orator besides and a professed lawyer, both Consuls together.

C. Calpurnius. L. Domitius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens do laye for this years Consuls, C. Calpurnius and L. Domitius. The Sicilian registers, Calpurnius and Domitius. In a capitol fragment, they are Calpurnius and L. Domitius son of Calpurnius. As for Calpurnius it is the surname of Calpurnius. For Velleius maketh mention of one C. Calpurnius under Augustus. In his 18 book and 1 chap. he noteth this the 660 year. The using for a Consulship and in his oration for Mutius. And Padianus upon the Oration for Cornelius. And Cicero in his Brutus, nameth them next before Herennius.

661
C. Valerius Flaccus. M. Herennius.

There are matched by Cassiodorus and Obsequens for consuls this year, C. Valerius Flaccus and M. Herennius. The Sicilian records, Flaccus and Herennius. A broken stone of the capitol, hath Flaccus and M. Herennius. Pliny in his 29 book and 3 chap, Cicero also in his Oration for Murana, and in Brutus, speaketh of them.

C. Claudius Pulcher, M. Perpenna.

Consuls this year, were C. Claudius Pulcher, and M. Perpenna, as witness Cassiodorus and Obsequens. Likewise in a Capitol broken monument, and in the Sicilian register, it is Pulcher and M. Perpenna. Cicero maketh mention of this Claudius as Pretor of Sicily, in the fourth Oration against Verrus; and as Edile Curule, in his second book of Offices. So doth Pliny in his 8 book,

663

L. Martius. Sext. Julius.

Cassiodorus and Obsequens name for consuls this year, L. Martius and Sext. Julius. The Sicilian records, Philip and Cesar, Entropius and Orosius. Sex. Julius Cesar, and L. Martius Philippus. A Capitol fragment, Philip and Sex. Julius son of Cinna. Pliny speaketh of them in his 2 book 8 chapr. also in the 33 book and 3 chapr. In like manner Cicero many times, and Valerius.

L. Julius Caesar, P. Rustius Lupus.

According to Cassiodorus and Obsequens the Consuls this year were L. Julius Caesar, and P. Rustus Lupus. And so it is in Publius Valerius, and the 73 Epitome: as also in other authors who have written of the Mithran war. In a fragment of the Capitol, are they seen written, Cesar, and P. Rustus son of Rufus. In the Sicilian records, Cesar and Lupus. Cicero in his book of Divination, speaketh of them both: and in his oration for Plancius he writeth, that L. Caesar missing of an Edileship became a Consul.

665

L. Porcius, Cn. Pompeius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, L. Porcius and Cn. Pompeius. Padianus upon the Orator for Cornelius, furnished Cn. Pompeius. Sextus and L. Porcius, Cato. The Capitol fragment shew no more but Sextus and Cato. Appian hath made mention of these consuls: so have Orosius and others that have perceived the Mithran war. This Cn. Pompeius was father to that Cn. Pompeius the Great: as Appian witnesseth, and Padian upon the Orator against Riso.

666

Cassiodorus sheweth for this years Consuls, L. Sylla and Q. Pompeius: and the same is written in Obsequens, Velleius, Entropius, Orosius, Appian, Plutarch, and others. The Sicilian records have Sylla and Rutilius. Sylla after his victory in the civil war, would needs have himself sturnamed Felix: and therefore Padian and the avouchers of the Capitol monuments, in report-ting this consular, write thus: L. Sylla, who afterwards was called Felix. The same man in his second Consulship, (which appeareth upon record in the Capitol) is named the son of Lucius, and nephew of Paulus. Moreover, of Q. Pompeius Rufus, Cicero maketh mention in his Brutus.

L. Cornelius Cinna, Cn. Octavius.

Reported there are by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers for Consuls this year, L. Cinna and Cn. Octavius. Appian, Velleius, and the rest, who have recorded the history of this time, name them L. Corn. Cinna, and Cn. Octavius. Plutarch writeth, that L. Cinna being of the adverse faction to L. Sylla, was by him made consul, upon condition, that he should not cross nor stand against the proceeding of the said L. Sylla: and so soon as he was entered into place of government, he began to trouble and disquiet the present state of the common-wealth, yea, and intended an addition against Sylla, by the means of Virginius a Tribune of the commons. Howbeit Sylla concerning Virginius, made an expedition against Mithridates.

668

L. Cinna II., C. Marius III.

After this, were Consuls, C. Marius the seventh time, and L. Cinna the second time, according to the records of Sicily, Cassiodorus, and those that wrote of the civil war. Plutarch saith, that Marius was the first man that was seven times consul of Rome. Moreover, as it is to be seen in Appian, and in the Breviaries, L. Cinna and C. Marius, without any lawful assembly for Election, declared themselves Consuls against this year, and the very same day that they entered into their magistracy Marius commanded Sext. Licinius a Senator, to be thrown down from the rock Tarpeta: who after he had committed many heinous crimes and outrages, ended his daies upon the Ides of January: in whose room was subordinated, L. Val. Flaccus, even he (as men think) who before-time was colleague to C. Marius in his first Consulship: of whom Sicero maketh mention in his Orator for his son Flaccus.

669

L. Cinna III., Cn. Papirius.

Cassiodorus witnesseth, that the Consuls succeeding in this year, were L. Cinna the third time, and Cn. Papirius. The Sicilian records, have Cinna and Carbo. In the 83 Breviary it is written, that L. Cinna and Cn. Papirius Carbo, for two years together usurped the Consulate. Also in the book entitled, Of famous persons, we read, that Cinna made himself Consul a second and third time. Of these Consuls Plutarch speaketh in Sylla. Appian in Mithridates, and in the first book of civil wars.

670

L. Cinna IV., Cn. Papirius II.

Next were Consuls, after Cassiodorus and the Epitomis, L. Cinna the fourth time, and and Cn. Papirius the second time. Cicero in his Tuclulan questions mentioneth Cinna four times Consul: so doth Suetonius in Cesar. And of Cn. Papirius Carbo twice Consul, the Capitol tables do yeeld testimony. As for the Sicilian records, they put down for consul, (not without suspicion of error) Carbo and Scribonius.

L. Scipio, C. Norbanus.

Besides the Sicilian tables, Cassiodorus, Obsequens, Appian, Entropius, Florus, and Tacitus in his nineteenth book do witness, that L. Scipio, and C. Norbanus were Consuls. In the Capitol fragments it is written, L. Cornelius son of Lucius, nephew of L. Scipio Africanus.

M. Carius, Cn. Carbo III.

I Find in Cassiodorus, Appianus, Velleius, and others, the next consuls to have been C. Marius and Cn. Carbo the third time. This C. Marius was the brothers son of C. Marius seven times consul, according to Appian: but Velleius, Plutarch, Entropius and others, say that he was the son of that C. Marius: and haply indeed he was adopted by C. Marius. Certainly, in the Capitol tables, he is called C. Marius, son of C. and nephew of Cicero. Cicero speaketh of these Consuls against Rullus: Pliny also in his 17 book and they who have set down in writing the civil wars of Sylla.

M. Tullius, Cn. Dolabella.

Next to these, Cassiodorus bringeth in for consuls, M. Tullius and Cn. Dolabella. The Sicilian records, have Decula and Dolabella. Appian also reporteth, that Sylla Dictator, to the end that the state and common-wealth might seem to retain some shew yet of her ancient dignity, permitted M. Tullius and Cornelius Dolabella to be created consuls, whiles himself after the manner of Kiste aloft in a throne above them, Cicero in his oration against Rullus, and Gellius in his 15 book and 33 chapr. maketh mention of M. Tullius and Cn. Cornelius consuls. In a Capitol fragment, this M. Tullius, son of M. nephew of A. is sturnamed Decula.

674

L. Sylla II., Q. Metellus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers, set down for Consuls, L. Sylla the second time, and Q. Metellus. Appian saith moreover, that Sylla, Dictator though he was, yet stood content and willing to be declared consul with Q. Metellus Pius, to the end that the common-wealth might seem to have some likeness yet of a free state. Of these consuls, Cicero maketh mention in his Orations against Verrus, and elsewhere. Gellius likewise in his 15 book and 28 chapter, together with Cassiodorus. This Metellus was sturnamed Pius. He it is, who was by lot appointed to manage the wars in Spain and against Sertorius: and son he was to Nimidicus.

675

P. Servilius. App. Claudius.

The next consuls, were P. Servilius and App. Claudius, as witnesseth Cassiodorus. In the Sicilian tables, it appeareth that their surnames were, Vatia and Pulcher: of whom Appianus writeth thus: The people of Rome in obsequious mannerto court Sylla the Dictator, requested of him that he would continue consul till another year: But Sylla would none of that: and took order, that Ser. Iulianus and Claudius Pulcher, should be declared Cof. In a fragment of the Capitol he is thus written: Pub. Servilius Vatia, called afterwards Iulianus: which surname he took of the Iulians, a nation in Syria whom he subdued. My authors are, Padianus upon the Orations of Cicero against Verrus; Strahon in his 14 book: Marcellinus likewise in his 14 book, with others.

676

M. Lepidus, Q. Catulus.

M. Lepidus and Q. Catulus, are by Cassiodorus named Consuls for this year. Plutarch reporteth, that when L. Sylla had given up his Dictatorship, and restored again to the people of Rome the free liberty to dispose of consular dignities in their solemn assemblies for elections: M. Lepidus an enemy to Sylla, and an audacious person, was declared Consul before Catulus, and had the prebeminence above him, by the earnest endeavour of Cn. Pompeius. Of these Consuls, Pliny maketh mention in his 36 book, wherein he saith, that they governed in the year 676. Likewise, Cicero in his Oration for Cornelius: Florus out of Livy: Valerius a book 3 chapr. and Entropius.

M. Aemilius, D. Brutus.

This year had for Consuls, by the testimony of Cassiodorus and Obsequens, M. Aemilius and D. Brutus, Macer, a Tribune of the commons, speaketh of them in Salsus, complaining that the commons were by the nobles oppressed. In like sort, Cicero in Brutus, and in his second book of Duties, as also Valerius in the 7 book and 7 chapr. This M. Aemilius was sturnamed Lepidus and Livianus: for out of the family of Livies he was adopted by M. Lepidus, and therefore right well he is called, son of M. Aemilius.

Cn. Octavius, C. Curio.

Verrus Flaccus setteth down for Consuls, Cn. Octavius son of M. nephew of C. and C. Scribonius Curio. The same doth Cicero report in Brutus. So do Salsus, Obsequens, Laetantius in his first book, and Pliny in his second book and and 35 chapter. Cic. in his Brutus, and Pliny in his 7 book and 41 chap. make report of three Caii Curiati, all Orators to wit, the father, the son, and the sons son or nephew.

L. Ollavius, C. Cotta.

Cassiodorus putteth down for consuls this year, L. Ollavius and C. Cotta. Obligatus, C. Aurelius and L. Ollavius. Pliny in his second book and 35 chap. Cicero likewise in his third and fifth Orations against Verres, maketh mention of L. Ollavius, and C. Aurelius consuls. Upon the broken marbles of the capitol, they stand to be seen, L. Ollavius son of Cn. nephew of Cn. and C. Aurelius. This year the Sicilian registers over-skip. Padianus writeth, that there were at this time three Cotta's brethren, and all of consular degree, namely, Caius, Marcius and Lucius.

680

L. Licinius Lucullus, M. Cotta.

For this years consuls, Cassiodorus registreth L. Lucullus, and M. Cotta. The Sicilian records, Lucullus and Cotta, Entropius, Appianus in Mithridatica, and Plutarch in Lucullus, nameth them, L. Licinius Lucullus, and M. Aurelius Cotta. Mention there is made of them by Cicero against Verres; and by Florus in the 93 and 94 Epitomes. This L. Lucullus had for his grand-father that Lucullus, who was consul with A. Albinus, as Cicero and Plutarch do testify.

M. Lucullus, C. Cassius.

This year (by the testimony of Cassiodorus) had for consuls, M. Lucullus, and C. Cassius: but the Sicilian records, nominate Marcellus and Cassius: whom Cicero in an oration against Verres, nameth M. Terentius and C. Cassius: saying that the laws Terentia and Cassia, were by them promulg'd. For, so far forth as we may conjecture by the capitol fragments, M. Licinius Lucullus, was adopted by M. Terentius Varro, and therefore called M. Terentius Varro Lucullus. Cicero in Lucullus, and Plutarch, call L. Lucullus and M. Lucullus brethren, whom Entropius nameth coin Germans by two sisters. That the surname of Cassius was Varus, appeared both by a conduit pipe or waterpout of lead found in Rome, and also for that Appian in his fourth book, writeth that C. Cassius Varus, a man who had been Consul, was condemned and outlawed by the Triumvirs.

L. Gellius, Cn. Lentulus.

The consuls next following, by the report of Cassiodorus, were L. Gellius and Cn. Lentulus. In like sort Cicero maketh mention of them in his oration for Balbus, and elsewhere. Plutarch also in Craffus, with Entropius and Orosius. Cassiodorus book sheweth Poplicola and Lentulus. Now the surname of L. Gellius was Poplicola, as witnesseth Omnipetrus.

683 Cn. Aufidius, P. Lentulus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for consuls this year, Cn. Aufidius, and P. Lentulus. The Sicilian registers have Lentulus and Orestes. Entropius, C. Lentulus and Cn. Aufidius Orestes. This Cn. Aufidius Orestes, when he went beside a Tribuneship of the commons, was chosen consul, as Cicero writeth in his oration for Plautius. This is that P. Lentulus surnamed Sura, who afterwards, being a man of consular calling, and who had been twice Pretor, was hanged and strangled to death when Cicero was consul, for that he had conspired with Caecilus: whose grand-father was P. Lentulus President of the Senat, as Cicero saith, pleading for his house, and inveighing against Caecilus: as also Padianus.

M. Craffus, Cn. Pompeius.

Next to them were Coss, M. Craffus and Cn. Pompeius, according to Cassiodorus, Plutarch, Appian, and the Sicilian records. Their surnames for certain, were Dives and Magnus. All the old writers speak much of this their first Consulship. Plutarch reporteth that L. Craffus attained to the Consular dignity, by the means of Pompeius the consul. Besides Cicero, Salustius, Padian writing upon the oration for Cornelius, and all other authors speak of these consuls.

685

Q. Metellus, Q. Hortensius.

Then followed consuls, Q. Metellus and Q. Hortensius, as Cassiodorus and the Sicilian catalogue do testify. Padianus matcheth Q. Metellus Creticus with Q. Hortensius that great Orator: Likewise, Josephus in his fourteenth book of Jewish antiquities. Cicero in Brutus calleth this Q. Hortensius, the son of Lucius, Q. Metellus afterwards upon the conquest made of Crete surnamed Creticus, was the son of L. Dolmoneus, as may be gathered out of Padianus upon the Oration of Tully [called Divinatio] against Verres.

L. Metellus, Q. Marcius.

Padianus writing upon Tully's Oration against Piso: Dio likewise and Cassiodorus join together in the consulship this year, L. Caelius Metellus, and Q. Marcius. The Greek records, Marcius Rex, and Metellus. This Metellus, Dio writeth to have died in the very beginning of his magistracy: that he also who was substituted in his room, left this life before he entered into the government: and thereupon it was not thought good to subeject any more; and by that means Q. Marcius bare that dignity alone: and him Salustius entituleth with the surname of Rex. This L. Metellus was brother to Q. Creticus, as Padian witnesseth.

687

687 C. Piso, M. Glabrio.

There succeeded Consuls, C. Piso and M. Glabrio, witness Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records. And in Dio they follow immediately by the name of Manius Acilius and C. Piso. Cicero in his twelfth book of Epistles to Atticus, speaketh of C. Piso and M. Acilius Glabrio, men of Consular place and calling. Padian in his commentaries upon the oration for Cornelius maketh mention of C. Piso and the law Calpurnia by him made, as something inordinate and indirect since after dignities of state. Moreover, of them Valerius in his fourth book writeth.

M. Lepidus, L. Volcatius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Manius Lepidus, and with him L. Torquatus, but untruly. The Greek records have Volcatius Tullus. Dio L. Tullus, and Emilius Lepidus. Salustius in Caecilus, L. Tullus and M. Lepidus. Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, M. Lepidus and L. Volcatius. Cicero in his oration for Sulla hath L. Volcatius Tullus: so as it appeareth it should be, M. Emilius Lepidus, and L. Volcatius Tullus.

L. Cotta, L. Torquatus.

The Consuls eleb, were L. Autronius Patus (as it appeareth upon a monument of a triumph in the capitol, and not Autronius, as commonly it is read), and P. Cornelius Sulla: who being condemned for ambitious seeking after that office, and having therefore suffered condign punishment, their accusers stept into their place of government, namely, L. Aurelius son of Marcus, surnamed Cotta: and L. Manlius son of Lucius, surnamed also Torquatus: as testify Salustius, Dio, Padian upon the oration for Cornelius, and that which he made in his white robe: and lastly, Tranquillus in Caesar.

690

The year next ensuing had for Consuls, by the testimony of Cassiodorus, Padianus, and the Sicilian records, L. Caesar and C. Figulus, whom Dio calleth Lucius Caesar, and Lucius Marcius son of Caius, surnamed Figulus. Cicero in his oration for Sulla, nameth them L. Julius and C. Figulus: so doth Salustius in Caecilus. This, L. Julius Caesar is his son who was Consul in the Maritan war.

691

M. Cicero, C. Antonius.

The Consuls this year, were M. Tullius son of M. surnamed Cicero, and C. Antonius son of M. as testify Dio in his seven and thirtieth book, Cassiodorus, Salustius in his Caecilian oration, Velleius in his second book, Joseph in his Jewish antiquities 14 book 8 chapter. Pliny in his eight book and three and fiftieth chapter, Tranquillus in the life of A. gustus, Appian, Entropius, Padian, and others.

There followed consuls next, D. Silanus, and L. Murena, as Cassiodorus, Salustius, and the Sicilian records do witness. Dio calleth them D. Junius son of M. surnamed Silanus, and L. Licinius son of L. surnamed Murena. Entropius nameth them D. Junius Silanus, and L. Licinius, son of that L. Murena who in quality of Pro-petor triumphed over Mithridates (as Cicero saith) pleading for Murena himself, being accused and in trouble for unlawful seeking to be Cof. In this assembly for election of Cof. L. Sergius Catilina suffered the second repulse: for anger whereof, In a melancholy he brake out into a conspiracy, and practised against the state: and likewise Servius Sulpicius Rufus the lawyer, who afterwards accused Murena for the crime aforesaid.

M. Pupius, M. Valerius.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year, M. Pupius and M. Valerius. The Sicilian registers, Piso and Messala. Dio, M. Pupius, son of M. surnamed Piso: and M. Valerius son of M. surnamed Messala Niger. Of this Messala Niger, there is also mention made by Padian upon the oration for Scaurus. Also of M. Messala and M. Piso, in Plinius seventh book, and six and twentieth chapter, seven and thirtieth book, cap. second, and the eighth book, chap. six and twenty. And in Caesar's first book of the Gauls war. Of M. Piso Padian likewise speaketh writing upon the oration against Piso.

Q. Metellus, Q. Asinius.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers nominate for this years Consuls, Q. Metellus and L. Asinius. The like doth Obligatus and Cicero in his first book of Epistles to Atticus. Dio nameth them L. Asinius son of L. and Q. Cecilius son of Q. surnamed Metellus Celer. Both of them were advanced to the Consulate (as Dio witnesseth) by the means of Pompeius, for they had been both twain his Lieutenants serving under him in Asia.

C. Caesar, M. Bibulus.

Cassiodorus, Suetonius, together with the Sicilian tables and the Breviaries, do match together for consuls this year, C. Caesar and M. Bibulus. Dio, C. Julius son of C. Caesar, and M. Calpurnius, Plutarch and Appian, C. Julius Caesar, and C. Bibulus. Albeit Appian as also Entropius and Orosius give Bibulus the forename of Lucius. Of Caesar and Bibulus, Cicero speaketh in his first book of Epistles, writing to Lentulus.

696

L. Pifo. A. Gabinus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records shew for Consuls this year, L. Pifo and A. Gabinus. Dio. L. Calpurnius (son of L. Pifo) and A. Gabinus son of Aulus. Caesar, Cicero, Plutarch, and C. Cassiodorus, L. Pifo, and A. Gabinus, Caesar writeth of them in his first book of the Gauls war, and Plutarch in the life of Cato the younger, Cicero also in his oration against Pifo and for Sex-tius. This Pifo the Consul Cicero and Padian surnamed Censorius, for so his grand-father before him was called, as appeareth in the capitol records for the year 606.

697
P. Lentulus. Q. Metellus.

The Consuls following for this year, were by Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records, P. Lentulus and Q. Metellus. By Dio, Pub. Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Spinther and Q. Caelius son of Q. Metellus Nepos. Of them speaketh Valerius in his ninth book. Lentulus (qd. he) and Metellus companions in the consularship were beheld and seen both upon the stage like plaiers: but the one of them took the surname of Spinther * one of the second sort of actors: the other, but that he had gotten the name of * Nepos already for his lewd behaviour, should have been called Pampulus, after the name of * one of a third sort, whom for all the world he resembled. Of the same men, Cicero in his first book of Epistles, and in very many of his orations, Plutarch in his seventh book and second chapter, Plutarch in the life of Cicero, and all other writers make much mention, 698

Cn. L. Lentulus. L. Philippus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Cn. Lentulus and L. Philippus. The Sicilian records, Marcellus and Philippus. Dio, Cn. Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus Marcellus: and L. Marcus son of Lucius Philippus. Of Lentulus and M. Marcellus Consuls, Cicero speaketh in his Epistles to Lentulus. Plutarch also in the life of Cato, maketh mention of Marcus Philippus now Consul. This Cn. Lentulus was the son of that P. Lentulus, as Cicero saith in his Brutus. And surnamed he was Marcellus, and not Claudius, that it might be known, of what family of the Claudii he was descended.

696
Cn. Pompeius. M. Crassus.

When as by the obstinate persistence of C. Cato Tribun of the commons, (who ever interposed his negative) there could be no ordinary assembly holden for the creation of magistrates the whole degree of the Senators changed their weed in token of grief: so as upon an Interregency between, Cn. Pompeius was chosen Consul, and with him M. Crassus the second time, as Plutarch, Dio, and Appian do witness. Lucius Domitius Enobarbus, whom Cato and all good men accompanied and presented, was in the common place by violence throngly beaten, and Cato himself wounded. These Coss. Dio calleth Cn. Pompeius, son of Cn. Magnus the second time: and M. Licinius son of Publius Crassus, the second time. Of them Padian, Eutropius, the Sicilian registers and others make mention.

Ap. Claudius. L. Domitius.

Dio in his nine and thirtieth book, for the year after the cities foundation 700, following the computation of Varro, avoucheth Consuls, Appius Claudius, son of Appius Pulcher: and L. Domitius son of Cneus, Enobarbus, Cassiodore and Obsequens, name them, Ap. Claudius and L. Domitius, whom the Sicilian records call Pulcher and Enobarbus: and Padian upon the Oration for Scavrus, L. Domitius Enobarbus, and Appius Claudius Pulcher. Of this L. Domitius, son of Cneus Enobarbus, Caelius speaketh in the eight book of Cicero's Epistles.

701
Cn. Domitius. M. Messala.

Against this year there rood in election and laboured with much earnestness and ambitious desire to be Consuls, Cneus Mammius, Cn. Domitius, M. Messala and M. Scavrus, as Cicero writeth to his brother Quintus. But at the last, even in the seventh month of this year there were created by means of an Interregency, M. Messala and Cn. Domitius. Neither had they been choien then: but that Q. Pompeius Rufus a Tribun of the commons, who still opposed himself to hinder and debar all election, was by order from the Senate committed: and the Senate made countenance to do the like by the rest, as many as went about to cross the said election. Thus much Dio. But Appian saith that the common-weal continued for eight months space in Anarchy without any sovereign magistrats of state. Plutarch writeth, that in this so great extremity of danger, Lucilius a Tribun of the commons, preferred a bill for the creating of Cneus Pompeius Dictator, who should redress all enormities and set upright the state again: but Cato gainstaid it, and so nothing was effected. Dio saith moreover, that the Tribuns of the commons moved for the chusing not of a Dictator only, but also of military Tribuns in consuls authority: but through the earnest labour of Pompeius, Consuls were created, Messala and Calpurnius, which surnames stand to be seen upon the Sicilian records. Also in the capitol monuments, written it is thus. Cn. Domitius Calpurnius son of M. nephew of Marcus, anno 708 and 717.

702
Cn. Pompeius. Q. Metellus.

When by reason of the contentions among so mighty competitors, the Consuls could not be created by the Calends of January: there passed an Act of the Senat, according to the mind and advice of Bibulus, by vertue whereof Cn. Pompeius was by the Interregent Serv. Sulpicius created Consul the third time, upon the five and twentieth of February, without a Collegue first, and presently entred upon the government. But afterwards to avoid the envy that might arise thereupon, he took unto him as companion in the Consulship for the five last months of the year behind, Q. Caelius Pius Metellus Scipio, his wives father. Thus writeth Padian upon the Oration of Cicero in defence of Milo: Plutarch likewise, Appianus and Dio. This Metellus Pius Scipio was also called P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica son of Nasica Scipio, who being adopted by Q. Metellus Pius, is called by Caelius in the familiar Epistles of Cicero, Q. Caelius son of Q. nephew of Q. Metellus Pius Scipio.

M. Marcellus. Ser. Sulpicius.

Against this year were Consuls created, M. Marcellus, and Serv. Sulpicius, as Cassiodorus, Plutarch, and Appian witness. The Sicilian records call them Rufus and Marcellus, Dio nameth them Servius Sulpicius son of Q. surnamed Rufus, and M. Claudius son of M. surnamed also Marcellus. Of these Consuls Suetonius also maketh mention in Caesar: likewise Cicero in his Epistles, and the Epitome 118. This Marcellus was the cousin german of that Marcellus who the year next following was Consul: and brother german to him who two years after bare the Consulship, as may be collected out of Verrius Flaccus, Dio, and Suetonius.

704
L. Paulus. C. Marcellus.

There succeeded Consuls, L. Paulus, and C. Marcellus: witness Cassiodorus, Dio, Suetonius, Hirtius in his 8 book, together with the Sicilian records. The one of these is by Dio named L. Emilius, son of Marcus, surnamed Paulus: the other by Cicero in his Epistles, C. Claudius son of Cneus, Marcellus. Dio writeth, that this man by some was reported to be adopted: i.e. the brothers son, others adoped by the brother of Mar. Marcellus, but Suetonius saith plainly, he was the brothers son.

705
L. Lentulus. C. Marcellus.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls this year L. Lentulus & C. Marcellus, as also Appian, Plutarch, Hirtius, Florus, and Cicero in his Epistles do testify. Dio calleth these Consuls

L. Cornelius, son of Publius, Lentulus: and C. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus. In the broken marbles of the Capitoll it is to be seen this C. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of Marcus Marcellus. This is that Lucius Lentulus Cras, who as Caelius testifieth in the former election took a repulse, and by Cicero is called in the Oratio against Catulus, Flamen Martialis.

C. Caesar. P. Servilius.

When Gaius Caesar the Dictator held the solemn assembly for the election, in the latter end of the former year, Consuls there were created Cains Julius, son of Cains Caesar, and Pub. Servilius, son of Publius Sulpicius. For now was the year come, when as Caesar by the laws might be chosen Consul: for so in the third book of his own Commentaries he saith himself, and so Dio in his one and fortieth book, Plutarch, Tranquillus, Appianus, and Cassiodorus do testify of him. But he meaneth that law which expressly forbade and debarred, that no man might be within ten years a space chosen Cof, twice. As for Publius Servilius, he was the son of that Publius Servilius that first took the surname Scaevola, who this year bare his Consulship at Rome, while Caesar warred in Macedonia.

Q. Fabius Calenus. P. Vatinus.

Dio saith, That the people of Rome having intelligence that Pompeius was murdered, endeavoured earnestly, that there might pass honourable decrees for Caesar the Conqueror as possible might be. And therefore they ordained, that he might be Consul five years together, and Dictator not for six months as beforetime, but a whole year: and endowed with the Tribunes authority for ever. Now Caesar, altho it he was without Italy, immediately entred upon his Dictatorship, having sub-ordained under him for his General of the horie, Mar. Antonius, a man who yet had not been Prator. This appeareth by the Capitoll records, Dio, Plutarch, and Cicero in his second Philippica. But under what pretence and colour Caesar took upon him this Dictatorship and the rest following, Marcus Antonius sheweth in his Oration of Caesars praise in Dio: wherein he saith, that Caesar was created Dictator to make head against the enemies and therefore the troubles and dissensions of war was the cause of this creation. But certain it is that Caesar became Dictator for another cause, namely, that by the means of that sovereign power, he might draw unto himself alone the whole managing and government of the State, which beforetime had been administered by many persons. But Dio addeth moreover and saith, that in the beginning of this year there were neither Prators nor Consuls elected. For Marcus Antonius General of the horie, arrayed in his purple robes, with six Dictors, making way before him, resembled a certain certain shew of the ancient liberty. But within a while after he departed forth of the City, and that which never was before done by any Master of the horse, he left Lu. Cæsar an aged man, Provet and governor of Rome. However, in the end of the year, after the recovery and conquest of Ægypt, when King Ptolemæus was slain, and Pharnaces K. of Pontus vanquished, Consuls were created, Q. Fufius, son of Quintus, Calenus; and Pub. Vatinius, son of Vatinius.

And these the Capitoll tables do shew, and Cassiodorus also. Of Publius Vatinius Consul, Macrobius in his second book maketh mention.

708

C. Cæsar. M. Lepidus.

Verrius in his capitoll tables setteth forth
Consuls of this year, only without ever a Dictator. The none record of Calpurnius, whereof Onuphrius speaketh here, nameth C. Julius Cæsar the third time, and M. Emilius Lepidus. But Dio in his three and fortieth book, The next year following (quoth he) he bare the Dictatorship and the Consulat both, the third time, and took unto him for his Colleague in both Magistracies, M. Emilius Lepidus. Of the same mind setteth Tranquillus to be in Cæsar, chap.
seventy six. Likewise Hirtius in the fit book.
But Onuphrius suppoeth that both Tranquillus and Diogenes, and Hirtius also was in an error.
For, with the capitoll records, Plutarch and Eusebius agree: who write that Cæsar this year was Consul the third time with M. Lepidus, and Dictator the second time.

C. Cæsar. Q. Maximus.

They who cut the capitoll marbles do shew unto us that Cæsar this year was third time Dictator with M. Lepidus General of the horse.
From whom Dio differeth; who doth report that this year Cæsar was Dictator the 4 time, and Lepidus second time Master of the horsemen: also that Lepidus fellow- Consul with Cæsar, declareth himself against all law, General of the horse. Thus much of the Dictator. But as touching the Consuls this year, there is to be seen written in the Index or table of Dio, that the same year Cæsar bare his fourth Dictatorship, and likewise his fourth Consulat without Colleague. In that history also it appeareth, that Cæsar presently entered upon his fourth Consulat, but bare it not throughout the whole year: and that so soon as he was returned to Rome out of Spain, he resigned and substituted in his place for the rest of the year, Q. Fabius Maximus, and Cn. Trebonius. With Dio, the evidences agree that are written in the capi-toll fragments: wherein it appeareth that Cæsar was the fourth time Consul, and that without a Colleague: as Sigonius maketh interpretation. For Cassianus Kalender, together with the Sicilian registers, do shew that Cæsar was Consul now alone the fourth time. In like manner, Appian and Plutarch make mention of Cæsar, who being Consul elect from the fourth time led an army into Spain. As for Q. Fabius, Suetonius calleth him a three months Consul.

Dio saith moreover, that Cæsar upon the death of Q. Fufius the Consul, declared the very last day of the year, C. Cæsar to be the Consul for those few hours that were behind.
Whereof Cicero in his seventh book of Epistles, writing to Cicilius, Macrobius in his second book of Saturnalia, Tacitus in his eighteenth book, Pliny in his seventh, and Suetonius in Cæsar do make report.

710

C. Cæsar. M. Antonius.

Dio setteth down for this year Cæsar Dictator the fifth time, together with M. Emilius Lepidus Master of the horse-men. But the capi-toll tables avouch him Dictator now the fourth time. Dio and Appian write that he created himself Consul together with M. Antonius. Likewise Cassiodorus and the Sicilian registers give record, that Cæsar was this year Consul the fifth time, together with M. Antonius. And Macrobius in his first book speaketh of them. Moreover, written it is in the capi-toll and Colotian tables, that C. Cæsar was Col, the fifth time, with M. Antonius son of M, and that in the room of Cæsar there was chosen P. Cornelius son of Publius. And this was P. Cornelius Dalabella, whom Cæsar himself (if he had lived) meant to have substituted in his own room. Plutarch writeth that Cæsar Consul now the fifth time took unto him for his companion in government M. Antonius. And when as he would have subordained Dalabella in his own stead, Antony gainstaid it in an oration: and afterwards, when Cæsar a second time would have had Dalabella to be declared Consul, and still Antony crossed and withstood it, Cæsar gave over his enterprise. But after Cæsar was murdered, Antony (as Dio writeth) fearing some inforrection and commotion if he should have rejected Dalabella, took him into the fellowship of government. Appian saith, that immediately after Cæsar was killed, Dalabella entered into the Magistracy. So saith Pelleus also. And this verily was the year, in which the conspiracy was contrived against Cæsar, whereof the capi-tains were M and Decimus both Brutus, C. Trebonius & C. Cassius: and upon the fiftenth day of March, when he sat in Council together with the Senat in the court of Pompey, he was stabbed and received in his body three and twenty wounds: which done, the murderers who had wrought the feat seized the capitoll, And C. Octavius his nephew or sisters son, whom Cæsar had made in his will his half-her,
and adopted to bear his own name, came out of Epirus, whither Cæsar had sent him before, minding to make war upon the Parthians, and after all lucky and happy proceedings, took upon him the name of Cæsar, according to his last will and testament.

711

711
C. Pansa. A. Hirtius.

Dio Cassiodorus, and the rest, nominate Consuls for this year, C. Vibius Pansa Capronianus, and A. Hirtius, son of Anulus. Cassianus book sheweth Cretonius and Hirtius. Whereby it may be understood, that Cretonius was the surname of Pansa, but peradventure written for Capronianus. In the Colotian table they are named C. Vibius, son of Caius, and Au. Hirtius son of Hirtius. This Hirtius was one of their sons who were out-lawed by Sulla, and whom Cæsar (as Dio reporteth) advanced to honourable dignities. Both these, and the Consuls of the year following, were by Cæsar elected and declined thereto, before he was slain. Dio, Appian, and others report, that of these two Consuls, Hirtius in the time of the civil war, in a battell before Modena against Antonius was slain; and Pansa some daies after, upon a hurt received in the same fight, died at Bononia. In the room of Pansa, C. Octavius was sub-elected Consul, the nineteenth of August in the same year, and he instead of Hirtius, took unto him for his Colleague Q. Tadius.

712

M. Lepidus. L. Plancus.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records put down for Consuls, M. Lepidus and L. Plancus.
Dio, M. Emilius Lepidus the second time, and Lu. Munatius, son of Lucius, surnamed Plancus.
Of these Consuls Suetonius speaketh in Tiberius, saying, that Tiberius was born after the battell of Philippi, when Mar. Emilius Lepidus was the second time Consul with Munatius Plancus. Now had there been before appointed Consuls against this year by Cæsar, D. Brutus and Lu. Plancus. But by reason that Brutus the year before was by the law Pedia condemned and after killed, and so the three Triumvirs u-rped the rule of the common-weal: agreed it was, that M. Lepidus one of the Triumvirs who beforetime also had been Consul with Cæsar in his third Consulship, should together with Plancus, (who also taking part and siding with Antony, had revolted from the Common-weal) administer the Consulat. Moreover, this Brutus was by Plutarch, Appian, Dio, and Zonaras, called also Albinus; I suppose, for that out of the race of the Bruti he was adopted and incorporated into the house of the Albini. In this year, during the civil war, Brutus and Cassius were slain in battell before Philippi, as Dio, Plu-tarch, Appian, and others write.

713

P. Servilius II. L. Antonius.

The Colotian tables, Dio, and Cassiodorus match Consuls together for this year, Lu. An-tonius, son of Marcus, surnamed Pietas, and
P. Servilius, son of Publius, surnamed Isauricus, the second time. Of these Consuls, Suetonius writeth in Tiberius, This P. Servilius was first Consul with Cæsar in his second Consulat: whole father I-sauricus died a little before, as Dio and Eusebius report. As for L. Antonius, named he is by Dio Pietas, for that being Consul, he together with Fulvia the wife of his brother Ma. managed the affairs of state with that mind, as if his whole care had been for his brother the Triumvir, in regard of which brotherly and affectionate kindness, he challenged the surname of Pie-tas.

714

Cn. Domitius. C. Asinius.

A Colotian table, Dio, and Cassiodorus joyn in the Consulat of this year, Cn. Domitius (son of Marcus, Calvinus, the second time, and C. Asinius, son of Cn. Asinius Pollio. Of these, Josephus speaketh in his fourteenth book of the Jews antiquities and three and twenty chapter.
Toward the end of this year, Dio writeth, that these Consuls gave up their place, and that other Consuls were substitute for those few daies that were to come; and one of them was L. Cornelius Balbus Gaditanius. And therefore in the Colotian table these subordinated Consuls stand under these names, L. Cornelius, son of Lucius, and P. Canidius son of Lucius. Of Pub. Cornel. Balbus Consul, Pliny writeth in his seventh book and three and fortieth chapter, and Pelleus in his second book.

L. Conforinus. L. Calpurnius.

Cassiodorus inferred for the next Consuls, Lucius Conforinus and Caius Calpurnius. The Sicilian records have Conforinus and Sabinus.
Dio, L. Marcus and C. Sabinus, C. Calpurnius son of Caius, is named by Dio in the catalogue or table, Sabinus, although it be read there commonly, but amiss, Asinius.

716

Ap. Claudius. C. Norbanius.

Consuls that follow, were Ap. Claudius and C. Norbanius, as Cassiodorus saith. But as the Sicilian registers, purport, Conforinus and Sabi-nius: as Dio writeth, Ap. Claudius son of Caius, Pulcher; and C. Norbanius, son of Caius, Plac-cus. As touching Tadius after the Consul elect, and substitute in the room of another, who before he entered into government, being terrified with the minatory threats of C. Cæsar, threw himself down headlong, and so brake his neck, see Tranquillus in Augustus.

717

M. Agrippa. L. Caninius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, M. Agrippa and Lu. Caninius. The Sicilian registers Agrippa and Gallus. Dio, M. Vipsianus son of Lucius, Agrippa: and L. Caninius son of Lucius, Gallus. Josephus in his fiftenth book of Antiquities, avoucheth Consuls. Mar. Agrippa and C. Canidius Gallus. Nepos also in the life of Asinius, calleth Vipsianus, Agrippa. In the capitoll marbles Yyyy a marbles and in other old monuments of Rome his gentile name is passed over, and namely, in the forefront of the Temple, called Pantheon, wherein is engraven M. Agrippa son of Lucius, Consul the third time, Tacitus also in his first book mentioneth this Agrippa.

718

L. Gellius. M. Cocceius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this year, L. Gellius and M. Cocceius. The Sicilian records shew Publicola and Nerva: Dio hath L. Gellius son of Lucius Poplicola, and M. Cocceius Nerva. Out of the capitol fragments it appeareth, that L. Gellius was the son of Lucius, and nephew of Lucius. By the report of Dio, this L. Gellius was brother to M. Valerius Messala. For it is the same man who was pardoned before by M. Brutus: whereby it may be understood, that Poplicola was his surname by way of adoption: for they were not the Gellii but the Valerii, that carried the surname of Publicola. The same fragments do shew, that the said Gellius left his place, and that another was put in his room. And haply it was L. Munatius, son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius Planus: whom Pliny in his thirteenth book and third chapter, saith to have been twice Consul: but in what year he was the second time, a man cannot find, unless it were in this.

719

Sex. Pompeius. L. Cornificius.

Cassiodorus and the Sicilian records set this, that this years Consul were Sex. Pompeius and L. Cornificius. Dio L. Cornificius son of Lucius, and Sexus Pompeius son of Sexus. This year Sex. Pompeius, son of Cneus was slain.

720

M. Antonius. L. Scribonius Libo.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, L. Scribonius and L. Atratinus. The Sicilian catalogue Antonius and Libo. Dio, M. Antonius son of Marcus the second time, and L. Scribonius, son of Lucius, Libo. The same Dio saith moreover, that M. Antonius the Triumvir, presently upon the very Calends of January gave over the Magistracy, and substituted in his own stead L. Scribonius Atratinus: and therefore many there be that affirm how it was not Antonius but Atratinus that was Consul this year with Libo. That Consuls also were sub-elected to bear out one part of the year, it is to be found in some authors that have set forth the Municipal Annals. And verily Dio maketh mention of Paulus, Emilius Consul, for one part of the year, and that he built a stately porch or gallery at his own charges, and dedicated it in his Consulship.

721

C. Caesar. L. Volcanius.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth unto us for Consuls, C. Caesar and L. Volcanius. Dio, Caesar the second time, and L. Volcanius son of Lucius Tullus. They who composed and digested the Sicilian registers, very unity set down Caesar and Cicero for this years Consuls. Of this Consulship of Caesar, Suetonius and Dio speak, saying, that he held it very few hours, as Antonius also beforetime. In stead of Caesar was L. Antonius subrogated, and many other for one part or other of the year, who in the book entitled, Old inscriptions, are reckoned in this manner:

Emperor Caesar II. L. Volcanius.

Kal. Januarii. L. Antonius.

Kal. Maii. L. Flavius.

Kal. Iulii. M. Atilius.

C. Fontius.

Kal. Sept. L. Pinnius.

Kal. Octob. L. Lanius.

Of L. Flavius made Consul by M. Antonius, and deposed, Dio likewise maketh mention, 722

Cn. Domitius. C. Sossus.

Cassiodorus nominateth for Consuls this year, Cn. Domitius and C. Sossus. The Sicilian records, Evobarbus and Sossus. Dio, Cn. Domitius, son of Cneus, nephew of Cneus Evobarbus; and C. Sossus son of Cnephew of Cnephew. Nepos writeth, that Atticus died, when Cn. Domitius and C. Sossus were Consuls.

723

C. Caesar II. M. Messala.

Cassiodorus avoucheth Consuls this year, C. Caesar the second time, and M. Messala. The Sicilian registers, Octavius and Corvinus. Dio, Caesar the third time, and M. Valerius, son of Marcus, surnamed Messala Corvinus, and that right truly. For Cassiodorus maketh no reckoning of that Consulship of Caesar which he bare with Pedius, because he was subordinated in the place with another. But Dio and Appian do witness that Caesar and Antony were marched together this year, both of them in their second Consulship, at what time as upon peace made with Sexus Pompeius, they were appointed Consuls beforehand for eight years next ensuing: howbeit in the first year the people turned Antony out of his Consulship, and proclaimed war against him and Cleopatra, and so in his place was Mar. Messala declared Consul. As touching the Consuls this year inboredained, thus we find written in the ancient inscriptions:

Emperor Caesar III. M. Valerius.

Kal. Maii. M. Titius.

Kal. Octobris. Cn. Pompeius.

C. Caesar III. M. Crassus.

Cassiodorus nameth for this years Consuls, C. Caesar the third time, and M. Crassus. The Sicilian records Octavianus and Crassus. Dio, Caesar the fourth time, and M. Licinius, son of Marcus Crassus. He added moreover, and saith, Caesar in the midst of that war crossed the seas out of of Macedonia into Italy, wherein he was the fourth time Consul with M. Crassus. Orsius likewise noteth, that Caesar called Emperor, was Consul the fourth time with M. Livius Crassus. Of other Consuls substituted after M. Licinius, this we find in the old inscriptions.

Emperor Caesar IV. M. Licinius.

Kal. Jul. C. Antistius.

Ibid. Septembr. M. Tullius.

Kal. Novembr. L. Sabinus.

Of M. Tullius Consul with Augustus, Dio maketh mention in his story of this years acts. Pliny also in his 22 book and 6 chap. and Plutarch in Cicero. By Pellius and Tacitus it appeareth that Antistius had for addition the surname of Vetus; and Sabinus of Savinus.

725

C. Caesar III. Sex. Apuleius.

In Cassiodorus the Consuls be C. Caesar the fourth time, and Sex. Apuleius. In Dio, Caesar the fifth time, and Sex. Apuleius son of Sex. In the Sicilian records, Octavianus and Apuleius: in the Antique inscriptions, Emperor Caesar the fifth time, and Sex. Apuleius. Dio saith, this was the year 725 from the foundation of the City. Of Caesar five times Consul, there is to be seen an old Epigram or inscription in this manner.

Senatus Populusque Romanus.

Imp. C. Divi Julii Fil. C. Quince.

C. Deff. Sex. Imp. Sept.

Relig. conservata.

That is,

The Senat and people of Rome. By Emperor Caesar, son of Julius of famous memory, Consul five times, elect Consul the sixth time, and Emperor the seventh, the Commonwealth saved.

C. Caesar V. M. Agrippa II.

Cassiodorus declareth for Consuls this year, Caesar the fifth time, and M. Agrippa the second time. Orsius and the Sicilian records, Caesar the sixth time, and Agrippa the second time. Dio, Caesar the sixth time, and M. Vipsianus Agrippa the third time: but it is to be read the second time, as Sigonius advertiseth, so as the next year it should be written the third time. And this plainly appeareth by the superscription of that Temple (which he erected and named Pantheon) in this form, [M. Agrippa son of L. third time Consul built it.] For Dio saith, that this Temple was finished two years after that he was Consul with Caesar the seventh time Consul, in which year himself bare his third Consulship, and not the fourth. For otherwise in the front of the said Temple, he would have written, [Consul the sixth time.]

727

C. Caesar VI. M. Agrippa III.

Cassiodorus saith, that the next Consuls were Caesar the sixth time, and Mar. Agrippa the third time. But Dio, Caesar the seventh time, and Agrippa the fourth time. But what is to be thought of them both, is evident by that which hath been said before. In the Sicilian registers verily it is written, Octavianus the seventh time, and Agrippa the third time.

C. Augustus Caesar VII. T. Statilius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the seventh time, and T. Statilius. The Sicilian monuments, Octavianus the eighth time, and Taurus. Dio, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and Statilius Taurus the second time. For he had been Consul first, for a part of the year, anno 727, and now is the second time: of whom Suetonius writeth thus in Nero, Nero took to wife Statilia Messalina, daughter (in the fourth descent) of Taurus, one who had been twice Consul, and also triumphant: he writeth also, that Augustus entered upon his eighth and ninth Consul at Tarracon.

C. Caesar Augustus VIII. M. Silanus.

Cassiodorus sheweth for Consuls next, Caesar Augustus the eighth time, and M. Silanus. Dio and the Sicilian records, Augustus the ninth time, and M. Silanus. A fragment of the capitol, Emperor Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and M. Junius Silanus. This year Augustus Caesar was Emperor the eighth time, and shut up the Temple of Janus the fourth time that ever it was shut: which he had let open before in regard of certain wars, as Dio reporteth.

C. Caesar Augustus IX. C. Norbanus.

Cassiodorus putteth down for this years Consuls, Caesar Augustus the ninth time, and C. Norbanus. The Sicilian registers, Augustus the tenth time, and Flaccus. Dio and a fragment of the capitol marble, Augustus the tenth time, and C. Norbanus Flaccus. This Norbanus seemeth to be the son of C. Norbanus the Consul, anno 716, for he had not the numeral note testifying a second Consulship.

C. Caesar Augustus X. Cn. Piso.

Cassiodorus setteth down for Consuls, Caesar Augustus the tenth time, and Cneus Piso. The Sicilian records, Augustus the eleventh time, and Piso. And Dio, Augustus the eleventh time, with Cn. Calpurnius, son of Cneus Piso. By a fragment of the capitol stone it appeareth that Augustus entered the Consulship the eleventh time, together with Asellus Terentius Varro Murranus: also that Murena died in his Magistracy, in whose stead was elected Cn. Calpurnius Piso: and Augustus went out of his government. Of which matter Dio thus writeth: Augustus went to the Alban hill, and there resigned up the Consulship. For whereas both he himself and many others, ever since the time that the C.W. was set in frame and established, had born the yearly Magistrats, he thought that from thence forwards he was to forbear the same, to the end, that the honourable dignity of Consuls should be open to as many as might be. And this did he without the City, because he would not be hindered and letted in the Action; and therewith substituted in his place Lucius Sestius, a man that of all others most affected and loved Brutus: who also wrote of his praises and commendable parts.

732
M. Marcellus, L. Aruntius.

This year had for Consuls, as saith Cassiodorus, M. Marcellus and L. Aruntius: as Dio, M. Claudius son of Marcus Marcellus, and A. Serranus son of Lucius. In the Capitoll Stone these Consuls are thus set down, L. Aruntius son of L., nephew of L. and M. Claudius son of Marcus, nephew of M. Whereby it is given to understand, that in the Sicilian records the Consuls are not well put down to be Octavianus the twelfth time, and Aruntius. In this year, the conspiracy of Fannius Capio and Varro Murena against Augustus was discovered: and the Temple of thundering Jupiter was dedicated, witnesseth Dio.

M. Lollius, Q. Lepidus.

The Colotian Stone and Cassiodorus shew for this year Consuls, Q. Aemilius Lepidus and M. Lollius. Dio writeth, when Augustus was in Sicily, and the people of Rome at the assembly for Consuls election, there arose a sedition and commotion. For M. Lollius only entred upon the government, by reason that the other place was refect and kept for Augustus: but when the place was refused, Q. Lepidus was created. Of these Consuls Horace in his first book of Epistles writeth thus:

Me quæ nuda nudo sciat implevisse Decembres, Collegam Lepidum quo dixit Lollius æno.

Know be, that 40 winters old and four, I was that year,
At Rome when Consul Lollius, chose Lepidus his peer.

M. Apuleius, P. Silius.

After Cassiodorus, the Consuls that followed for this year, were M. Apuleius and P. Silius. But in Dio, M. Apuleius son of Severus, and Publius Silius son of Publius Nerva. In the Sicilian records, Apuleius and Nerva.

735
C. Sestius, Q. Lucretius.

The Colotian Stone, Ensebins in his treatise of Times, Dio and Cassiodorus set forth as Consuls this year, Caius Sestius, son of Caius, Saturinus and Quintus Lucretius son of Quintus Vespilio. Of this years consuls thus writeth Dio, Caius Sestius was declared Consul: but for that there was to be given him a companion, and Augustus refused the second place of Consulship reserved for him, there arose a sedition, untill Augustus pronounced Consul Quintus Lucretius one of the Embassadors, whom the Senat had sent unto him about the appealing of the foresaid sedition: notwithstanding he was a man in times past profcribed and outlawed. The same writeth Velleius in the second book. In the broken Colotian Stone it is to be read, that the Consul elected instead of Sestius Saturinus, was Mar. Vinicius son of Marcus Vellitius, unto Vinicius adjoyneth as Colleague, Agrippa. In this year, after the fifth ten years were expired, for which space Augustus together with Agrippa at the first received the Censorial authority and dignity, he was created a second time by the people over-see of mens behaviour for the term of five years; and resumed the Censors power for the same time, and the Consular authority for ever. So as, at all times and in all places, he might have twelve Lictors go before him with their bundles of rods, and be allowed to take his place and sit with the Consuls.

Cn. Lentulus, P. Lentulus.

Publius Cornelius son of Publius, Lentulus and Cn. Cornelius son of Lucius, are set down for Consuls by the Colotian Stone table; by Dio also and Cassiodorus. In this year Marcus Agrippa by the motion and authority of the Emperor Cæsar Augustus, obtained of the Senat and people of Rome the Tribunitian power for five years.

737
C. Furrinus, C. Silanus.

Here succeeded Consuls next, according to Cassiodorus, C. Furrinus and C. Silanus. After Dio, C. Furrinus son of C. and C. Junius son of Caius Silanus. But in the Colotian fragment C. Furrinus son of Caius, and C. Junius. Whiles C. Furrinus and C. Junius Silanus were Consuls, the solemn plaies, called Seculares were now the first time let out by Augustus, as Censorinus and Dio affirm.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls, Lucius Domitius and P. Scipio. The Sicilian records, A. Nobarbus and Cornelius. Dio, L. Domitius son of Lucius, nephew of Lucius, A. Nobarbus and P. Cornelius son of P. nephew of Publius Scipio: In like manner the Colotian table, wherein it standeth, that for P. Cornelius there was substituted L. T., i.e. Tarius: of whom Pliny in his eighteenth book and seventh chapter writeth thus, L. Tarius Rufus, a man most hateful for his parentage; parentage, deserved a Consulat under Augustus Cæsar of happy memory, only for his military service. In this Consul year was the Quinquennial solemnity performed, as writeth Dio, in memoriall of the Empire of Augustus: and Agrippa one of the Quindecenvirs, had the ordering and setting out thereof.

M. Drusus, L. Piso.

The Consuls next following, were M. Drusus and L. Piso, as Cassiodorus saith. The Sicilian registers name them Lilo and Piso. Dio, M. Lucius son of Lucius, Drusus Libo: and L. Calpurnius son of Lucius Piso, M. Drusus son of Marcus. L. according to the Colotian fragment.

740
Cn. Lentulus, M. Crassus.

This year next following, had for Consuls, after Cassiodorus and the Sicilian monuments, Cn. Lentulus and M. Crassus: whom Dio calleth, M. Licinius son of Marcus Crassus; and Cn. Cornelius son of Cn. Lentulus. The Colotian fragment sheweth Marcus Licinius son of Marcus.

741
T. Nero, Q. Quintilius.

Tiberius Nero, and P. Quintilius were Consuls this year, as Cassiodorus reporteth. They are named Nero and Varius in the Sicilian Catalogue. And Dio calleth them Titus Claudius son of Tiberius Nero: and P. Quintilius, son of Sexsus Varius. The Colotian fragment, Tiberius Claudius son of T. Suetonius writeth, that Tiberius bare his first Consulship but a few daies. For this is that Tiberius Nero, Augustus *Cæsar*s wives son, who after the death of Augustus, attained to the Empire, having been first by him adopted.

742
M. Messala, P. Sulpitius.

Cassiodorus putteth down for Consuls, Messala and Quirinus. The Sicilian records, Messala and Quirinus. Dio, M. Valerius son of Marcus Messala Barbatus: and P. Sulpitius son of Publius Quirinus: of whom Suetonius in Claudius and Tacitus in his second book writeth. Moreover, this is that Sulpitius Quirinus, who by Josephus in the seventeenth book of antiquities and first chapter, is said to have born the Consular dignity and was Lieutenant in Syria. At which time, our Lord Jesus Christ the Redeemer and Saviour of mankind, was born: of whom Saint Luke maketh mention, saying, This was the first enrolment or taxation which was made by Quirinus President and governour of Syria. After these Consuls, others were substituted in their place, as the Colotian Stone sheweth, wherein it is thus read:

*M. Valerius, M. F.
C. Valerius, C. F.
Suff. C. Caninius.*

Likewise in Cyprian his Calender, these Consuls are written with their surnames:

Messala Quirinus, Rebulus Saturinus, Maximus Tubero.

By which it appeareth that Rebulus and Saturinus were the surnames of Caninius & Volgius. By a fragment of the capitoll marble, it is evident, that the surnames of Valerius was Amylianus son of Volgius; and Rebulus of Caninius: and that as Rufus was put in the place of Valerius, so Rebulus instead of Rufus. There remaineth also the memoriall of Rebulus and Saturinus in the Sicilian records. In this year, Dio reporteth, that Augustus was a second time made over-see for mens manners and demeanours five years more: and that he resumed still the same authority by times, as the Empire and therein Agrippa died.

743
P. Fabius, Q. Aelius.

Cassiodorus exhibiteth for this years Consuls, Paulus Fabius and Q. Aelius. Dio, Paulus Fabius, son of Quintus Maximus and Tubero. Of Q. Aelius Tubero, and P. Fabius Maximus Consuls, Frontinus speaketh of in his book of water-conduits: and Pliny in his eighth book and seventh chapter, where he writeth, that the Theater of Marcellus was dedicated when Quintus Tubero and Fabius Max. were Consuls.

744
Julius Antonius, Q. Fabius.

Cassiodorus nameth for Consuls this year, Julius Antonius Africanus and Q. Fabius. Dio, Jul. Antonius Africanus, and Q. Fabius son of Quintus Maximus. The Sicilian Catalogue and Calender of Cyprian shew Africanus and Maximus. Dio nameth Julius the son of Antonius, unto him Horace writeth in this manner:

*Pindarum quisquis studeat amulari
Iulæ geratis ope Dadæden, Nilius pennæ, &c.*

With wings devis'd by Dadæus
And glew'd with wax, they flie:
Whoftrive (O Iule) with Pindarus
To match his Poetry.

And after,
Tandis (Antony) quotes in dædas Nilius trallus.

O Antonius so oft
As he doth mount the clouds aloft,

Drusus Nero. Titus Quintus.

Here succeeded Cass, according to Cassiodorus, Drusus Nero, and T. Quintus; but after Dio, Nero Claudius, son of Tiberius Drusus; and T. Quintus, son of Titus Crispinus. Drusus and Crispinus, by Cuspinian Calender and the Sicilian registers. This Drusus brother of Tiberius Nero was Augustus Caesar's wife's son: who being Consul, died in Germany, and both he and his children had the surname of Germanicus. Dio writeth: which addition the Senate gave him first of that Province, as Emperius hath. With the death of this Drusus endeth Germanicus histories: for thus it is written in the last Epitome, &c. Look in the said Breviary.

To the Reader.

I doubt not but many of them who shall take delight and pleasure in reading the Roman story above-written, will presently grow into a liking of the very place, which hath afforded so worthy persons and rare examples. The love whereof hath moved many a man to undertake a voyage to Rome, only to see the river Tyberis, those seven hills, and the monuments remaining of that famous City. The journey they have found, for way long and tedious; for expense of money heavy and chargeable; for hazard of religion, conscience and good manners, exceeding dangerous: so far degenerated are the inhabitants now from that ancient people so devout, so virtuous and uncorrupt, in old times. To satisfy the Readers in this behalf, and to avoid the perill of that travell, I thought it not amiss to bring Rome (as it were) home to them, even to represent unto their eye the Topography thereof, that is to say, a description of the place, with the memorable edifices, or rather the ruins of those antique buildings, mentioned in the story aforesaid. And forasmuch as Bartholomew Marlian hath herein taken pains, and made a Treatise thereof, worthy in his conceit to be dedicated unto that noble Prince of famous memory, Francis the French King, the first (I take it) of that name: and for that those learned men, who last of late forth in print, have thought good to adjoin thereto, as a necessary dependant, the foresaid Treatise: I for my part, having struggled with the difficulties of the Alps, and in some sort overcome them; I crossed Rhone and the Po; passed over the hills Olympus and Aemus, and in some sort overcome them; I crossed Themopylae and Tempe, from now I would not at my return to stick at the pleasant meadows, Palatine, Capitoll, Aventine, &c. with the plains and valleys between, or the river Tyber and the Marsh field underneath them, beautified especially with such facile Temples, triumphant Arches, glorious Palaces, Theatres, Cirque, Colonnies, and Colosses, wonders of the world. And albeit I found Marlian for walking himself, and the book that goeth in his name much corrupted in the print, yet by conference with other Authors, I have reformed the faults, and endeavoured that our English edition might in some measure be answerable to the Latine.

A Summary collected by John Bartholomew Marlianus, a Gentleman of Millain, touching the Topography of Rome in ancient time.

The First Book.

CHAP. I.

The situation of the City.

Before we enterprize to shew the edifices and buildings of the City of Rome, somewhat would be premised of the site thereof. Begin therefore we will at the very habitation of the immortal gods: with the invocation of whom, the Poets are wont in every hard and difficult work, to lay their first ground and make their entrance.

The Capitol hill, where it is broadest, exceedeth not 800 foot: in length it lyeth out toward the Northwest 1500. It hath a point or wing on either side in fashion of a semicircle, and in compais containeth well-near seven furlongs.

* Stadia.

From this mount as it runneth out in length, the Palatine hill is divided by a valley of the same breadth, or somewhat more; making a square with four angles of unequal sides, containing 1200 paces. For, the one of 600 foot boundeth upon the Capitoline hill: a second of seven hundred foot, bendeth to the Northeast: the third, being almost twice as long, looketh toward the Southeast and the mount Caelius: the fourth, which of all others is biggest, and comprehendeth the list or shew-place, called Circus Maximus, directly regardeth the Aventine. On the second side thereof there is one plain, reaching from the head and top of the Forum Rom. to the utmost skirt of the hill Quirinalis, which bendeth toward the Suburra, and taketh up in breadth 500 foot: but it lieth out in length almost a mile from both sides, between the Capitoll, the Forum Nerva, and the mount Caelius: in like manner from the said mount Caelius and Palatine, Suburra and the Esquilina, as far as to the Church of Saint Marcelline. A second plain there is, under under the other point and top of the Capitol, near the Theatre of Marcellus, which stretcheth our 500 foot: from the mount it self, as far as to the Tyber; and anon over-against the valley from the crooked reach and course of the river, and the nook whereby the Aventine is divided from the Palatine, it spreadeth broader: but afterwards between the said hills it groweth narrow, until ye come to Caeliolus and the very gate Capena, where the Aventine is parted from Caeliolus only by the breadth of the street or high way. The length of this plain is likewise a mile, having on the right hand, Tyber and the Aventine; on the left, Capitoline mount, the Palatine, and Caelius.

Then followeth the mount Caelius (separate from the Palatine by a plain) resembling a pyramidal form of a spire, so as the Baile thereof containeth 500 foot near to the Amphitheatre. Divided also from the same it is by the street Appia, fast by the grand Cirque, which reaching to the gate Capena, leaveth on the left hand a valley 600 foot broad, between Caelius and Caeliolus, lying out in length 4 Stadia, and within a while to the walls which joyne close to the mount Caelius, as far as to the gate Agnaria. This hill then from thence lyeth along the City wall for 4 Stadia, toward the Northeast. From hence the walls meet afront for the space of two Stadia, unto the gate Navia: from whence as they turn to the Northeast, it is parted from the Esquilina by the street Labicana; and anon shewing it self affront near S. Marcelline, it beareth forward as far as to the Amphitheatre. Thus keeping no certain form, it taketh in circuit about 2500 paces. Moreover the Capitolina is engaged within the said valley, the street Appia, and all along Northeast and Southeast, with the City walls: and hath in compais well-near a mile.

The Aventine seemeth to contain two hills: the broader part whereof toward the Tyber, and in like manner in length from Tyber along the walls, and anon near the gate Hostiensis, is divided and cut with a crooked street-way which leadeth to the angle of the grand Cirque and the mount Caelius: leaving the other part thereof, divided on the right hand from the mount Caelius by the street Appia, until you come to the gate Capena. It had in compais 18 Stadia, as Dionysius also rectifieth: and on the Southeast, a most spacious and large plain of 4 unequal sides: toward the South containing almost 6 Stadia, Westward five, somewhat less Eastward, but toward the Tyber not above four.

The Esquilina on the South part is divided with the street Labicana; on the Northwest, with the valley lying between Caelius, Palatine, and it self: on the North the Suburra; and from the Viminal hills the street called Patritius parteth it, until a man come to the bath of Diocletian. In circuit it containeth about 4 miles, and hath no certain form: inasmuch as Varro (not without good reason) thinketh it two hills, and cutteth it into many parts.

The Viminal hill on the West side regardeth the Quirinal, having about a furlong space the plain Suburra lying between: on the North it hath the valley Quirinalis. Between the same hills there lyeth as it were 4 jugera in breadth, but about a quarter of a mile in length. And anon it joyneth to the Quirinal and Esquilina along the wall of the City, by a continual row of many arches, whereby these mountains are made even. The compais thereof taketh up two miles and an half: the form thereof is long wide, and the breadth not in every part alike, but variable.

The Quirinal mount on the left hand, directly from the tower called [Militarium] for the space of 4 Stadia, over-looketh the level plot of the City which lieth Westward: but on the right hand (as clearly appeareth by that which we have said) it is opposite to the Viminal on the third side Northward, for the space of 6 Stadia it lieth to the hill called Hortulorum. It hath a valley lying between, in breadth 4 jugera, reaching near to the gate Salaria: and in the whole compais it taketh almost three miles.

Next to it is the little hill Hortulorum, although it standeth without the old pomy of the city: for the space of 3 Stadia it beareth over the valley Martia lying between it and Tyber. It carrieth in length along the wall of the City, from the gate Flamentiana to Collina, a full mile more than any other sides. The circumference thereof is much about 18 Stadia.

There remaineth now the mount Janiculum, on the other side of Tyber: the one half thereof and not above, is contained within the walls: from the Vatican plain, for the space of 3 Stadia, whereas it stretcheth toward the South, it adjoyneth to the river: the other part thereof is enclosed within the walls, for the compais of five Stadia.

Moreover above the Vatican plain, there is a little hill of the same nature, which putteth forth two points like horns: the one toward Janiculum, the other Northward, much like a bow full bent: the convexity or outward compais whereof containeth a mile.

Now will we run over the plain and bafe plot of the City: which beginning at the Capitol hill near the gate Flaminia, at this day on the Northeast side (or rather the North) comprehendeth a Diameter or race almost of 8 Stadia, environed with the hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum: but on the West side, the Tyber runneth by it, where along the banks thereof it beareth a greater space. Moreover, by a straight and direct line being drawn for two Stadia from the hill Hortulorum, and namely, where it over-looketh the Piere of Domitian called Numaetia: along the bank of Tyber, over-against the Pile Hadrian, it maketh a quadrangle of four uneven sides, containing within it more than three miles: without which square is left the valley Martia, namely, as much as lieth between the hill Hortulorum, the wall of the City, and Tyberis: so as the breadth draweth narrower still unto the gate Flaminia.

There resteth yet the Transtiberin region, which together with the Janiculum, taketh in compais about three miles. This will be more easily observed and marked by the very channell of Tyberis.

Tiberis; which entering into the city, keepeth his course directly on the right hand of the gate Flaminia through the vale Martia, and soon after by little and little turneth from the North, Westward, and representeth the form of a semicircle, in the convexity whereof is the Patican, and within the concavity, the Mars field. Moreover, beneath the Moles or pile, Hadrian returning to his former course, as far as to the utmost foot of the Aventine, winding somewhat crooked into the South, not far from the gate Portuensis it runneth forth of the city.

Thus much concerning the situation and form of Rome, and the plot wherein it standeth, which at this day is so far changed, that hardly a man may find any token or memoriall of it, as it was in old time.

CHAP. II.

Of the founders of the City of Rome, the KK, and Inhabitants thereof.

THE region (on which Rome was after built) West of Tyber, a hundred and forty furlongs distant from the sea, the Sicilians (by constant report) first inhabited. Afterwards, the Aborigines leaving Arcadia, by the conduct of Oenonius the son of Lycaon, came into the laid quarters: and being grown into a liking of the place for the fertility thereof, they expelled the Sicilians, and held it for their own use. In process of time the Pelagians, a people of Greece, together with the Thessalians, who came to aid the Aborigines against the nations their neighbor borderers, remained also in these parts (with the good will and contentment of the said Aborigines) untill the Trojan war: but they all retained the name of the Aborigines, which prerogative they held because they were the first, that by arms conquered that feignory and kingdom. Long time after, Saurn being chased out of Crete by Jupiter his son, fled into Italy: where he taught Janus the King of the Aborigines the skill of planting vineyards, with the use thereof, and likewise the handling of the sickle: in regard of which good turn, he was freely scotied by Janus in part of his realm, yea, and after the decease of Janus enjoyed the kingdom alone. After this, the Arcadians, who forsook the city Palantium (as weary of their own native country) and by the leading of Evander, seeking some other place of habitation, arrived at the place where now Rome standeth: received of Faunus the K. of the Aborigines, a portion of ground: built a fort upon a little hill not far from Tyber, and named it Palantium, in remembrance of their native city which they had abandoned. After all this, the Peloponnesians, Phanetians, and Epians, by reason that Elis their native country was walled before by Hercules, were by him brought away into Italy, and they planted themselves upon the mount Saturnine. These men lived a long time according to their own laws and customs, untill they being vanquished and subdued by the Aborigines, were incorporated by them into one commonality. Then reigned Latinus the son of Faunus, untill such time as Evander the son of Anchises, after the overthrow and final ruin of Ilium, after many adventures and much variety of fortune, which he had endured together with the Trojans his companions, came by the instint of the destinies to K. Latinus. Whose daughter Lavinia he took to wife, and so was by Latinus admitted into the society and fellowship with him of the kingdom. When the Aborigines and the Trojans were thus linked and joynted together, he called both nations by the name of Latines. Then was Evander warred upon by Turnus: for that he had married Lavinia, who was espoused and affianced to him before. But Evander won the victory, and in single combat slew Turnus. At that time also Latinus died, and left his son in law Evander heir to the crown. certain years after was Evander killed by Mecentius K. of the Tuicans: and Ascanius his son succeeded in the kingdom. He built the towns Lavinium and Alba: and when he departed this life, made over the crown to his brother Sylvius. After him followed Kings, Ascanius Sylvius, Latinus Sylvius, Alba, Atys, Cappis, Capetus, Tiberinus, Agrippa, Romulus, Aventinus, Procas, and Numitor. This Numitor usurped the kingdom by fraud, which in right of eldership was due to his brother Numitor. And for fear lest there might arise from his brothers offspring, some one to make claim and recover the royal seat, and thereby himself be thrust out of his place, he consecrated Rhea the daughter of Numitor to Vesta, for to be a professed Nun. She being thus made a votary, and devoted to perpetual virginity, happened to be with child by Mars, and was delivered of two boies, twins, namely, Romulus and Remus. Numitor advertised herof, commanded both the babes to be cast forth to perish. Found they were by Fausulus a shepheard upon the bank of the river Tyber, and by his wife Fausula fostered and brought up among other shepherds. Remus being grown to mans estate, was taken by certain thieves and robbers, and brought to K. Amulius his great-uncle. Accused he was, for that he used to raise booties and drive away whole droves of Numitor his cattell. Whereupon delivered he was to Numitor for to be punished according to his discretion. But Remus after much discourse of speeches to and fro, was by certain tokens found and known to be Numitor his daughters son. And at the very time came Romulus also with Fausulus in place, purposing to rescue Remus his brother. Soon they entred into a conspiracy, and at unawares surprized and murdered Amulius: and so restored their grandfater Numitor. In the second year of Numitor his reign, Romulus and Remus built the City of Rome, in the very place where they had been laid forth to perish, which was the 432 year after the winning of Troy, and the twelfth day before the calends of May. Afterwards in a fray that arose between Romulus and Remus striving for the sovereignty, Remus came by his death, and then Romulus gave name both to the City and Citizens also of Rome.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

The form and bigness of the City of Romulus.

Romulus set out the City four square, as Plutarch witnesseth: whereupon of some it is called R. Quadrata. Others affirm, that the form and compass thereof is uncertain and by reason of Antiquity unknown at this day. The hill Palatinus was by Romulus first fortified, because therein he was brought up: at the foot thereof began the Pomerium. Afterwards the Capitol and the Roman Forum were laid to it.

The City began to be marked and bounded out from the beast-market: from whence in certain places were Fories pitched and set between, along the bottom of the mount Palatine as far as to the altar of Consus: and so within a while to the old Curia: then, to the Chappell of the Lares and the Roman Forum the bounds were extended, untill a place was assigned for the wals, and a spacious plot to build the City upon.

Titus Tatius began the wall from the rock Carmentalis, and brought it to the way, which is not far from Tyber: from thence, Southward unto the farthest part of the grand Circus: and so Northward he ranged it into the Forum of Nerva, and in the end joynted it to one of the points of the Capitol hill, and within it compassed both the Capitol itself, and also the Palatine. And finally, to enlarge the City, he set to it the hills Quirinalis and Capitulus.

CHAP. IIII.

The gates of Romulus his City.

Romulus when he died, left the City of Rome with three gates, namely, Carmentalis, Romanæ, and Pandana. Others add a fourth thereto, to wit, Janualis.

Carmentalis took the name of Carmentis the mother of Evander, whose Chappel Carmentalis stood before the gate. This gate stood under the Capitol on the right hand, between the cliff Tarpæius and the Tyber, over against the Church now of S. Katherine, toward the shep-place Flaminianus. This was afterwards named Scelerata, for that without this gate, in the Temple of Janus, the act of Senat passed, for the sending of the three hundred Fabii to Cremera, who went forth at this gate, and were slain every one at Cremera.

Rohidua was so called of Romulus: built it was where now the gardens are belonging to the new Church of S. Mary, not far from the angle of the mount Palatinus in the bottom of the cliff of Victoria. Some affirm, that this gate was afterwards called Mugonia, of the lowing of kine and oxen: others name it Trigoni, of three corners that it had.

Pandana was so named, because it stood open for things to be brought through it into the City. The same also was called Libera or Romulida. The place for it they assigned where the gate Saturnia stood, bearing the name of the old City so called and after destroyed.

Janualis carried the name of the Temple Janus, which is not far off, it stood sometime at the very foot of the hill Viminalis.

CHAP. V.

The variety of the compass and walls of the City.

WHEN the Romans one while made war upon their neighbor nations of Italy, and otherwhiles defended themselves against their violence, it hapned for the most part that they got the upper hand, and ever as they vanquished any and subdued them under their subjection, in the end made them Citizens of Rome: by which occasion, the City built by Romulus, was not sufficient to receive so great a multitude. Tullius therefore after his conquest of the Sabins and Albans laid to the City the mountain Capitulus and the Esquilæ, and so enlarged it. Afterwards, when Politorium was won, and a number of the inhabitants translated to Rome, Anagnin made a second enlargement of the City, and granted these new comers the mount Aventine to inhabit. The old Romans therefore dwelt in Palatine; the Sabins in Capitolium; the Albans in Capitulus: and this new come multitude in Aventine. But after the Latines also were received into the City, they joynted Janiculum also to the city by a wooden bridge made over the Tyber: and call a trench called Fossus Quirinius, about the low and level places of the city. So the Trans-Tyberine quarter was united to the city and made it more spacious and largely: last of all, Servius Tullius by adjoining the hills Viminalis and Quirinalis to the five abovenamed, amplified the city. And as before it was mounded about with rubbish, and the same rudely laid, Tarquinius the proud was the first that by the posterity that followed, repaired and rectified upon the old foundations. But the city in old time, when as it flourished in greatest glory, extended far more in bounds and compass, for in Plinius time the circuit thereof within the wall contained about 20 miles. But in these daies hardly 12. And the whole compass of the city, with the suburbs and buildings about and without the walls (which although they spread far, were comprehended yet under the name of city) in the said Plinius time, was 50 miles.

CHAP.

CHAP. VI.
The Pomary of the City.

That void space of ground within and without the walls, which might not lawfully be either ploughed or inhabited, is called Pomary. And sometime it is put for the circuit of the whole City. This Pomary was oftentimes let out farther, and altered by the Roman Emperors. But none had power granted so to do, save only they that either conquered somewhat to the Roman dominion, or endowed the City with some singular and especial benefit; as the Emperor Claudius and many more. And like as the Romans had no certain limits of their Empire, so no certain bounds confined either the City or the Pomary.

CHAP. VII.

The gates of old Rome, which at this day are not to be seen: those also that are now extant.

Even as the bounds of the City and Pomerium were many times altered, so the gates also; some were left within the City, by occasion that the walls were farther set out and lost their names: others in time were so old, that they fell down, and albeit their name remain, yet the place where they stood is not known. Some again were made new, and took either new names, or else kept their old: others changed the place, and held their old name: and finally, there were some that had two names; and others, more. And these in manner were all the names of the gates:

Flumentana, or Flaminia.
Numentana, or Viminalis.
Esquilina, or Taurina.
Capena, or Appia.
Tergemina, or Hofienfis.
Ratumena, or Vientana.

Quirinalis, or Agonensis, or Collina.
Janualis, or Sabula, leading into the Sabins country.
Nevis, or Laticlava.
Calimontana, or Asinaria.
Portuensis, or Navalis.
Triumphalis, or Vaticana.

Carmenalis, Magonia, Pandana, Querquetulana, Raduscula, Saginalis, Saucualis, Collatina, Interaggers, Tiburina, Gabula, Latina, Aurelia, Caulatua, Laurentia, Fontinalis, Lavernalis, Ereentina, Minutius Saluta, is, Mutia, Pinaculais, Prensina, Libitinenfis, Valeria, and Tarpia.

Flumentana took name of the river Tiberis: for it stood at the first upon the bank of that river, not far from the bridge of Xystus in the end of the Broad street, and at the head of the way or street Flaminia; but afterwards, translated it was to the place where now it standeth. In time following, it was called Flaminia, of the cauley of Flaminus: at this day it is named, The peoples gate, and is situate in the hill Hortulorum.

Collatina bare the name of Collatia, a town not far from Rome: now it is Pinciana, of one Pincius a Senator, whose name it keepeth. This also standeth in the hill Hortulorum: between it and Flumentana is a mile space.

Quirinalis took name of the Chappel of Quirinus: or because in old time the way lay through it, for them that went to the hill Quirinalis. It seemeth to be called Agonensis, quasi agorae, i.e. without a corner: afterwards, Collina: and at the last, Salaria; for that by it salt was carried into the City. This name it holdeth still and standeth 6 Stadia from Collatina.

Viminalis is from Quirinalis distant 5 Stadia: so named, as they say, of a wood of Ofers, which (as it is supposed) sometime grew thereby: or else, of a Chappel of Jup. Viminus. This also men called Figulensis, of the potters works made without it: but now they name it the gate of S. Agnes, and Numentana.

Interaggers standeth in the Plain Viminalis, between the gate Viminalis and Esquilina: it had the denomination of Tarquinius his mures and banks, among which it was built.

Tiburina stood between Esquilina and Numentana, so as it was 12 Stadia distant from Esquilina, upon the plain of Esquilis in the very place where the conduit is of the Mary water.

Esquilina took that name of the hill Esquilis, the same in ancient time was called Taurina, of a bulls head there found: for many a day after was the said bulls head seen painted in the inner front of the said gate. At this day, S. Lawrence gate.

Nevis drew the name of certain groves or woods near adjoining. In times past Laticlava, and now Major. An arch there was so called and erected in the same place by the old Romans.

Calimontana, standing from Nevis 8 Stadia, seemeth by a finity of name to be so called of the hill Caelus in the edge whereof it standeth: and Asinaria it was called, of the Asies which were wont to be sent out to Naples, by that gate. At this time they call it S. Johns gate.

Gabula, built close to the mount Caelus, Southeast: which seemeth by all likelihood to take the name of the City Gabii, which it directly regardeth. It carried the name also Metridium, of measuring and is situate from Calimontana, as it were 5 Stadia.

Latina is 5 Stadia likewise from Gabula, seated not far from the Church of S. John Baptist: so called, for that men go forth out of it into Latiun.

Capena is so named of the Capenats, a Latine nation, against which it lyeth. This also is called still Camena, of a grove and Chappel of the Muses, built just before the same gate. Appia likewise, of the high-way Appia, which Appius the Censor paved, and so it bare his name. They call it also also Triumphalis, for that in triumph the pomp is that way carried with state. Off some it is named Forniculis, for the plenty of springs there. At this day S. Sebastians gate.

Tergemina took that name of an old gate so called, at which the 3 twins Horatii went forth against their enemies, and gave the first name to it. Some shew remaineth yet of this gate to be seen, near the Selva.

Hofienfis was in ancient daies so called, for that it led to the City Hofia: now S. Pauls gate: situate it is from Capena well-near 8 Stadia.

Portuensis is a gate beyond the Tyber, within half a Stadium of the said river: so called, for that it ledeth to the haven of Hofia. Now a daies men call it, Porta ripa, i. The bank gate.

Aurelia, looketh toward Janiculum: distant from the former almost 7 Stadia. In this age they call it S. Paterace gate.

Malis, was built by Albius Hadrianus, of whom it took that name.

Septimiana, bare the name of Septimius the Emperor: and because it standeth under Janiculum, is at this day called, Sulani Janum. Some affirm, that this is Fontinalis, because out of the mount called Aureus, there issue fountains: for to the said hill this gate standeth close. From it to Aurelia are 5 Stadia: and to the river Tyber 7 jugera or acres.

Thus much for the gates of the City of Rome; and their names.

The wall in old time had upon it 360 turrets. Some of these are decayed and gone: others repaired, and many this long time are ready to fall.

Now is it time, and the course of the Story doth require, that leaving the towrs and walls, we enter into the City, and shew the beginning and the place of those edifices, which within the walls, either upon the hills or the plain plot off the City, were built by men in old time. First therefore, begin we will at the worthiest earthly habitation of all their Gods, to wit, the Capitol.

The second Book.

CHAP. I.

The sundry names of the Capitol.

The Capitol was by the old Romans called Mount Saturnus, either of a City named Saturnia, which under the very hill was built in that place where now Rome standeth: or because Saturn in times past dwelt in that hill: or else (as some think) for that the mount it self had Saturn for the tutelar God and Protector thereof. But afterwards it was named the mount Tarpia, of the Virgin Tarpeia, of whom Livy writeth. Last of all, Tarquinius Priscus going in hand to build upon that hill a temple to Jupiter, when he digged for to lay the foundation, chanced to find in the bottom of the trench a mans head: whereupon they called it Capitolium. And the Augurs being sought unto and demanded, What the finding of that head might signify? answered, That this Castle should be the See of the empire and the head of the whole world. This hill they divide into the Castle and the Capitol. The Castle they build Northward, as a stronger and more fortified place: but the Capitol, toward Tyberis, a place naturally defended,

CHAP. II.

Who first laid the foundation of the Capitol: who finished it: how often it was burnt, and by whom reedified.

IN the Sabine war, Tarquinius Priscus vowed to build the Capitol temple: but after the war was ended, so soon as he had laid the ground-work, he died. After him, Tarquinius Superbus, finished the building, of 4 square stone: and decried the charges thereof out of the pillage of Pometia, a Town that he won. When he for his tyranny was banished Rome, Horatius Pulvillus, the Consul, dedicated the said Capitol to Jupiter. It stood upright and sound for the space of 415 years, until the Marian wars, and then (in the Consulship of Scipio and Narbo) it was consumed with fire. Sylla re-edified it, and Q. Cælius consecrated it: and so it continued until the Vittellii an war. During which troubles, it was a second time burnt, at what time it stood with the dores thick, undefended, and not rified, Vespasian built it again in his life, a third time it was destroyed by fire: and together with the Capitol, Vespasian also himself died. Afterwards, Domitian re-edified it in more magnificent and stately manner than it had been ever before, and disbursed therein above 12000 talents. Of the Capitol turrets and pinnacles, the statues and images smitten with thunder-bolts and blasted oftentimes with lightning, divers writers have made mention.

CHAP. III.

The Temple of Jup. Feretrius, of Jup. Ops, Max. of Juno, and Minerva's.

The Capitol, Cicero calleth The house and habitation of the gods, because it contained the chappels, statues, and images in manner of all the gods: but the first of all other in Rome was that of Jupiter Feretrius, vowed by Romulus in the war against the Canenians. After which was ended, and he returned to Rome with victory, he reared a temple in the very pitch and top of the capitol hill. But Jupiter was by Romulus named Feretrius, as long would have it; for that Jupiter sifted him in striking the enemy, in that very place where he vowed the temple. Or else, because the Romans used in making of peace, to swear by his scepter and the flint. The roof of this Church built down for very age and through neglect of the Romans, Augustus repaired. This temple first built by Romulus, was afterwards enlarged by Annius Marinus.
Z z z

But the temple of Jup. Op. Max. of all others was the greatest and most renowned. This also was called Capitolium; and Targ. Priscus vowed it. After him, Targ. Superbus expended in the foundation thereof 40000 pound weight of silver; but before that he finished it, he was deprived of his Kingdom for his tyranny, and left the work unperfect to be accomplished by the Romans. Built it was upon the hanging of the Capitoline hill toward Tiberis, as hath been shewed before. For the form, the greatness and beauty of this temple, read Dionysius and sundry other authors, who have written of the Roman acts and of Rome it self. Upon the top or lantern thereof, stood Summanus the God, made of potters earth, whose head was smitten with lightning and fell into Tiberis. It had within it besides, a sanctuary or secret chapel, which no lay person might enter into. Within the said cell or chapel, were two coronets of gold: the one of them the Gauls consecrated to Jup. Op. Maximus; the other, the Carthaginians sent to Rome in the honor of Jupiter, in token of joy for their victory over the Samnites. Moreover, in the said temple were other three chapels, to wit, one of J. p. Op. Max., in the midst second of Minerva on the right hand; and a third of Juno on the left. And because men in old time attributed unto Minerva the invention of numbers, a law was set down in writing, That the chief and highest Pretor for the time being, should drive a spike or great nail near unto her image, whereby the computation of the years might be known. This so rich and costly edifice, was burnt all at once in the Vitellian war. Now at this day the place where it stood, is prophane: howbeit there remain yet to be seen, some tokens thereof, and the foundations; but all deformed and broken peccemeal.

CHAP. IV.

The Temples of Saturn, Jupiter Tonans, Jupiter Custos, of Fortune, of Vejovis, Mercy, Juno Moneta, and of Janus. The sepulchre of Orestes, the common Treasury, the house of Manlius, and chapel of Carmenta.

Since that we have described the temple of Jupiter K. of the Gods, in what place it was situate, and by whom built: meet it is to make report also of other gods in order, who had their houses in the capitol: and first of Saturn, Jupiter's father.

Saturn in old time had an altar erected unto him in the very way as ye go out of the Forum up to the capitol, as some think. There be that would have this temple or altar of Saturn, built by the companions of Hercules: others again say, that Tullius reared it. But of this variety in opinion of Writers, this may be the reason, because some affirm, that there were two temples consecrated to Saturn, but reared in divers places; and at several times: one at the rock of Carmenta, even before the capitoline cliff (wherein the bones also of Orestes brought from Aricta were bestowed); the other in that very place, where now standeth the chapel of S. Saviour: where yet at this day there is a turret to be seen, which they call the Tower in Atrium: for there first was the common treasure house of Rome. In the temple of Saturn, dedicated by Caius Lucilius, there stood Janus with four faces; signifying the four times of the year: of whom the first month January took name.

The temple of Jupiter Tonans Augustus Caesar first built, on the capitoline cliff or side of the hill, South-east; upon this occasion: It happened, that in the Cantabrian expedition, as he was carried by night in a litter, the lightning slightly glanced thereupon, and killed the servant that was the guide: and therefore he both vowed this temple, and also finished it to the honor of Thundering Jupiter. A temple also to Fortune was built not far from it.

The temple of Vejovis, stood between the castle and the capitol, in that part where now the chapels are to be seen of confederators. In old time they called this idol-devil, Vejovis, because he was deprived of all power to help and do good. To him they sacrificed a she goat: because he held arrows in his hand, most men thought he was Apollo.

Asylum, that is to say, the temple of Mercy stood likewise upon the capitol hill, near a shadowy grove, in the very valley amid the capitol, and the castle. Called it is the temple Intermontium, between two ockerows. This, Romulus erected; that what offender soever thither fled, he should be privileged as in a sanctuary. But Tiberius afterwards, supposing that this place ministered occasion of mischief, deprived it of that liberty. This Asylum, by report, the posterity of Hercules first erected.

The temple (as also the mint-house) of Juno Moneta, was built upon that plot of ground, where sometime stood the house of M. Manlius. This chapel, some report that L. Furius vowed; others, that L. Cicereius the Pretor; and Ovid, that Camillus. Now was Juno called Moneta, of giving warning; for that from the very place where afterwards the temple was set, there was a voice heard of Juno, admonishing them of the future overthrow by the Senones. In this place now standeth a Senators house of Rome.

The

The temple of Janus keeper of the Capitoline castle, stood in that place, whereat that day is the goal and prison for malefactors and fellows, toward the South-west, over, gainst the Forum Romanum. This Janus upon the Capitol, Romulus and Tullius devoted to have two faces peering thereby the two nations. Others would have him to be portrayed a faced; for his cunning and providence; for he was the first that invented the roiall crown; also boats; the skill of navigation; brazen coin and many other things. Janus took that name ab initio, of going, for that he turneth about the heaven and all things else, for which cause he also named Verrumini; in old time they believed there was but one Janus; but posterity in later age, have imagined more.

The temple of Jupiter Custos, Domitian (after he was invested in the empire) build it, and placed his own image in the lap and outcome of that god; It stood where at this day the Salara or salt pits are, near to the temple of Janus.

CHAP. V.

The temple of gods which have no certain place now in the Capitol.

Among those gods, whose determinat place assigned to them in the Capitol, is not known where it was, the first was Terminus, as to whom in all the world throughout, there is no proper place appointed. Now this Terminus was a rude and formless stone. Unto him Tullius first vowed a temple; and some say, that Numa dedicated it. How ever it be; no doubt verily ancient it was, as easily may be collected by that which followeth. But why, that in the Capitol was of men in old time reputed for a god, this was the cause: when Tarquinius Superbus determined to build a temple to Jupiter, he consulted with the Augurs about the place, because he would begin nothing without the approbation of the birds. They shewed unto him the mount Tapeius, but this place was already taken up with other gods, whose chapels there, were consecrated and halowed. These therefore were by certain sacrifices to be conjured out from thence, for to give way to Jupiter, and to be transfused into some other quarter. All the gods willingly yielded their places up to Jupiter as their K. only Terminus refused to be displaced; and so remained there still. When he had finished the temple and fore-part of the roof which regardeth the said stone, was left naked and open for that god, as who neither ought nor could be enclosed, the augurs therefore being sought unto and demanded, For what reason Terminus alone abode still with Jupiter, when all the other gods were gone? made answer, that thereby signified, that together with religion, their empire also was eternal. To this god they sacrificed not but in open air and publicly abroad, as being the god and keeper of bounds. Saint Augustine witnesseth, that Mars also and Joveinus together with Terminus, would not agree to give place to Jupiter; for that the dominion of Rome should not be bounded out, nor yet decay with age and continuance of time.

To Mars and Venus Ericina, Astius and Q. Fab. Max. being Duumvirs, dedicated chapels upon the Capitol, severed sundry by one vault or cistern.

To queen Juno, C. Flaminius in the Ligurian war, vowed a temple.

To Ops, Tullius the K. consecrated a temple; for that she is called the earth, and is the mother of all things, as bringing forth all, and receiving all again. The fame Ops is called Mais, Fauna, and Bona Dea. This temple was blasted with fire from heaven, as Levy telleth.

Mars revenger, Augustus Caesar erected a temple upon the Capitol, within the hill Saturninus.

To Faith, on the same hill, Astilius Collatinus dedicated another.

To Health, Concord, Liberty, and Victory, they built temples; and many there were within the city erected to Concord.

To Fortuna Præmigenia and Obsequence, Tullius dedicated a temple.

To Venus also they set up a temple in the Capitol, in memorial and ever lasting praise of the Roman dames, for willingly parting with the hair from their heads, toward the making of engines, that during the Gauls war, were deviled and made against the enemies.

Tarquinius Superbus built a temple to Jupiter Sponsor, and Sp. Postumius dedicated it. Likewise to Jupiter Pater the old Romans consecrated a temple in the Capitol.

The bankers

CHAP. VI.

Of the statues which either in old time were or now remain in the Capitol.

OF Statues in old time were sundry sorts, and the same made of divers matter: some of marble, some of brass, some of silver, and others of gold. Many of these were set up in the capitol to the immortal gods for divers causes; and namely, for their benefits bestowed upon mankind; which a long time were honoured and worshipped. To noble men likewise and such as had deserved well of the common-weal, the usual manner was in old time to set up statues and images in the temples, to provoke others by their example to do the like.

To Jupiter in the Capitol, Sp. Carvilius erected a statue in his temple, after he had vanquished the Samnites, taking the proportion or form thereof by the pattern of Jupiter Lætarius his image. Florus maketh mention, that this statue was smitten with lightning. He also set up another to Thundering Jupiter.

The old Romans set up in the temple of Jup. Op. Max. Statues to Health and Faith, to elicit of them one.

For Nemestrus was an image erected in the Capitol, for that this goddēss punished proud and faithlesse persons. She is named also Rhamnusia of Rhamnus a village in Attica, where she was worshipped; & Adrastea of Adrastus, who was the first that built a temple in the honor of her. Unto Hercules, for his notable and famous act, they erected many statues in the Capitol; and namely Pub. Sulpicius and Pub. Scaevola one; and Q. Fabius Max. another, which he brought from the Tarentines by him subdued.

The images of good Event, and good fortune (the workmanship both of Fraxinetus) were within the Capitol.

The image of Apollo with a diadem, and his Colossus thirty cubits high, in the making whereof were bestowed 140 talents. Lucullus translated out of Apollonia in Perusia, into the Capitol.

An image there was of Janus likewise in the Capitol, holding in his right hand the number of 300 and in his left of sixty five, to signify the daies of the yeer.

Two golden statues of Castor and Pollux, were by the Emperor Claudius of famous memory, dedicated in the temple of Jupiter.

The counterfeits resembling the rivers, Nilus and Tygris, half naked, were let up in the forefront of the temple of Conversators: the one carry upon the shoulders, Sphinx; the other a Tygre; two wild beasts: both of them hold in their right hand Cornucopia, which signifieth plenty.

The personage of Hercules portrayed naked, of brasse and double gault, without beard, holding in his right hand a club, and in the left the golden Apples of Heperides, was found near the Greek school and the beast market, in the ruins of Ara Maxima.

There be certain portraictures also of the Partian and Dacian triumphs, enclosed within walls which were taken out of the church now called S. Marins.

CHAP. VII.

Statues of famous and noble men set up in the Capitol.

 Cum Claudi- de & crepundi- is, but to [crepundi] read [crepundi] out of Claudi- pro Rebus signifi- fying the Greekish and Asian habie: for the Roman statues were Togate.*

TO Scipio they erected in the Capitol, a statue wearing a souldiers cassock and hippers or pants in regard of his victory over Antiochus, for an everlasting memorial of his worthy deeds. To Sylla there was also a statue erected in the Capitol, in habit of a footman.

For Emilius Lepidus, when he was but a boy, the people of Rome let up a statue, because he had in a battel vanquished the enemy, and saved a Citizen.

The like honour to the rest they did to Messius, for that he had preserved out of the temple of Vesta, being on fire, the image of Pallas.

They erected an image to Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, in recompence of a benefit of hers for that in a great dearth of corn, she served the people at 3 farthings a Modius. The same they did to Trebius the Adile.

Fabius Maximus made for himself a cast or molten image, and erected it just by that of Hercules.

Unto Brutus, for delivering Rome from the tyranny of Tarquinus, the Romans erected his image in the midst of the KK. statues.

Domitian would not suffer any image of his to be erected, unless it were of molten silver or gold, and of a certain weight.

The emperor Commodus took off the head from the coloss of Nero, & set upon it his own face which he had in the Capitol. This Colossus is to be seen broken as it was, in the houses of Conversators.

In the laid houses of Conversators, is extant yet the brasse portraiture of a she-wolf, at whose teats, Romulus and Remus, the first founders of Rome, are to be seen how they hang sucking.

The image of Romulus and Remus remained in the Capitol, resembling two youths the one standing upon the feet in servile habit and attire: the other sitting like a shepherd or herdsman, bending forwards with the body, plucking a thorn out of the sole of his foot, which rankled and fettered withall.

An infinite number of statues were in the Capitol, of gods especially, brought from other parts to Rome. For the Romans robbed the churches of foreign nations, for to enrich and adorn their own.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Capitol cliffs, Tarpeia rock, the stone of Carpenters, and the gate Sacerotaria.

In old time, they called that place and way whereby men go up to the Capitol, Clivus Capitolinus: but where that place was in times past, sundry opinions there be. Some affirm, that it lay toward that part of the hill which looketh to the Aventine, where now standeth S. Gregorius church in Velabrum: others between the temples of Saturius and Concordia, near to the arch of Severus; and at the stairs and standings, called Senatoriis Stabulis. Now the arch of Severus was raised at the foot of the Capitol hill, in the very head and top of Forum Romanum: under which they passed, that in triumph ascended up into the Capitol. The Capitol cliff then, was next unto the Roman Forum: which by the Censors was paved with flint: who also set up a galleis from the Chappell of Saturius unto the Capitol Temple close to the

Samueliam

Samueliam and the Curia over it. Corn. Tacitus writeth, that in former times there were many avenues and waies upon the Capitol, and thereupon arose (so many and divers opinions concerning the Clivus Capitolinus). In the place of the feast Feralia was in old time celebrated, whereof some tokens remain at this day to be seen. In it stood Attila house, which was full of shields and other armor, Cicero maketh report.

That place was called Tarpeia rock which standeth over the Forum Romanum: from whence in times past felonious malefactors found gully, were pitched down head-long, and wherein at this day offenders are punished.

Caementa stone, regardeth Tiberis, just over-against the Senators bridge. The Dung-gate called Sacerotaria, stood upon the Capitol cliff afore said; thither was throwed out all the fifth rid out of the temple of Vesta, for to be caried away and soon after to be cast into the Tiberis.

CHAP. IX.

Of tables, of the brasse columns or pillars, and of the silver Goose.

In the Capitol there were two sorts of tables: the one of Pictures containing the noble acts or battels, with the sieges and assault of Cities, exploited by valiant martial men. For some of them were so deorous of praise and renown, that they could not be content to behold their own statues erected in the Capitol, unless their acts were described also and depicted in tables set up in publick place; and by that means left their glory behind them, commended likewise to posterity. Another kind there was of tables, wherein were written in the most ancient laws, to wit, of Romulus, Numa, and the other KK. Likewise the statues of the later lawgivers (the publick acts and ordinances) the leagues and covenants with other nations; the sacred rites and divine service, and the ancient records and monuments, which were engraven and cut in brasse tables: of which, some at this day are extant; others by continuance of time, by war, fire, and carelesse negligence are lost and perished. For the keeping of these, there were certain persons appointed; that in so serious and important matters, there should be no forgery or corruption.

Pillars likewise of brasse, were by Domitian set up in the Capitol; the which, Augustus the conqueror of Aegypt, caused (of many brasse beak heads of ships molten together) to be made into four huge columns, and brought them to Rome. Sylla likewise took out of Tiphis temple in Athen, certain brasse pillars, brought them to Rome, & there consecrated them to Jupiter in the Capitol.

The Portraiture of a goose in silver, was set up within the Castle by the Romans for perpetual memory, because a goose by gagging gave warning of the enemies coming, to the warders of the castle and thereby saved the Capitol. For which cause geese long time after, were fed & kept in Rome at the Cities charges. There are besides, many other antiquities within the Capitol, cut in tables of brasse and marble both, and namely, Epitaphs, which here for brevities sake are left out.

CHAP. X.

Of certain edifices and buildings upon the Capitol hill, and of other things in general.

Now that we have made declaration of the statues, tables, and columns, worth the noting: something by the way would be said in the place, as touching the ancient houses there. The court called Calabra Curia, Romulus built the Capitol, and covered it with reed. Into this place the King-lacrificer was wont to assemble the Senat and people of Rome, that from him they might learn and know the daies of solemn game, plaies, and sacrifices.

Not far from the said Curia, was the cottage of Romulus.

And almost the same place stood the stately porch or gallery of Messius and Constantinus. The Library also called Majorum, built artificially upon marbles pillars and besides the publick court-yard.

There was an hallowed place likewise upon the Capitol, from whence they gathered Ferena, or sacred herbs, to make garlands for the facials heralds and the Paterfamilias: whereof they were crowned when they purposed either to make any accord and peace, or to proclaim war.

The flint stone also was here found, which they held in their hand when they were by Jupiter; pronouncing these words, If I made default with my knowledge, then let Diapler cast me out of all that I have (saying the City and the castle) as I hurl from me this stone.

The Capitol had certain vaults like celliters, into which were thrown all things overt, word; or so old that they were good for nothing. The fix steeds drawing in one team, were there to be seen, which Corn. Cornelius set up, the twelve gilded shields likewise, made of that many wherein the Ediles condemned and fined the corn-mongers that hoarded and kept in their corn. The shield also  Marins*, set out with the image of Ajdrubal; and the column garnished with ship beak-heads of brasse, whereof Livy speaketh, were here to be seen. Within the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus there was a short cloak or mantle and purple wolle, to which, of other purple gait, monuments were laid, they shewed the colour of shies in regard of the excellent bright galls and lustre that it caried. A present this was (by report) given to Aurélianus by a Persian K. who had it from the Earliest Indians. The lintell, cheeks and sill of the Capitol door, were made all of brasse. The brasse tiles likewise upon the roof, Q. Caius gilded over the place where Numa took his auguries was on the Capitol; but Tatius used rather the cattle cliff: where also stood sometime the house of Mavilius; but afterward thereupon was built the chapel of Juno Moneta. The books also of Sylla were kept in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus; by ten Wardens in stone coffer under the ground. Over & besides so many edifices were there, so beautiful was the Capitol, and the riches thereof so great, so many goodly ornaments and shrines of the gods most artificially wrought, that right worthy of men in old time, it was called the earthly habitation of the gods & Jupiter himself. For during the upright and flourishing state of Rome; so curiously built and richly beautified it was: that heaven surpasseth the earth, so far this edifice went beyond all other works and wonders whatsoever of the world; inasmuch as it seemed to have been built by the gods: so far surmounted it all the device and reach of mans wit. But as excellent as these things sometimes were, now at this day they are to be seen, all naked, forlorn, and desolate.

CHAP. XI.

The Temple of Concord, and Jupiter Stator: moreover what the Curia is.

Between the Capitol hill and mount Palatine, there lieth a valley, whereof we have spoken before. The Temples and buildings whereof, as also the places behind the Capitol, by order and course we are now to describe. In this valley therefore the temple of Concord delivered to be visited first: which word, being derived (as it were) from the unity and agreement of heart, maintaineth, augmenteth, and preserveth alone, all things in the world whatsoever.

A temple to this Concord, Camillus vowed, in case he could reconcile the Commons to the Nobles. When as therefore the people were brought into grace and favour again with the Nobility, he built the church of Concord, beginning above the Comitium and so forward unto the Forum. The porch belonging to this temple, are yet to be seen at the foot of the Capitol. From it, there was an ascent of an hundred steps up to the chapel of Juno Moneta. That temple of Concord, slain in long time to decay, was afterwards by the Senat reedified. Therein many a time the Senat met and sat in council, and orations were made unto the people. In this also there was a vault or shroud under the ground, wherein oftentimes thieves, armed men, cutters and bucklers were kept as in a prison, until the assemblies of the people were dissolved. This house had many statues and images cunningly and cunningly wrought, namely, of Juno, Apollo, and of Latona, bearing and holding her two babes Apollo and Diana. Likewise of Alectryon and  Hygiea*, the handy-work of Nereides. Also of Jupiter, Ceres, and Minerva: likewise of the Dames weeping and adoring the laid images all made of Stones. Moreover, the images of Mars and Mercurius; the workmanship of Pythagoras. Also of Marsyas bound, made by Zeuxis the painter, likewise father Liber and Cassandra, painted by Theodorus. As for the image of Victory in the porch and entrance of the said temple, it is to be seen how it was smitten with a thunderbolt.

To Jupiter Stator, Romulus in the Sabine war vowed a temple, that he might stay the flight of the Romans: whereupon he was called, the upholder of the Roman state. Therefore after victory obtained, he built a temple at the foot of the Palatine hill, just over-against the church of Concord, where at this day be most high battlements of wals. In this house also, like as in that other of Concord, the Senat assembled oft. Likewise in other temples. The courts, wherein the Senat gathered together in Council, were temples all, and therein were there also made: but in the sacred churches of the gods, neither met the Senat, nor any orations were made to the people. This temple of Stator was burnt to the ground in that fire of *Nero*es making, and never after reedified.

CHAP. XII.

The temple and grove of Vesta: the temple of Faith and of Romulus.

The temple of Vesta was built by Romulus, between the Capitol and the Palatine hills, not far from the Forum Romanum; whereat this day is to be seen, the church of S. Mary of graces. Neer unto it the palace of Numa was built. The Roman Pontiffes, when they would consult of great matters concerning religion, met in the court-yard of Vesta; like as the Senat and people of Rome, debated in council of their weightiest affairs within the temple of Faith. Now this was a most ancient temple built in Palatium by Romulus, or as some will have it, by Numa.

There was a grove also consecrated to Vesta, which reached from the roof of the Palatium, as far as to the large street called Nevevia. Out of that grove (before Rome was taken by the Gauls) a voice was heard, giving warning, that the City should be lost, unless the wals and gates were repaired.

The temple of Romulus was seated at the foot of mount Palatine, in the midst of that side which regardeth the Capitol, in that very place where now the church is of S. Theodore. In this again temple, there is a most ancient monument, the portraiture of the she wolf, yielding her teats unto the founders of the City, to be sucked.

CHAP. XIII.

Lupercal, and the figure Ruminalis.

The Lupercal was a cave at the bottom of the Palatine hill, overspread and covered with trees, having springs deep beneath under the rock. In the most inward and secret place of this cave there there was an altar consecrated to Pan. But as touching the etymology and derivation of the name, as also of the situation thereof, there go divers opinions: for in times past the place was, close hidden and unconspicuous. To now, it is inhabited on every side, inasmuch as there remaineth no milk and taken at all where Lupercal was. However the greater part of writers affirm, that it was in that quarter of the City, where at this day S. Theodorus church is seen. For to this place upon a time the Tyber overflowing, made a creeke thither: and hard by it was, where the two infants were cast forth. In the Lupercal therefore, certain authors confidently avouch, that Romulus and Remus were laid to perill, and so carried by water to the place called afterwards Ruminalis, were under a fig-tree there, nourished by a she wolf. This wolf haunted & kept in the den called Lupercal; and from thence ran to the bank side under the fig-tree Ruminalis for to the suckle the said babes, and so gave the name unto the cave to be called Lupercal, as it were the lurking hole and den of the wolf. There be again that would have Evander to give the name to the same hollow cave: for he, as is before declared, was defended from Arcadia, where the people after most ancient rites and ceremonies, do right devoutly worship Pan, the god of herdmen. Unto whom also a mountain in Arcadia to him dedicated, was called Lycium, for that he keepeth, as it were, the wolves from the sheep, and preserveth the flocks and herds. This Evander therefore coming upon a time into Italy, and resting in these parts, consecrated both this grove and cave to Pan, and according to the manner of his country, there honoured him. In the said cave, therefore, reared was an altar, and a goat thereupon sacrificed unto him, as to the god and preserver of the flocks: and seeing that he called wolves from them, therefore the place wherein he was worshipped took the name Lupercal.

Now the least Lupercalia was by Romulus and Remus instituted. For they having obtained of Numerus a plot of ground to build them a City on in that very place where they had been cast forth, called all their companions to a feast and merry meeting: where, after they had killed sacrifices, and refreshed themselves with meat, and withall taken their wine liberally to the full, they grew to disport, and in the merry fit clad themselves in the skins of the goats which they had sacrificed, and then fell to hopping and dancing full boundly. Hereupon their posterity, celebrating the memoriall thereof, held a festival solemnity called Lupercalia, which retained the name of the place where first they began. Hereof see more in Quintus Maximus, Servius, and Plutarch in the life of Numinus. As for the fig-tree Ruminalis, it was so named of the river Tyber, called at the Rhinion. Some would have it take the name of Romulus. Others of the milk given to the laid infants, for that part of the throat which draweth milk, is called Ruma in Latines. This place was over against the house of the two lords Cosmus and Damianus, on the side of the mount Palatine, opposite against the she-wolf, called Circus Maximus, Romulus and Remus: thus laid forth about Lupercal, and carried by the water to this place, were soltered for a while under the fig-tree Ruminalis, in the place where the Comitium after was. The tokens of this tree remaineth unto the time of Augustus Caesar, as Ovid testifieth.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the new way, the streets Jugarius, and Tufcan.

The street called the new way over against the temple of Jupiter Stator goeth along the valley between the Capitol hill and the Palatine, and reacheth to the Forum Romanum. This, howsoever it be called new, was well known to be most ancient, and is different from that, which Cacullacalla repaired under his bins.

The street Jugarius, otherwife called Thurarius, leadeth from the gate Carmentalis, along the foot of the Capitol hill, to the Forum Romanum. In it was the altar of Juno Juges, who was thought to make marriages, and to couple folk in matrimonies, and thence it was that gave the name to Vincut Jugarius.

Vicus Tufcanus beginneth at the Forum, and along the foot of the Palatine sheweth the way to Velabrum. The reason of the name was this. The Tuicans upon a time fighting against the Aricians, were by them overcome; and after many thousands of them slain in battel, the rest being few in number fled to Rome: who taking delight in the pleasant seat of the City, & the commodiousness of the place, determined there to remain. Whereupon having a plot of four stadia granted them by the Senat, between the Capitol and Palatine, they inhabited the same. Herupon the street was called by them Tufcanus Vicus, and many a 100 year after retained that name. In it afterwards there kept bawds and such kind of people, whereupon it grew out of credit, and lost also the first name.

CHAP. XV.

The Arches of Romulus, the Senaculum, and the dwelling house of Ovid.

The old arches (whom some think Romulus erected) continued a long time built of brick, neither would the Romans suffer that any man should make them of marble: to the end, that the memoriall of their City founder, should remain more firmly in the minds of men. But in continuance of time long after, they decayed and fell down, in that very place where now is the church of S. Mary of Grace, and were never afterwards reedified. The Romans named that place Senaculum, between the Capitol and the Forum, wherein the Senat kept a consistory for council and consultation.

That Ovid mansion house stood under the Capitol, himself witnesseth, even where as now the church is of S. Mary of Consolation. Thus much of the buildings of the Capitol and the valley to it. Now followeth the mount Palatine.

The third Book.

CAAP. I.

The divers etymologies of Palatine.

Albeit the hill Palatine were along time inhabited before the City was built, and namely, first by Valentia the daughter of Italus; then by Evander, who also therein let up a castle; whom there succeeded after the City was founded, KK and Emperors; inasmuch as scarcely any one place of Rome is more renowned by writing, then this hill: yet the certain reason of the name why it should be so called, and which a man may be bold to follow, can hardly be set down. Some would have it so called, because the Arcadians wandering with Evander disorderly, and the Palatines out of the Rheatin territory (called likewise Palatium) came to that mount and it inhabited; others of Palas the great grandfather of Evander. Livy thought, that of Palantium a City of Arcadia, it was first called Palantium, and afterward Palatine. There are besides, who of Palatia the wife of Lavinus, fetch the original of the denomination: or of Palatib, the daughter of Hyperboreus, who bare Latinius unto Hercules, and inhabited this mountain or of Palatia the daughter of Evander, who there was buried: or of Palas, who was himself inhabited in it. Some there was also, of the bleating of sheep, which pastured there in times past, before the hill was by men frequented and peopled, imagine it was so named: or else because *Ro*cks were wont there palare, that is, to wander and graze up and down. And hereupon it is, that Nero were called it Balanium, of Balanus; or Palatinum of Palas. Terentius calleth it the mount Romulus, of Romulus his image, found at the very foot of the said hill. This may suffice of the derivation of the name.

* Palatinus, it, Bleating.

CHAP. II.

The temple of Victory, Ceres, Juno Sospita, and the mother of the gods: the temple of Liberty and the porch thereof, as also the house of Celsus.

NOW that we have declared the reason of the name of Palatinum; we will go forward to shew the temples and houses of the mountain, like as we have done in the description of the Capitol hill.

When the Romans had performed fortunately many martial exploits, and oftentimes returned with victorie over their enemies, because they would not be found unthankfull to the gods, unto whom they were beholden for their happy achievements, and thereby afterwards misse of the like fortunate success: they consecrated unto the goddess Victoria a temple in that part of the Palatine, which looketh toward the hortyards and gardens of Maria Nova in the very bottom of the descent, hard at the gate Romanus. L. Posthumian an Edile Cursus took order for the building thereof, out of certain money raised by fines and penalties; and when it is finished, he dedicated it to the goddess Victoria.

Neer thereto there was a chappel, consecrated to Victoria, which M. Porcius Cato vowed, Besides in the same place was the temple of Juno Sospita.

The Arcadians, which with Evander came to the Palatine hill, built a temple also in Palatinum to Victoria, but as different from this above-named, as far more ancient and to the honor of that goddess, solemnized yearly sacrifices.

They built a temple also to Ceres in the Palatine.

In the fatall book of Sibylla there was a prophesie found, That the forrein enemy and strange born should be chased out of Italy, in case the mother of the gods might be brought to Rome from Passionus. Now a time it was, which the inhabitants of that country so called. Sent therefore were Embass. into Asia as far as to Passionus a town at Phrygia: who brought with them that Great mother of the gods in Italy. Then P. Cornelius carried it from the sea into the Palatine, and bestowed it into the temple of Victoria, until such time as one was built of purple for her. Afterwards, M. Livinus and C. Claudius the Censors took order for a temple to be made to this great mother of the gods, & the same let out with statues, pillars and pavement of divers stones of great price. And Junius Bruns dedicated it. The plaies also and games called Megalothia, whereof Cicero speaketh, were first instituted at the dedication thereof.

Unto Liberty, P. Clodius built a temple and stately gallery in part of Celsus his house, neer the temple of Jupiter Stator.

CHAP. III.

CHAP. III.

Of the Chappell and altar * Febris: the temple of Lares: the chappel of the goddess Virtutis, of Faith, and Jupiter Victor.

* The fever;

NOT to those gods only that did good to mankind the Romans consecrated temples, but dedicated chappels to those also that did them hurt, to the end, that they should do less harm, and punish them more gently. For certain it is, that on the hill Palatine there was a temple & altar both consecrated to the Fever: likewise to Nemesis the goddess of vengeance; whereof before in the second book.

Besides, they erected a chappel of the Lares in the Palatine.

In like manner, there was a chappel in the Palatine, consecrated to the goddess * Virtutis into which, if man and wife came together, although they disagreed and were fallen out before, they returned home again good friends from thence, and all was well.

After that Ennius with his son Africanus and daughter Roma came into Italy, they reared a temple to Faith, in Palatine; they which was dedicated notwithstanding in the name of the daughter, and the same was written in the forefront of the temple: and therefore many years after, when Romulus and Remus strove who should give name to the City, the Senat and people of Rome reading the name of Aeneas his daughter in the frontispice of the said temple, resolved to name the City after her, Roma.

Q. Fabius in the Sabin war, vowed a temple to Jupiter conqueror: and afterwards built it on the Palatine hill, and there dedicated it.

CHAP. IIII.

The temples of Heliogabalus, Apollo and the Penates: the house of Orcus; the place of the Paladium or image of Minerva; and the temple of Augustus.

Antonius Heliogabalus consecrated a god in the mount Palatine, which he called Heliogabalus, and built a temple in the place, where before stood that of Orcus or Pluto. But to who credit and name to this new and counterfeit god with great reverence and worship, he endevoured to translate into this temple of his, * the sacred cup of that great mother of the gods, the fire of Vesta, the image of Minerva, called Palladium, the heaven, the earth, and all things else which the Rom. honoured above the rest. The Christian and Jew with religious awe there consecrated, to the end, that no man in the religious worship of that temple and god, might allege any pretence why he should not with good conscience so do.

Moreover, in the Palatine, there was built a most ancient temple of Apollo. This chanced to be overthrown by thunder and lightning; and when the fourtieth gave out, that the god misused it & required another, Augustus Caesar adjoined a porch to the ruin: the god and dedicated the temple a new that there stood: wherein himself, when he grew aged, many a time sat in council with the Senat, and empannelled the decuries of judges. In it likewise were pendant candlesticks branched with arms like trees, whereon the approved poets bestowed their writings. Certain marks and tokens of this temple are to be seen (although obscurely) neer to the vineyard of Edra, where the house of Tiberius stood. Unto him were intimated the Apollinare games, whereof read Cicero.

The temple of the City-protectors, called Penates, stood in that part of the Palatine which looked into the North, even to Velia not far from the Forum. In it were the images of the Trojan gods in the same are portrayed two young men sitting together, and holding a ball in their hand. In like manner, the crooked augurs flaves called Lusini, from root and brail. Besides, an earthen Trojan vessel of potters work, Apollo also and Nephele were there to be seen.

When the temple of Vesta was on a light burning fire, the image of Pallas being saved out thereof, was transcribed into Velia, and gave the name unto temple of Palas, now S. Andrews church, standing in the same place.

Some report, that there was a temple built in Palatinum to Augustus Caesar of famous memory by his daughter Livia.

CHAP. V.

The Palatine houses, and the court of the Salii.

That Romulus and Remus being shepherds shod some time in these parts, the flocks and cottages, which long time after were found here, made of light wood & reed, do testify which as any of them in continuance of time decayed and fell down, the shepherds repaired with the like matter to their ancient form, that the perpetual memorial of Romulus and Remus the City founders, what kind of persons they were, and what manner of houses they lived in, might be delivered to posterity. In that corner of the Palatine hill, which leadeth unto the grand cirque or show-place, there stood (many ages) the cottage which they called Casa Romuli.

Tullus Hostilius, before he built his court dwelt upon Velia, in that very place where afterwards the chappel of the Penates stood.

Not far from thence, even in that part of the Palatine which regardeth the Forum, Caesare (by report) had his house built.

* Not much unlike, but somewhat better faim, then S. Zynobius of Paula.

* Scaphium got Father Hyphos, the figure?

Moreover, between M. Scævus his house and Capitulum, there was but a small step over, Cicero's house purchased of Crassus, was in the most frequent and conspicuous place of the mount Palatine, above the Church of Jup. Stator, near the Palatium. Pliny testifieth, how the houses of Crassus the Orator, and Puerbini, in the Palatium, were in old time overturned.

One Captain Favus likewise had a house in the Palatium. Alfo Tiburtus, whereof we have written in the former chapter. Augustus (born in the region about Palatium, in a place called Capita bubula, i. the ox heads; and where after his death, they erected a chapel unto him) dwelt first near the Roman Forum, above the round stairs called Scala anularia, in the house sometime of Calpurnius the Orator. Afterwards he built the stately Palatine at his own charges and gave it to the City, and himself dwelt on the Palatine hill in the small house of Horatius.

The Guild, or religious court of the Salii, built in the mount Palatine, chanced to be burnt; and in the ashes thereof, the staff of Romulus called Livinus was found, without any hurt. Publius dwelt in an house flanking over the Forum, which was called Subvotia.

That the dwelling house of Tarquinius Priscus was near unto the Temple of Jup. Stator, may soon be proved out of Livy.

CHAP. VI.

Of the top of Velia; the statues in Palatine, and other things in general.

THE pitch of the hill called Summa Velia, was in that higher part of Palatium, which looketh into the South-east, whereas now is the Temple of Mary the new. Called Velut was, because in old time before the device of shearing sheep, the shepherds were there wont to pluck the wool from the sheeps back.

Augustus set up a Library of Latine and Greek books in Palatine, and adorned it with the money raised of the most excellent brasts of that huge colossus of Tukan Apollo. He adjoynd thereto a porch or gallery, which they call Palatium.

In it was erected by the Senat, a statue unto Numerianus the Emperor, and a singular oratory. In the same porch, the Romans also let up a statue unto M. Varro, whiles he lived.

The Auguratorium, which was a place where they used to take auguries, was upon mount Palatine. Capitulum Palatinum likewise, the workmanship of Scopas, was in Palatium. Ladona in the same was placed.

Titus the Emperor set up a golden statue in Palatine to Britannicus.

Moreover, the tree which grew out of Romulus his spear was in the Palatium. For he, after he had taken his auguries in the mount Aventine, lanced his spear from him into the Palatine, which sticking in the earth, budded forth leaves and grew to be a tree.

Likewise the bay tree, which the same day that Augustus was born, sprung with him and suddenly appeared, was in Palatium. Of this laurel tree, they that afterwards triumphed, were wont to wear their wreathed garlands.

The Palatine baths, whereof Cicero maketh mention in his Oration for Refois, were in the same Palatium; and of them there remain yet some tokens, above the Circus maximus, not far from the vineyard of Fedra.

In the same mountain also there was a place called Sicilia, and Iupiters parlor.

The most beautiful streets called Atronia &c. paved with Lacedæmonian and Porphryet stones, were in Palatium. The streets also of Padus, and Fortuna respectively, were to be seen in Palatine. And there were the games and pastimes celebrated, which they call Palumal.

CHAP. VII.

The Palatium now called the Greater: the court-yard of the Palatium; and the old gate of the very Palatium itself.

HOW great a compass the Palatium took up in old time, how gorgeously it was built, how rich, how frequent and full of houses, the huge ruins, the pictures, statues, and most precious pillars there found, do easily declare. For no man ever hath left in writing, who first built so great and stately edifices; who afterwards enlarged the same, and in so conspicuous a place erected those houses. By little & little it grew to so great an height, as if all writers should be ignorant of those antiquities: neither was any thing at one time done at once, which seemed worth the memorial. For Historiographers are wont to deliver unto posterity those things only which are rare and worthy of admiration. The mount Palatine at this day is called Palatium majus, and setting aside the Church of Saint Andrew, hath scarce two houses inhabited. The rest being either replenished with vines or fit for pasture, yieldeth grafs and food, for sheep, caples and goats. So as it seemeth it may be called Palatium of the bleating that sheep make, rather than Palatium.

This Palatium had also a place therein called Arrium, built in old time and hallowed by Augury: in it the Senat gave in council, because they might not assemble in any place unaugurate or unhallowed. Therein also rains were sacrificed.

The old gate of the Palatium was near the Roftra, over-gaint S. Laurence Church in Miranda. Some would have this to be called the gate of Romulus, in old time.

CHAP.

CHAP. VIII.

The Temples of Janus, Augustus, and Faustina.

AFTER the description of the Temples and edifices of Palatium, the third part of the city, now followeth a fourth: namely, the Roman Forum. Therein is the most stately Temple of Iannus (for me thinks we do well to begin at Iannus, who is counted the dore and entrance as it were of all things) having four gates. For Iannus himself, who was therein worshipped, had four faces; and from Falisci a city in Tuscan forced by the Romans, he was translated to Rome into the Forum, named after Transitorium. His Temple was built in that part of the said Forum which looked toward the Roman Forum. Procopius saith, that in his daies it was built in the midst of the Forum over-against the Capitol, a little above the place which the Romans called, The three Destinies. Other Temples there were besides of Iannus, and namely, in the Capitol near the theatre of Murcellus, with two fronts all of brasse, and had two brasse dore, which in time of peace were shut, and against war, were let open.

The temple of Augustus was built in the Roman Forum. This was begun in the time of Tiberius the Emperor, but left imperfect. Caligula finished it. Above it, he made a bridge which joynd the Capitol and Palatine together.

There remain yet to be seen certain monuments and marks of the temple of Faustina. Hadrianus the Emperor her husband founded it at the foot of the Palatine hill (where the brazen image of a bull standeth) for her sake that she might be honoured as a goddess. The same, his son Antoninus Hellogabalus afterwards would have to be a temple for himself, or Iupiter Syrius, or else the Sun. At this day it is the church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. IX.

The Temple of Castor and Pollux, and the Roftra.

NO man doubteth but that the temple of Castor and Pollux was sometime in the Roman Forum before the Roftra, near to that above-said of Faustina. This sacred house A. Posthumus the Dictator dedicated: and L. Metellus afterwards repaired and beautified it, with the Dalmatian spoils. In it, as in many other, the Senat used to sit in council, and therein were publick Orations made to the people. C. Metellus adorned the same with statues, pillars, and excellent painting: wherein also he let up the portraiture and resemblance of Piora, a picture of singular beauty. A table besides, which contains the records and monuments, touching the free bourgeoisie granted to the horsemen of Capua. The steps and greeces going up to this temple, Cladius afterwards plucked up, as witnesseth Cicero.

There was a temple or consecrate place called Roftra, at the foot of the hill Palatium, over-against that before-named of Castor and Pollux, whereas now is the little chappel of S. Mary de Inferno. From these Roftra, were the sentences and acts of the Senat, brought and propounded to the people.

CHAP. X.

The Temple of Castor, Venus Genetrix, and Mars revenger: and the court of Venus.

Castor of famous memory had a temple near his own Forum, at the broad-street called Sacra, behind the temple of Faustina. In it were let up as Saints, Victory and Castor.

In the same Castor's Forum, there stood a chappel of Venus Genetrix, behind the said temple of Faustina. This, Castor vowed in the Pharfallian war, and dedicated it. After victory in the war against Pompey, Castor enclosed the temple of the said Venus, within a court-yard and a cloister, which Hadrian afterwards repaired and built new.

Augustus Castor in the battle of Philippi, vowed a temple to Mars the avenger, which afterwards he edified in his own Forum, wherein were certain iron pots dedicated to Mars: and two statues, bearing up the tabernacle of Alexander the Great. This is thought to be at this day the church of Saint Martina.

CHAP. XI.

The Temples of Vulcan, Concord, Peace, Romulus, and Venus Cloacina.

THE temple of Vulcan, Romulus founded, above the Comitium and Forum Romanum, at the bottom of the Palatine hill: but Tatius dedicated the temple of Vulcan, as also of the Sun and Moon, of Saturnus, Rhea, Vesta, Diana, and Quirinus. In the temple of Vulcan there was dedicated unto Vulcan, the brazen chariot of Romulus, wherein he rode in triumph a second time. Therein remained also the statue of Cocles there erected. Many a time were Orations made to the people in this time.

In the yard belonging to Vulcan's temple, Fulvius, the son of a Libertine or enfranchised citizen, 303 years after the building of the capitol, vowed the temple of Concord, if he could reconcile the States of Senators and Gentlemen to the people. Afterwards he built it of the amercements and penalties that he took of Uiters condemned, at the foot of the mount Palatine. Optimus the Consul Consul afterwards repaired it anew. In it, Pliny testifieth that an altar ran blood for two daies. Livia Drusilla in her open gallery, erected a chapel of Concord, in regard of the mutual and loving agreement between her husband and her: which afterwards Tiberius dedicated.

In that place where Drusilla first founded the said chapel of Concord, Vespasian afterwards with wonderful celerity and speed, (after the civil wars ended) finished the Temple of Peace, begun before by Claudivius. A large building this was and four square, set out with most stately and fair columns, and of all other Temples the richest. In it Vespasian bestowed the holy vessels and precious ornaments of the Temple in Hierusalem; which T. had shewed in triumph. It had also the statue of Granvader, and an infinite number of other ornaments wherewith it was decked and beautified. This Temple caught a fire, and at once suddenly was consumed whole: and never was it known to this day how this fire came: unless it were (as some imagine) by reason of an earthquake which happened the same hour, the stones rubbed together and struck fire.

An altar of Pedeus was by Augustus first reared: but in what place, the posterity knoweth not. The same, Agrippa afterwards enlarged and adorned. Between the Temple of Peace and Faustina, there is at this day a most ancient Temple, and two pillars of the porch to it, which now is dedicated to the two brethren Saint Cosmas and Damian. Some think it was the Temple of Romulus and Remus, the same that Caracalla the Consul, after he had subdued the Samnites, dedicated, and of the infinit mals of spoils adorned it.

That the Temple of Venus Cloacina stood near the broad street Sacra, Ovid testifieth. Now the image of this Cloacina was found in a privy or draught, called Maxima, and T. is consecrated. And because it was not known whole resemblance it was, it took the name of the place wherein it was found.

CHAP. XII.

The Temple of Tellus, Salus, Victoria, the Sun and Moon, the house of Cassius, and the Army.

Where the Temple of Tellus stood, some say it is uncertain: others think it was not far from the Esquias, near the rising of the hill that leadeth to S. Peters Church in Vincula, whereas now standeth the Temple of Panteon. Sempronius vowed it: for whiles he fought a battail with his enemy, at Asculum the head Town of the Picentes, the earth quaked: and because he would pacify the goddess Tellus (i. the earth) which he thought was angry, he vowed this Temple unto her. Built it was in the same plot of void ground, where the house of Spurius Cassius (who sought to be a King) was overthrown. Near unto this Temple of Tellus, there was an Atrium: where of Cicero also maketh mention in a certain place. Within the said compass, C. Junius Bibaculus, the Consul, vowed a chapel to the goddess Salus, in the time of the Samnites war. The same was by him put forth to building when he was Censor, and dedicated by him Dictator.

A. Valerianus an Aedile, caused the Temple of Victoria near the Roman Forum to be made, of the penalties and fines taken.

In this place also was the altar of Apollo.

Some would have, that the Temples of Concord and Aesculapius, were near the Amphitheatre, in the place where the gardens be of S. Mary the new.

The Temple of Mercury also was in the Forum.

The Temples likewise of Iris and Serapis were in the Burse called Emporium. And some think, that these were the Chappels of the Sun and Moon, dedicated by Tatius.

CHAP. XIII.

The Forum of Trajanus: the things now therein, or that have been heretofore.

Thus much of Temples, of holy and religious places, which seemed worth the noting, hath been briefly written. Now from hence forward we will speak of those things, which shall concern the honour and memorial of moral men, and first begin we will with that excellent Prince Trajanus.

Forum Trajani was built (with wonderful Art and industry of man) by Apollodorus, between the Forum of Nerva, the Capitol hill, and the mount Quirinal. The same workman built also (at the commandment of Trajanus) Meiodemus and Gymnasium. The roof of that Forum or Hall was of brass, within round about in every place the forms and images of horses, and military ensignes all gilt. Now were these foreaid images erected there at the cities charges in memorial of them that had deserved well of the common weal, or otherwise of some notable act.

The triumphant arch in like manner with many other monuments reared to the praise of Trajanus, adorned this Forum or hall of his.

The porch of this Forum, built upon most mighty and high pillars, and resting upon large characters, yielded to great admiration to the beholders, that they seemed rather the works of giants than men. Into this, Alexander Severus in the honor of Trajanus, translated most beautiful statues of singular men.

Trajan horse in like manner stood in the mids, bearing upon high columns.

In a coin also there is found the image of Trajan, with this inscription: S. P. Q. R. Optimo Prin.

Principis. The Senat and the people of Rome to the best Prince. But hereof Lampridius writeth much.

He likewise is reported to have adorned the palace, made of sundry marbles, with pictures and statues within.

In the midst of the Forum, there stood the column of Trajan, built with winding stairs. This had round about it the summary of the acts of Trajan engraven and chased most cunningly; but above all the Dakes war: within there be 185 steps up to the top; and it hath 40 little windows to let in light into them: that shall go up: 120 foot high it was, or (as Eutropius writeth) 140. In the lower of lantern thereof were the bones of Trajan kept within a golden ball. This pillar Trajan himself never saw: for whiles he warred against the Parthians, the Senat dedicated it unto him in his absence. But he in his return from the Persians, died in the way at Seleucia a City in Syria, of a flux of blood. His dead corps was brought to Rome: and of all the Emperors, he alone (as Eutropius writeth) was interred within the City. The reason why his bones are left in that Column is this: The manner in, old time was, for Princes and Noblemen to be buried under hills: but there being not mountains enough wherupon to raise sepulchres in every place, it hapned that such steeples and high pillars were set over their dead bodies instead thereof.

CHAP. XIV.

The Forum, the Palace, and porch of Nerva.

Next to our sight cometh the Forum of Nerva, and it is behind the Church of S. Hadrian. In the midst of it there stood a Column of brass of an huge bigness: covered with plate of silver or copper, and hath within it light every way. This Forum was garnished with divers statues and Columns, containing the whole order of the acts of Nerva. This was afterwards called Forum Transitorium, for that from it there was the way to the Forum of Augustus, and the Roman.

There appeared as yet some part of the Porch or gallery belonging to the Forum: for being consumed by fire, yet it left certain obscure tokens, witnessing, that in the same place was the Forum of Nerva.

Part also of the Palace of Nerva, built of 4 square stones and pillars, together with the Church of S. Blaise, are yet seen enclosed between the Comitium and the tower of Milvia.

CHAP. XV.

The Roman Forum, the Comitium, the prison Tullianum, and the Image of Marforius.

The Roman Forum, which also is called Latinum, began at the foot of the Capitol, and reached in length to the Church now of S. Mary the new, which is in Velia. But at the first, the circuit and bounds thereof were much narrower. For from the head thereof abovenamed, it went no farther than the nearest foot of the mount Palatine. Many a year after, Augustus Caesar enlarged it.

The Comitium joyned to the Forum, or rather it was a part thereof: for it beginneth at the gate of Palatinus, and endeth at the Church of S. Mary the new.

At the foot of the Capitol hill, South-east ward, Ancus Martinus built a prison for malefactors to be laid up in. After him K. Tullius adjoyined to it that part which is under the ground, and called that dungeon, Tullianum. Made it was of huge and mighty big stones, with narrow long holes, for to receive the shadow, as it were, and resemblance of a light. The dungeon within was vaulted with stone, only for darkness, and loathsome by reason of a strong and stinking lent. This whole prison was divided into two parts, the upper room and the nether. Carcer it was called in Latine Carcerendo, because it kept them there enclosed from coming forth.

Just before this prison there lieth a huge marble-idol which they call Marforius. Some think it was the Image of the bakers god, others of Jupiter, surnamed Panarius, of the tumours that bear upon like to loaves of bread. For the Romans in times past, when they were besieged by the Gauls in the Capitol, had warning by Jupiter in a dream, to make bread of all the corn that they had left, and to throw it into the enemies camp. Whereby the Gauls despairing that the Romans could possibly be tamed with hunger, brake up the siege. Whereupon the Romans in perpetual memorial of this benefit, erected an altar and a statue to Jupiter Pistor.

This image is thought to be the resemblance of the river Rhenus in Germany, because it is upon a rock. But why it should be called Marforius, I know not, unless it be because it standeth in the Forum of Augustus.

CHAP. XVI.

The Secretary of the people of Rome: the arch of Septimius; the Temple of Saturn. Of the Treasury, and the mint-house where they coined money.

Behind the image of Marforius, over against the arch of Septimius is the Church of S. Martina: where, as it appeareth by an evidence engraven in marble, was sometime the place called the Secretary of the people of Rome.

Right against the said Church of S. Martina at the bottom of the rock Tarpeia, standeth the arch arch of Septimius, which in both the fronts thereof containeth the deeds of that Emperor both by land and sea.

Directly there followeth the Temple, sometimes of Saturn, now S. Hadrian's Church. The said Temple was of great antiquity. Some report L. Lartius for the builder thereof; others L. Targuinius: albeit more likely it is that Lartius dedicated it. Livy writeth, that when A. Sempronius and M. Minucius were Cōnsuls, Numantius Plancus rededicated it. The treasury of the people of Rome, no writer denieth, but that it was translated out of the Capitol into this Temple. But why men in old time would have the treasure to be within Saturn's Temple, there be divers opinions. Some say, because in Saturn's daies there was no theft committed: for under him all things were common; no covetous miser nor lewd person laid wait for his neighbour, but all things were administered with righteousness, faith, and love. Cyprian alledgeth this cause, because Saturn was the first that in Italy ordained money to be coined. Moreover, in this treasure-house were kept the public ordinances. Also the books called Elephantini, containing the five and thirty tribes of the people of Rome. Moreover, all the books of the Cities accounts: also the ancient writings and records of the old Atrium and the City debts. Furthermore, the standards and ensigns of war. Over and besides, whatsoever was by the Generals and Captains after the conquest of Provinces carried in triumph, was thither brought. Lastly, whatsoever was expedient and profitable for the common-weal to be relieved, as laws, letters, and other common registers of a City. The Censors likewise were put to take their oath in the Temple of Saturn.

Between the church now of S. Hadrian, and that which sometime was the Temple of Cæsar and Pollux, stood in old time the work-house wherein they coined money.

CHAP. VII.

The golden Miliarium the bridge of Caligula, the Rostra and the Curia.

Miliarium aureum stood in times past at the head of the Roman Forum, under the Temple of Saturn, near to the arch of Septimius. A pillar it was, so called, wherein all the high-ways of Italy were cut and engraven, and there ended, and from which the measures began and went on to every gate of all quarters.

Caligula brought a bridge of marble through the Roman Forum, from the mount Palatine to the Capitol. A more stately and curious piece of work there never was throughout all the City: the bridge was sustained with four or five mighty pillars of most white marble: whereof at this day three are to be seen at the foot of the one hill, and as many at the other, in such manner as they were in times past by Caligula built for the bridge. In the midst of the Forum, over-against S. Hadrian's Church there standeth a pillar, which is verily thought to be one of them that supported the brazen horse of Domitian gilded all over. At the foot of this horse was the resemblance of Rhene, a river in Germany: for that Domitian the Emperor had triumphed over that Province, and this is the Image which afterwards they called Marforius.

Of the beakheads of the Antiat ships, a pulpit was built in the Roman Forum by the Romans at the foot of the mount Palatine, which Temple they called Rostra: that therein the acts of the Senat should be made. Now of this Rostra there were twain, the new at the bottom of the Palatine as is before said, and the old near the Curia in the Comitium. In this Rostra were laws published, causes pleaded, and Orations made to the people. On the same manner was also to erect the Statues for most famous and noble men.

In the most conspicuous place of the Forum Romanum, before Rostra, upon a lofty stone was the portraiture let or Faustulus the fosterfather of Romulus and Remus. For he, whilst he was detestful to part the fire between Romulus & Remus the founders of the City, was there slain, where, afterwards they erected unto him his statue. Behind the Rostra was the sepulchre also of Romulus. Moreover, before the Rostra stood the statue of Hercules, clad in a coat after the Eleans habit, with a grim and stern countenance. Three statues also of Sibylla in the same place. The manner of the Romans besides, was to set up the heads of those that were put to death, there to be seen.

Two Curia or Council-houses at Rome there were: one near the Forum, built by the Temple of Peace, named Hofilia; the other in the mount Calvus, whereof we will speak hereafter.

CHAP. XVIII.

The Lake Curius, the great sinker town ditch, and the Doliola.

The lake Curius was in the midst of the Rom. Forum, near Domitian's his horse. This lake took that name of M. Curius, who to save the common-weal, willingly of his own accord cast himself headlong, armed as he was, together with his horse into a chink of the ground in the midst of the Roman Forum. Some would have it so called of Metius a Sabine, who through this lake escaped safe to his own company.

The vault or sink called Clauca Maxima, was made by the commandment of Targuin: for by reason that the hills were digged under, and the City stood hollow upon arches, it received & carried away all the filth thereof. At the Temple of Jup. Stat. divided it was into three conveyances or channels, whereof two of them are now stopped up, the third runneth with most clear water by the Lake Curius, under the Roman Forum, along the foot of the mount Palatine into Velabrum, and from thence in a sink made of four-square stone, it dischargeth it self into Tiber. In old time there there were many such vaults, and those for public use. But after the City was won by the Gauls & burnt, whilst every man made haste to rebuild his house, where he could meet fast with a convenient place: they took no heed to the streets as they were before: so as neither the City was divided as aforetime into quarters, nor yet the finks which in times past went under the streets, were marked where they lay: but afterwards were conveyed under private mens houses, whereby it came to pass, that each house almost at this day hath a sink or privy belonging to it. Hereupon also it is, that this author, whose epitome or abridgment we write, hath not divided the regions of the City agreeable to the old writers. But to the end that those things which the fethers down might be sooner understood, and better remembered, he hath parted it into those quarters as now it standeth and when he sheweth in what part of the city any place in times past was, he declareth them in those coats which at this day are known to the inhabitants. But as at first these finks were common (as I have said) so there were appointed public overleers to look unto them.

Near the foresaid great sink there was a place, which of certain barrels under the ground was called Doliola. This place was reputed so holy, that a man might not spit thereupon, in it were supposed to have been certain secret mysteries of Numa. And yet, there be that think verily the ashes of the French Senones were there bestowed.

CHAP. XIX.

The Comitium, the Temple of Venus Genetrix, The Statues and Images that were in the Comitium and Roman Forum, Cæsar's statue and pillar.

VHere the Comitium was, from what place it began, and in what part of the City it ended, we have shewed before, in the fifteenth chapter of this book. Called it was Comitium, as Plutarch saith, for that Romulus and Tatius were wont to meet together in this place, to make covenants between them. In which place afterwards, the Senat and people of Rome assembled, when they would decree any thing for the good of the C.W. and namely, when Cōsuls, Tribunes Cōsular, and such Magistrates were created, and other affairs concluded, whereof authors make mention in all their writings. That place was near the Senaculum, at the very foot of the mount Palatine. This Comitium was open above-head for many years: whereupon oftentimes, albeit assemblies were summoned, yet they were impeached holding for them, fearing some tempestuous weather toward. Long time after, when Annibal came into Italy, they set a roof over it: and afterwards Cæsar repaired it again. In this Comitium the plaies were many times exhibited. In the same (as Livy reporteth) the books of Sibylla were burnt. In like manner many lewd and outrageous acts were committed in the assemblies there, whereof elsewhere we will speak.

In the Comitium stood the statue of Cæsar: which being afterwards stricken with fire from heaven, was translated into the court-yard of Vulcan. In the cantons and angles of the Comitium, were the statues likewise of Pythagoras and Alcibiades: Also in the ascent and stairs thereof, on the left hand of the Curia stood the Image of Accius, together with his whetstone and razor.

The Image resembling the Mother goddess, was set up in the Forum. They that worshipped this goddess were of this opinion, that the stone whereof she was made, could not possibly be consumed with fire: yet they guessed hereby, for that albeit many fires were made, in the night especially at her Image, yet it took no hurt thereby: and therefore gave they out, that there was such virtue herein, as I have said, and from thence it came, that in all streets almost they began to worship her, and to erect altars and little chappels unto her.

The Temple of Venus Genetrix, as is shewed before, was in the Forum: Just before this Temple stood the statue of Cæsar, carrying a blazing star upon the head. In like manner a Column of Cæsar made of Numidian marble 20 foot high there remained. Before the Temple of Cæsar there was the statue of Q. Marcius in horsemans habit: of Tremellius clad in a side gown; of M. Atticus covered with a veil.

CHAP. XX.

The column called Mœnia: the pillar Horatia: the houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian, The Temple and court-yard of the said Cæsar.

In that part of the Forum was the Column Mœnia, where stood the palace of Porcius. Called Mœnia it was, of Manius the Censor: for he (when as he sold unto Cæsar his house, and when Plautus the other Censor gave order, that the palace aforesaid should there be built, reserved in the sale so much space for himself, as pillar or column would take up: upon the which he might put out aloft to jut forth, made of joists and boards upon them: from which place both he and his posterity might behold the sport of sword-fencers. And this privilege he obtained: whereupon, others also, as many as might be allowed, were as industrious, and built them columns in the Forum.

There stood a rock of stone in the Forum, whereupon the spoils of the three twins Christi were hanged.

In like manner the pillar called Horatia.

The houses of Cæsar, Constantine, and Domitian beautified the Forum.

Likewise the court and cloister of Minerva; and the shops [of Bankers] as well old as new.

The dead corps of Cæsar was brought out of the Curia into the Forum, and interred in that place, where afterwards they built unto him an altar and Temple.

Likewise in the Forum the manner of the Romans was, to lay down their Magistracy.

CHAP. XXI.

Cæsar's Forum: the Palace of Paulus, and his Library.

BESIDES the Temple of Saturn, or the common treasury (whereof we have written before in the 16 chap. of this book) in the Roman Forum toward the Northeast was Cæsar's Forum, even in that very place which seemeth lower than the rest, behind the Temple of Faustina. There, was the Temple of Venus Genetrix; about which, Cæsar made a cloister and a Forum, not of wares and merchandise to be sold, but for them that repaired thither for justice in law matters. In this Forum, among other statues (whereof there were many and thole most fair and beautiful) he suffered his own to be made, all armed. The Forum it self contained but a small compass, but it was most excellently set out. The very level of the plot stood in an hundred millions of Asles and above.

Cæsar purchased with 1500 talents, Paulus Æmilius the Colleague of C. Marcellus in his Consulship, to be his friend and to stand with him, Paulus having received this sum of money, built in the midst of the Forum near to the Temple of Cæsar and Pollux, a most excellent and wonderfull Palace, of Phrygian columns, which afterwards they named, Basilica Pauli, A Library also the same Paulus erected, near unto his own Basilica.

CHAP. XXII.

The Forum of Augustus: the galleries of Antonius, Faustina, and Livia: Cæsar's house.

THE Roman Forum, those also of Julius Cæsar and Augustus, were (as it is well known) near one to another. That of Augustus, they affirm to have been at the image of Marforius, in the most frequented place of the City: it was but in little compass, as the other of Cæsar, but excellently well adorned with brave statues and other things. For it had the statues of Cæsar and Pollux, with the victory of Alexander the Great: the image also of Corvinus, and of the raven that upon his helmet fought. Also Apollo in Ivory: and besides these, other ensigms and ornaments of vertue and valour.

In this Hall or Forum publike justice was administered: and the judges from thence were empanelled: herein they debated in counsell, of wars, of triumphs, and other weighty affairs. From hence they used to go when they took journey into their Provinces with foveraign command. Hither, they that returned victors, brought the ensigms and tokens of their victory. This Forum being by time decayed, Hadrian reedified.

This Forum had two porches, wherein were the statues set out & decked in triumphant manner. Augustus dwelt in the street Sacra, in a house not so large and stately, but marvellously furnished by his neece Livia. And Augustus not able to abide this wastfull superfluity of riches, pulled it down and laid it even with the ground: in the void place and court-yard whereof, was afterwards built the gallery of Livia: which also was called Claudia. Nero cast it down, but Domitian built it up again under the old name.

The goodly galleries of Antonius & Faustina, adorned with divers and sundry marbles well built in old time, were whereas at this day standeth the Church of S. Laurence in Miranda.

CHAP. XXIII.

The raster or beam, called Sororium Tigillum: the Street Cyprinus, Sceleratus, and Patritius: the house of M. Antonius.

SORORIUM TIGILLUM was a place hallowed for the expiation and assailing of Horatius for killing his sister, set up near the street Carina, to the honour of Jupiter.

The street Cyprinus is near to the cliff or rising of the Capitoll, which leadeth to the Church of S. Peter in Vinculis, so called of Cyprus. In it dwelt the Sabins first, when they were afranchised and made free denizens, Surnamed afterwards it was Sceleratus, upon the wicked and devilish act of Tullia, whereof Livy speaketh. Some think this was one with the former: others say, it was divers from it.

The street Patritius was so called, because of Patritii, who were by K. Tullus commanded there to dwell. For this was a place raised somewhat higher than others: from whence as from the upper ground, they might easily defend themselves against the sudden violence of others, if it should be offered.

M. Antonius dwelt in that house, where sometimes stood the Temple of Tellus. After Antonius, the Church of S. Pantalon was in the same place built.

CHAP. XXIV.

Busta Gallica, and Æquimelum.

BUSTA GALICA, was a place, in the heart of the City, where the dead bodies of the Frenchmen that held Rome, were burnt and buried. It was in that part of the City where at this day standeth the the Church of S. Andrew (in Busta Gallica.) Now they call it by an awk name, Portugallo: and it is not far from the Amphitheatre. Varro setteth the Busta Gallica near the Æquimelum. As for Æquimelum, it was so called, because the house of Melinus who fought to be K. was there laid level with the ground.

CHAP. XXV.

The street called Via Sacra: the arch Fabian and Vespasian.

THIS street beginneth at the old Curia, in the angle of Palatium near the arch of [Great] Constantine. Varro suppoeth that it began at the Carina, and the chappel of Sternia. Whereby a man may gather that the Via sacra sometimes went through the gardens now of S. Mary the new, to the Temple of Peace, the Forum of Cæsar, and so directly up to the Cattle of the Capitoll. The name of Sacra it took for that the Augurs when they came from the Capitoll hill, went through it as they took their Augury: or because monthly, they went in procession with sacred reiques along that way: or last of all in regard that in it there was a league and covenant made between Romulus and Tatius. At the head and top of it, Ancus Martius in times past dwelt, near the chappel of the Lares.

In this street was the famous statue set up of Cladius.

The arch Fabian likewise, near the Kings Palace, fast by the Basilica of Paulus, was reared by Fabius the Centor, who subdued the Allobroges. In which arch was the scutcheon with his arms, and other tokens of the victory engraven. Fast by it, Scirionius Libo erected a seat and Tribunal for the Pætor, named Puteal.

In the time street-way was the marble arch of Vespasian, (the ancientest of all others that are now to be seen) erected by V. Vespasian after he had won Hierusalem. In it were his victories cut and engraven, with the ark of the covenant of one side, and on the other, his triumphs and spoils; and namely, the golden candlestick; the seven other lights the two tables of Moses, the vessels of the Temple of Hierusalem; the golden table, weighing one great talent; and many things else, whereof Josephus writeth.

CHAP. XXVI.

Græcoflafis; Senaculum; the Curia: the Palaces of Opimius and Porcius.

GRÆCOFLAFIS is a place on the right hand of the Rostra, as men go forth of the Comitium; where, the Embassadors of forrain nations being sent unto the Senat, used to stand and give attendance until they were admitted to audience.

The Palace of Opimius, and the Curia, stood near unto the Græcoflafis. Above the Græcoflafis was the Senaculum at the Temple of Concord, Called it was Senaculum, because the Senat or the elders were wont there to meet. In Greek it is named ἑστιάριον.

Curia was in the Comitium, and some think it is all one with Senaculum; so called, because the affairs that required publike care were there debated. There was a Curia also of Priests, where Church-matters were handled and treated of. Now this Curia where the Senat met, was a Temple or hallowed place: for neither might the Senat meet, nor act of Senat pass, but in the place set out and appointed by augury. Hereupon Curia Hostilia, Pompeia, and Julia, being profane places before, were by inauguration consecrated Temples. In this Curia was the altar of Victory: and upon the stairs of the said Curia stood the image of Victory, made of fine pure gold.

Cato the elder in the time of his Ceniorship, built (with the City money) a palace near to the Forum, under the Curia, which after his own name he called Portia Basilica.

The palace also of Romulus (as men think) stood where the Church is now of S. Mary the new. These places therefore which have been thus described in the fourth region of the City, joyned together in one place in a manner, and were all contained within this circuit, as you go from the Centurion toward the Temple of Peace, and the Church and gardens of S. Mary the new almost as far as the Esquilia.

The fourth Book.

CHAP. I.

The Temple of Janus and Piety: of the publike goat of Rom. Commons.

SEEING that four parts of the City are described, the sixth ensueth; which in lodeth those places that comprehend Tyber, part of the Arventine on the right hand, and the rock Capitol on the left: the valley also which lyeth between those very hills. Wherefore begin we will at the memorable places, which are next after the Theatre of Marcellus, and so run through the plain and level plot of the City. And with Janus first, whom men in old time believed to be the very doo; and as it were the entrance of all things. Unto Janus Numa built a Temple at the gate Carmentalis, (afterwards the chappel of S. Katharine) at the bottom of the Argiletum, close close unto the theatre of Marcellus. This Temple had two doors: in time of peace they were shut, but in war opened by that Consul, who, as the worthier person, was first created. It is found in records, that this Temple was shut but only thrice. First, by Numa himself: secondly, by T. Manlius the Coel, and a third time by Augustus, after the battel of Actium. But why in time of war it stood open many reasons are given: and this is thought the chiefest, namely, an accident that befell when Romulus warred against the Sabins: for when the Sabins were now possessed of the gate Carmentalis, and about to rush violently into the City, all on a sudden unlooked for there issued forth upon the enemies a pious river and stream of hot boiling water out of the Temple of Janus, which stood near to the gate: whereupon they were driven to flee, and so the City was saved. From hence it is that posterity coming after, open the doors for Janus that he might be at liberty, when he is called forth, as it were, to help in time of war.

Others report that Tatius and Romulus both were the founders of that Temple: as who, when the covenant was made betwixt them, agreed together of that two-faced god as an indifferent and common witness to them both of the accord contracted between two Kings and two nations: and so erected unto him this Temple in that very place where now the ruins of S. Katharine's Church are to be seen.

Moreover there be who affirm, that Cn. Duilius vowed it, and Tiberius built it: but the variety of these opinions kemeteth hereupon to arise: for that it is received and held for certain, that there were many Janus worshipped as gods by the posterity: whereas they in old time believed but one: so as that which is spoken of divers is fully supposed, as said of one. Which may be seen before, whereas we wrote of Janus with four fronts or faces, whose Temple was erected in the Forum. For it is said, that Janus was the first who erected Temples and ordained divine service and ceremonies for the gods: and therefore in sacrifices deserved the first place.

Portraied he is with a key and a wand: as who is the porter to keep the gates, and the guide to direct the ways.

Augustus besides, brought his image out of Egypt to Rome; and in the herb-market built a Temple in the honour of him.

To Prius in the said herb-market, M. Artilius Glabrio dedicated a Temple in that very place where at this day standeth the Church of S. Nicholas in the prison: for even there Ap. Claudius the Decemvir by a decree of the Senat built a Prison, for that the common goal (whereof we have written before) was not sufficient; and called it, The prison for the Commons of Rome: wherein himself afterwards being found guilty wrought his own death. In which also many years after, a certain filly poor woman of bale and obscure parentage, being newly brought a bed, being apprehended for an heinous offence, was condemned to be starved to death. Her daughter, being a milk woman and delivered lately of a child, made humble request to the goaler, that she might have leave to go to her mother: and when he had made straight search before, whether she brought with her any food: and saw her have nothing about her, let her in: and so she went and came many times. At the last, known it was that the prisoner within was nourished by the breast-milk of her daughter: whereupon the mother was delivered and set free: and both mother and daughter were allowed their food ever after by virtue of a decree, at the Cities charges: and in regard of that kindness and affection of the child to the mother, they consecrated this place to the goddess Prietas. Livy supposeth, that it was not the mother but the father that in this manner was by the daughter nourished.

CHAP. II.

The herb-market: the Temple of Juno Matuta, and of Hope: the Oratory or Chappell of Numa: the Column called Lactaria: the Altar and Chappell of Carmenta.

His place hath the name of Forum Holitorium, for that therein is great store of worts and pot-herbs without the gate Carmentalis; where, where, in times past was the old market kept: and at this day called it is the street Montanaria.

Within the compals or the said market-place, C. Cornelius the Consul, in the time of the Gauls war, vowed a Temple to Juno Matuta: which afterward being Cenfor, he put out to building, in that very place where afterwards stood the Church of S. Andrew surnamed in Matutina.

The same C. Cornelius built in the Forum Holitorium the Temple of Hope, and the same adorned with divers and sundry marbles: which afterwards Collatinus consecrated. Many a day after, it was smitten with lightning: and in the end set on fire and burnt.

A Column also there was in the same market-place, named Lactaria: unto which the sucking babes that were to be nourished with milk, were presented.

The Oratory of Numa stood in the bottom of Argiletum, near the theater of Marcellus. The Altar Carmentalis, consecrated by Evander to his mother Carmenta, stood before the gate Carmentalis.

In the same place also was the Chappell of Carmenta built by the matrons of Rome. At the first, she was called Nicostrata: but for that she delivered Oracles in verse, she took the name of Carmentis.

CHAP.

CHAP. III.

The fish-market, and Temple of Fortuna Virilis.

The fish-market standeth along the Tybre, near to the [Forum] Junius, between the Churches of S. Mary in Porticu and Egyptiaca, within the gate Carmentalis, not far from the Forum Boarium, i.e. the ox-market.

The Church of S. Mary Egyptiaca is at this day near the Tybre, and a bridge of the said name. Some go about to affirm and prove that this was sometime the Temple of Mercy; others, of Fortune and Chastity; but all in vain: for those Temples were not in this place, but in the ox-market: as for this Temple of Fortuna Virilis, whereof we now speak it was near Tybre. In it stood the statue of Serv. Tullius made of wood and guile all over, which in a great fire when all things else were burnt, remained only safe and sound.

CHAP. IIII.

The Temple of Vesta, the Salinae, and the arch of Cocles.

Near the Church of Mary surnamed Egyptiaca, there remaineth at this day a most ancient Temple, now dedicated to S. Stephen, the frame whereof is circular, and the pillars are set round about and bear up the roof which being one entire piece of work, carrieth the whole Temple. Consecrated it was in old time to Vesta: and Numa taking that circular platform, from the Temple which was at Alba, made it with a lover in the top, having a hole to give light.

Howbeit, of this goddels her self there is no image nor resemblance; for that fire, whereof she is the goddels, can have no certain and permanent form. As for Vesta, the Latines call her so, because she is arrayed with divers and sundry things. Of the Greeks she is named Isia. For that her force and power appertaineth to altars and hearths where fire is kept. This is not the Temple wherein the sacred fire is preserved: but that whereof we spake before, which Romulus built between the Capitoll and Palatium.

Salinae were the store-houses of the salt which served the City: and they stood upon that bankside of Tybre, which from the foresaid Temple of Vesta reacheth into the Aventine.

The arch of Horatius Cocles stood at the very foot of the Aventine hill, where the rising thereof beginneth between the mount and the Tybre.

CHAP. V.

The Forum Boarium.

Hitherto from the beginning of this fourth book, are described those things which on the right hand of the Tybre were worth the noting. Now forward we will alter our manner, run through all the memorable things which are on the left side of that river: and first, as concerning the beast-market.

The beast-market was near to Velabrum and Janus, between the mount Palatine and the Greek school, close to the Temple, now called S. Gregories Church. In it there was a most ancient image in brass of a bull, whereupon some think it took the name Boarium. Others, for that oxen were there sold: or because they used in old time to sacrifice those kind of beasts there: or else for that Evander in that place killed an ox in sacrifice to Hercules, for killing Cacus and recovering again his kine and oxen. In the same place were kept the instruments wherewith the Ministers belonging to sacrifices the sacrificers also themselves, were furnished when they went about their sacrifice. In this market-place was the first fight exhibited of sword-fencers.

CHAP. VI.

The Temple of Hercules Victor, and the Altar called Maxima.

The round Temple of Jupiter Victor was built in the beast-market, near the Greek school: where sometime Evander reared unto Hercules the altar called Maxima. This Temple (as they say) was so religious and venerable, that neither fire nor dog would enter into it. For Hercules at what time as he distributed a dole of flesh to his followers and ministers in his sacrifice, prayed unto Asygius [the god that gathereth flies.] He it is therefore that driveth away all flies from this Temple: and at the door thereof he left his club behind, which as soon as the dogs see they run away far off: and thus unto the daies wherein Pliny lived it was free from flies and dogs. At the sacrifice and divine service of this Hercules, neither women nor bondslaves, nor yet freed men that had been in villenage might be present. At the last, this Temple was consumed in that fire which Nero the Emperour made.

Ovet and besides, Evander erected unto Hercules a statue, which was called, Hercules Triumphant, because so often as there was any triumph in the City it was clad with a mantle, and other habiliments of triumph.

All the time that Evander reigned Hercules had no more but an altar which they called Maxima: and this Evander reared unto him for killing of Cacus, and restoring his kine and oxen again. Upon

Upon this altar he sacrificed the tenth part of the fruit of his kine: for Hercules had given out and promised, That they should live an happy life who dedicated unto him the tenth part of their goods. Hereupon cometh the name of Decima Herculeana, i. e. Hercules Tithes.

CHAP. VII.

The Temples of Chastity, Prosperous Fortune, Matuta, and Fors fortuna: of the place called Vicus Publicus, Velabrum: and the sepulchre also of Acca Laurentia.

Near to the Temple of Hercules, well known it is that a chappell was built by Amulius to Pudicitia Patritia i. e. Gentlewomens chastity. Now the image that represented this Saint, stood in the beaſt-market. To the service and ſacrifices celebrated unto this godelle, virgins that were Commoners daughters might not come. And therefore a certain maiden of commoners degree, reared a chappell also to Pudicitia Plœbeia. From the service and ſacrifices thereof, the Patritia virgins were likewise debarred. Many other places & Temples besides were consecrated to Pudicitia.

The Temples of Prosperous Fortune and of Matuta, Servius Tullius consecrated in the beaſt-market: And that Fortune he called Proſpera, which was not blind. In that place (say they) an Olive tree sometimes stood, and upon a time when honey dropped and flowed from it, the Soothsayers gave order, that a little coffer or box should be made of the wood thereof, wherein those lots were put and laid up which by the direction of Fortune were either handled or shuffled together by the hands of young boys: as if such should prove happy fortune, & excellent. Servius Tullius described all his acts whatsoever to Fortune, who being born of a bond woman, had many times for need and by her, and was in the end advanced to princely dignity. And hereupon he dedicated Temples to Fortuna Primigenia, Majoula, Comertens, Bona ſperans, and Vident, as who would say, she ruled and did all. Likewise, a Temple he consecrated to little Fortune, signifying thereby, that nothing can happen unto us, be it never so small, but we must attribute it, as coming from the gods.

A Temple to Matuta Camillus vowed in the Veientian war and dedicated it: which long before that time Servius Tullius had erected. To Matuta and Fortuna Primigenia the Romans did sacrifice upon one and the self same day: and likewise in one and the same day both their chappels were burned and consumed with fire together. Corvulus the Consul caused a Temple to be made unto Fors Fortuna, or Fortis Fortuna near unto that of Matuta, of the money sailed out of the spoil gotten from the Tuſcans.

The street called Vicus P. blicus began at the Forum Boarium, and went from thence unto the Aventinas as far as to the Temple of Juno. In this street near the said Forum was the Chappell of Velabrum, in that very place where now standeth the Church of Saint Gregory in Velabrum, so called.

Aventine hill was sometime separated from the other mountains by the Tiber between: wherefore that Tarquinius Priscus turned the channell of Tiber, it brake out mountains, and having found a Irish or creek it beat upon the foot of the Aventine. And therefore of necessity, whosoever would go to the Aventine was to make a fare, that is to say, by paying his quadrans, ferry over thither in a Wherry. Hereupon that place is at this day called Velabrum, i. e. vehendū, i. e. ferrying over, where sometimes the Tiber had wrought out a Irish.

Antia hath left in writing, that the sepulchre of Acca Laurentia was in Velabrum.

CHAP. VIII.

Vertumnus and his Temple: Janus with four faces: the house of Africanns: the Court or Palace Sempronia, and the wooll-shops.

Men in old time called Vertumnus, not only the god of buying, selling, and of fruits; but also him that ruled mens minds, so named à Vertendo, for that oftentimes he turned & changed at his will and pleasure the purposes and thoughts of men another way far divers. His Temple & image they erected in the Tuſcan street, near to the altars of Ops and Ceres. The festival daies of this god, celebrated in the month of October, are called Vertumnalia. Some there be that would have Vertumnus and Janus with four faces to be all one: upon this reason, for that they affirm the Temple of Janus afore said to be in Velabrum, whereas they build that of Vertumnus. But now that Temple whereof we have before spoken, upon four pillars beareth up one roof, and hath four gates & sides, and in each forefront twelve little windows, which signifye the four quarters of the year, and the twelve months. In old time they put Janus before, in all sacrifices, and gave him that name ab eundo, i. e. going, and hereupon the entries and doors of houses be called Janua.

Near the image of Vertumnus Pub. Africanns had an house, which Sempronius afterwards bought together with the wooll-shops, and built the palace which they call Sempronia, near the Temple of S. Gregory in Velabrum.

CHAP. IX.

Argiletus: the house of Cornelius: Æquilibrium: the Chappell of Surguendy or Boath.

The Argiletus beginneth at the bottom of the Tuſcan street, and endeth at the Theatre of Marcellus. But Ædinius Pithus saith, it began at the head of the said Tuſcan street, under Cælius, between between it and the great Lutis, and so reacheth to the Aventine. The name it taketh of a kind of clay or loame, whereof there is plenty in that place: or else of one Argus who being entertained as a guest by Evander, laid wait for his life, intending after he had murdered him, to be King and rule himself. But the friends and company about Evander discovered his traips, and to be was by them slain. Unto him therefore Evander reared a tomb even there, and consecrated the place.

Now Imus Argiletus is juit by the Theatre of Marcellus. In this street were divers shops of artificers or artificers, and especially of stationers or bookellers, and those they commonly called the Argiletan shops.

Cornelius Domitians is said to have dwelt in Velabrum.

Æquilibrium is between Velabrum and the Capitol, near to the staplers and wooll-shops. The name arose hereupon, for that Sp. Melius a Roman Citizen who aspired to be King, sometime there dwelt: who being detected of that crime was killed, his goods confiscated, and his house laid level with the ground, and the plot where it stood by the Romans was made a void-yard.

The Temple of Murtia goddess of Idleness was under the Aventine upon the ascent of the hill called Civus Publicus, in that part whereas folk go up to the Church of S. Prisca. Hereupon the mount Aventine was sometimes called Murtius.

Moreover, some there be that in this place would have the Asylum to stand; but we have shewed before that Asylum was first built by Rom, upon the Capitol. But in process of time, after that so great riches and wealth was gathered and laid up there in the Capitol, and that otherwhiles the Senate used there to meet and sit in council: the Rom, thought it not with the safety for them than thieves, fellows, and other lewd infamous persons of all sorts, should come for refuge thither, and there abide: and therefore they supposed it better for their security to translate this privileged sanctuary to some othere place. Whereupon not there alone, but in many other parts afterwards there began sanctuaries to be set up, not at Rome only, but also in other quarters of the world.

CHAP. X.

Circus what it is, why it was so called, and for what cause ordained.

The place where games & exercises of disport were performed, was called the Cirque so named, for that the scaffolds were built in circuit round about to behold the pastimes: and within that compass the said solemnities were exhibited: also for that the pomp was carried in show, and the horses ran about the goals there. Built it was round, but long-wile like an arch or bow, having in the circuit about it steps one above another, with apt seats for the beholders, that one should not hinder the prospect of another: in the midst were two marks or goals distant alike one from the other. Also the barriers or cavercus so called, because the horses stood there pent and kept in until the Magistrate gave the signal to begin the course.

Now these solemnities of games and plaies are festivals in the honour of their gods: for ordained they were first, and still are observed and kept, either for their birth daies & nativities, or dedications of Temples. And at the very first verily were hunting and baiting of beaſts, which they called (Munera) to the honour of Saturn. But the stage-plaies were due to Liber: the Circenian games to Neptune and Ceres. Thus these pastimes were assigned, some to the gods, and others to hoſe: and in honour and memoriall of them yearly solemnized. As for the games Circenian, they were so called, because when they were to be performed, they had the bank of the river of one side, and swords set to flank the other. But of these games, plaies, and solemn fights, Silius hath written at large.

CHAP. XI.

The great show-place called Circus Maximus.

Tarquinius Priscus instituted first this large circuit for running of races, and laid the foundation thereof between the two mounts Aventine and Palatine. But Cæsar was he that enlarged it, and made it more magnificent and stately. For being (as it was) three furlongs and an half in length, and four acres broad: it is thought that it was Cæſar's and not Tarquinius' who 'erected it out to that largeness: and this foundeth like to a truth, considering that in Tarquinius daies the City was not so populous, neither given so much to these shews and fights, as in the time of Cæsar, and therefore the place required not so great a compass of ground. Now this Cirque for three parts thereof to wit the two sides and one of the ends had a ditch digged ten foot deep, and as many broad: behind that ditch were galleries built three stories high: and these had seats made beneath with stone, and above of timber: all which galleries had one and the same bases for they closed together round like a globe. Able they were to receive a hundred and fifty thousand men. Seemore thereof in Dionysius, Pliny, Livy, and others who have written of the Roman Edifices. This Cirque Augustus adorned and beautified afterwards: for he made the barriers of marble, and guided the goals, and many other ornaments he set it out withall. Lastly, when it was decayed and fallen down, Trajan rectified it, made it more ample, and trimmed it up. Yea, and after him, Heliogabalus set thereto besides most fair and goodly Columns, and garnished them with gold, and paved the very floor with Chrysocolta. But as touching the beauty of this Cirque, Nazarius writeth much. For, by report, so elegant it was, that men resorted to it, not so much to behold the exercises and maſteries there, as the pleasant and delectable beauty of the place. Maximus therefore it was called, either because consecrated it was to Fortunus, the the greatest of the gods, or for the excellency and impronovousness of the games: or else because in comparison of other Cirques, to wit, Flaminia, and the other called Intus, i. e. the inmost, this was the biggest. For Pliny hath left in writing, that it lay out in length three furlongs, and once its breadth, so as it would well serve for two hundred and sixty thousand men to sit within it.

CHAP. XII.

The Temples and Altars which we read to have been in the Circus Maximus, or about it.

Consius is reported to be the god of Counsell, either for that he concealeth mens counsels, or Copeneth them unto men. This God had an altar in the great shew-place covered over which betokeneth, that counsell ought to be close and covert. For which cause, this altar as we read, was by the old Romans to him consecrated. For they at what time as they consulted about the ravishing of the Sabine maidens, fearing lest they should have been detected before the time, dedicated this altar to this god, and erected the portraiture and image of him thereon. Which altar verily, either by some injury of the times, or through mens neglect of the gods, continued so forlorn, as it the end it was altogether unknown where it stood. At length found it was again, and at all other times remained covered, but in the time of horse-runings, and then it was uncovered and set open. To this god was the feast also instituted, called Consualia. And those disports and pastimes which they devoyed for the ravishment of the Sabin Virgins, were celebrated at this altar by certain Priests belonging to that god.

In like manner Neptune, surnamed the Chevalier, had a Temple in this Circus Max. which in the year of our Lord 1526 was found behind the Temple of S. Anthonis, at the foot of the mount Palatine, in the very foundations of the Circus: for such marks and tokens were there to be seen, that by good evidences it appeared that this was the very Temple of Neptune. For the honour of this Neptune, the games Circenses were by men in old time solemnized.

Allé to Genius the guide and director of secret plots, they directed an altar in the great Cirque; Over and besides these, this Cirque contained three other altars: one to the Great gods; a second to the Penates; and a third to those gods of heaven and earth, from whom all things arise and have their beginning. These gods above said, the Romans called Genii, Penates, Presidents, and keepers of the City.

Liber, Libera, Ceres, and Proserpina, had their Temples about this place called Circus Max. which Posthumius when he warred against the Latines, vowed and the same man upon his return with happy victory built and dedicated them accordingly.

To conclude, in the same camps were the Temples of the sun, and of Flora. Moreover, a Temple there stood near this Circus, unto Venus: which Q. Fabius Gurges the Consul, caused to be made of the money raised upon the fines of certain wives that were condemned for playing false with their husbands.

Lucius dedicated a Temple to Juventus without the great cirque, not far from that place,

In like sort, Mercury had a Temple near this Circus Max.

In Plinius daies there was seen in the Circus Max. the image of Fortuna Seia.

CHAP. XIII.

The Naumachy of the great Cirq. ne.

Naumachy is a place so called ἐν ναυτίᾳ τῶν ποταμῶν, i. e. for that in it they used to skirmish with ships. For there were places digged deep like ponds, where were represented some shews of navall fight, for the exercise of the Roman youth, that they might know how to charge and annoy the enemy at sea also. And these kind of sports were exhibited and practised not in the cirques only, but also in the Amphitheatres.

CHAP. XIV.

The two Obelisks of the Circus Max.

The Obelisk (as Marcellinus testifieth) was a very huge and rough stone rising like a spire or brooch, by little and little to a mighty height: and that it might resemble a ray or sun-beam, it grew with smaller and smaller in fashion of a steeple, with four sides or edges, and in the top it is very narrow, and there made plain and smooth right artificially. In most of them are engraven and cut certain Hieroglyphick notes, and namely, such as testifie either the founder thereof, or else other memorable matters. Of these figures and characters, the same Marcellinus speaketh in this wise: Moreover, the infinite variety of forms and characters, called Hieroglyphicks which all about we see engraven, the ancient authority of the first learning did set forth and mark to. Thus much saith he. Now they drew and portrayed therein sundry forms and shapes of living beasts and birds, and oftentimes devised new and strange resemblances, whereby they reserved and kept for their posterity whatsoever was memorable and worth remembrance. This manner continued not in Aegypt only, but also in other parts of the world, until such time as letters were found: and then this was given over. At the first one letter implied a whole word, and one word went for a whole sent ence. But heretofore shall find much in authors that have written of these characters. Moreover, as Pliny witnesseth, these Obelisks were made of the stone Simitar. Then they erected and consecrated consecrated to the gods, and principally to the Sun: and therefore in hewing and cutting them, they resembled the sun-beams, as we said before. The first that ever devised these Obelisks, was K. Methres. At Rome were none of these Obelisks wrought and cut out, but brought thither from other parts, and so for beautifull shew and to wonder at were erected. Therefore in the Cirque aforesaid, called Maximus, two Obelisks were seen, one standing upright aloft 80 foot high: the other lying along in the Naumachy: it carried in length a hundred and thirty foot and 8 inches, besides the base or footstall, which Augustus translated to Rome out of Hieropolis, a City of Aegypt: but when he would have set it up on end it fell down and brake in twain. This was bewyn out of the quarry, by King Sannefretus, in whose reign Pylagorus was in Aegypt.

CHAP. XV.

The arch of Settinus in the Cirque, The place of the Tuberos in the Cirque. The stews, the house of Pompey, and the fountain of Juturna.

Sertinus having made conquest of Spain, brought great store of money into the City chamber: and of the spoils taken from enemies, he reared two arches: the one in the beast-market, called Forum boarium; the other in the great shew-place, named Circus Maximus. Upon these arches he set golden images, and other ornaments to beautifie them.

The house and family of the Julii was none of the wealthiest, but yet of great credit and estimation with the Romans. Among whom there was so great concord & unity, that 16 of them at one time dwelt and agreed well together in one and the same house. For their singular prowess and worthy acts they were allowed by the Senat and people of Rome a scaffold by themselves in all the shew-places and Theatres, to behold all fights and maneries of activity.

About the Circus Maximus stood the stews and brothel-houses, where sometimes harlots and naughty-packs kept, such as made profession of whoredom. But this place was afterwards laid even with the ground, and is now a void place.

The house of Pompey was near the Circus Max. and therein was the statue of Hercules erected.

The fountain or well of the nymph Juturna, is yet (as some think) to be seen, boiling up in the V. labrum near the common sink or vault called Maxima.

CHAP. XVI.

The Septizonium of Severus.

Here should follow by course after the great Cirque, the fix part of the City, namely, the mount Calvus. But because we meet with the Septizonium of Severus: and the arch of Constantine (before we come to Calvus) between it and the mount Palatine, something would first be spoken of them, especially being so excellent building as they are. The Septizonium therefore is a mighty mount or terrace raised from the plain ground 4 square, compassed about with seven articles, that is to say courses of rows of pillars one above another, yielding as it were as many porches or galleries: and in this order they are disposed, that the higher the pillars stand, the lesser and shorter they be. In the midst hereof, four walls arise, containing within them certain low places like cabinets. In the top thereof were bestowed and laid the ashes of Kings and Emperors deceased. Jul. Capitolinus nameth this mount Septidionum, for the Greeks call places much frequented, whereunto many waies lead. Hepodius of Syracuse, seven and 10 ways. Pliny calleth it Syprisidionum, of seven lots or furlows. For in every course thereof the columns meet together in the head with marbles trankles. Other beams there be besides, reaching inward from them to the mount itself, so as every such course yielded a stage like a gallery or walking place. Two of these Septizonia we read there were at Rome, to wit, the one of Titus, in the street called Via nova, of right great antiquity, not far from this of Severus: of which at this day there is to be seen no shew or token at all. The other of Severus, whereof there remain still, over against S. Gregories Church 3 Zones or girdles (as it were) of curious work: for the beauty and maneries of the pillars worth the seeing, and pleasant to behold. Reared it was in the broad street called Appia, and built by Severus himself. That which now is left thereof, leaneth out so, as it seemeth ever and anon ready to fall.

CHAP. XVII.

The triumphant arch of Constantine the Emperor.

These triumphant arches were erected for them only, who having subdued whole Provinces or conquered Iorran nations & obtained brave & fortunate victories, seemed worthy of triumph, and thereupon they are called Triumphant arches. Upon these arches for the perpetual and everlasting memorall of acts atchieved, were cut and engraven the portraitures of the very places where the war was performed: the resemblances of Fabricks and ranged battels, if the service was on land; and of ships, if it were at sea. Howbeit until the time of the Emperors no man raised any arches, and in Plinius daies they began first to be built: so that of Titus is of all others most ancient. For before their age, only statues and trophies were set up. But in process of time following, many of these arches were raised: among which, that of Constantine is to be seen above the rest, at the corner of the mount Palatine near the Theatre, beautified with triumphall ornaments, and and remaineth at this day in a manner sound and whole without any hurt. This arch Constantine erected for himself upon the victory which he obtained over Maxentius at the bridge Milvian.

CHAP. XVIII. Caelius the mount, and Caeliolus.

The mount Caelius in old time was named Quercetulanus for the number of oaks there growing; but afterwards it was so called of one Caelius Vibennus, a Duke of the Tuscan nation, unto whom the Romans granted a place in that mountain to inhabit. For when as the Tuscan people, by reason of their multitude, and the strong fenced places which they held, were suspected, commanded they were to remove into a street which of themselves was named Thufew. But such as were without suspicion, kept the hill Caelius or Caeliolus, i.e. the little Caelius; a place where sometime the goddess Diana was worshipped: and at this day there standeth the Church consecrated to S. Evangelista the virgin. This mountain afterwards by Tiberius was named Augustus.

CHAP. XIX.

The Temples of Faunus, Venus, and Cupid: the Court Hostilia: the forrain camp: the house of the Laterans: the Palace of Constantine, and Caelotians: the horseman statue of L. Verius.

Vpon the ridge or side of the mount Caelius there standeth a round Church, now patronized by S. Stephen, but hallowed and consecrated in times past to Faunus, Faunus he was called, in gods, for that he foretold things to come by voice and not by signs. The Albans in old time inhabited that part of the hill, where at this day the Church stands of S. Mary Dominick.

In the hill Caelius stood sometimes the Temples of Venus and Cupid, not far from the gate Navia, where now is the Church of the holy Cross in Hierusalem.

The Court Hostilia was in two places of Rome, the one in the common Forum, hard by the Temple of Peace, where King Hostilius first dwelt, the other in that place, where afterwards the Church of S. John and S. Paul was built.

A place there was in the mount Caelius called Castra Peregrina, toward the Northeast and the Esquilæ, where at this time the Church of the four crowned Saints is frequented.

The house of the Laterans also was built upon the same mount, at the Palace or stately Hall of the Laterans.

The Palace of Flavius Constantinus, near the house of the Laterans, stood between the gates Capitominus and Gabina.

The Palace of Caesarianns was built at the gate Navia, and the Church of S. Holy-croft in Hierusalem.

In the street called Lateranensis stood the statue on horseback of L. Verius. Some say it was made for M. Aurelius Antonius, others for Septimius Severus.

CHAP. XX. Of the Amphitheatres, and first of that of Statilius Taurus.

Now it followeth to speak of the Amphitheatre of Statilius Taurus, but before we write thereof, let us be briefly shewed what an Amphitheatre is. Now this word Amphitheatrum cometh out of Amphi, g, g, g, i.e. of looking round about: for two prospects joyned in one, make the form of an hemisphere or half circle. Some think, that Titus devised the Amphitheatre first, but some avow and prove, that C. Caesar built the first that ever was in Mari field: but by the authority of Suetonius it is proved, that Statilius reared one Amphitheatre before Titus.

In these Amphitheatres were prizes and rewards propounded to them that would fight with beasts. Condemned persons likewise yielded there to the eyes of men a horrible and fearful sight to behold; for thither were those prisoners brought by the Lictors, within that enclosure to wrestle and maintain conflict with wild beasts.

Moreover, the Emperors before they took their journey to any war or expedition, exhibited unto the people in these Amphitheatres shews of sword-fencers at the sharp for life and death: to the end, that the soldiers should be acquainted with fight, and learn not to be afraid of weapons, of wounds, no, nor of bloodshed, nor to draw back and avoid the perils of war to come; for the novelty and strangeness thereof. A great part of Statilius his Amphitheatrum, is yet to be seen near the walls at S. Cross Church in Hierusalem. And at the same time he built it, when Augustus Caesar encouraged and exhorted the Citizens of Rome, every man according to his ability to beautify and adorn the City.

CHAP. XXI.

The water conduits why they were devised, by what means waters were conveyed into the City, so what purpose, by whom first, and how many.

The City of Rome in the beginning, as hath been said in the first book, was but narrow of compass, and confined within small bounds: and the people for commodity and store of water, fet setled upon the river Tyber. But as the city daily more and more increased, necessary it was that some should build them houses and habitation in other place, some in another, farther from the river: whereupon distressed it was for want of water, which was to be fetched so far off and that with great pain and labour: besides, those places which had no current of running waters to walk away the filth, and carry it into Tyber, became (by the noisome air which was infected with their loadsome and stinking smells) unwholesome, and the subject many times to the pestilence. Prince Nerva therefore (the Emperor) undertook to redress and remedy this mischief; and others after him by his example) and devise by the wit and subtle invention of men, conduits-pipes, to bring water into those parts of the city which otherwise had none. And this verily they did two waies, the one by arches, when by digging certain rills or rivulets the water was carried level above ground, forced by certain weights, ballasts, and counterpoises the other by vaults under the ground, bringing water into the city by secret under-waies through pipes, spouts, and rocks. By which means it came to pass, that in the city every where such there was of water, that each house almost had a well in it, but especially at the bottom and foot of the hill Quirinalis, and all the side thereof, in the street Parianæ, Numeræ, the Latine way, the Aventine, the Jews street, and in many other places: so as in this our age full it is of such water-works under the ground. Now were these waies conveyed from divers places, and some conduits especially, such as were devised by arches were higher or lower than others. In the beginning and all the former times, there were by report five heights or depths: The highest of all was new Anio; next, the waters Claudia; in the third place the waters Julia Tegula in the fourth; then Martia; and after it old Anio, the level of current whereof, Virgo followeth and Appia, and the lowest of all others, Alfentina, which serves that quarter of the city beyond Tyber, and other low places built upon the plain. These waters were first brought into certain great conduit-heads, and from thence they were by a certain measure distributed by the conduit officer, and so ran into places appointed. Now that great conduit-head was called Cassellum, which receiveth first the common water, and afterwards sendeth it out into divers and sundry parts: and the keeper or officer that overseth it is named Cassellarius. There were besides level or above ground certain cisterns or receptacles of water, which kept water to serve curriers, fullers, and other such artificers for their necessary use. Over these waters were appointed certain wardens and keepers, and a set number of labourers and workmen to fee thereto. Finally, a grievous punishment was to be inflicted upon them that either marred and hurt the conduit-heads, or devised and conveyed water to other places than the laws or publicke ordinances, or the Censors or Ediles permitted: or took more water than at the first was allowed them. Appius Claudius (by report) was the first man that brought water into the city by arched work. But of the Roman waies, of the conduits, and other matters ordained thereabout, of the manner of conveyance, the instruments, measures, and weights thereto belonging, read Frontinus. Who of these things hath written truly and at large. Also have recourse to Sex. Rufus, who of the same argument hath made a good treatise. In the time of Frontinus there were but nine waters and no more brought into the City, namely, Appia, old Anio, Martia, Tegula, Julia, Virgo, Alfentina, called also Augusta, Claudia, and new Anio. Rufus reckoned ten more, whereby it appeareth, that he wrote long after Frontinus.

CHAP. XXII.

The conduit or conveyance of aqua Claudia.

Claudius began two conduits, but left them unfinished when he died. Claudius the Emperor of famous memory, took them in hand again, and in most magnificent manner made an end. To the one of them, namely, which beginning at the sources or springs called Carsina and Curtius was drawn to the City, he gave the name Aqua Claudia: the other, for difference sake of the two conduits of Anio he called his own, or the new Anio: and distinct it was from that which is named old Anio. The water Claudia therefore was brought from the gate Navia, along the side of the mount Caelius into the Aventine. A part also thereof Cavacalla derived into the Capitol hill.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of the thing which now in mount Caelius are not known where they stood.

Before the Consul having expelled Tarquinus, built a Temple to the goddess Carna in mount Caelius, to which goddess also, upon the accomplishment of his prayer and vow, he offered sacrifice. They in old time supposed that she had power over the vital members of the body, and to her devotion they committed those parts, and that she should preserve them safe, they did sacrifice upon her altars, and presented oblations.

Agrippina likewise began to build a Temple to Claudius Caesar, which after her death Calpurnia finished, and Nero utterly destroyed to the very foundation: this also was erected in the same hill. Mammaria Formiana, Master of Caesars Carpenters in France, was the first Roman that adorned and set out his house which he had in Calius hill with marble rough-cast. Moreover, the house of Claudius Centimalis stood upon the said hill. Also the house of the Tartius, who were two of the thirty tyrants. Likewise the house of Junius Sencor, wherein, when as all other edifices and buildings upon that mountain were consumed with fire, the image of Tiberius remained unhurt. There also it is said of Titus Claudius Cyprianus, the maker of hymns. In this hill was the great Macellum, the cave or den of Cyclops, the Spoliarium, and the army.

CHAP. III.
Cacus, and his hole or Cave.

Cacus, by report of the Poets, was the son of Vulcan, whom they believed in old time to breathe out of his mouth fire and smok. This Cacus infested the places near unto him with robbing and spoiling. But more probable it is, that he was a most lewd and thievish servant of Evander, and therefore the Arcadians called him κακός, i.e. naughty. A cave he haunted, as by very good conjectures is certainly gathered, in Aventine toward Tyber, over-against the Church of S. Mary Aventine, whereas the river runneth nearest to the hill, and whereas there hangeth over a vast and huge craggy rock, as fit a place as might bemo make a starting hole and cave for such an one, and near it is to the gate Trigemina. Him when Marcellus had killed and sacrificed, he reared an altar unto Jupiter Juvencor, near to the said cave or den.

CHAP. IIII.
The Armilustrum, and some other things in generall.

A*rmilustrum* was a place where fouldiers shewed themselves and their armor, and where they used to muster: where also in their arms they sacrificed and did service to their gods, with resounding loud trumpets. Some would have it to be in the Aventine, others in the Cirque Maximus: but that matters not much. Hither the fouldiers used to repair when they were returned from war, and here they laid up their harness and weapons. For armor of their own and in their privat custody the Romans had not, to use in the wars: but delivered all up to be kept safe either in the Armilustrum, or the tower or castle upon the rock Tarpia.

In Aventine, near the Temple of Juno Regina, were the Scala Cermania, that is to say, a steep place with a downhill; where wicked malefactors, drawn with a crook, were most miserably executed and killed.

There stood sometime this hill, near the Temple of Diana, the house of Phyllis. A part of this mountain was called Kemuria: which Remus chose to dwell in: and being there by his brother Romulus committed to the earth, he gave it his name.

The Senat and people of Rome built in this mountain, to the honour of Decius the Emperor, the baths called Deciana, and others also near them, named Variana. Moreover, the bairns of Trajan were in this place, where now the vineyard of Francis Albertinus is.

The caves of Favvus and Picus also were in the Aventine, as fabius report, Italia likewise dwelt in the Aventine, as M. Cato recordeth.

The Temples and edifices of this hill all in generall were (by report) burnt in the daies of Tiberius, sometime Emperor.

CHAP. V.
The sheard hill, and other things within that compass.

The plain and level ground between Aventine, Tyber, and the City wall, hath four sides, but uneven: in which there riseth a little hill, commonly called Tellacens. The whole compass hereof will hardly be measured with 2000 paces: the height is about 160 foot. It resembleth in shew the form of a gourd: and the one side of it which regardeth the Tyber is broader than the other. Near to this hill was the glais-makers street (and the potters) also the carpenters habitation. And no man doubteth, but hereupon arose and grew the mount called Tellacens. For in old time, at Rome and elsewhere, as also in some places now adies, much use there was commonly of earthen vessels made by potters: which even by this may be certainly collected, for that in Numa's daies there were four colleges or societies of potters: and these made of clay not only vessels, but also the images of the gods, and ornaments to beautifie and set out their Temples: pillars and wals were by potters work seeld in the outside, nay, the very dead bodies were bestowed in coffins of baked clay. Since then, in so great sort of earthen vessels and potters work, much of necessity must needs be broken, which if they had been cast abroad in the corn-field and pasture grounds, would have made all barren and unfruitful: again, if they had been thrown into the water, would in time have choaked up the channell of the current, and forced the river to swell and overflow the banks: Numa therefore commanded this kind of workmen to dwell in one place, and gave order to sling all that was good for nothing, as filth, ruff-raff, and broken sheards into one place: whereupon, in process of time arose a mount which they called Tellacens. Among these potters there was a place hallowed to Venus Myrica, as we find in some records.

CHAP. VI.
The Pyramides; the sepulchre of C. Cestius, and the garners of the people of Rome.

The Pyrimides were huge towers four-square, rising up in height, sharplike to a flame, whereof they have the name πύρ, i.e. of fire. But Stephanus suppoeth they were so called, πύριον, i.e. of wheat; because into that place where they were erected, wheat was brought out of

of all Egypt; which made a great dearth of corn. These at the beginning were reared by the Kings of Egypt, thereby to spend and consume their superfluous wealth and substance, whereof they had no use; for fear lest if they had gathered goods, and heaped up a deal of gold, silver, and other riches, they should thereby have given occasion unto some for to lie in wait to take their lives away: also, that the common people should not live in idleness. Afterwards, at Rome likewise they bestowed their money thereupon, for to make the world wonder, and to shew their vain-glory. There is yet one of them to be seen, standing upright at the gate Hofstiensis, enclosed within a wall. And commonly it is said, that it was the monument or sepulchre of C. Cestius, one of the seven Septemvirs, called Ephlones. But Blondus would seem to prove, that it was the place for buriall of the whole College and Society of those Septemvirs Ephlones. Now were they called Ephlones, who had the power to ordain and make feasts and solemn bankets to the gods.

It is written, that there were 140 garners of the people of Rome, between the mount Tellacens and Tyber.

In the same compass of ground near Tyber was the lake or pool Hylerna. Some also affirm, that there stood sometime in that quarter a little town called Capena.

CHAP. VII.
The sweating steeple, and the image of Jupiter.

By cause the Esquilis should next follow: but because it lieth between the way Laticana on the Southeast side, and the valley (which for the breadth of 400 foot enleotheth that way) on the West: we will rehearse what memorable things have there been in the Laticana way and the valley afore said, before we come to the mount Esquilis. In our return therefore to the triumphall arch of Constantine, whereof we spake before, we will as we go discourse of the rest. Near then unto this arch there appeareth the half rundle or circumference of an old steeple made of brick, which Villoz calleth the sweating steeple: for that the report goeth, how sometime there gushed water out of it: whereby the common people, standing to behold the games and plaies in the next scaffold of the Theatre until they were thirst quenched their drought.

In the top hereof stood the brazen image of Jupiter, because their ancestors in old time were wont when they made solemn leagues to use the image of Jupiter. But for that it was a trouble either to carry with them or to send the said image, especially if they were to contract and establish any accords in far remote countries, therefore instead of the complete image they took the steeple only: which might betoken Jupiter the King of the gods, as well as if he had been there present full and whole.

CHAP. VIII.
The Amphitheatre of Titus Vespasianus, The Temples of Fortune and Quirites.

Between the two hills Calvus and Esquilis was there an Amphitheatre. This Vespasian built first, and afterward Titus his son dedicated and beautified it with the bairns, built near unto it with right great celerity and speed. This Amphitheatre was commonly called Colosseum, of Nero's Colossus, which was set up in the porch of Nero's house. In the same place of the Theatre were the pools before time of Nero, whereof we will speak hereafter in this very book. This Amphitheatre they called also Arena, i.e. the Sand-floor, because the ground was spread over and laid with sand, that the wrestlers might fall softer and take less hurt, also that the blood should be drunk up, to the end that the sword-centers in combat might not be afraid upon the sight thereof, and so with less chearfulness and courage set upon their concurrent: and last of all, that the champions, whose bodies were anointed with oyl, being betwexed with the sand, might with more ease take hold one of another. The whole Theatre and place it self within (which during those daies of the games was covered over with tent-cloth) would receive 80000 men. But hereof see more in Pliny, Pompeius Laetus, and other writers of the Roman acts.

Eulvinus Flaccus built unto Fortune (fast by this Amphitheatre) so goodly a Temple, as for state and magnificence there was hardly another in all Rome comparable unto it. Besides it, there were many other chapells at Rome consecrated to Fortune.

Likewise a Chappell of Quintus and rest was built in the broad street Laticana.

CHAP. IX.
Of Esquilis.

The mount Esquilis, as well by Varro as others, is divided into many parts, and each part thereof took name of those captains who in times past, before the City of Rome was built, there inhabited. For one was called Cispina, another, Oppia, and a third, Septius. But hereof Varro writeth at large. The posterity following changed those names, as we shall hereafter hear. Some think that Esquilis took the name of Excubias, i.e. watch and ward. For when Romulus had no very great troth in Tiberius, he used to have a standing watch by night, for fear he should be secretly forsaken and killed, or else turned out of his kingdom. Others suppose it was so named of foulders, who there used to cast forth chaff, and such refuse of light corn, to beguile and catch the poor birds.

The side of the hill toward the broad way Laticlavia, which lieth between the Churches of the 40 martyrs of S. Clement, S. Peter in Vincula, and S. Martin, was called by the name of Carinae, as Livy seemeth to testify, from that part therefore, because it was first inhabited, we shall do well to begin our treatise.

CHAP. X.

The Carinae, the old Curia and the new.

These Carinae, according to their model and form were houses like to keels of ships, standing within the Temple of Tellus. Their ruins are yet to be seen near the Church of S. Peter in Vincula, i. e. in bonds.

Near to that place was the old Curia built by Romulus; but the new was erected near to Comptinus Fabricius, i. e. the Quarrefour or cross way of Fabricius.

CHAP. XI.

The bairns of Titus and Philip; the statue of Laocoon; the Palace of Vespasian; the houses of Balbinus and Pompey.

Here remain yet to be seen the tokens and prints (as it were) of Titus the Emperors bairns, not far from the Church of S. Martin in the hills: for there be great cisterns to receive water, which at this day be called Septimius Sella, according to the number of those cisterns: and so far reached the house of Nero, called Aurea, i. e. golden.

Not far from thence in the year of our Lord 1506, one Felix a Citizen of Rome, chanced to find in his vineyard the statue of Laocoon, made by those excellent workmen, Aggesander, Polydorus, and Athenodorus, Rhodians who with wonderful cunning portraited and cut most artificially in one intricate stone, Laocoon himself, his children and the admirable windings and foldings of the serpents about them. And now at this day is to be seen at the Vatican in the palace of Vesphasian near the said bairns of Titus. See more of this you may in Pliny. As for the story itself, most learnedly and lively it is set out by Virgil, and there to be read. Behind these bairns of Titus, between East and North, the ruins of others besides are thought verily to be those of Philip the Emperor.

Above the bairns of Titus some set Hadrian's bairns; for that this place is yet called Hadrianetulus. By the testimony of Lampridius it appeareth that Balbinus his house was in Carina. There also was Pompey's house, in which Lenaxus his freed-servant taught grammar.

CHAP. XII.

The cliff Virbius; the house of Servius Tullius; the golden one of Nero, and that of Virgil, Mecenas his tower and hortyards; the Temples of Fortune and Felicity.

That part of the Esquilie, which overlooketh the Church of S. Laurence in Fontana, is named Clivus Virbius; there also is the grove Fagualis, wherein stood the mansion house of Servius Tullius.

Nero's house, called Golden took up all that space, which from that quarter wherein now Saint Gregory's Church standeth, lay between Constantine's arch, the Colosseum, the Carina Esquilie, and Mecenas hortyards. His house before was in his own fire wherewith he burnt the City, consumed also: and when he re-edified it anew, he called it Aurea. The spacious largeness wherof was such, that it had about it three porches of a mile compass apiece. It contained also a pool like another sea: walled it was about, and resembled a very City. There were to it belonging holts and hamlets country like, vineyards pastures, woods, and beasts both tame and wild of all sorts. The holts and the porches were double gilded all over, and set out with precious stones. And in one word there was nothing wanting that might serve for pleasure or prodigal riot.

In the entry of this house there stood an huge image giant-like, called a Colossus, 120 foot high. After Nero's death, dedicated it was to the sun, and then changed the name. Now men think it was called Colossus after his name who was the first deviler of all such statues.

Within the same house, Nero included also the chappell of Fortuna. This goddess being made of the stone Phengites, when all the doors were shut, gave light to the whole house within: such raies of radiant brightness casteth this kind of stone from it. This goddess Servius Tullius first consecrated, and of Segetes, i. e. standing corn, called her Seia.

At the bairns of Dioclesian, there is a street-way leading up to S. Antonies Church in Esquilie, where stood sometime a most noble tower of Mecenas within his own hortyards: for those most pleasant hortyards were in the plain of Esquilie. Here within was Prapus worshipped: upon which ill-favored Idol Virgil hath played much in verse.

Near the hortyards of Mecenas stood the said Virgil's house.

The Temple of Felicitie, which took up a part of that plot where Nero's Gold-house should stand was by him burnt.

Above those gardens or hortyards of Mecenas was raised a wonderful piece of work, called Aggeres Tarchinius Superbi, i. e. Tarchinius bulwarks.

CHAP.

CHAP. XIII.

The Palace of Silius; the plain and market place of Esquilie; the grove Querquetulanus; also that of Juno Lacinia, and of Mars; the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

The palace of Silius in Esquilie, stood (as they say) where the Church of S. Mary the greater now is.

The plain or field Esquilie, near the tower of Mecenas (called Inter montes), among the hills, is between the fore said bulwarks and the City wall. This plot of ground was in times past called Foculus; because dead bodies were therein burnt. But when the stinking steam thereof was noisome to the City, the Citizens and Augustus (as by a general consent gave the field unto Mecenas, where he made his goodly hortyards and most dainty gardens. Of which Cicero, with others, speaketh much.

In like manner, the market place Esquilinum was in the same hill.

That side of the Esquilie which looketh toward the grove Querquetulanus had in it the grove of Juno Lacinia.

In the same Esquilie was the chappell and altar of Ill-Fortune.

In the way which goeth to the gate Interagere, even in the very bulwarks or rampiers of Tarchinius stood the arch of Gordian made of marble, garnished also and set out with ornaments of triumph. Of the ruins thereof was S. Gregory's Church in Damasus built.

CHAP. XIV.

The cliff Suburrans; the arch of Galienus; the shambles or flesh-market of Livia, or as some would have it, Livianum; the Praefectine way, and the Trophees of Marius.

At the top or upper end of Suburra was the Clivus Suburrans, so called of Suburra, yielding an easy ascent from thence up into the Esquilie.

Among you meet with the triumphal arch of Galienus the Emperor (where now standeth the Church of S. Peter) making a goodly shew of the Tiburtine Stone, wherof it was made. Near unto it was the shambles or market-place, called Macellum Liviae, or Livianum. This, as some think, took the name of one Macellus who being a notorious thief, and practising much to steal into the City, was in the end apprehended, and by the Censors condemned: and his house being seized as confiscate to the City was converted to a place wherein they sold meat and all other victuals; and so it kept still the name (as is said) of Macellum. Some are of opinion, that the said house was pulled down, and another built in the ruins thereof, which retained the name still of the former.

From thence beginneth the port-way Praefestina, and leadeth to the gate Esquilina.

In this way you shall meet on the right hand with a huge bank of brick, half ruined; upon which were erected two Trophees of marble; that is to say, certain posts like Quintus standing upright with spoils of enemies hanging thereupon; and they resembled men that were taken prisoners. It is said, that these Trophees were set up by Marius in his triumph for the Cimbric war: which when Sylla had cast down and overthrow, C. Caesar (afterwards Dictator) erected again. The place of the inhabitants thereabout, is at this day called Cimbrum. As touching Trophees, look to read more in Plutarch Valerius Max, and others.

CHAP. XV.

The house of the Elia; the chappell Marianum; the region or quarter called Tabernola; the bairns and dwelling house of Gordian; the Palace of Caius and Lucius; also the Palace Licinianum.

The house of the Elia stood in that place where now be the monuments Mariana and the chappell of that name.

The plain part of the Esquilie, between it and the mount Calvus, and the Basilica Laceranensis, is at this day called Morulanus, for Mariana; and in old time, the region of Tabernola.

Near the Church of S. Eusebius, in the way of Praefestina, was built the bairns and habitation of Gordianus. The ruins of those hot-houses are yet to be seen, whereby a man may soon give an estimate, how fair, how rarely, and large they were at first.

Between the gates Esquilina and Navia, not far from the walls, there be to be seen certain notable ruins: this they commonly call, the bairns of Galatius. But in that place stood, in old time, that beautiful and famous palace which Cesar erected under the name of Caius and Lucius his nephews. Hard by the Church of S. Balbina, whereas now is the Bear called Pileatus, stood sometime the Palace Licinianum.

CHAP. XVI.

The water Martia or Trajana; and the Temple of Ius.

The current of the water Martia, passing by the gate Trajana through the plain of Esquilie went as far as to the bairns of Dioclesian, unto the hills next adjoining. This in old time was called Ansera. It riseth out of the spring Piconia in the mountains of the Pelignis, and passeth by the the Martians country and the lake Fucinus, and so runneth to Rome; the coldest and most wholesome of all other waters that run into Rome. This water Ancon Martius began first to bring into the City: afterward, Q. Martius furnished Rex, took it in hand; and a long time after Agrippa repaired the conduit thereof. Of it read more in Pliny and Frontinus.

The Temple of Isis is by P. Vitell placed in the quarter Esquilina.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Suburra; the house of Cæsar and Lælia; and the street Patricius.

Suburra is a street of all other most frequented: it beginneth at the Forum Romanum, and goeth on forward directly by the Forum Nervæ up to the hanging or rising of the hill called Cilve Suburrana, whereof we have written before in this book; and it endeth where the way Francia beginneth. Called it was Suburra, either for that it sustained and bare up the Carina and the wall under it; or because it lay under the old City; or as Varro thinketh, of the burrough or street Succursus. In this street Suburra was the house of Cæsar, so long as he contented himself with a mean estate.

In it were sometimes certain stews and brothel-houses, as Martial writeth.

The street Patricius windeth crooked from the hill Viminalis, and endeth at the baths of Diocletian. Of it more hath been said in the former book.

The house of Lælia likewise was in the same street, as Martial witnesseth.

CHAP. XVIII.

Suburra in the Plain; and the Temple of Sylvanus.

The mount Viminalis on the West-side of it hath part of the Quirinalis opposite against it: and the vale lying between was named Suburra the plain.

In the same valley in times past were the ten Tavernæ; so called of the number.

The pit also of S. Proba was in the same hill; which Proba her self made near to the Church of S. Marci in the field.

At the foot in manner of the hill Viminalis, over-against S. Agatha's Church there stood the Temple of Sylvanus, as appeareth by many good tokens.

CHAP. XIX.

Of the hill Viminalis; the Palace of Decius; the Laver of Agrippina; the baths of Olympias and Novatus; the dwelling houses of Q. Catulus, Craffus, and C. Aquilius.

Varro reckoneth the hill Viminalis among the Esquilæ. Viminalis it was named of Jupiter Viminalis, whose altars were in that hill; or else of plenty of Officers there growing.

In the highest rising and ascent of that hill, there stood in old time, (where now is the Church of S. Lawrence in Panisperna) the Palace of Decimus the Emperor, as may be shewed by the ruins thereof.

Not far from the same place, toward the Church of S. Vitalis, were the lavers or washing places of Agrippina mother to Nero.

The baths of Olympias were situate toward Suburra; the tokens whereof are now found in the brow of the hill.

Likewise the baths of Novatus were built upon the hill Viminalis, where the Church of S. Prudence standeth.

The hill Viminalis had also three goodly houses of most noble personages, to wit, of M. Craffus, Quintus Catulus, and Caius Aquilius; the marks whereof are evident to be seen in the side of the said hill.

Upon the same hill in times past a certain feastivall sacrifice was solemnized, which the dwellers and inhabitants there, call Fagual.

CHAP. XX.

The baths of Diocletianus; the Library Ulpia; the plain Viminalis; the gate Interaggeres; and the vale Quirinalis.

The baths of Diocletian are to be seen all ruinate on the side of the hill Viminalis: and by their ruins a man may easily gather how stately and magnificent they were sometime. These were begun by Diocletian and Maximinian Hercules; in the building whereof 40000 Christians were held to work many years together in most slavish manner.

These were afterwards finished and dedicated by Constantine and Maximinian, new Emperors. Of the vain and superfluous expenses which the Romans laid out upon Baths, read Seneca, who depaينتeth out their wastfulness most excellently.

In the same baths was the Library Ulpia, which by Hadrian, or (as some think) by Trajan, was thither translated; wherein were the liest records, and those huge volumes, called the Elephantine books in which the acts of the Emperors, and all the sanctions and ordinances of Senat were, as Pollio witnesseth.

Behind

Behind these baths, from above the rampier or bulwark of Tarquinius Superbus, was the plain field Viminalis, which spreadeth out as far as to the City wall. There is seen as yet the gate Interaggeres shut; albeit it seemeth more probable and like to a truth, that it stood in the plain Esquilina.

In that very place there was a pit or well of spring running water, which the neighbours dwelling thereby called the pit of the Vivarium, or the park pit, within which park they kept enclosed divers and sundry kinds of wild beasts. The harbors and dens of these wild beasts are yet to be seen: whereupon it cometh, that those places or parks which are set out and appointed for feeding of Deer, we like to call Vivaria.

The space between Diocletian's baths and Constantine's arch is named the vale Quirinalis: in which they say, that Romulus met with Proculus.

In the same was the sacred chappell of Fortuna Publica.

CHAP. XXI.

The mount Caballus: the Etymology of Quirinalis: the tower Militarium: the baths of Paulus: the chappell of Neptune: the baths of Constantine: the house and street of the Cornelii.

The hill which at this day they name Caballus was in old time called Quirinalis, as by many signs and reasons may be proved; so as no man skillful in the Roman story, need to doubt thereof.

This Quirinal hill, the six in order of the mountains of Rome, (as Varro testifieth) taketh that name of the Temple of Quirinus; after others, of the Quirites, who coming with Tatius from Cures, there pitched their tents and lodged. This mountain is shaped long, for it comprehendeth that little hill which is between the gate Collina and Colatina. Upon it standeth the Obelisk of the Moon, engraven with Egyptian hieroglyphick characters. In breadth, from the North Southward, it reacheth to a tower, now called Comitium.

In the pitch and top of the hill, above the Forum of Trajanus you shall see the tower called Militarium; where in old time the souldiers of Trajan kept their standing guard, and gave the tower that name.

On the same ridge were the baths of Paulus, built: which place at this day by a corrupt name, is called Bagnana-Poli.

In the descent and hanging of the Quirinal hill toward Suburra stood sometime the chappell of Nephtis, which appeareth by the pictures and other reliques there found.

From hence toward the North were the hot-houses of Constantine, as the ruins of the place do testifie.

The house of the Cornelii was built in the street so called, and at this day the name it keepeth still, but more hereof eliewhere.

CHAP. XXII.

The Temples of Saturn, the Sun, and Bacchus: Quirinus his Temple and porch: the old Capitoll: the Chappells of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva: the house of Pomponius Atticus.

In the Cornelian street (whereof a little before we made mention) were two gyant-like images; I called Colossi, resembling two old men, naked, and holding Coronæ in their hand. It is commonly received, that these were the Statues of Saturn and Mars; for that certain it is how their Temples stood hard by: and many evidences there are, besides the very ruins thereof, which testifie so much.

Over-against the hot-houses of Constantine, upon the very brow of the hill, there standeth to be seen one half of a marble tower, which the people dwelling thereby call Mæsa. This men think, was the tower of the Sun, by the ornaments there reared and set up by Aurelian: for this Emperor worshipped the Sun above all other gods; and therefore you shall see stamped in his coin this inscription: Soli invicto, To the invincible Sun. His mother also, a Priest of the Sun, thereupon reared a Temple unto the Sun.

In the side of the hill near the foresaid baths are two horses seen standing; the handy-work of Praxiteles and Phidias. These were (by report) Tiridates the Kings, and translated to Rome.

That part of the Quirinalis which boundeth upon Palus Martia was called the mount and Temple of Clæva and Apollo.

Not far from thence behind this hill, there is another rising and ascent: where, by antique letters it is evident, that the old Capitoll stood, together with the chappell of Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva.

Over-against these places, inclining toward the right hand, where now standeth the Church of S. Vespasiani, Pomponius Atticus dwelt in an house which came to him by inheritance from his grand-father and was called Pamphiliæna. They write, that this was a most sweet and pleasant seat, by reason of a wood near unto it.

In the same place was built afterwards the Temple of Quirinus, kept always shut, to signify that it was an unknown secret: whether Romulus were entered and lay in the earth, or were translated into the number of the gods in heaven.

There was a porch or walking place there of that name; where folk used commonly to meet, to dispatch businesses and contract cōpulsals.

CHAP. XXIII.

The path-way or causey called Alta; the house of Sabinus; the street and statue of Mamurnus; the Court and gardens of Salust, and the field or plain Sceleratus.

The high causey reaching from the Baths of Constantine to the gate Viminalis along the side of Quirinalis was paved with four-square Rome.

Upon that causey, at a place called the Pomerian, Flavius Sabinus had an house, wherein, by report, Domitian was born.

It is avouched in old time there was a street of Mamurnus: and that his statue there stood where now is S. Salsus Church.

Not far from that Church was the Court of Salust, and his most neat and fine horticards, where the field called Sceleratus lay, and reached near the gate Collina. Of those horticards, as also of the hamlet Tiburina, there yet continue some marks and remnants in the bottom of the valley, between the very hill and the way which bringeth to the gate Salaria. On that little hill is seen the very house of Salust, which the people there inhabiting call Salustrium. Of this matter see more in Cicero and others.

Beyond the horticards of Salust, near the gate Collina, there is an high place like a mount, where in times past the vestal votary Nuns, such as were condemned for incontinency and incest, were buried quick; and thereupon all the plain about it was called Sceleratus, together with the way that leadeth thither.

CHAP. XXIV.

The Temples of Salus, of Dius, Fidius, of Fortuna Primigenia, of Honor, Hercules, and Quirinus; also the Senat-house of women.

The mount Quirinalis had very many Temples & Chappels, although the certain place where they stood is not so well known as this day, namely one of Apis. That of Salus was painted by Fabius Pittor, and burnt in the time of Claudius. By Junius Bubulcus Dictator when he triumphed over the Æquians it was vowed by him (Censor) put to making, and in his second Dictatorship dedicated.

* Dius Triominus Sabinorum.

* Salustius, Dius, and Fidius, were the Sabins gods, which, when they left their native country and home, with all their other household gods, they carried with them into mount Quirinalis. This god (forsooth) was in words and name three, in deed and truth but one, as they said. These three therefore had one temple built them upon this hill, and were called by one name, Sanctus. The opinion received of which godhead was such, that an oath was thought to carry a great power of sanctity and holiness, whereby a man in that threefold name and one Deity avowed and swore these, Me, Dius, Fidius.

Domitianus, a Prætor or Lord Chief Justice within the City of Rome, built a Temple upon that hill to Fortuna Primigenia.

Besides, in that mount were the Temples of Honor and Hercules. Likewise the Council-House of women was in the mount Quirinalis, at which in former times the wives and dames of the City met yearly upon certain solemn set daies. Moreover, it is recorded, that the feast Ægonalia was celebrated in Quirinalis.

CHAP. XXV.

The Court or Forum Archimonium; the pillar Tiburina; the house of Martial; the Cirque of Floralia; the Temple of Flora; the shops of Minium, and the common ascent called Clivus Publicus.

Between the hill Hortulorum (whereof ye may read before in the first book and the chapter next following) and Quirinalis there is a valley four-square, but lying somewhat in length. In that part thereof which lieth under the mount of Clara and Apollis, was the Court called Archimonium. For the very Church of S. Nicolaus, which at this day standeth upon that place is named De Archimonio.

Not far from it there is another place, so wit, Pila Tiburtina: There stood the house of Martial, as he himself witnesseth.

Next to it followeth the round Cirque (Floralium) where yearly to the honour of the goddess Flora, the feastvall Floralia is celebrated. Now this Flora was a famous courtesan or strumpet at Rome, who having by her whorish trade gathered a mighty deal of goods together, in her last will made the people of Rome her heir, with this condition, That every year they should celebrate the memorial of her birth day. But the Senat thinking this a ridiculous mockery, to honour and dignifie so fitly a thing with such a remembrance, they devised a goddess of flowers, forsooth, called Flora, and her upon those holidays they seemed to please and content, that the would be good to the growth of trees and corn, and that they might do well in their flowering and blooming time. To this goddess we read that a Temple likewise was consecrated: Anon you meet with the work-houses where they make Minium, i. e. Vermilion. Near unto which was the Clivus Publicus.

CHAP.

CHAP. XXVI.

The hill Hortulorum, the Temple of the Sun, and the sepulchre of Nero.

This little hill (Hortulorum) containeth but a few things worth the writing. Among which is the house of Pincius a Senator, who gave the name both to a gate and a mountain, which in these daies are called Monte Pincius, and gate Pinciana.

The reliques and marks of his house are seen in that very place, near the old wall. And about the same walls we meet with an huge building in form of an hemisphere or half circle, which men imagine was the Temple of the Sun.

Upon the same hill over-against the tomb of Marcellus in the very port way Flaminia, fast by the monument of Domitian stood Nero's sepulchre also.

Now this hill Hortulorum took the name of certain horticards and gardens under it, which in old time, by reason they were continually so well watered were most fruitful. Down this hill all they were wont (in times past) to descend into Campus Martius, who meant to sue and stand for any Magistracy.

CHAP. I.

Of the flat plot of the City, and the Theatre in general.

That it may be understood more certainly in what place of the plain and level part of the City every thing stood, let there be a straight and right line drawn from the Capitoll, through Panthæon to Tyber, near the Church of S. Roch. So shall the City be in manner divided into two equal parts. The one shall lie from the front and side of the Tyber, the other from the Forum of Trajanus to the gate Flumentina, along the foot of the two hills Quirinalis and Hortulorum.

Begin we will therefore at the Theatre of Marcellus, and recount the places in order, as hitherto we have done. As for Theatrum, a Greek word it is, and in Latine may be aptly translated Forium. The first Theatres were appointed among the Athenians, and those in regard of husbandmen, who on festival daies visited the Temples of the gods: afterwards, at Rome they began to be taken up. The first, and that the greatest of all others was, built of timber by M. Scæurus: for, the concavity within would receive 30000 men. After it, were Theatres made to turn about and on their feet front one while this way, another while that. But as touching Theatres, see more in Cassiodorus and Vitruvius, who have written plentifully thereof, and namely, by whom they were first ordained, and in what manner built.

CHAP. II.

The Theatre of Marcellus and the Library: the gallery and court of Octavia.

Augustus built many things under the name of others, as we find written by authors in sundry works. And among the rest was the Theatre of Marcellus his nephew or cousin by his sister Octavia. A part hereof is yet to be seen between the Capitoll and Tyber, where now standeth the palace of the Sabelli. It was able to contain 80000 men. See more thereof in Alconius.

Hard by the very same Theatre was the gallery of Octavia, reared by the said Augustus for his sister Octavia's sake. Therein were certain curious pieces of work wrought by Praxiteles, and namely, the ravishing of Proserpina. The portraiture of Bacchus & Satyrus, Allo, Apollis, Diana, and the nine mules; the workmanship of Timarchides. Within this gallery on walking place, Pliny saith, there stood a chappel of Juno, and the image of the said goddess. Fast by the said gallery stood the court or palace of Octavia, and in it Cupid portraied with lightning in his hand. It took up in times past as great a space, as at this day the Churches of S. Nicolaus in Carcere, and S. Mary in Portico.

After the death of Marcellus, Octavia his mother set up a library near his Theatre. Now the first that ever ordained. That books of all learning should be in some public place bestowed for to be read of all that would come; was at Athens Pisistratus the tyrant, and at Rome Afinius Pollio.

CHAP. III.

The Cirque or new-place Flaminius, and the Temple of Apollo.

That this Cirque Flaminius stood in that place where at this day the dark store-houses and cellars be, heard by S. Kiburnus church, the marks yet remaining testifie Flaminius it was called, either because it was built about the plain called Campus Flaminius, or else by Flaminius the Consul, who was slain at the battell of the lake Thrasymenus. In it were the plaies and games exhibited, which they call Apollinæ; and therein the horle-runnings were performed. To it the Senat used oftentimes to come down from the Capitoll to sit in council. Neptune also had a chappel there.

Apollis

Between the Mausoleum of Augustus, and the hill called Horodorum, were the Trophees of Marius over Jugurtha, Trophees as Varro witnesseth; were so called of εἰσπῆ Greek word, which significth, flight; for that the manner was to hang up the spoils and disrobings of enemies put to flight and slain, upon trunks and poles.

In Mars field, were the sepulchres of Sylla, Hirtius, and Pansa, of Italia, Brianninus, Drausus the Emperor Claudius, and other right hardy and valiant knights, beside infinit ornaments more, whereof we have written before in this book.

The seventh Book.

CHAP. I.

Of the river Tybre.

IT should follow by due course and order, to treat of Laniculum and all that quarter of the City on the other side of Tybre: but because these parts are separate from the rest of the City by the river Tybre between; thereof also it is meet to say somewhat briefly. And first weily the reason of that name should be shewed. Some think therefore, that the river was called Tyberis, San. Tit. Ubijus. For the Sicilians when as in old time they had overcome the Carthaginians in battell, and taken a number of them prisoners, enjoined them for the better fortification of their own City, to cast a trench about it, and to let water thereinto: and this ditch in reproach of their enemies, they called Ugyn. And the same men upon a time afterwards, when as they encamped near Rome, gave this very name unto this river (also, whereas before it was called Albulis. Some think it was named so of Tyberus a King of the Talcans, slain upon the banks thereof. Varro is of opinion, that it took the name of Tiberinus, a neighbour Prince of the Veitians. In holy writings we read it Tyberinus. In vulgar speech they call it Tyberis: in poetry, Tybris. In old time it was termed Runon, as it were, gnawing and eating the banks thereof. Also at one side of the City it was termed Tarentus, as a man would say, wearing the banks. It springeth from the Appennine, above 40 other rivers) is increased to such bigness, that ships of burden and the greatest hulks, may come up in it as far as Rome. This river divideth Tuscan from Embrina, the Sabins country and the Latins, entreth at the North part of the City, and so passeth through Southwards, between the gates Hofiensis and Portuensis, leaving Laniculum on the right hand and the City on the left, and so near unto Hofia is discharged into one mean broad stream, and falleth into the Tyrrhene Sea. Upon the banks thereof, as if they were consecrated to some divine power, it was not lawfull to set up any building. Certain warders and keepers there were appointed, for the chancell and the banks. But of this river, Pliny and others have left much in writing.

CHAP. II.

Of the bridges built upon Tybre.

THE Tybre, as is above said, being so deepe, as that it is navigable, and beareth the greatest ships, hath no foord in any place that can be waded through; and therefore necessary it was to make bridges over it, and so to join that part on the farther side of Tybre, to the rest of the City. He. cules, after he had killed Geryon, built a bridge, where afterwards flood that which they called Sublicius. Also before the foundation of the City, there was a bridge over Tybre, called Saevus, upon which they sacrificed men to Saevus by throwing them down into the river. But when Hercules afterwards had put down that manner of sacrificing, he gave order, that mens images made of the City was built, there were other bridges made to the number of eight; to wit, Milvius, Elivius, Palatinus, Laniculensis, Cestius, Fabricius, Palatinus, and Sublicius. And all these, save the Sublicius only, Vestius overthrow.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Milvius.

THE bridge Milvius, which men now call Melvius, standeth upon the way Flaminia, a mile and more from the City. Built it was in the troublesome times of Sylla, by Seamus when he was Centor. Many a time they say it was cast down, and as often set up again.

CHAP. III.

The bridge Elivius, now S. Angel, the Vatican or Triumphal the Laniculensis or Aurelianus.

THE bridge at this day called S. Angel, in times past Elivius, took that name of Elivius Hadrianus, for he built that bridge, and neer unto it a sepulchre, which they call Moles Hadriani. Beneath

CHAP. V.

The bridges Fabricius and Cestius.

Beneath this is another which giveth passage into the mount Vatican and the plain thereof, and thereupon they named it Vaticanus also Triumphalis, for that over it they went up in triumph to the Capitol, to give thanks to Impiter and rejoice. The piles are yet to be seen in Tyber, over against the spittle or the Capitoll of S. Spirit. The third bare the name Laniculensis of Laniculum neer unto it, and Aurelianus of the port-way Aurelia, or the gate so called. Antonius Pius paved it over with marble, and being demolished in the civil wars, was called the broken bridge. Afterwards Pope Xystus the fourth reedified it, and gave unto it his own name.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Island Tiberina.

OF this Islands beginning, we have treated before in the description of Mars field. Le. on. 1 Dionysius also let down this story at large. It resembleth the form of a bireme gally, and where it is broadest, it is not above a dart shoot over, in length it containeth about two stadia or a quarter of a mile. This was in times past called Lycania, and was hallowed to the honour of Aesculapius, whole image from out of Epidaurus was thither brought. Of Aesculapius, and his temple read Pliny.

A temple also of Jupiter standeth in it, dedicated by C. Servilius the Daunwir, which had been vowed by L. Furius sixty years before the Gauls war.

In the same Island were sick folk presented unto Aesculapius (in the field,) And neer unto the temple of the said god, was a lazar-house, for that this god was the inventor and maintainer of Physick.

In it also stood the chappell of Faunus, neer to the very river: but scarcely remain there any tokens thereof. This Faunus (as men say) was reported to have been the first that consecrated chappels and temples to the gods; and for this cause, all such places consecrated to the gods were called Fana. By the testimony of Cornelius Tacitus and Suetonius the statue of the emperor Tullius stood there.

CHAP. VII.

The Senators bridge called also Palatine, and that which is named Sublicius.

Beneath the abovesaid Island, as it were a darts cast off, was the seventh bridge, Senatorum pontis, of the Senators, also Palatinus, in the mount Palatine neer adjoining: and at this day named it is the bridge of S. Mary in Aegypt, by reason of S. Maries church neer by.

Now followeth the last bridge Sublicius, and which also is counted the most ancient of all others. This was first made of timber by Anens Martius at the very foot of the Aventine mount: framed only with a floor of planks without any iron spikes and nails or props to shew against it, so as in times of war and trouble it might be taken in peeces one from another. Now Sublicius it was called a Sublicus, i. great strong posts. But afterwards Emilius Lepidus made it of stone, and thereupon named the marble bridge. Upon it in old time sat beggars craving of alms of the passengers. From it also leud and wicked malefactors, were thrown down headlong into Tyber. This bridge as well as other, was often demolished and built up again by one or other.

CHAP. VIII.

Of that side of the City which is beyond Tyber. The City and temple of the Ravens and Fords Fortuna: the basis of Severus: the hort-yards of Calixtus the water Alicetina, & the meadow of Mutius.

THE region beyond Tyber in old time had the name of Laniculum, the hill which overlooketh and commandeth the greatest part thereof. We find it also called of men in those daies the City of the Ravenates, who with a fleet having aided the Romans, were permitted to dwell in the Laniculum, for fear lest at any time that mountain and hold should be seized and kept by the enemies. Now for as much as this quarter was inhabited by base people (such as followed vile occupations, there were in it but few things worthy of any remembrance. Severus therein built certain baies: Casus made hort-yards and prepared also a fair pool called the Naumachia for the fight there. Also the temple of Fors fortuna, was (in Tib Casus daies) dedicated in that quarter. The water called Alicetina, was derived out of the poole Alicetinus, by the high way or cauley

Claudia into the foresaid Naumachie, and served all those parts. This water was also called by some Angustia. See Frontinus, who hath written much of the Roman waters.
Marius, who willingly had exposed and offered himself to die for the love of his country, was for that good service endowed by the people of Rome with land on the other side of Tyber. The place at this day is yet called Prata Mævia. Neer unto the Arsenal and ship-docks on the side of Tyber, were the plaies and games of Fishermen in times past celebrated.

CHAP. IX.

The sepulchre of Numa, and Cæcilius the Poet. The Tribunal of Aurelius, the Ianiculum, and the bury-yard of Marcellus.

That the sepulchre of King Numa was under the hill Ianiculus a chift of this, with his books long time after digged there, do sufficiently prove. See Livy, Solinus, and others.
 The Tribunal Aurelia, and the Arsenal was on that side of the Tyber, as appeareth by those authors.

The hill Ianiculus took the name of Ianus who there dwelt. & therein was afterwards buried. He also built a town or City there, as they say, so called. This Ianiculus was also called Anipolis as Rome Saturnia.

Commonly also it is received, that Cæcilius the Poet was under the same hill Ianiculus buried. Marcellus the Poet, as himself witnesseth in his first book, had most pleasant and delectable bury-yards in the same Ianiculus.

CHAP. X.

The hill and field Vaticane, the temple of Apollo and Mars, the Naumachie, the cirque bury-yard, and Obelisk of Cæsar.

The mount Vaticane and the plain thereto, were without the City, 'in the parts beyond the Tyber, and in that very place, where at this day is the church of S. Peter, and the Popes palace. Called it was Vaticanus, of the god Vaticanus by whose instinct & inspiration it was beleev'd in old time that prophecies were delivered. And this god they called Vaticanus, for that in power was the beginning of mans voice, for as much as infants, so soon as ever they come into the world, presently pronounce and utter the first syllable of his gods name, * Va.

The temple of Apollo was in Vaticane, in that very place, as men think, wherein at this day is S. Petroni or Parnali church, also another of Mars, wherein standeth S. Marces in Fabrizius, upon the port-way called sometime Triumphalis. Gellius writeth, that Iulius Pavlus the Poet had hort-yards in the Vaticane.

The vale Vaticane is there also to be seen, wherein Nero enclosed a compasse of ground like a ring for to ride and break horses in. The conventicles also and wine-taverns there he adorned. Moreover, Nero had hort-yards in that place, which he let forth for divers andundry punishments and tortures of Christians. All this place thus enclosed, he called the Cirque. Also the pools made for ship-right, called Naumachie were there, and the Obelisk of Cæsar in the way Triumphalis is yet to be seen standing upright.

CHAP. XI.

The way or streets Triumphalis, the water Sabbatina, the sepulchre of Scipio.

Of the Triumphall way, there hath been some mention made before. Called to it was, for that the solemn pomp of triumph used to go that way up into the Capitol. This as well as others was paved with flint stone. It went on still to the back porch of S. Gelsus, towards the plain field of Flora: and so forward to the temple sometime of Jano, now S. Angelo, and from thence to S. Georges church in Velabrum. In the pontifical hort-yards there be many antiquities found, brought thither from other places: and namely, the protiture and counterfet of Nilus, all of sorts of creatures living and encreasing there. Likewise of Tyber, with the yielding her teats to be sucked of the founders of Rome. Apollo with his bow and arrows; the statue of Læcoron, whereof hath been spoken before; Cupid hard by Venus. Many other things before appear in the gallery, and those hort-yards.

The water Sabbatina, was derived to Rome from the Sabbatine pool, called Anguillarum and afterwards when the conduct and conveyance thereof was by Hadrian restored, it was brought into the palace of S. Peter, to serve the priests there.

In Vaticane plain, not far from the mountreaved by Hadrian, there stood a Pyramis or Pisces in times past, under which they say P. Scipio Africanus lay entombed.

CHAP. XII.

The mount of Hadrianus, and the meadows called Quintia.

Aelius Hadrianus reared a huge and mighty mount for his own sepulchre neer the bridge Ælius, over against the Mausoleum of Augustus. In which were bestowed first his own ashes, and afterwards the relics of all the Antonines. This is at this day the fort of the Popes. The same also is called the tower of Crescentinus, because one Crescentinus, a famous captain, held it a long time. See more in Procopius.

The meadows Quintia in the plain Vaticanus, took the name of Quintus Cincinnatus. Read Phiny hereof. Now they be called Aprata.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things which either have been, or remain now without the gate Flumentana.

The first thing presented to our sight when we are out of the gate Flumentana is the port-way or causey Flaminia: which, as we have before shewed, was by Cn. Flaminius brought as long as far as Ariminum. Within the City he paved it with flint or peble: without he laid it with gravel. And in that order be all the port-ways laid about Rome. Upon this way Augustus made four bridges, whereof at this day there remain scarcely any tokens. Neer unto the causey Cæsar had a farm or manor house, which he called ad Gallinas. The reason of that name Livy sheweth. To the way Flaminia, another named Claudia joined upon which were the Hort-yards of Ovid.

The way Æmylia, made and paved by Lepidus the colleague of Flaminius, leadeth from Ariminum as far as Bononia. Now two causeys there were of that name, the one which met with Flaminia: the other which Scævus laid and made, which went through Pisæ and Luna to the Sabati. In likemanner there was a way called Tyberina and Cælia, without the gate now called Pyramidaria, which passed along time by Sutrinum, Tetrella, and Viterbium into the way Vulturnensis.

Certain places there be in the way Flaminia somewhat hollow and flat like saddles, called therefore Collata.

Without the gate Collatina there is a causey of the same name.

CHAP. XIII.

Of those things that are reported to have been without the gate Collina.

The port-way from the gate Collina is called Salaria, because the Sabines at it brought salt into the City. There upon stood the bridge Salarum. And it reached to Numantina. In it was the temple of Pennus Erycina, vowed by Fabius the Dictator, and dedicated by L. Porcius. There stood the image of Pennus Verticordia, so called for that she averted mens minds from wanton lust. Likewise the temple of Honor, and an altar in it. Finally, the monument or tomb of Licinius the barber of Augustus.

CHAP. XV.

The things that either were, or at this day are without the gates Numentana and Intragreges.

Without the gate Numentana, there beginneth a causey of the same name, by which men go to Numentum. The same is called Figulensis, of the potters furnaces there standing. The goddess Nenia, which was wont to wait & attend upon funerals with doleful plaints and lamentable moans, is reported to have had a temple without this gate. In like manner, other gods and goddesses, which are supposed to hurt mankind, they erected temples, but without the gate, because they should do the lesse harm: and namely, to the Fœces, to Mars the revenger, to Nemesis about such other. Upon this way Numentana there appeareth a most ancient temple of Bacchus about S. Agnes church, and over the same standeth the bridge Numentana, built by one Naseter an Etruscan. Between this way and Salaria, was a withdrawing house in the country of [Phanotus] Nero freedman, in which Nero killed himself. Without the gate Intragreges, was a tower or castle called Cæstidia, where the souldiers of Dioclesian kept a corps de guard. There also is a park called Frumentum (now Frumentum) to be seen, where divers wild beasts were kept, more for pleasure and delight, then profit and use.

CHAP. XVI.

Of those things that without the gates Esquilina, Navia, Calimontana, and Gabina, either have been or now are.

From the gate Tiburina, there goeth a way of the same name leading to the City Tyber. Upon it there is a bridge Mamianus, commonly called Mammia, and bearing the name of Mamianus, Alexander the Emperours mother, who repaired it. A place there is by it called Phiscola, of a multitude of pits there. Also the bridge Lucanus, without the said gate standeth over the river Anio. And without the same gate, the two riverets called Anio the old and new do gather a current and run to Rome.

Without the gate Esquilina are waies Labicana and Prænestina. In this way the water Appia hath his head and beginneth, which by Appius Claudius was brought into the City.

The water Virgo likewise, which in time past was shewed by a maid to the souldiers, is thus way, and from thence is conveyed to the City.

But the Roman waters see Frontinus, who describeth right excellently, the source and beginning the conveyance and cartage, the end also and use of every one of them.

At the end of the way Calimontana, beginneth another called Campana, which closeth with Latina, the Between the gate Calimontana and Latina, standeth the gate Gabinia. From which there there went away some time called Gabina, leading to Gabis (but it runneth soon into Preneſtina for that the Cabians dwell upon it.

CHAP. XVII.

Of those things which were or are without the gates Latina and Capena.

The gate Latina gave both name and beginning to the cauley Latina, which through Lavinium, now called Val-monture, and Ladium reacheth to Campania, in which there stood in old time, the temple of Pomona, fortune, and the image of the same goddess. Of which writeth Valerius Max. In the said way the water Tepala gathereth to an head and current. From the gate Appia, beginneth a cauley of that name, paved by Ap. Claudius as far as to Capna, whereof look in Sirabo.

At the gate Capena, was the temple of Mars the warrior, or Grandivus; and therein the fountain of Marr. Hard by the same temple was the stone Manalis brought into the City of Rome in time of a drought, and presently there arose a shower of rain; whereupon he was called Manalis. In the way Capena, stood the oratory or chappell of Dea bona: and neer to it, they say, that Clodius and Papirius were slain. Neer to the gate Capena, was the altar of Apollo, the sacred grove of Honour, and the temples of Hops and Minerva. Likewise of Tempest, built by Marcellus. Moreover, another of Ridiculum: because Anibal having there encamped, was enforced to depart from thence mocked and scorned. Upon the way Appia was the bridge Valentinus, built by the Emperor Valens, and thereupon, neer the hill Messica, standeth the town Sinnessa.

This way had certain notable sepulchres, namely of Collatinus, the Scipies, the Servillii, Metelli, Tullii, of Ennius, Pompeius, the Horatii, and other. And in that part is to be seen the plain, whereupon the Horatii fought that famous combat to the utterance. In it also there is a water and well-spring, consecrated to Mercurius. To it upon a time when the people of Rome ran, every man dipped therein his branch of laurel, and therewith besprinkled them that were next, with an invocation to Mercurius; that as many as had this alperfon and sprinkling, might be spoiled of their finnes, and of perjurie especially. The grove also of Egeria was this gate. The way Laurentina fell into Appia: wherein S. Sebastian (by report) suffered even in the very place where they used to solemnize the feast Terminalis, to the god of Meers and Bounds Terminus.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of those things that be without the gate Hortensia, and others in generall

From the gate Hortensia beginneth the way Hortensia which leadeth to Hestia, built by Aneni. This was called in old time, the gate of the three twins brethren, or Trigemini; and with-out it, Livy fetterd the purse or merchants hall, Emperium.

In that part of the City on the other side of the water, were three gates, Portuensis, Aurelia Fontinalis. At Portuensis, beginneth away of that name, and leadeth to the port town Offia: where there was a temple of Portunus, the god of havens: and wherein the feast Portunalia was celebrated to the honour of that god.

From the gate Aurelia, the way also Aurelia taketh beginning; which along the sea-coast of Tuscania, leadeth to Pisa. The same was called Trajana of Trajanus who repaired it: wherein were the hort-yards of Galba the Emperor; and there also was his sepulchre.

[At the gate Fontinalis, was the feast Fontinalis celebrated at Rome, namely, to the goddess of fountains, as saith Sext. Pompeius.

To the Reader.

For as much as Titus Livius is prolix and full of variety: and howsoever otherwise willing enough to speak our language, yet most loth to forbear and forget certain Roman words wherewith so long time he had been acquainted: also for that now & then he saith one in his English tongue and in his French and Italian another; whereby he may be thought either to trip or to have forgotten himself, and the faults imputed to his teacher: in these regards (me thought) I owed thus much for their sake and converse with English Livy, as to satisfy them in that behalf. A twofold Index therefore I have digested: the one dwelling and leading readily to the most material and principal matters contained in the whole body of the History: the other expounding those things that may seem at first strange to the most; and with all, shewing here and there the reason of the foresaid disagreement, hoping that as use will make them more familiar in those strange phrases: so deeper and surer conference with him in the primitive Latine (the only touchstone of his true speech) shall excuse and acquit me of just blame, who have endeavoured that he might deliver his mind in English, if not so eloquently by many degrees, yet as truly, as in Latine.

An Index pointing to the principall matters contained in the History of Titus Livius.

A Second Index,

Containing the exposition of those terms in Levy which are not yet familiar in English, and of some places omitted in the Marginal notes.

Wherunto the Reader may have recourse, when he meeteth with any such difficulty in the History.

A ulus, the surname to divers families in Rome.

A Adile, certain inferior magistrates in Rome; who were of two sorts: Plæbeii and Censures; Plæbeii, of the Commons only, two in number more ancient than the others, chosen by the people alone to second and to assist the Tribunes of the Commons as their right hands. This name they took of the charge they had of temples, chapels, and ornaments: albeit they registered the Sancions and acts of the people called Plæbiscita and kept the same in their own custody, and were clerks of the market: also they exhibited the games and places called Plæbii-Curules; were likewise twain elected out of the order and degrees of the Patritii: so called of the ivory chair wherein they were allowed to sit, as officers of greater state. They set forth the great solemnities called Ludi megæi, or Romani; were overseers of the buildings throughout the City as well public as private, in manner of the ædiles in Atheni; they had regard to the Publick vaults, finks, conveiances, and conduits of the City waters; looked to the Arsenal.&c. Moreover, they had power to attach the bodies of great persons; and were charged to see unto the provision of corn and victuals. At the first, none but Patritii might be advanced to this place: but in process of time, Commoners also attained thereto. These as well as the Plæbeii were Sacrosancti, unviolable.

Erarii, they were, who being citizens of Rome, were by the Cenſors deprived of giving their voices in their Century or Tribe; paid all tribute with citizens according to the valuation of their goods; and ſerved in the wars of their own charges: and either becauſe era pendebant, or, era non mitterant, it ſeemeth they took that name.

Agmen quadratum: Agmine quadrato ductus taken in a three-fold fence. First, The same that infesto exercitu infestis agmine, or, infestis signis: which signifieth the ordinary manner of enemies marching with banners displayed, either to a battail, or to the sieg and assault of a fort: and this manner of phraise addeth a grace only to the sentence. Secondly, To march or fight in a four square battailion, though not always with equal sides & right angles: and the same not charged with the carriages at all. Thirdly, When an army is spread and displayed at large, enclosing the impediments or baggage in the midst, for safety and security.

Agraria, were laws preferred by the Tribunes of the Commons, as well for division of lands (conquered from the enemies) among the Commons; as to restrain the possessions of the Nobles within a certain limit and compa-

Ambition; The inordinat and excessive desire to be in office of state, appearing by indiest and unlawful means : either to their friends and kinsfolks, or to the people : against which, many laws in Rome were provided : namely, Acilia, Bibia, Emilia, Clodia, and others.

Anclite. Anclite was a buckler or cushion, that (as they say) fell from heaven into the hands of K. Nimian time of a plague: and he being advertised by Egeria, that it was for the health of the City, and ought to be kept safe; caused it more to be made unto it, so like, as they could not be known from the pattern: which hereby was preserved. The keeping hereof was committed to the twelve Sold.

Annales, were brief memorials, Chronicles, or commentaries, containing the names of consuls every year, the date of times, and all memorable occurrences hapning therein. The high Priests, called Pontifices maximi, had the charge by their place to gather the same into tables, and to fet them up in their houses for to be seen: and hereupon they were called Annales maximi, A Maximis Pontificibus; and not of their greatness, as those huge volumes, named Libri Elephantini.

App. Appius, a forename appropriate to the House of the Clandii in Rome.

Appia vna. A notable street or high-way begun by Ap. Claudius, reaching from Rome, as far as Capua; and afterwards by Julius Cæsar and Trajan, it was extended to Brindis in Calabria. Of all other it seemeth to be the principal, by the testimony of Papinius the Poet, who writeth thus of it:

Called it was Triumphalis (as also the gate Caperna?) because through it the triumphs ordinarily passed at the said gate.

Ara maxima. The great altar reared by Hercules, and took the name of a great heap of stones about it.

Arbor infelix, Is commonly taken for a tree that naturally beareth no fruit.

Argileus imus, is the base or low part of a street in Rome; in regard of the upper end thereof, called Sutrinus: in like sort as JANUS (JANUUS & JANUS).

Arx, is taken for some void place, whereupon nothing groweth, quia arces Forum boarium in Rome. Arx againe is of two names, habes and differeth from Campus, for that it is less. Alio a plot of ground made level and clean for to build upon: as in Suetonius 26. Forum Caesar de manibus inchoavit the Arx whereof, (I say), the trimming and levelling of the plot cost H. S. millies; id est, 100 millions of Sesterii. Last of all, the broad yards before temples, nor covered but compassed about with columns, like a cloister with an altar in the middle, be called Aræ.

Aruspices were wifards or fouth-fayers, directed by the bowels and inwards of beaſts killed for ſacrifices, called alſo Extiſpices, and in Greek ἐρσπισται, who prying into them, had eſpecial regard of the liver: whereupon their whole Art and learning was termed ἰντασκορία, albeit they obſerved alſo the heart, lungs, ſpleen, and kidnies.

As or Aſſus, uſually in Liby is taken for a Roman poſe, or coin in braſs, the tenth part in value of their ſilver Denarius. At firſt it was a pound weight of twelve ounces; but afterwards, the Sextans, id eſt, the fix part thereof, was valued worth the whole: and howſoever otherwiſe it altered in poſe, it went alwaies for 3 farthings or thereabout of our engliſh money.

Angurium. See Auspicia.

Angréi Romani. Pieces of gold coin current in Rome: in round reckoning equivalent to our spur-rial of 15 sh. For 100 Sesterii made aureum, which amount to 15 sh. 7 d. ob. the 4. part of mina, i. a lib. in silver, and of an ounce of angel gold.

A Aluſcia Aluſcia were properly the obſervation of the birds, either by their ſinging and flying in the air: or by their geſture and manner of feeding in their cava or coop: whereb-their Augurs & Pullarii knew in their learning, the pleaſure and will of the gods, whether they favoured their enterpriſes or no.
The birds that gave ſign by their voice and ſinging, they called Ofiſines quaſi ore canentes, as the crow, raven and owland therof came Agurium, quaſi avium arctius. Thoſe that ſhewed ought by their ſight & wings, were named Alites or Præſepes, as the buzzard, eagle, crane, gypſe, ſwan, and broad-winged fowls, maſſuſſaria. The good ſigns were called ſiniſtra Aluſcia quaſi ſiniſſima, quæd ſiniſ ſtri, whether they came from the left hand or the right. In pullets or chickens kept in sage; they obſerved whether they came forth willingly to their meat (for to abſtain from it was thought unlucky) whereas their feeding heartily, was a good ſign, and called ſolſtimus terpidius, quæd ſerripervium & ter-rapidum. when ſome of the meſt faltheſt out of the mouth, & ſcream pavis, beareth upon the ground; as it must needs do, when they pecked either corn, or gobbets called off a.

Balliffs, were certain wares-like engines for to defend out and led mighty fiones, to batter and make City wares; made with ropes of fiones and womens hair especially twined together as appeareth by Petrus Colonus at Rome, unto whom, by occasion that the women of the City paired with their hair for that purpose, a Temple was dedicated. According to the weight of fiones or balluts that this engine would carry, they were called Centenarii, or Centenarie balliffs.

Balliffs, were stately edifices or halluts Rome; at first serving to lead in under cover, wherein they differed from Fera and also to minister justice, of Beauvais, which signifies a Judge, as well as a King; but afterwards they used to meet there in consultation; also to negotiate and transfigure; and these had not only benches and bays like law-courts, but shops also for the better sort of wares and merchandice.

Minerva, The goddess of war; whose temple stood before the gate Cernuntia, and adjoining thereto was a column named Bellica: from which the Romans were wont to lance a dart or javelin towards those parts where they intended to make war: whereas in former times they sent their heralds to the very confines of their enemies, to perform that ceremony.

igati, were the Roman Denarii, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with two horses, called Biga.

metarche, The chief magistrates of the Boeotians.

Cains. } The forenames of sundry fa-Cn. Cnens. } milies in Rome.

the new Moon, which fell out with them ordinarily the first of every month: so named αὐτὴν καλῶσι, id est, a calandā, because the petty Pontius used then to call the people to the court Calabraz; and there to pronounce unto them how many daies were to the Nones of each month &c.

and as they were they that stood in election and sued for dignities of magistracy: during which time, they wore whiter and brighter gowns than ordinary, that they might be the more easily seen and discerned a far off among others.

caprati, as well horse as foot, were they that were armed at all peeces with compleat harness: and such horsemen were named Dr- fensores.

scapulis, were engines of war to shoot arrows or such like offensive weapons, far off: and by that name was called not only the instrument it self, but the arrow or whatsoever was shor out of it: as Turneb. writeth in his 15 Adversar. cap. I.

Senators, Magistrates of State in Rome: whose charge was to value and estimate mens goods, and enrol them accordingly in their several ranges. Also to demise unto certain Farmers, called Publicans, the publick profits of the City for a rent, and to put forth the City works unto them to be undertaken at a price. Likewise to oversee mens manners, whereby oftentimes they would deprive Senators of their dignity, take from gentlemen their honours of service and their rings; displace Commoners out of their own tribe, disable them for giving voices, and make them Ararii.

Centuries, were ranges and degrees of men according to their worth, as they were assessed and enrolled by the Censors.

Comitia, were those assemblies and elections, wherein the people of Rome gave their voices and suffrages, according to their behaviour & wealth, by Centuries. And such were at all times most favourable to the nobles.

circenses ludis (as one would say) Circu-enses. For in the beginning before the great lifts and shew-places (called Cirques) were built, the plot of ground wherein were performed the horie-runnings and other masteries, was flanked of the one side with the river, and environed on the other with swords, Vide Tur-neib. Advorlar. lib. 2. cap. 5.

Strophium, a piece of silver coin in Greece and those parts near adjoining, less than Drachma or Denarius : so called of the stamp, representing a man carrying a pincier, or casket with holy relics, in Cybele mysticis, in Bacchi oracles, or Cereris initiis. It is true, that 7500 of them go to the Euboick talent, which containeth 4000 Denarii; it is just our great sterling : but it Denarius have proportionally less quantity to it, and that 4 Denarii are 5 ciltophors, (as Glaucan collecteth out of Budam) it cometh to our treston of 6 pence maxima, supposed to be the image of Venus, found by K. Titius in the great vault or sink conveyed under the city, called Cloaca maxima. And for that it was not known what goddess it resembled, he gave it the name of that place. Others say it is written Chacina, of the old word Cusio to fight: for that the Romans and Sabins (ready to strike a battail) were by means of myrtle branches consecrated unto Venus, pacified and reconciled, in that very place where afterwards the said goddess was by that name worshipped.

temptionalis senex, Pallius Mannius upon the familiar Epistles of Cicero, giveth this attribute to Scaptius in the end of the third book of Lucy, whereas in all editions it is, Concionalis. Now these Coenptionales senes (saith he) were those old men, in whose tuition and authority, men by their last will and restament left their widows or daughters; and without whom they might not pass in Dominum virorum per coemptionem, i. be married according to the ceremony called Coemption, whereby the husband and wife seemed to buy one another.

Cobors, was ordinarily a band of 500 souldiers; although once or twice in Livy we read of Quadragesima cobortes.

Comitium, was a publick place or Hall within the Forum Romanum, where the people used to assemble for audience of justice, pleading of causes, and other occasions: whereupon Comitiales dies, were such daies upon the which they might to assemble and meet together.

Comitia, or Comices, were the solemn assemblies of the people at Rome, summoned by the magistrates lawfully; to choose officers, to enact new laws or cancel old, by their voices: whereof were three sorts.

Curia, instituted by Romulus. Centuriata, by S. Tullius. Tribuna, brought in by the Tribuns of the people: and the first author thereof was P. Volero.

Curia and Comitium, were Ausplicia, performed with the solemnity of observing the approbation of the birds, and the Senators, Tribuna, were held by the Commons only penes quos non erant auspicia, and required neither Auspicia nor autoritas comi., the allowance of the Patres. And as in Comitum Comitatus, the richer and greater men had the vantage; so in Curia and Tribuna, the poorer sort (for their number) went away with the better.

In the Comitia curiata, at the first (until S. Tullius his reign) passed the election of KK, and other magistrates, judgements in capital matters, and laws. But in later times, they served only for two laws: i. de imperio, or de re militarium; in which the consul or others (chosen to their magistracy in Centuriis comitiis) had authority of command in the army: the other, de adoptione; and these laws were called Curiae.

In the Centuriata comitia, from the time of Sor. Tullius, passed the elections of consuls, Decemvirs, Tribuns consular, Censors, Prætors; and such greater magistracies; and confirmed they were by Curia. Also, judgment of capital matters, & the laws named Centuriata. In this, there was one centurie drawn forth by lot out of all the rest to give their voices first; and that was called Præ-rogativa. After which, were called to their suffrages, the Centuries of the first and second Classes; and they were named Præ-rogate: the rest which followed, were called Inter-rogate.

Tribuna, served for the creation of Tribuns, Ædiles of the Commons, and other inferior magistrats. Also the laws as touching peace, or enfranchising allies, judgments penal and fines: and those ordinances concerning the good of the Commons, called Plébiscita. Some have thought *amili*s and Curiata and Tribuna comitia, were both one: but Curiata were more ancient, and of greater state as being Antipater, and exanthoritate Patruus. Herein only they agreed together and differed from the Comenstrata, that in delivering their voices, the Tribes and Curie were intermingled: whereas the Centuries were sorted and gave their voice according to their degree, age, and ability in the Censors book. Congius, or Chus. A measure among the Romans containing 6 Scattarii, and every Scattarius about 20 ounces: so that Congius receiveth X. libras mensuras: as appeareth by the old pourtrait thereof in brals, with these two characters, X. P. i. ten pound. Whereby in round reckoning it may go for our wine gallon or somewhat better. And for that great persons were wont at first to give dole unto the common people, of wine or oil by the Corgii: all other donatives and largesses of that kind, were afterwards called Congruaria. Consul, one of the two foreign yearly magistrates in Rome, succeeding in the place of K.K. so named, a Consulendo either of asking counsel of the people and Senate in State matters, and withal giving his own advice, and providing for the good of the weal-publick: or else of judging, for so Consules signifyeth: as when we say boni consules. And Lexy faith, that Prætor, Consules, and Judices, may be taken one for another. Two of them were usually chosen every year, as appeareth by the law of the 12 Tables: Regio imperio suo fuisse: itaque prædando, Judicando, Consulendo, Prætoris, judicis, Consulis, appellatoris, &c. Corona, hath divers significations in Lexy. Corona mureti cingens, to invest a City round about with armed men, and to give the assault from all parts at once. Sub Corona vendere servos, to sell slaves in open market, either having garlands on their heads, as the manner was: or environed about with a gaud of fouldiers, which also is called Corona militum. Sundry garlands or chaplets there were moreover, called Corona, wherewith fouldiers were rewarded by their captains, or they honored by their fouldiers: (besides those that were presented to Generals by their friends and well-willers, or offered to the honour of the gods): as Obisidionalis or Graminea, which was a wreath of a caich grafs called Gramen, given to him that delivered an army from a siege, and was by the whole army bestowed upon that savior. Croica, made of oak branches, for him that in battel saved the life of his fellow citizen. Muralis, resembled the battlements of walls: which be received of his captain, that first scaled the walls and mounted over, in the assault of cities. Cæstrensis, in form of a palliade or rampier made with pales or strong stakes: the honor of him who first entered the enemies camp. Navalis or Refrata, pountiured with the Rems or beak-heads of ships, called Reffa: his reward that first boorded the enemies ship, and gave the first meane of a naval victory: These were the principal. For, others there were not so ordinary, as namely, Exploratoria garnished and set out with the lion, moon, and other stars; bestowed upon them that did special service in epical and discovery of the enemies quarters.

Curia, were parishes in Rome; 30 in number, instituted by Romulus. Certain halls besides, appointed for assemblies and convocations about Church matters and Religion; whereof some were old, called simply Curia; others new, named Novæ. As for Curia Hostilia, this was the ordinary ancient place of public council within Rome.

Curia, the Priest belonging to each Curia by parish aforesaid; and Curia Mex., the chief superintendant over them all.

D. Decius, a forename: for Decius, although it were the gentile name of a house, grew afterwards to be a forename, as Paulus: and likewise forenames at the first, came to name families, as Posthumus.

D. Decimus, a forename likewise, as of that Brutus surnamed Albinus, who killed Cæsar.

Decemviri, were magistrates, officers, or fellowships, ten in number.

Decemvirs legibus scribendis, were ten men chosen to make laws in Rome: who afterwards usurped the sovereign authority, and tyrannized.

Decemviri sacrorum, were certain Priests, who had the keeping and perusing of Sibyls books of destinies, and thereout gave order for sacrifices and expiation of prodigies.

Decemviri; ten Judges or ministers of Justice, selected out of the great court or counsel of the 100 Centumvirs, and they were called, Decemviri de litibus judicandis: assistant they were to the Pretor or L'chief justice.

Dictator, a sovereign magistrate above all others in Rome, from whom no appeal was granted, mere absolute and King-like: but that his time of rule was limited within fix months ordinarily: so named, either because he only said the word and it was done, or because he was Dictus, i. nominated only by one of the Comitia, and not otherwise chosen, usually in some time of great danger of the State. He was called also Priester Maximus: and namely, when he was made for the ceremony of striking up or driving a nail: also Magister Populi, as Cicero 3 de fin. Moreover, he was sometimes appointed to ordain and hold solemn feasts, in regard that it had rained

DIVISIONS, magistrates two in number, of divers forts.

Decemviri capitales, judges to sit upon life and death: from whom it was lawfull to appeal to the people.

Dumoviri sacrorum, out of the Patricians, ordained for dedication of temple, preparing the sacred beds for the gods, called Leſiſterna; and for the books of Sibylla: theſe afterwards were increaſed to five, and ſorten. See Dumoviri.

Dumwiri Naales, two wardens of the navy ports, and sea-coasts.

E Epulones, were certain Priests whose office was to prepare and set out the solemn feast for winter called Epulum, and for other gods. Of them were three, called Triumviri Epulones, and after seven, Septemviri Epulones.

For the first time, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration (FDA) has approved a drug to treat the chronic pain associated with osteoarthritis. The drug, called milnacipran, is a selective serotonin-norepinephrine reuptake inhibitor (SNRI) that has been shown to be effective in treating chronic pain in clinical trials. The FDA's approval of milnacipran is a significant milestone in the treatment of chronic pain, as it is the first SNRI to be approved for this purpose. Milnacipran is a prescription drug that is taken orally. It is approved for the treatment of chronic pain associated with osteoarthritis in adults. The drug is not approved for the treatment of acute pain or for the treatment of pain associated with other conditions. Milnacipran is a selective serotonin-norepinephrine reuptake inhibitor (SNRI) that works by increasing the levels of serotonin and norepinephrine in the brain. These neurotransmitters are involved in the regulation of pain, and increasing their levels can help to reduce pain. Milnacipran is taken orally, usually twice a day. The most common side effects of milnacipran are nausea, constipation, and dry mouth. Other side effects include dizziness, headache, and fatigue. Milnacipran is contraindicated in patients who are taking monoamine oxidase inhibitors (MAOIs) or who have a history of MAOI use. It is also contraindicated in patients who are taking other SNRIs or who have a history of SNRI use. Milnacipran is a prescription drug, and it should be used only under the supervision of a healthcare provider. It is important to follow the instructions of your healthcare provider when taking milnacipran. If you experience any side effects or if you have any concerns about your treatment, contact your healthcare provider. Milnacipran is a promising new drug for the treatment of chronic pain associated with osteoarthritis. Its approval by the FDA is a significant milestone in the treatment of chronic pain, and it offers a new option for patients who are struggling with this condition.

Plutarch were the Heracles, of whom there was a College, to the principal of them was Phylarchus, as it were their Dean; and according to Plutarch he ought to be a man that had children of his own, and his father living; for having the charge of making peace and alliances, he believed that he should be a person accomplished, and as well to look before as behind ἐμπροσθεν καὶ ὀπίσσω, to regard what is past and what is to come; the one was signified by his father, the other by his children.

Falsi signifieth sometimes falso dicere, holidaies; and in that sense Quod est with his books Falsi, wherein he sheweth down the ordinary feales of every month. Otherwhiles they are put for law-dates, wherein the L. chief iudice or Pretor might use these three words, De, Dies, Actio, which broken to give leave to the party for to plead, to minister law and justice between plaintiff and defendant, and to pronounce the sentence and award.

Flamines, certain Priests among the Romans: they took that name of Filamen, a flet of wollen yarn, that they used to wear upon their heads. Three of them there were Patruini, and those were called Majores, namely, Dialis, for the service of Jupiter. 2. Maritalis, of Mars. 3. Quirinalis, or Romulus deified. Of Commoners were 12 more, called Minores, deputed to inferior charges, and the meanest of them all attended the service of Pomona the goddess of apples and such fruits.

Fortune a great goddess in Rome, entitled with many and sundry names.

For Fortuna, a goddess of Rome, whose temple was in Transfibrina region, where she was honored & worshipped of idle persons, such as professed nothing, but lived of their rents only, and namely, for that she came unlooked for and undeserved.

Fortune is a goddess, whose fortune is called for her power, especially in battail. Publicus, when she favoured the common-wealth, Mascula, good to the male kind, and Masculus to the female, Veritas, kind to folk of ripe years. Primigenia, the first begotten or the eldest. Eques, either for running to help with great speed or assitant in horie-service. Obsequens, pleiable and easily entered to accomplish all their vows and desires. Pervus, for advancing mean and obscure persons to wealth and worship. Scia, for the kind and seasonable ripening of corn and fruit. Pro-

ferra, which was alwaies present and vouchsafed her helping hand, Mala, when contrary-wife she was backward and evermore crossed their designs, Vilcaua, for that many one hath been by her enticements inured & entangled, Rudus, Ingrate, Bene Speranti, Respectui, Prompti, Ire, Cruce, Conuerſioni, Gratiæ even yett et genui, Ecce Phryxæ &c See Alexander at Alexandro, Martian.
Forma, Kommunion, or Lentum, The great common place at Rome, wherein causes were pleaded, and audience given to publick Orators, Under the name of Fogyn were other places also called courts, as also markets, distinguished by their proper names, as Forum Crutium, Olearium, &c.
Fogyn, Whereof slaves were called Fugifera, Was a kind of fork or gibbet which slaves fastned upon their shoulders when they were scourged by their masters, Either about the Foras or Cirkle whereupon afterwards they were crucified and executed: howbeit, some think they bare it only for a publick shame.

G The following are the names of the persons who have been appointed as members of the Board of Directors of the Corporation:

Gabinus cinctus was a kind of habit and wearing of a gown after the Gabines fashion, when it was cast over the shoulder to backward; that it seemed to compais and gird round the whole body. In that manner the Consul clad, used solemnly to set open the doores of Ianus Temple, before he went to the wars.

Geniti, Genil were supposed to be mutarii and pararii, brokers (as they were) between men & the gods, or rather Interpreters and Salutigeri, messengers between, of a middle nature betwixt the one and the other, Cicilius Rhodigin. lib. 2. chap. 3. But according to Empiriodactes, each one was thought to have his angel from the very day of nativity, unto whom they used to sacrifice upon their birth day, as to their protector. Also every place had their peculiar Geniti, and then were they called Lares, as Rurales, and penurini in Livy.

Galli, Priests of Cybele that gilded themselves in a frantike fury, and used in their service to her, for to strike and beat upon tabers and drums.

H

H Alta, Besides the ordinary signification, signifieth the Centumviral or Decemviral jurisdiction in supply or assistance of the Prætorian, for that they set up a sear to be seen at the place of judgement. Also it becometh post-fide, when they fold either goods or slaves to him that would bid most at such a sear. Moreover, the putting forth of the Cities works, called * Uro prima, to certain Publicans or undertakers by the sear, at a price, and it was called Subbæstatio.

IANUS is a God in Rome, sometime represented Bi-front with two faces, signifying the time passed, and that to come: otherwile Quadrifrons, & betokeneth the four times of the year having in his right hand a character resembling 300, in the left another, shewing threehundred and five, according to the days of the year. But in the plural number Iani, betoken certain hills or great foursquare buildings, with four prospects and cross thoroughfares, whereof were divers in Rome.

Ian, Eight daies in every month of an old word Iano, to divide: for that they commonly fall about the midst of the month, namely, upon the thirteenth or sixteenth daies, according to Plinius, Iano ubi sunt agende, qui dies mensium Penetrant maribus, sicut Aprilis.

Interdict of water and fire, were they who for some time were banished. Which judgement, although it was not by express sentence pronounced, yet by giving order, that no man should receive such an one into his house, but deny him fire and water (the two necessary elements of life) he was condemned; as it were to a civil death: and this was called Legitimum exilium. But voluntary exile was, when a man to avoid the payment of a grievous fine, or imprisonment, went out of the way of his own accord, and left his native country.

Ingratus, which commonly I translate Acid, seemeth among the Romans, to bein measuring of land the Basis, ground, and foundation of all other measures in that kind: like as, the As is Assis, of weights: of which it borroweth the terms in sub-division and multiplication, whereof the least is Semifcrupulum. Now is the Scrupulum in land measure sixteen foot square, according to which, it may soon be gathered, how much Ingratus containeth; considering it hath that name, a divisus altitudo juncit: by which reckoning it beareth 28800 foot of ground within the square. But for that, others think that Ingratus is almost as unusquisque solum suo die exarari potest, one daies work of a yoke or team of oxen: for want of another fitter word (except I would call it a journey) I have expressed it by our familiar term of an acre, which is not much under or over a daies work in plowing of oxen here in England.

Interregnum, or Interregium, is properly the time between the former King deceased, and the creation of a new: and he that ruled in the mean space, was called Interrex. Which terms continued afterwards in the free state when there were no Kings, in the case of vacancy of head-magistrats.

H-S. This Character compounded of two capital I, and the letter S, thus coupled together, is Sesterius, that is to say, a silver coin among the Romans, consisting of two Aesses and an half, and thereupon it hath the name Sesterius, as a man would say, Semis tertius.

two, and half the third: and therefore you see the numeral note of two, and S for semis, which is half. It is the fourth part of the Roman Denarius, and in value amongeth us three half pence passing over. But Sesterium in the neuter gender, betokeneth almost as multa Sesteria, i. a thousand Sesteria: so that decem Sesteria signifieth ten thousand Sesteria, and decem Sesteria is as much: for you must in this matter of feet hundredfold millia for the regimen of the Genitive case. But if you add unto Sesterium the numeral adverb, it sheweth the same Sesterium in the neuter above said multiplied a hundred times: so much as the said numeral beareth. For example, decem Sesterium, is decem Sesteria, a hundred times told and as much to say as decem et sexcenta millia Sesteria, which is a million of Sesteria in the primitive signification: whereby a man may soon learn how much is millia Sesteria, and the rest either under or over decem. The same is to be said of Nummi and Nummi, for it is the same that Sesterium and Sesterium. Moreover, decem, millies, and such like adverbs: whether you put Nummi or Sesteria thereto, or no, is all one: so that by this form of speaking, quod bona sunt decem, is meant thus, his goods amounted unto two millions of Sesteria peeces. Thus much for Livy and other Historians and writers in prose: for I am not ignorant that Poets for the verse like confound these two words many times, and put Sesteria for Sesteria, as Georgicus Agricola hath well observed.

Jupiter Indiges, Indigetes were these called, quia nullum rei indigent, because they need nothing, or quasi indices agentes, i. converting among the Gods, having been sometimes men: or by reason that they might not indigere, i. be named; of rather for that they were easy to be entreated and last of all, quasi in loco degenet et ideo propitii, i. the tutel gods and protectors of this or that place: which I rather encline unto.

Iustinus, was the stay of civil jurisdiction and pleas for the time, upon some sudden troubles, as Tullius Gallus &c. Which vacation, if we will be somewhat bold, may be called not unfully a Lawfeed, as Sestius the Sun-feed.

K. Kaim, } The forename of many Romans.

L. Lacius, } The forename of many Romans.

Latina sc. feria, Certain holydaies Conscripti, appointed by the Priest or Magistrate, as occasion required, and nor let feasts. The solemnity was published and held by the Roman Consuls newly created, upon the mount Albanum to Jupiter Latiaris: and a sacrifice there there offered which they call Latus, for the health of the Latine people: at which, the manner was to give a dole of flesh called Viscerum to the Latine States.

Lechthemia is in some sort declared in the first and fifth and twenty books of T. Livius, and is as much to say, as the solemn ceremony of stripping and leaving out a bed, not for repose but repul, according to the ancient manner: wherein they laid the images of their gods, reared upon bolsters and pillows: the principal whereof was that in the honour of Jupiter at the Epulum Jovis, whereupon Jupiter was laid Juno and Minerva sitting of either side by him.

Levis is usually to be understood in Livy for the bed: whereupon they laid themselves at ease when they took their recreation, and Levis is taken for Conclavia, i. the parlour where they were wont to lye, because the usual manner was to set three such beds or pallets together: (whereof the room had the name) and a table raised somewhat higher from the floor, and placed so, as it served all three pallets, and was open at one side for the servants to come unto it, and either set meat thereupon, or to minister what was called for. Upon each of these beds there sat or leaned ordinarily three persons: so as nine was the full number of guests at the board, according to the rule, Non fewer than the grapes, nor more than the mistles. For Horace in this verse, Sape tribus lectis videtur canere quatruor, seemeth to glance at the nigardie of that would rather want meat than guests, and so set twelve at the table which was but for nine, whereby also they were pent up together too strait.

Legati, are usually taken for Embassadors sent from one Prince or State to another. Also for Lieutenants in an army, having the charge of a legion under the General, and in his absence, the charge and command of all. Who likewise were sent as Nuncios or messengers of credence from the Generals in the field, to make true report unto the Senat, of the success of their affairs. Moreover, they are oftentimes put for deputed-delegates, or commissioners assistant to the Cos, or L. General, in matters of state: having their principal directions from the Senat, but commission to deal in the particulars after their own discretion: much like to those that be called Legati à latere.

Libitina, the goddess of funerals: and after a sort, the superintendent over sepultures: supposed to be Venus Epiymbia. In whose Temple were all things to be sold necessary for the interring and burial of the dead. Whereupon they also who were employed to carry forth and bury corpses, were called Libitinarii: as well as Vespillones: in Greek νεκροφύται and καταδολοι. It is put for death in Horace, when he saith, Non omnis moritur, vivasque peris mei, Vita'm Libitiniana: and in Livy, as well for the ministers as furniture to sepultures belonging. The Chappel to this goddess stood without the City, and a gate there was Libitinensis, at which they carried forth their dead. For at Rome they might not commonly bury or burn a dead corpse within the City, unless it were upon a special privilege: and the law of 12 tables provided therefore in these express words, In urbe non sepelito nec uris: but in some barren part of their land, each man bestowed the ashes or bodies of their dead. The practise whereof is evident by many examples in histories; and at this day are monuments standing of their tombs reared near the great caule Appia, and elsewhere about Rome. The consideration hereby, with some other circumstances of a place in the 3 book of Livy, gave me occasion haply to translate amiss. There hapned to be a great mortality in Rome and the territory about it not only of men but of cattle also: at what time as the Volcians and Æquians were encamped within three miles of Rome, with a purpose to give the assault to the City: but they were suddenly stricken with a fear that they durst not approach: neque, tellusque procul visa atque imminentes tumuli acciterent mentes curas &c. where I have Englished imminentes tumuli, tombs & graves near at hand, in opposition of tellus arida (Romane) procul visa: and the rather, because it presently followeth, In deserto agro, inter tabern perarum atque hominum: where tumuli, may well be put for tombs and monuments: and imminentes near at hand: as Livy and others do take those words. But if any man would have it meant rather of the 7 hills of Rome commanding and overlooking those houses aloft said, I will not be against it, but rather my Jurisperiti shall go with him: and pardon me I hope he will, if either there or elsewhere I have seemed to nod and take a little nap, Nimisque opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum: seeing that I have taken my rest in the manner, and not slept until my neighbour awaked me.

Libitina in Livy are ministers or sergeants attending upon the magistrats of Rome: namely, Dictators, Consuls, Pretors: for those only were called sometime magistrats ad libitina, as superior to the rest: so called (as Festus thinketh) quod fasces virgineum ligatos ferant, for that they carried rods tied up in bundles: which rods were of birch, willow, hazell, or the Cyprian-tree, [a kind of Plane or Maple] and within them stuck an axe, all to signify whipping and death. These officers made way before those magistrats, and were ministers also of the execution.

Lituus was the Augurs staff, much like a bishops crozier, crooked at the end.

M. Agister Equitum, Master or general of the horsemen. This was an office or dignity among the Romans, incorporate as it were in the Dictator alone, who ever had the absolute naming and choosing of him: and ordinarily daily he was subject to him, howsoever Manlius was by strong hand and a violent course of the people made equal to Q. Fabius his Dictator. Commander he was under him of the Cavalry: also his Lieutenant-general and coadjutor with him in all executions. The same that Triumvir eternus in the time of the K.K.

M. Marcus.

M. with the note of A. The forenames of postrophes, Manlius, certain Romans.

Manlius, in an army, was at the first a petty company of ten souldiers following one javelin having a whip of herbs or hay fastned to the upper end, as a man would lay; an handful of men: used after, for a small band or Squadron of souldiers: and Manipulars were they termed, who served in one such Manipulus.

Mania, otherwise called Lentulus or Leo, the daughter of Cadmus. Into her temple, at the time of her solemn feast, might no maid serve as an erker: and if any did, they were sure to be beaten forth by the dames or wives there assembled: in remembrance of one Amphigenia, the chamber-maid of Leo, with whom her husband Athenas, as she thought, was more familiar than she liked well of.

Megalops, were plaies or games at Rome, not (as the later seemeth to import) Magni, which were Romani, but in the honour of Cybele the goddess, named also Ida, Magna mater, the great mother of the gods.

Milia decem milium annis grave, &c. Was no doubt, a fine of brass in money set upon a brass head, after the weight of so much: every As weighing a lb. of 13 ounces. For before that silver was cast and stamped for coin, As grave plastra ad stratum corvebant (as Livy saith) when they paid tribute or subsidy to the City chamber, as they were assessed.

Mundus Mulieris, the Elegancy of women. Nam quæ ætate Græci nomine ornamentis appellaverunt, cum non perfectæ ætatis quæ ætatis in mundum, the world, Plus, first book fourth chapter.

Muræa or Murina, one of the names attributed to Venus, opis in præter modum, non movetur sed faceret benevolentiam muræam, i. ut in de deus opis & muræa is contrary to that other goddess Aphrodite, qua ad opem excelsam, and hereupon it is that Muræa is put for the goddess of flesh and lickeness.

N

Nopæabula, was an enactment proposed in favour of debtors at Rome, whereby the old debt-books and obligations were cancelled, or the Nemina dashed out. Among the Athenians this practice was called Sisychia, an easing of burden, or Choregia, a carrying off for striking but of debts.

N. Numerius, a forename to some houses of Rome.

Nundina, were the market daies appointed every thirtieth day at Rome, for the pleasures of the country to repair unto the City, to sell commodities or to buy their necessities. And hereupon Triumviri, in the space of 49 daies, comprehending three market daies, Nundæ, were daies in the month so called, because they began the 5th day after before the Ides: honored by the Romans both for the birthday of K. Servius, and also for the chasing out of the K.K. for otherwise it was not lawful (as Ovid saith) Nundæ in Italia Deo sacre.

O. Veneris Ovis, were eggs set upon the poles in the solemnity of the most sumptuous of the plaies Circenses, to reckon or score up (as it seemeth by Livy) the races; which were performed with 24 courses to represent four and twenty hours of the day. Neither was it for naught, that those were made of eggs, rather than other things: for as eggs are laid by birds (the swiftest of all other living creatures) so they also were to contend and strive to be most active, &c. or else because Cassio & Pallus (those renowned horsemen) came to an egg, as Poets saith.

P

P. Publius, a forename to some Roman families.

Pandulium or Pandulak, was a solemn diet or council, wherein all the states of Ætolia assembled to consult of publick affairs.

Patres, were at Rome 100 Senators or Noble men, counsellors of state: chosen in this manner: 3 out of every one of the 30 Curia, and those make 90: 3 more out of each tribe, (which then were but three) and one by Romulus himself: and as this number made the body of the Nobility or Sena as the first to, out of every Curia, he chose ten of the most honorable and active young men, to the number of 300, (which he called Cleues) to guard his person. From whence came the order of the knights or gentlemen of Rome; men a degree between the two titles of Nobles and Commons; as it were the seminary, to replenish the Sena, when the places were void, and to augment the number of them. These were called Patres Conscripti, Alfipis, & Scelti. And like as the former were named Patres Majores gentium: so the latter sort, Minores gentium: alluding to the several ranges of the gods, who were some of them, Majorem gentium, such as ever were counted in heaven: termed also Scelti: others, Minorem gentium, who had been men, and were after canonized gods. [The off spring and progeny of the Patres, were Patruus, in opposition evermore of Platius, Commons.

Porticus, were either the porches & other stately buildings before temples, as belonging unto them: or else goodly galleries and walking places apart by themselves: under which men rested in the rain, and where they used to walk to cool themselves in summer.

Præda,

Præda, booty, pillage, or sackage in the own kind, as it was gotten from the enemy, to wit, slaves, prisoners, beasts, goods, armor, &c. Manniba, the money raised of such pillage or prey, sold.

Pretor, one of the superior magistrats of Rome. In the City he ruled as L. chief justice: in the province he commanded as L. governor and deputy: and was General in the field as well as the Consul. At first, the name of Consul, Pretor, and Judges, was all one.

Prægrævia centuriæ, were those centuries in Comitia Centuriatæ, which by lot had the first place in giving their voices: the rest that followed, were called Primo-vocata and Inter-vocata, and delivered their suffrages in their course.

Prætexta toga, a robe embroidered of purple, common to men and women, Ingenium fulgens, & ornamentum. Cicero in Perrem, 3. Whereby it appeareth, that it was allowed but to certain persons: and, as P. Manlius writeth, to 6 sorts.

1 The children of the Paritii, until 17 years age. 2 All Senators upon festival daies. 3 Wardens at the games or plaies called Campialitii. 4 All magistrats, as well in the City, as in the colonies or borough Towns incorporate, called Municipia, and Masters of Confraternities. 5 All Priests, and among them, the Augurs. 6 They that triumph, And this differed from the rest, being wrought with gold and damask work.

It seemeth that these differed likewise one from the other, in the manner of the guarding: laid broader or narrower: as also in the rich or deep colour, whereupon they were called Di-lappra: or that some of these robes were all one purple, other but parcel. And whereas the gentlemen of Rome are said Porpurati and indivisi, it is to be understood either of angust-clavus, or else of some lighter colour, as the violet, and not of that rich red purple, which is scarlet. For that robe which was done upon our Saviour Christ, * one of the Evangelists called scandilus, and other two, supplex.

Pullarius, the Chick-masser or pullitier: one that had the charge and overseeing of the sacred chickens, kept in a pen or coop for auspicia: who by observing their gesture or feeding becomes every morning, related what was foretold thereby good or bad. See more in Auspicia.

Pro-consul, Some have thought, Pro-consule. Pro-pretor, that they should be Pro-petore. Pro-questor, Quintus otherwise thus, Pro-questor, but they are in misde opinion out of the way: for in deed Pro-consul is he, who having bin Consul, went out of his magistracy at the years end, and nevertheless was sent forth unto his Province again with full Consular authority: whereas Pro-consule to speak precisely is the Viz-consul namely, one that having never been Consul created, but some private person, yet upon an urgent occasion, might for the while supply the place of the Consul. The same is to be said of the rest. And hereof you may read in the oration of Cicero, pro lege Manilia. Howbeit in my translation of Livy, I have sometime used Viz-pretor and Viz-consul, for Pro-pretor and Pro-consul: because that manner of composition frameth well with our terms in English. Moreover, we read once in Livy of a Pro-dictator, in the proportionable signification to the other.

Quadrigati, were the Denarii Romani, having the stamp of a chariot drawn with four horses, called Quadrifa.

Quadrans, a peece of base brass coin or poise at Rome, the fourth part of As, which is a cue and a c.

Questors, were inferior officers in Rome, as treasurers to receive and lay out the City-mony, whereof there were Urbanis, Provinciales, and Cæsarienses.

Quæstorium, a plot or quarter in the Roman camp, where the treasurer lodged and other officers of the camp.

Q. Quintus, the forename of sundry Romans. Quindecenviri, the same that Quindecimviri first, and Decemviri sacris faciendis. Their number was 15, and albeit they were encreased by Sylla Dictator to 60, yet they retained still the name of Quindecenviri.

Quintana was a gate in the Roman camp, at which provision was brought in to serve the market. Read the annotation in the end of English Tacitus.

Quingenviri Mensarii, were certain men, five in number, appointed upon occasion to discharge the debts of the commons, so called of Mensa, a table set out in publick place: upon which they either counted or weighed their mony.

Quingenviri muris refectendis, were five officers at Rome chosen extraordinarily for repairing of the walls and turrets of the City.

Quinquaginta or Quingentarii were certain sea-fights and games at Rome in the honor of Minerva. They continued five daies; and began the fifth day after the Ides of March, i. the 20 of March: and these were called Quingentarii Majores. For others named Minores, fell about the Ides of June, and that was the mintless holiday, as appeareth in the ninth of Livy.

Quintilis, the month of July, before Julius Cæsar time.

Quirinalia, was a festival day to Quirinus, appointed for them to sacrifice, who had neglected or missed to do divine service in their parish at the feast Fornacalia: and it was called the fools holiday: for that they were ignorant of the time of the former feast, or knew not their own Curia.

Quiritæ, the name appropriate to the citizens of Rome: and so they loved to be called within the City: but in the camp, if the General gave them that term, it was taken for a great disgrace unto souldiers and men of arms.

R Crast, were light armed footmen, resembling our footmen: so called à crast, i. Dew. For like as there falleth commonly a drizzling dew before a good thour of rain: so these Rorarii skirmished looly, before the legi- onary footmen came to the battail.

Rorarii, were three-tined pikes of bras, jet in the nose or beak-head of war-ships, to offend the enemy, as appeareth by Piræis, Rorarii, tridentibus: and thereupon by Synedoches, the stems of ships were so called. And for that the publick puppet for orations at Rome, was reared and adorned with fuch, it also was called Rorarii.

Rudra, Qui militat religione salti rudra, i. acer- reus. To make sense of this place, I have translated Rudra, peeces of bras money: for that I cannot see what should be meant by rubbish stone in that place, which was not demolished by Annibal, for any thing that I can find: but only robbed of the silver & gold within the chappell of Perona: in stead where- of were found arsa acerbis by reason that the soldi- ers, who had some len- of religion & touch of conscience (whereof their leader Annibal had never any) cast from them Rudra. Now, probably it is that Rudra, is cor- ruptly put for arsa, the later end of the word: or if we admit Rudra it is well known that Rudra as well as arsa signifieth bras and bras money, as appeareth by Rudra, the di- minutive: for as of arsa came arsulum, so of Rudra (no doubt) Rudra: luna and like as of arsulum, arsa luna, a god of the Painims, father of Arge: luna (because copper & bras money was before silver coin): so of Rudra, luna, the gate Rudra luna in Rome, set out with bras. Now that Rudra luna is put for a small pece of bras coin, it is proved by the form of words in hymns and telling, and in manumission, Rudra luna luna luna luna luna which is all one with arsa luna luna luna luna luna by which I collect that Rudra in this place may stand for arsa, peeces of coin. For there went arsa, arsa arsa, which Horace putteth for heaps of bras money, and not for brasen im- ages. And well it may be that the soldi- ers upon some devotion threw into the Church their oblations of such money as they had in their belts or bandoliers. This conjecture & construction of mine may serve, until some- what here may be made of rubbish stone, or better expoi- ion come in place. The word (I am sure) will bear it, and the context in all sense and congruity, doth require it.

S Altare Deo, after a devout and reverent manner they bowed unto the Idols or gods of the heathen as they passed by, and withal, touched their hands: which Lucretius sheweth in these verses,

Tum portas proper, aliena signamans, dextra ostendunt attenuari. Sape saluantur, salti praterque manuum. Scleratus Vicius, a street in Rome named before- time Cyprius, which in the Sabine language signifieth [good]: but upon occasion of a wicked act committed therein, it was by the contrary, called Scleratus. Seestium, was a general instruction and revolt of the commons in Rome, wherein they left the City, until such time as they had the au- thority of their Tribuns strengthened and con- firmed: yea, and certain laws enacted and established by a solemn oath, with a curse denounced to all them that went about to abrogate or abolish the same: which there- upon were called Saceria leges.

Sex, Sextus, Sergius, Sall, forenames to Ro- Serv, Servius, S mans Sextilis, the month of August, so called by the Romans before Augustus Caesar his daies, for that it was the sixt in number: as Quintilis the sixt, beginning at March, Sextura, 97. 9. In Inventum graffatum in Sa- berra. It might well be that yonkers there made a fray or committed some riot and felony: for it was a street most of all others re- quented, and besides, in it kept stumpets and curtisans, like enough to give occasion of much quarrel & misuse among youth, as ap- peareth by Iuven. I and Marialis in this Dis- tinction.

Fama non nimium bona, prelle, Quales in media sedet Sabura. Suffragii, were the voices of the people given by Centuries, Curie, or tribes, which in Rome went affirmatively under this form, Hiis- gati, be it according to your bill: and nega- tively thus, Antiquo, I deny or reject it. Sordidati, were they that changed their weed in reatu, i. (whiles either themselves or their friends were in trouble and danger of judg- ment) that is to say, put off white which was the ordinary colour, and did on black: but if they changed their apparel upon sorrow and mourning for the loss of friends or any pub- lic calamity, they were called rather Pul- latus and Atratus.

Sella Curulis, a seat or chair of estate. One of the regal ornaments at Rome, belonging to the Kings first: afterwards, during the free state, used by Dictators, Consuls, Pro-consuls, Pre- tors, and Propretors, Censors and Ediles, na- mely those called curules, for distinction from those that were Plebeian and last of all, by the emperors in the time of the monarchy. This chair was made of Ivory: on which the a- bove said magistrats usually sat, not only in the Senat-house when they consulted or gave au- dience, or when they beheld the publick games & plays, & rode either in triumph, or other- wise in the streets mounted upon their Cha- riots: but also at home within their private houses, & wheresoever else it pleased them: & this badge or ensign of honor they had both in time of their magistracy, & afterwards: & as such, Senators were called, Curules, (for the rest, who had not attained to those dig- nities, they named Pedales, as some think, for that they went on foot to the Senat or places before mentioned) so these magistrats like- wise above said, were entituled by the name of Curule, And Curulia was that chair called either of Curia a chariot, for that they sat thereupon within their chariots; or, quasi Curia, because it was made crooked or curb- wise, like unto our folding chairs.

Senator, A Counsellor of state. A name it was of honor, and not of age: as the word implieth: for to that place men attained often times very young. Senat was the body of that degree and common Council, opposite unto Plæti at Rome, namely, when it was biecta and the whole people comprehended under Senatus ordo and Plæbeius. Senarius, a small brazen pece of money at Rome, which being the sixt part of As, cometh to a cue or half a farthing.

Sextarius was the Basis of measures in Rome, as As of weight: and look how As was divided into twelve ounces, so Sextarius into twelve cyathi, and in measures Sextans was the sixth part of Sextarius, which weighed twenty ounces, much about a winepint and a half a- mong us.

Of Sibylls, books so often mentioned in Livy, which being three in number, were bought of Sibylla by King Tarquinius the proud, at the price of nine, after the had burned six of them before his face: which books were kept dili- gently in the Capitol: and whereout the De- cemvirs by their learning made report of the will and pleasure of the gods, See A. Grævus, 1 book 29 chapter.

Sigillum, was the general name of all the ensigs in the field. But Aquila more particularly was the main standard to a whole legion: so cal- led, for that upon the top of a spear was reared and fastened an Eagle in silver at full re- lief, and the same sometime was gilded stand- ing upon a base or footstall of the same met- tal. The other ensigs, as well of cohorts, which were bands of five hundred men usu- ally, as of centuries, companies of hundred, named more especially Vexilla, and were ge- nerally called Sigra, had the portraiture of Minotaures, wolves, bores, hories, dragons, with sundry other devices according to the fancy of the Colonels or captains, containing also the name of the cohort or Century, and the legion to which they belonged.

T Alentum Atticum, As well ponderale which was weighed, as numerate or nummarium, which was counted in money, was of two sorts: The less of sixty pound Attick, and eve- ry one of them consisted of a hundred Drach- me or Denarii Romani. If Mina then be three pound two shillings six pence, Sterling, the less Attick Attick amounteth to 187 pound ten shillings of our English money. The greater, or simply the great, talent, in Livy, is fourscore Mina, and hath proportion tri- ginta or Septuaginta, ad Mina, which com- eth to two hundred and fifty pound Ster- ling. Now was the Euboick talent (whereof Livy also speaketh) half of Talentum majus Atticum.

T. Titius, A forename to many houses of the Romans.

Tegula, A target-fence, which the legi onary Romans soldi- ers, made either in the open field when they were overcharged with their enemies, or in approaching the walls of Towns to give assault. In the former, after they had enclosed within them their bag- gage and light armed men, they rested them- selves upon their knees, with their targets close couched together over their heads, to avoid the enemies shot: and after they had well breathed they would rise up all at once again, fresh and lusty to a new skirmish. In the later, they had the like target-roof, but pent-house wise, one overlapped the other after the manner of tiles, and so they scaled walls without offence from above.

Templum hath in Livy three significations, 1. a sacred house or chappel dedicated to some god or goddess for divine service, as the temple of Jupiter in the Capitol &c. 2. An open place, from whence a man might see all about him, as having nothing to hinder his pro- spect, and which likewise might be seen from all parts, whereof cometh the verb contem- plari, i. to behold. And such did the Augurs chuse for to take their signs of bird-flight. 3. Any place hallowed, although not for di- vine service, yet for debating of serious hu- man affairs, as their Curie and Council- Chambers, yea, and the Rostra at Rome.

Thalasso, An Auspicate or lucky word used at Bridals or weddings in Rome, like to this among the Greeks, ὕδα ὁ ὑδάτος, ὁ ὑδάτος Hymen, O Hymen, hymen, &c. Catal, Thesfa, whereof Livy writeth in the fifth & ninth books, were certain petty chariots or dreyes of silver or ivory, carrying the images and ornaments of their gods in great pomp upon certain high daies: and they who led the hories drawing the same, wore their richest apparel, holding in their hands and training the false reins stretched out at length in so- lemn way, whereupon Festus thinketh they took the name Thesfa quasi Tenfa.

Trabea was a roial robe or mantle of estate, all of deep purple or scarlet only, at the first: but afterwards, embroidered richly with gold. Livy seemeth to confound it with Vestis pur- purea, Palla, Palmeta, and Triumphalis. And in truth, all one they were in the principal substance and matter thereof, namely, purple or scarlet: but different in the letting out, be- ing embroidered with gold, more or less, distinguished also with white among (for that was a roial colour) as may appear by the dia- dem, which was a white wreath, or band done about the head of Kings, or in the man- ner of the work: for either it was palmeta, so called called la mundaia clorum, i. of the broad bottoms of gold, ad infus puberum, to the breadth of ones hand, as Festus thinketh: or branched and damasked with flour-work, like to the date-tree: or elic pila, of tiffow or embroidery.

Tribuns of the Commons were certain Magistrats, as Provosts or Protectors of the Commons, to restrain and keep down the excessive power of the nobility: chosen and confirmed by the general oath of the people, whereby they were Sacrosancti, i. sacred or inviolable, and no violence might be done to their person. They had a negative voice and power of inhibition, called Intercessio, whereby they might cross and stop the proceedings of the Senat, or any magistrat, save only the Dictator: even the very Consuls, whom in some case they might command.

Tribuni military in Consuls authority, or Consulary governed the State of Rome many years in stead of Consuls.

Tribuni military in the army, were Colonels over a thousand.

Tribuni avari, were the keepers of the City chamber or common Treasury, as it were, the masters of the exchequer.

Tribus in Rome, first three, containing each of them ten Curia: but afterwards they were five and thirty, containing all the natural citizens of Rome.

Tribu moeris, was a kind of ignominy and disgrace, when a man was displaced by the censures out of his own tribe into another more base than it, and namely, Transfusa in urbanam of which urbana there were four, Suburrana, Esquilina, Palatina, and Collina: into which King Servius distributed those that were manumitted, and Rellus afterwards servitum urbem.

Tribunus capitalis. Three Judges deputed to sit upon life and death, touching felonious crimes. They were called also Quæstores pænalis, &c.

Tribunus Monetalis. Three officers for the mint of money, either brass, silver, or gold. They are represented in old coins by these five letters stamped thereupon, Æ. A. S. P. F. for ave, auro, argentei, flando, fortitudo: that is to say, for the melting, coining, and stamping of brass, silver, and gold. They were afterwards four in number, and named Quæstores.

Tribunus or Tresorarius nocturnus, Three overseers of the night-watch, for fire, &c.

Tribunus Mensuræ, Three Commissioners deputed for the time, and as occasion required, instead of bankers or treasurers to receive a stock of money, and to lay the same out upon extraordinary charges, as in the time of the second Punic war, when the City chamber was without money. Which stock was put into their hands out of private moneys, by way of a voluntary benevolence and contribution, as appeareth in the six and twentieth book of Livy.

Tribunus [Extraordinarius] Three likewise to levy soldiers and able men for to bear arms (without the usual order of matters) throughout Italy, upon some special occasion.

Tribunus salutis deducendis three commissioners who had authority to enrol new inhabitants into any colony: also to let out and divide the City lands gotten by conquest, at their discretion among them.

Tribunus also there were three, Wardens to oversee the sacrifices, the oblations and offerings to the Gods.

Turpillus, certain festival games instituted (as Festus saith) by King Turpinus the proud, for to pacify the infernal gods; upon occasion of a contagious malady that hapned to women great with child, endangering both them and those they went with: which stode upon the corrupt flesh sold abroad in the market of oxen and bulls, killed for sacrifices: whereupon the money employed about those solemnities, was called Turpitanum as.

Solennitas or Suavitatis, was a solemn sacrifice at the institution, review, or purging of the City every fifth year: and this was called Lustrum conditum. It was performed by killing a bull, a ram, and a bore. At which solemnity all that were able to bear arms, assembled in order of battail.

Triumphus, a solemnity in honor of them who have vanquished their enemies: so called, for that their soldiers rejoyced, Triumphus (as Varro thinketh) or of Triumphus for Triumphus: one of Bacchus names, the first invention thereof: or of Triumphus three voices: because it was granted by the suffrages of soldiers, Senators, and common people: as it may appear in Livy, by the triumph of L. Paulus Æmilius, who had like to have been disappointed thereof, by his own soldiers.

V

Venus Erycina, Ovid. A. P. 81. A scale unum colle tenet: the was so called of a promontory in Sicily, called Eryx, where there was a goodly temple built in the honor of Venus: and afterwards at Rome also in memorial thereof.

Versus Efeceus, certain licentious and lascivious songs, used among the Painims at wedding: the manner whereof, come first from the City Efeceus (as some think) or as others, Quia sacrum putabatur arces, because they were thought to have vertue to withstand witchcraft and sorcery.

Vestales virgines, were certain professed Nuns vowing virginity, who had the keeping of the sacred fire of Vesta. Nec tu aliud offas, quam parum intellige flammam, Ovid. This Vesta was brought from Troy with the image of Minerva, called Palladium, and other holy reliques.

Viro tributa, is, uxoribus, were certain City works, for which the censors did bargain with the Publicans or undertakers, at a price, Virtute.

Verbena although it signifieth a special herb, called Verbena, as, verven in English, and in Greek apocyon, because doves delight much to be above it: yet the word is attributed to divers other herbs put to holy use among the Painims, which are called Sagmina in Latine, and in Greek lysastra. But Discofides describeth one sort thereof which runneth by the ground, and groweth not so high as our vervin doth, and it seemeth to be that which the Physicians, Herbarists, and Apothecaries call Græven, uysch, in Greek dent de chien in French: and the colich gras in English: according to which saith Livy, Fa- ciat ex accipuram graminis herba atunlit, Vittorinus, guinarum nummus. A piece of Roman silver coin, half Denarius, and a double Sestertius, having the image of Victoria stamped upon it, either standing on foot crowned with a chaplet of bay, or else carried in a triumphal chariot drawn with four steeds, holding forth in her right hand the forelaid garland, as is to be seen in divers antiquities of coin.

Veteres signifieth a place in Rome called Petere: Curia in respect of Novæ, or certain shops called Argentaria of bankers, in regard of others also named Novæ.

A Table of all the Orations in Titus Livius, by way of division of the general into particular members, fitted for all sorts of speaking or writing, and digested according to the severall places of the three principall heads of all Causes in Oratory, to wit, the Deliberative, the Dimsionative, and the Judiciall.

To the High and Mighty Princefs, and his moſt Gracious LADY,

CHRISTINA,

By the Grace of God Queen of the SWEDES, GOTHs, VANDALS and the adjoyning Provinces.

Madam,

I bath happily ſaln out, that your wonderful Humanity and Learning, rarely to be found in ſo great a Majeſty, have given me advantage of omitting one of thoſe two ſubjects which uſually are the Contents of Dedicatory Epiſtles. For I have ſo many reaſons to declare why I preſent this Supplement to your Majeſty, that if I were forced likewise to declare the Argument of the Work, to what End, and in what Manner it is contrived, I could not accompliſh it without a long and tedious Epiſtle. But now thoſe Your two Virtues I mentioned, have freed me of this Neceſſity, ſeeing out of your Humanity you condeſcended to read the Work while it was in Compoſing, and by your Learning more fully underſtood, then I or any other could expoſund what was ſuperfluous, and what wanting in it. I will not therefore accuſe the meaneſſe of my Wit or Learning, or any other thing, that this my Deſign hath no more happily ſucceeded, (Let thoſe men pretend ſhortneſſe of time, multitude of buſineſſe or incommodities of ſickneſſe, who aim at other Glory beſides that of Obedience) it ſufficeth me, I am conſcious, that in writing this, I have obſerved the benefit of your Studies, and in making it Publick been Obedient to Your Will. For when in compiling the Relicks of LIVY's HISTORY, which at that time you diligently read, I had finiſhed this Work as a Bridge over a broken Paſſage, You were pleaſed (according to Your excellent and well known Goodneſſe) to expreſſe Your liking of my Endeavors; and, as Your Self thereby had reaped Benefit, ſo to judg them fit of Publick View, that others might likewise be profited by them. Wherein You maniſeſted both your Wiſdome and your Bounty: Your Bounty, in that what was ſolely intended for your own ſervice, you were willing ſhould be uſeful unto all: Your Wiſdom in that, in this new beginning and encrease of Learning, which by your example and Help the North doth greedily receive and happily improve, you have encouraged other men to exerciſe their Wit and Industry in publiſhing more Accurate and Learned Writings, when they ſhall have underſtood with how much Candor and Clemency You accept this rude and unpoliſhed Piece of mine. When therefore I ſee not only thoſe who are born unto your ſervice, but many alſo of ſtrange Nations moſt willingly entertain and execute your Commands: Should I at all be backward in my Duty, who, if not alone, yet amongſt a few of your moſt Faithful and neareſt ſubjects; am in a peculiar manner obliged by your Majeſty? I am indeed His who created all things, neither from any other do I expect a True and Lasting Felicity; neither do I bear a mind inferior to so great a Hope: But as to the Offices of this Life I am by him bestowed upon your Majesty, as by infallible Arguments, to your self not unknown, may be demonstrated. Wherefore my constant and resolved Rule of living (which, if I attain not unto, as I am willing and ought to do, yet I aim at and endeavour) is, to attend God's will only in those things which are expressly commanded or forbidden; in Actions indifferent and arbitrary to be guided by your Majesty alone; which I the rather strive to perform, because I know it is your Pleasure. And truly this were a sufficient tie of my Obedience and Reverence, if you had not otherwise both by your Virtues and Deserts obliged me, both which are so ample and of so effectual an Influence, that it is hard to say whether in Contemplation of them I am more willing to serve you, or for other Reasons more strictly bound to it. I find my self now involved in a very doubtful Case, and on both sides much perplexed: For if I say what I have intended, as my desire is, and as is Just and Right, I may happily not be relished by your Majesty, who do more freely exercise your Virtues, and faster your Favours, then willingly bear them repeated. And if in the Mention thereof I shall omit any thing, I shall fail in my Duty, and Detract from Your Praises, which (with as fervent a desire and good will as I prosecute them) had I liberty to expatiate, I could in no wise according to their Dignity set forth, much less being freightened within the narrow limits of an Epistle. Nevertheless I am confident, that the Temper of the business (which your self cannot disallow) is agreeable, as to the present purpose, so to both our Dispositions. For I abhor Flattery as doth your Majesty; neither am I more willing to speak any thing in such a strain, then Your self to hear it. And, according to your discerning Spirit, you are not ignorant that I am of this mind, that if it were in my choice whether to offend You in doing You Good, or please You by Flattery, I should without scruple chuse the former, which few Subjects can do and few Princes endure. Hinder not therefore my desires which cannot offend on that part: Give us leave to acknowledge what we have received; and if miserable men are freely allowed to complain, why should your Majesty forbid us modestly to boast of our Happiness under such a Prince as Your self? Neither ought this, the only Reward of your good Deeds, or the Fruit of our Thankfulness to perish; we then again a fresh receive benefits when we repeat them. But I see what is happened, whilest I beg leave to Write I loose both Time and Space. What therefore I am about to say, shall be into a few Periods digested, and I shall of every kind speak somewhat only in Summe. As to those your Virtues wherewith you have magnificently Adorned this Empire; that I may briefly declare what I think, I shall borrow a Sentence from our beloved Tacitus; in which Author, You know, Tiberius reproacheth C. Cæsar, That he had all the Vices of L. Sylla, but not so much as one of his Virtues: which may justly be inverted as to Your Majesty, that You have acquired all the Virtues of Your Predecessors, omitting what Vices were in them, inasmuch as You have augmented their Ancient Honours by Virtues new and heretofore unknown to this Kingdom. I believe that former Ages wanted not excellent Kings, yet, however it came to pass, the Sweetick affairs never ascended to any illustrious or durable greatness in their dayes; the Praise of that work properly belongs to the Gustavides, of whom not any one ever Reigned without some Memorable profit to the Countrey: for even the Error of some have proved of good use; the Case of Ericus and Sigismund instructeth Posterity wherein Kings may offend: and others are admonished by the severity of Charles, how unsafe it is to provoke Princes to Anger. But what Pen or what Oration can sufficiently declare the the Immortal benefits reaped from the two Gustavi? They were both so great, that if you compare them with others, you will easily prefer them before others; but if you compare them between themselves, you will rather conclude that this was Greatest and the other Greatest, then discern which of the two excelled. For it is a great Error and blindness of judgment to measure the Greatness of Kings by the outward Splendor of their Actions, and respect that only.

It happens often to these Stars on Earth as to those in Heaven, that some indeed are the greater though others seem to be so. But this is manifest, that God had Ordained by two Princes especially to advance the glorie of this Kingdom, even by GUSTAVUS the Great, and his Daughter CHRISTINA. He indeed was the more endowed with Warlike Virtues, yet so as when he had leisure from the Field, he did most Accurately and Skilfully manage affairs at Home: God having reserved Your self, Madam, to a greater work, the Recoverie, Establishment and Ornament of Peace, hath every way accomplished You for so great a Task; yet so, as while there was a necessity of War, You could not complain of anything wanting in Your self to the highest Praise in such an Employment. For whereas little is to be attributed to bodily exercise, You were found eminent in all those Virtues of the Mind which are required in the best Emperors, as Counsel in Perplexities, Constancy in Adversity, Moderation in Prosperity, Diligence, Wisdom, Faithfulness in all things; whereby after many and famous Victories, You concluded Peace with Denmark in the first year of your Reigne, and in the fourth year a most glorious and advantageous one with the German Emperor. Which peace how and by what means you have adorned, I cannot in this Haste declare; I shall only name the encrease of the City, many Towns built and well constituted, Justice established, the People eased in their Taxes, Manners amended, the Honor and Reward of Learning encreased, the Universities enriched, Schools erected, Merchandize flourishing, many Manufactures newly invented, the Ground manured beyond the simplicity of the Ancients; your care and diligence adhibited toward the Commodity of Travel, measuring of High-ways, building of Inns, and indeed toward all things which we see, which we are sensible of, and the benefit whereof we enjoy; so that I may justly account those my Countrymen of Germany happy who shall hereafter rest under your Protection: whom I would have, with my self and all other Your Subjects, think no signifier of God's Anger or Favour toward them, then as he shall long preserve, or suddenly take away such a Prince from amongst them. If there be any who dare not lift up their Eyes by reason of the misery of times past, or are so hindered by the Interposition of clouds that they could not hitherto behold this Bright Star, be comforted with its Aspect, and refreshed with its Heat: They may justly be encouraged to expect all things happy and prosperous near at hand, not only by the greatness of so Benigne and Favourable a Light, but also by the Constancy thereof. For the Splendor of it is not derived, as that of a Candle or Torch, which failing, the remaining substance appears fouler; but like that of the Sun, True, and Pure, and Innate; neither to be consumed by Time, or extinguished by Violence: which now shineth openly to those who dwell afar off, and will so dispell all Clouds from before their Eyes, that you shall find none so blind as cannot see it, or impudently injurious to their own judgments as to deny they see it. But though it be troublesome to me to draw my mind from this sweet and pleasing Contemplation, I shall not endeavour to comprehend the mention of these Virtues within the narrow Limits of this Paper, this Time, or this my little Wit, which ought in whole Volumes to be declared to all Nations and Ages. I shall make bold to be more Prolix in the Commemoration of your benefits bestowed.

bestowed on me, as being not so well known to the World, and more properly belonging to the Causes of this Dedication, as likewise not unworthy Monuments of your Virtues. But I must first acknowledge the Providence of God which I have alwaies found most manifestly present in this businesse. When for many years in Germany I continued in such a condition of life (for many reasons thereunto perswading me) as not resolutely addicted to any particular Profession, yet ready to accept of any which should lawfully offer it self: in all that while no man determined my liberty with obligation to any calling. In the mean time I spent not that my leisure in idleness, but bestowed it in those Studies to the which (by what afterward hapned, I evidently understood) I was from my infancie ordained. The time now grew on, Madam, wherein I was to be dedicated to Your Majesties Service, and Benediſt Skytte came to Argentoratus, whom Your Majestie hath deservedly honoured with many Favors, and lastly with the Dignitie of a Senator. By him invited I came to Your Universitie, where instructing the Youth with care and diligence, though I had an earnest desire to see Your Majestie, yet I preferred the necessitie of my present Office, before the sweetnesse of an happinesse not yet due to me. When I had now three years been debarred of any Conference with your Majestie, having lately taken upon Your Self the Administration of Your Realm upon occasion of a Funeral You came to Upsal. And from that time I shall begin the Commemoration of Your Favours towards me. The last Office of Love was then performed to my Patron John Skytte Senator, whose praises according to the Dutie of my Place, I endeavoured to set forth in a Funeral Oration; and this was the first Speech I made in Your hearing: But when by the cheerfulness of your most Serene Countenance, You discovered both Your understanding of what was spoken, and Your Favour to the Speaker, I was so infinitely possessed with Pleasure and Admiration, that thenceforward I resolved to esteem You not only as a Queen of Me and Your Kingdomes, but Princeesse of all Virtues and Wisdom. The same Favour I received two years after, when as often as you came to Upsal, you heard my Discourses upon any Subject you propounded. Intending afterward to accumulate more Favours upon me, You invited me to Court, not only beyond my Hope, but besides my Thoughts of any such thing: what You there bestowed upon me, can scarce by a long Oration be declared: You made me Keeper of Your Librarie, then which I know none so soon after its first beginning, more plentiful in Books, which hath been a main help to me in Compiling this Supplement. You gave me the Title of your Historiographer, that when you should think fit I might deliver to Posterity the Memory of things done or to be transacted. You afforded me Lodging in your Court, not only very convenient, but (which is rarely found in so frequented a Place) very private and quiet also, and a Stipend, which by experience I have found, very subject to Envy. And whereas these may be esteemed Favours of the highest rank, you have, by what after followed, caused them to be esteemed small ones: For when you desired the Knowledge of the Greek Tongue, that you might from their own Mouths understand the sense of the most excellent writers in Civil and Moral Wisdom, you did so by degrees induce me to the Office of your Instructor therein being ignorant of your Purpose, that at length I understood I had taught much indeed, when on the sudden I found you had Learnt so much. By this your Art in that small time you could allow out of two years to such a Study (being a Queen actually Reining, waging War, often holding Parliaments, every day Councils, and constantly distracted with other busineses) you made such an improvement that after Trial in Polybius and Plutarch, you read Plato also, and that with such understanding, that little wanting my help, you could hastily Translate him into Elegant Latine in most significant Expressions, and of Your self observe and for true reasons Correct the Error of Translations made with the great pains of Learned men. Whereby I reaped so great and various fruits of purest pleasures, as I could not but often ingenuously confesse to my most intimate acquaintance, That whosoever Time, or Labour, or Study, or Care I bestowed in this employment (for Trouble, I call my Confidence to mistresse, I never felt any) I thought all abundantly recompensed with that reward I could every hour receive from you. For to omit other benefits, what an advantage was even in this, to be every day in the presence of so great a Prince, to be seen and commended by You to obtain the Title, Place and Honour of a Favourite? Truly my Happinesse seemed so great to me, that I began to be afraid of it. For though, by the Grace of God, I ever put off those my worldly Accomplishments, as knowing I must one day leave them, or they me, yet out of importunity of mind I might by too great happiness have grown insolent, but that by certain Arguments I learn in time to know that so great a Fortune was not conferred as Due to any mans Merits, but as the free gift of your Grace and good will. And in this so high and great an Happinesse there are many excellent Circumstances, particularly considerable. I am tied only to my own Vocation, employed only in mine own Studies, that is, I am so free that I am not employed and engaged in any service not proper to my own Office and calling. Neither have you a care of my Time and Health only, but also of my Modesty and Bashfulness: I appear not but at the time of your Studies, neither then do I break in without command, or stand as an idle and dumb Spectator, vainly loosing time, or boldly vaunting of my Liberty and Familiarity. Neither is my work base or vile, we do nothing which requires either Secrecy or Excuse; whosoever will not betray his own ignorance must needs confesse the employment on my part worthy of a man, on yours becoming a Prince. Hence to I have related part of the Favours you have bestowed on my Person: it remains likewise I should acknowledge those Favours (as much more bestowed on me) which you have conferred on others by my Intercession: In which confession I have cause to fear, that I shall not only contract Envy to my selfe, but give Occasion to others to accuse your Majestie, as being too Facile in granting what is requested. To these I shall answer, That I do indeed acknowledge and admire your Goodnesse, which hath far exceeded my Deserts, and that others also may obtain equal or greater Favours if they ask them with the same Respect that I have done: as first, I never desired any thing but what was Just and Equal; nor secondly, any thing misbecoming the Office and Majestie of my Prince; thirdly, by all those Boons I have obtained for others, I know not that I am a penny the richer. But in this strait, wherein it is easier to think of more things then to write them, many things come into my mind, which I am forced to pretermitt. This I shall say, I am in doubt whether I am more beholding to your Majestie for small favours bestowed at my Request, or for the great ones; for as these carried the greater Price, the others did more manifest your Humanitie. That your mind capable of highest things would condescend to so little ones. We Read of a King, who when a Physosopher asked of him a Groat, said, It was too little for a King to give; when he presently asked a Talent, said, It was too much for a Physosopher to receive. Your Majestie hath more magnificently used the same Method, in Your smaller favours; regarding what was fit for me to receive, in the greater, what became Your self to give. With the like Clemency You have had compassion on some miserable men (whom I therefore commended to Your Majestie because none had pity on them) and done that which I dare yet scarce speak; both for the Greatnesse of the Thing, and for the Greatnesse of the Thanks due, which cannot cannot at present be expressed. But I may happily be accused of Flattery, that I should think your Person may be more Elegantly declared or praised by any man's Oration, than by your own Deeds and Works; or that I should think you stand in need of my Compliments, for having voluntarily remitted to the City of the Virginians the Poll-tax of their Taxes, by which I think the City was preferred, and shall do well and justly if they honour your Majesty as a second Founder; You have thereby for ever secured the Commonwealth of the Virginians, and in particular making it your Majesty's Debtors. For I know not who of Right owes most to you, they who received the benefit or be who procured it at your Pleasure. Is there any thing else to be equalled to, or preferred before what I have already said? No, surely even this. In that you have promised to make me a better man, not as all nature is improved by Laws and Manners, nor as many, by Example, but, as yet now, by your care and Diligence in Conversation with me. For you have promised to make Borgia with me (this is to do well and for me) your Wife and Prudent men ought to be qualified, and by what power and way is it to be learned, which when I have learned, I make no question of being much better than now I am. And I so much value this your Promise, that I cannot but free you from the burden of your Obligation to fulfil your Kingdom, and I shall not refuse, if I may ever see you, to declare the Reasons of this my Resolution. And to perform this, will I suppose be neither unpleasant to you, nor yet Difficult, seeing You send forward to the height of that Wisdom, which even among the Learned you shall find none who pretend to reach nearly indeed truly know & understand it. In this thing I may well boast whereby I am more happy, not only than ordinary men, but the servants of Solomon himself, who are justly esteemed happy in having opportunity of hearing his Wisdom. This would have been much more happy if he had taken peculiar Care to have instructed them in his own Person, which we read not to be ever did. But I perceive that contrary to my will and the nature of my Argument, the very Paper admitteth me to make an end. I shall therefore now be silent, humbly adoring your Majesty, and giving You to understand, that not only this Book is Dedicated to Your Majesty, but my whole self with all my Soul and the Affection I bear, with what I am, or have, or can do, being for Your sake simply willing to do any thing whatsoever without exception, unless what is against Conscience, or beyond my Abilities to perform.

MADAM,

The Lord Preserve and Keep you.

THE SUPPLEMENT OF LIVIE'S HISTORY

By J. FREINCSHEMIUS.

THE FIRST BOOK

In place of LIVIE'S XIth Book.

Collected out of Authors whose Names are in the Margin annexed.

HE Power of the Samnites was now by many Battels much broken, neither was any doubt made of happily finishing the War, in case the Enemy in this low and weak condition were prevented of time sufficient to recollect and strengthen his spirits. Therefore Q. Fabius the Consul, in the year from the fourth of the foundation of the City 601, now in the heat of his Youth, and assuring himself the glory of putting an end to this War, having made a sudden levy, marcheth instantly with his Army into Campania. For the Samnites being an hardy people, and by all their overthrows brought rather into Despair than Fear, while the former Consuls carried back the Legions to Rome attending on their Triumph, laid hold on that opportunity, and what with the Relicks of their former Armies, and some new Levies, had gathered together a considerable force, and because they knew the Plague was at Rome, and had heard that the present Consuls were men not much to be feared, either for any experience in Martial Affairs, or for any great Authority they had, they grew confident, invaded, depopulated, and wasted the Territories of the Campanians whom they had always hated, but now more vehemently, looking on them as the Authors of the danger and calamities they now sustained. The Roman General had a heart no way misbecoming the dignity of his Fabius-Family, but the small account he made of a Nation so often beaten by his Country-men, and his earnestness of being in action, did at this time quite bereave him of all Counsel and Deliberation. He marcheth swiftly towards the enemy, and having discovered the Samnite scouts, who upon sight of the Roman troops retired back to their own main Body, and judging this to be a flight of the whole Host, without any consideration had either of the place or the condition of his men, he commands in all haste that may be the Battle to be begun, as if the hope of Victory consisted only in Expedition: But the Samnites having notice of their approach, were very circumspect, had seized on advantageous places, marshalled their Army, and incensed the minds of their Souldiery by their commanders Orations; and consequently the Event of the Battle was accordingly; for the Samnites being in good Rank, and well prepared, made no great business to rout the Romans, being very weary with their journey and furious march, out of all order, as if they came rather to plunder than to fight. Three thousand of Fabius his men were lost, a greater number wounded, and only by the benefit of Maximus, the Night was the total destruction of his Army prevented. Then retiring to a more commodious place, as well as in such a Conjunction may be expected, they fortified their Camp, where there was little better comfort or confidence than in the field, the Weary had no convenience of Zenarus, the Hungry wanted food, and the Wounded had no application of Medicines, for issuing out with their weapons only, they had left all their carriage and baggage in the former Camp: so event of things, they thought fit to obey the Gods who would themselves open a way for their fortunes to proceed by. A very strange thing then fell out, but of most undoubted truth, by reason of the sincerity of so many Authors affirming it, as likewise appears by the structure of the Chappel in Tibur then erected and consecrated. When the Roman Embassadors had delivered their Message, the Epidaurians entertain'd them kindly, but because it did not appear what was convenient to be granted them, they were conducted to the Temple with liberty to convey away what should seem convenient for their use. The Altars of this God among the Græcians was most commonly in open and high Places; the Epidaurians also five miles from their City had a Temple of greatest Fame in those days, and very rich by the gifts of men who believed their health to proceed from thence; Being brought thither, while they stand in admiration of the Largeness of the Statue which was cut by the excellent skill of Therapmedes the Parian; Behold an huge Serpent creeping out of a secret place fills all their minds with horror and Devotion: For the Priests with great veneration cried out, The God himself is in this Snake, and being sometimes seen in this shape, it always imports a good and healthful Omen. Two days was he seen in the Temple and then again withdrew himself; the third day through the midst of the throng of Spectators and Adorers he went directly to the Port where the Roman vessel attended them; and entering into the Ship he rolls himself up according to his spiral manner, in the Cabin of Q. Ogulnius President of the Embassy. There is an ancient story that the same Æsculapius having assumed the form of a Serpent was carried from Epidaurus to Sicily by a Troak of Mules, one Nicagora, the wife of Echitimus driving the wain.

The Romans rejoicing at the good Omen, as having the God himself present among them, hoisted sail, and in a few days with a prosperous Voyage, crossed the Seas and arrived at Antium; where the Sea being troublesome, and their navigations hindered, the serpent which had kept it self still and quiet all the voyage, creeping out the Ship, glided to the Porch of the most eminent Church in that City, and there abode three whole days together: The Romans much fearing they should never draw him from thence, seeing he had not in so long time returned to his wonted sustenance, but at length having regained him with much cheerfulness they conveyed him to Rome: The whole City ran out to the sight of so incredible a wonder; on the banks of the river as he passed by many altars were erected, incense and sweet odours prepared, and sacrifices slain. They were now just come to that place, where Tibur a little dividing it self, suffereth an Island to appear in the midst of it; when the Serpent forsaking the Ship betakes himself into that Island by swimming, and was not afterwards any more seen by man; hence was the place call'd the Island of Æsculapius. The Fathers all agreeing that the Gods had chosen that place, decreed a Temple to be there erected to Æsculapius. The sickness whether by this remedy, or that it had otherwise run its full course did suddenly cease; the Temple was quickly enriched with many extraordinary offerings, and its revenues wonderfully spread abroad by those who profest to have received help in their diseases from this God. L. Posthumius the Consul carried the same pride with him into his Province which he had exercis'd against his Colleague at home: For whereas Q. Fabius Gurges, the last years Consul, did by order from the Senate manage affairs in Samnium as Proconsul; Posthumius arrogantly writes to him commanding him to depart the Province, in as much as himself was sufficient to wage that War. Fabius answering with the Decree of the Fathers, and that it was not safe for him to desert a business imposed on him by the Senate; the Romans upon this news feared lest by the discord of the Commanders, the Common-wealth would be damm'd: Wherefore 'twas thought fit to send Legates to the Consul, to desire in the Senates name that Fabius might be suffer'd to continue with the Army in Samnium. Posthumius having returned an absurd and broken Answer; add'd withal a speech of singular impudence: That during his Consulship, he was not oblig'd to obey the Senate, but they him; and that his actions might correspond with his words, forthwith dismissing the Legates, he march'd with his Army to Cominium, which City Fabius did then besiege; resolving (if by no other means he could) by fight to remove his Rival: The Roman Armies had afforded the enemy a full spectacle, if Fabius had resist'd with the same he was assaulted; but he being better temper'd both by nature and his Fathers documents departed the Province, having profest that he yield'd not to the Consuls fury, but to the good of the Commonwealth. Posthumius in a few days reduced Cominium, whence leading his Army to Pennum, and taking that also, he carried about the War to other Towns; many whereof partly by force, partly by treaty were brought under his power. In this Expedition ten thousand of the enemies were slain, six thousand two hundred casting down their arms, yielding themselves to the mercy of the conquerors. The Consuls achievements were not any way contemptible, but the grace of them were spoiled by his pride and Insolence: Wherefore when he did by Letters therein give the Fathers that the City and Territory of Pennum was very convenient for a Colony therein to be planted, the counsel indeed was accepted, but without mention made of the Author of the Victory and the counsels, other men had the conduct of the Colony of twenty thousand men, for so I find it in Authors of no small credit: A great number indeed and almost exceeding belief, but that it seems reasonable, that in the midst of Nations, yet unbiassed they should think of placing a considerable force, as a double guard both against the Apulians and the Lucanians. Now the stubbornness of Posthumius, as besides other grudges and offences, it contraried him much envy; so it tended much to increase Fabius his Favour and good opinion with with all men, so, that when he came to the City, and had made relation of his performances, his triumph was readily assented unto. Being now Proconsul he did on the Calends of August make his triumph over those Samnites who are call'd Pentri: Old Fabius followed his Chariot on horse-back, whom the people beheld, and by their acclamations acknowledged not only an Assistant, but the author of the Victory. He accumulated all the glory of the enterprize upon the peoples Consul, using himself as the name, so the modesty of a Legate; beholding his sons honour with as much complacency, as when, being yet a little one, he did in his own triumph carry him about in his Chariot. Part of the plunder by the Consul divided among the soldiers, the rest laid up in the Treasury; and C. Pontius the Samnite being first led in Triumph was afterward beheaded: A stout man he was and of worthy memory, who in those days did a long time sustain the Roman violence, gave them many considerable overthrows, but of all the most shameful one at the Caudine Spinnies: He was reported to say, That had he been reserved to this day wherein the Romans should have learn'd to receive money, he would no longer have suffered them to bear sway. It seems then the fortune of the City was not better defended by their industry in Arms, then their innocence of manners: In the mean time Posthumius fretting no less at the honour had been granted his Rival, then that the like had been denied him, by weakness of mind opposing his own contumacy, to the authority of the Fathers, did both exasperate the wound of his own spirit, and imitate those imaginations against him, which ought by modesty of speech and carriage to have been asswaged. He abstained not from complaints against his enemies, not from reproaches against the Senate, and to spite the Fathers, he distributed the whole prey among the soldiers, and disbanded his army before a successor could be sent him. He triumphed likewise contrary to the pleasure of the Senate, which, though some refer to his second Consulship, I believe more fitly agrees with this conjuncture, and it is so affirmed by authors of no mean credit in Histories: By these doings he drew new hatred upon himself, and he was no sooner out of office, but the two Tribunes of the people upon a set day accused him: Besides what hath hitherto been mentioned, 'twas objected against him, that before he march'd armed Liv. Epit. 11. out of the City; he employed two thousand choice men out of his Legions to dig up a piece of ground, and detained them many days in this work, not remembering they were his soldiers, not his slaves, and were leav'd to enlarge the Publick Land, not to manure his. Being earnestly press'd with these his faults was valued to stand him in two hundred thousand pieces of money. Now P. Cornelius Rufinus, and M. Curius Dentatus entered their Consulships. Each of these with his Legions did utterly wast Samnium, depopulating their grounds, and ruining their Cities, and in many few battels having the upper hand compelled them at length to sue for peace, for having in so many battels lost the prime of their Youth; and in Pontius the chief counsel and conduct, they Orat. 32. 1. now this fourth time a League might be renewed with them. 'Tis likely too the Romans even Livie Epit. 11. weary with beating, were willing to conclude a difficult and miserable War, with the tranquility of a certain peace. I find the war with the Samnites to have begun when M. Valerius was the third time Consul, M. Cornelius Cossus being his Colleague, and being through four and fifty Consulships, with various success continued (only by some shortlived truces suspended) it held Livie 7. 29. both parties in play with much trouble and vexation; whether Cornelius triumphed for this War is uncertain; as for Manius there is no doubt, for his fortune being more eminent in that he subdued other enemies, he Triumphed twice in the same Consulship: For the Sabinæ a Warlike Nation; now grown wealthy with a long peace, whether they were moved with their own proper Livie Epit. 11. compassion, and Entreaties of the Samnites; or whether willing timely to prevent those miseries, which (having swallowed up their neighbours) they forelaw approaching to themselves, have put their young men into Arms, invaded some places under the Roman Jurisdiction: Against these some tastes of the miseries of War, he sent part of his forces by privy journeys into and vastation on every place: This straight did soon dissolve the formidable Army of the Sabinæ, several troops running several ways to the defence of their own subsistence; so that the Consul had an easy Victory over the dispersed forces. In this Expedition they proceeded as far as the Adriatick Sea, gaining the possession of so much ground, and so many men, as the saying of Curius began to be famous, who (according to the genius of those times being more ready in deeds then in words) when he could not express every singular circumstance, in gross exacted that he had taken so much ground, it must needs have turned into wilderness, but Aul. de viris necessity have perished with hunger, but that he had taken so many men, they must of Illyr. c. 33. When the Sabinæ sued for peace, not only that was afforded them, but likewise the Freedom of the City, (though without the suffrage of the Tribes) this favour was in memory of their old Affinity under Tatius, the late War not being carried on with any malignant hatred. Of the next years Consulship (underwent by M. Valerius Corvinus, and Q. Cædicius Noctua), we have Florus B. 1. 15. arrived to little understanding; only I find some Colonies about this time deduced to Cassrum, Florin. to Adria (from whence the Sea taketh its name) and to Sena in Gallia: Nevertheless consider, Florin. ing those Regions were not as yet to such a purpose sufficiently settled, I think fit rather to encline illaries about Thirteen Thousand were wanting.

But the Joy for this victory prevailed not so much with the Gaules, as sorrow and Confection for the Lamentable Defolation of their Country . Wherefore gathering together all their Country men then in Arles in Etruria , full of Grief and Anger , void of councill and hope ; having no habitation wheretoe to be received at home , I know not what Fate drawing them to their destruction) in a heat of Resolution they drive toward Rome , thus Computing, That there is no other way to recompence the defolation of their own Countrey , but by forcing the Romans to seeke like Ruine of thier City : That their Spirits and Forces were now too inferior to , nor the conquest of their March from Aratum of less importance, than that of their Ancestors who marched from Clusium of the same Eturria and took Rome : With the likes speeches incensing themselves they Rush on , by nature impatient of Delay , and now haily in their Counsels that they might overwhelm their Enemies unawares , But travelling through an Enemies Countrey, they met with many obstracles, fo that the Romans had Leisure to provide against this Fury . At length wandering through unknown and unfriendly places, guided by one certaine Line, they light upon Demetrius the Confull, and immediately joyne Battell with him ; But their unhappy rashness confounded both their Reason and Discipline : many being slaine in Battel, the Refidue growing mad with Rage and despair sheathed in their own Bowells, those weapons they had in vain drawn againt the Enemy. Insomuch as so fudden and vehement a Judgement overtook a late most flourishing People for their villany in murdering Embassadors, that in the space of few months they were totally cut off, and ceased any more to be dours, that in the space of few months they were totally cut off, and ceased any more to be numbered among Nations, whose laws they had broken themselves to their Neighbours, and Kinsmen the Boii, where the next year by Disabada the Confall with an universal slaughter clean swept away.

For whereas the Boians and Etruriars were involv'd in these late disasters, and possessed with fear of the same Calamities, they were at the Lake called Vadimonis in a fet Battell overcome, many of the Etruriars slain, few of the Boians escaped, the very name of the Senones so utterly extirped, that there is not thought to be left alive one Man of that Nation which had set Rome on fire. About this time I think it more probable that the Colony was planted in Sena, the Romans having now an entire possession of their Country, and quite taken away their Name out of that part of Italy. Nevertheless the Etrurians and the Boians next year recruiting their army with young men now grown up, ventred once more to try the Fortune of a Battell. Then it was I believe by Q. Ennius Papus that they were beaten, for his and C. Fabricius his first Consulship hapned that year, and 'tis certain the Province of Etruria fell to Papus by Lot. But in most Annals yet extant, the Memory of these Transactions is swallowed up by the Intervening of greater matters. For whereas the Romans had by so many continual fights and victories very mightily increased their Virtue and Power; all the free Cities and Nations in Italy being brought into feare, conspired in a great and most dangerous warre, joyning together all their Counsells and forces as against a Common Enemy, and Plunderer. Neither thought they fit any longer to deferre their Designe, while now the Remnant of the Boians and Etrurians sufficed to distract the Roman Powers. And first of all the Samnites, again breaking their League and openly joyning force with the Lucanians and Brutians, commenced the Warre. But these were overcome by C. Fabricius in many pitch'd fields; especially in one most remarkable when they joyntly battell neer the City of the Thurines, which Statius Statiulus had again freighly besieged; where the Enemy was with a very great slaughter beaten, and their Camp likewise forced and taken. It is reported that while the camp was strenuously defended, A young man of large proportion of Body was seen to bring Ladders to the works, whereby the Romans being animated obtained a complete victory. Twenty Thousand are said to be slain in the fight and in the Camp, Five thousand together with the General taken Prisoners, and twenty Colours. The next day the Consull resolving to reward those whose valour had been eminent, and promising a CORONA VALLARIS to him who first entered the Enemies Camp after diligent Enquiry made after the man, the souldier was not to be found (if so be he were a souldier) who would claime this Honour; 'Twas therefore believed and voiced abroad that Marius was the Author of this feat, and the Cause of Victory; And by the Consull's order supplication was made unto him, which the souldiers with Laurels on their heads performed with great Joy and Gladness. The Tarentines had not as yet assisted the Accomplishes with any open aid; for though they were the Principal Authors of the Confederacy, yet they thought it wiser to let the Roman forces be provoked and the Fortune of warre tried with other men's danger than their own. But this Diffimulation served not their purpose, for a meet accident provoking the Rashness of the Giddy rabble betrayed all their Counsells. Even at this Time, that part of the Italian shore, after the Manner of the Grecians (by whom Tarentum and most of the other Cities were builded) did excessively delight themselves with fights, and stage plays: The Tarentines above others were most Luxurious in this kind, inso much as it is said they had more Feasts and Solemn Playes then Days in the Year. It hapned they were then met at their sports in the greater Theatre by the Haven side, when L. Valerius (some say Cornelius) one of the Admiralls of the seas was descryed entering the Haven with ten Roman Vessels; A Fatal Error to both Parties. For the Romans ignorant of all things betook themselves thither as to a friendly and amicable shore; the Tarentines on the other side Conscious of their own Privy practises interpreted this Navy to be sent with an hostile intention. There was then present one Philicharus whom for his loose Conversation the Citizens call'd Thais; He mentioning the articles of some former Leagues, said it was not lawful for the Romans to saile past the Promontory of Lacinium, that therefore they should go out and meet the soft-hardy Barbarians, and suppress their Pride with a Mischiefe. The giddy Rout besotted with continual drinkings manifest their assent by Acclamation, so that one scandalous persons opinion in a matter of so great importance was generally received, and without further Consideration they take up armes, and assault the Ships: The Romans as not dreaming of any such Encounter, being utterly unprepar'd to fight, betook themselves to flight. The Tarentines swiftly pursuing, Five ships only managed their Escape; as many being hemm'd about were brought into the haven, whereof foure with the Admirall were drown'd and one taken; The Men, as many as were of age and strength fit for Warre, were slaine, the rest made slaves. Presently with the same vanity they wage warre against the Thurines, accusing them, that the Romans came into these parts by their means, who though they were Grecians, had yet in the time of their distress choosen a Barbarous Nation to be their Protector, rather then the Tarentines their Neighbors and Kinsmen. The City is taken and plundered, the Chief men cast out and banish'd, and the Roman Garrison compounding for their own safety are dismissed. The Romans hearing the Newes, were according to the Greatness of the Injury most exceedingly incens'd, yet thought it not convenient at that season to undertake a new warre: An Embassy was decreed to complain of the Outrage, and instruction was given the Legates to Require, that the Captives should be set as Liberty, the Thurines goods or the just value of them should be restor'd, the Exiles call'd back, and the Authors of these Misdeemeanours deliver'd into the hands of the Romans. The Tarentines according to the Greeke Custome were wont to assemble their People together in the Theatre; whether the Embassadors being with much Difficulty admitted, they find a Rabble-rout totally debauch't with Drunkennells and Idleness, for this likewise was a great Holy-day with the Tarentines. There when L. Posthumus the Prince Legate began to declare his message, he was entertained with such mocks and scoffs of the wanton multitude, that he carried home greater causes of hatred than he came to complain of. For they had him in such contempt, that not regarding any thing else he spoke; when, as being a Roman, he chanced to pronounce any word not so exactly according to the Greek manner, the whole company would burst out into laughter, crying out upon him and reviling him as a Barbarian, they fear'd and flouted at the Habit of the Embassadors, for they came in their gowns, and at last fairly thrust them out of doors, in vain claiming the privilege of the Laws of Nations. Now, what is scarce fit to be spoken, but may prove of good example to curb the insolence of popular licence, it is reported, That as the Embassadors pressed through the crowd of the Tarentines out of the Theatre, a certain Buffoon, one Philonides (for in this the Tarentines were beholding to their good manners, the Names of their Jesters were recorded in their Annals, though their Princes were forgotten) like an impudent Dog, piss'd upon the sacred Vestments of the Embassadors. This might seem the crime of one only mad furious fellow, but that forthwith the whole drunken Society did own it, and the whole Theatre resounded with laughter, and clappings of the hands, at approving the fact. Polisimus lifting up his voice, We accept this, O men, O Jester (saith he) seeing ye bestow these things upon us, we regard not at your hands. And when he turned himself to the multitude shewing his defiled garment, they renew'd their laughter, and began to dance, singing scurrilous and reproachful Verses against the people of Rome, wherefore Polisimus again crying out, Laugh on, saith he, laugh on, Tarentines, While ye may, for hereafter ye shall weep sufficiently: Whereat the Tarentines being nettled, Nay, saith he, to vex you the more, I tell you before hand, this garment shall cost you much blood the washing. After this, receiving no other answer, they sailed home. Now at Rome, L. Emilius Barbula, and Q. Marcus Philippus, had begun their Consultship, by whom the Senate being convened, and the Robe defiled, as it was, being shew'd by the Embassadors, who declared to the Fathers the whole series of affronts and indignities heaped on them by the Tarentines: Their Spirits were in an high manner incensed, and not so much as any scruple made of vindicating their reproach by Arms. But because they had already to deal with so many mighty Nations, they could not resolve whether now immediately, or hereafter to send an Army against the Tarentines, and the debate continued many days even from morning till night: Some were of opinion, That nothing should be enterprised before the other Cities, at least till the Tarentines were reduced; others contended, That the war should incontinently be commenced; at last, numbering their votes, it was decreed, That the business of the Tarentine war should be refer'd to the people.

The people with an unanimous consent agreed upon the War, and accordingly letters were sent to Emilius the Consul, who was then gone to the Army into Samnum, That omitting all things at present, he should pitch his Camp in the Tarentine Fields, and, unless he could procure satisfaction for the injuries received, that he should prosecute them with a just and holy war. The Tarentines perceiving they had now no longer to deal with a few unarmed men, but a just and well order'd Army, rousing themselves out of their accustom'd slothfulness, began feebly to enter into counsel, what was to be done; to accept of the war was dangerous, to do what the Romans required in satisfaction was base, and to avoid both impossible: While their opinions were thus doubtful, one among the rest stood up and said, Why do we thus, O Tarentines, waste the time in vain altercations? the times are come which require Deeds rather than Words, which that they may be order'd to the publick benefit, there is need of free Speech and sincere Council. Neither am I much moved that heretofore, by a strange disease incident to Free Cities, ye have been delighted with flattering and sugar'd Orations, though of ill consequence, because then, as in time of Prosperity, ye regarded not much what mainly tended to the good of the Commonwealth: But now the Roman Army is upon our Borders, and the fear of the enemy before our Gates, and this is sufficient to instruct us to prefer what is Profitable before what is Pleasing. Neither would I have you so interpret me, as if I stood up to buy you in the teeth with past misdemeanors; for unfeignably to object old crimes is the part of an enemy, and one who wantonly insults over others infirmities: And an honest man that is careful of the common safety, will hide and excuse the faults of his City, unless the remembrance of them be of concernment to the avoiding some publick Calamity. For seeing we are but men, to pretend freedom from all error, would argue too much Pride: But often to fall at the same stone, and not to grow wiser when the very event plainly chastiseth our rashness, is not consistent with right reason. We have at one man's warning assaulted and drown'd the Roman ships, and presently with open war vexed our Kinsmen the Thurines, because they had rather be protected by the Romans, than swallowed up by the Lucanians and Brutians; moreover, we have suffered shameful indignities to be cast on the Roman Embassadors; so that a war we might have avoided, a heavy dangerous war we are not provided for, hath in a most unlucky time overtaken us. Finally, the Roman Camps are now pitch'd in our fields, and we as yet wavering in our counsel, deliberate still whether it is safer to accept a formidable war, or make a dishonourable peace. And I would to God at length, that laying aside all self flattery, and forgetting self-interest, and aiming at the publick honour and profit, we might freely and truly consult together, there might certainly a way be found of making an honest league, or a safe war. But now I see you clearly divided into two parts, I may say factions, not taking counsel out of judgment or as the state of things require, but every man byass'd by his own inclination: For how comes it to pass, that so few of the young men, and poorer sort stand for peace? and why do none of the rich and ancient men desire war? what other reason can be given of so equal a division in the City, but these that would fain in quiet reap the commodity of their Lands and Urury, the other in time of war, hope for command and liberty of plunder? This is an old disease amongst us, neither of a long time hath our Commonwealth wanted such men, who even with the danger and detriment of the City have studied to increase their own private wealth. All which may happily be prevented (for I must speak what I think at present most conducive) if ye will neither buy peace on such base conditions as shall infringe the privileges of a Free City, nor yet trust singly to your own Forces in so difficult a war. Our Ancestors have often committed the conduct and command of their Armies to foreign Leaders: Either out of Peloponnesus or out of Sicily we have sent for Archidamus the son of Agessilaus, afterward for Cleonymus, then presently for Agathocles. Even in our own memory when we were infested by our Neighbours, our Fathers made use of Alexander the Epirot: By which means they did not only themselves succeed prosperously, but left things in a flourishing condition to us: There is at this day the same friendship between us and the Epirots, neither are they now less potent in an Army and a Commander: And the benefit is fresh in memory, which Pyrrius received from us; in that with our whole Navy we assisted him in his attempt against the Corycraans. Therefore esteem this not as my counsel, but as the counsel of the wisest men who have heretofore happily governed this Commonwealth, which ye ought therefore at least to follow; because in the former example you may discern both the reason and ground, as also the issue and success of it. And yet otherwise, there may be arguments most evident and sufficient to the same purpose: There is no man amongst us so singularly eminent, to whom all the rest will willingly submit themselves, and what danger there is in emulation, when we have to do with a fierce and potent Enemy, ye are ignorant. And whosoever ye shall make General, either by his too great affection to peace, or by his ambition of carrying on the war, may wrong your affairs; not to say, that 'tis not safe to commit a war into the hands of any ordinary person against the Romans, an hardy stout Nation and inur'd to Arms. But the truth is, which none can doubt of, that Pyrrius is not by any man exceeded in virtue and experience of Military affairs. But perhaps he will not come? Certainly, being a man desirous of action, and having no other war at present, he will not only come himself, but bring a formidable strength, and that of no fresh-water soldiers. And if ye fear his encroachment upon your Liberties, ye may treat with him on such conditions as the Commonwealth may be secur'd. By this means ye may either obtain an honourable peace, or bestow a glorious one. Though indeed it be not the least of my hopes, that the Romans will rather before-hand deal with us on equal terms than admit of Pyrrius into Italy, having heretofore feared a King of much less glory and renown out of the same Epirus. This counsel prevailed not only so far, as to make them see a probable way opened to the publick safety, but likewise the assembly being divided into two contrary opinions; neither part being able to prevail over the other, they did all unanimously concur in this, as seeming indifferent to both sides.

'Tis reported, when the Rumour was spread about the City, that a decree was made for the invitation of Pyrrius that one Meton a covetous fellow, taking a dry wither'd chaplet upon his head, after the manner of Drunkards, together with his mistress, entered the Theatre; the people according to their idle custom, commanded him to sing and his woman to pipe, after a while silence being made, Meton cries out, To do well, O Tarentines, in that ye grant Liberty to them that please, to sing and Dance; for when Pyrrhus once comes into the City we shall scarce be allow'd to live after our own minds. The People being somewhat moved at this saying, and murmuring and whisperings arising: Those who were authors of the injuries against the Romans (fearing lest if peacefull Counsels prevailed they should be delivered up to punishment) having chid the people, That they would suffer themselves to be unworthily divided by a rash fellow, forcibly thrust Meton out of the Theatre, so that afterward without contradiction the Decree was ratified. But the Roman Consul, hearing nothing from the Tarentines tending to peace, and understanding that Embassadors were sent with presents to Pyrrius, sets himself to the War, wasteth their grounds, taketh their Cities some by force, some by composition, and fills all places with loffe, and terror. The Tarentines lent forth forces to hinder the spoile, but, after a sharpe conflict, the Romans having the better, the Gracians are driven backe into the City with great loffe. Then Emilius without resistance wasteth and burneth the whole Country round about. The Tarentines terrified with these calamities, (like a people, the more insolent in prosperity, the more dejected and fearful in adversity) submit themselves to the Government of Agis, who was a constant author of maintaining the Roman friendship. Their desire and hopes of peace were most augmented by the discourse of some prime men who were dismissed by the Consul, and declared his Humanity, with what indulgence and candour he entertain'd those who were taken in several places of the Countrey, or in the last fight. But the confidence of Cineas who was now come with Auxiliaries from Epirus, changed their minds, and erected their spirits. For Pyrrius being a man of vast conceits, and in emulation of Alexander the Great, comprehending large Empires in his fancy, believed now a way to be laid open to accomplish all his designs, as if the Fates themselves had invited him.

It is said he was much confirm'd by the Oracle of Delphos, whose words were indeed of an ambiguous sense, which yet the Kings ambition did favourably interpret. For consulting about the War he was now to undertake, Answer was made, Posse cum Romanis vincere, that he should overcome the Romans, or the Romans him. But I think his chief encouragement was from the Tarentine Embassadors who affirm'd, That out of their own Cities, with the help of the Lucanians, the Messapians, Samnites and other the confederates, they could easily raise twenty thousand horse, and three hundred and fifty thousand foot. With this strength, when he should once have brought the Romans under subjection, he hoped with little pain to attain the Lordship of all Italy; then a short cut into Sicily would present him with an Island much at discord and void of a Ruler (the families of Agathocles being destroyed) and this he thought he might claim by right of Inheritance, as having begotten Children on Lanassa the daughter of Agathocles; these things happily succeeding he was resolv'd to make War with the Carthaginians. It reported that Cineas, a man of excellent wisdom, willing to have the King by his own confession acknowledge that his immoderate desires, whereby the enjoyment of his present felicity was disturb'd, were in reason to be restrain'd, asked him, What he would do when he had overcome the Romans? Pyrhus then declaring how one victorie would beget another, And what shall we do, saies he, when all these things are accomplish'd? Why then, saith Pyrrhus, we will enjoy the fruits of Peace, the benefit of ease and Idleness. To which Cineas replied, And why, O King, can we not at present enjoy the same things, while they are in our hands? whereat the undertaking of new Wars may utterly deprive us of them. But a second embassy coming from the Tarentines, Pyrhus overcome by his own ambition, answer'd, That 'twas the custom of the Epixoi to Wage War, not only for themselves, but for their companions and friends also. But to dissuade him the more secret counsels, he articles very precisely with the Embassadors, That altho as he had resolv'd them, he should be suffer'd to return home, and not be detain'd in Italy any longer then necessity should require. Then with all might and maine intending himselfe upon preparation for the War, he caus'd a great number of long ships to be made ready, and likewise trains up others for transportation of men and horse. Now having Employed most of the Italian Embassadors (whom under a pretext of honour he detain'd as hostages and pledges) in lerying and conducting of forces, he sent the rest beforehand to Tarentum, with three thousand armed men, and Cineas for Commander. By their arrival all hopes of peace were broken off, Agis his government abrogated, and by decree of the people the guidance of affairs committed to one of them who were now returned from Epirus. Not long after Milo being sent by the King, secures the Tower of Tarentum with a Garrison, and claims the custody and defence of the walls, with the very good will of the multitude, who were glad to see strangers undertake all the trouble and labour, while they safely enjoy'd their rest; they therefore cheerfully decreed Corn for the souldiers and Money for Pyrhus.

In the mean time L. Aemilius, understanding of the Arrivall of these beyond-sea Souldiers, that he might have the safer winter quarters, resolv'd to draw his army into Lucania. His journey was by certain narrow passages that in on the one hand with the Sea, on the other with ragged and impassible Rocks. The Tarentines having intelligence of his purpose, said by that shore with their ships furnished with Cross-bows and Slings, assailing the souldiers as they pass'd through strait and open paths with stones and darts. But Aemilius, not being able to help himself by virtue, secur'd his passage by cunning; the Captives which before he had placed in the Rear, he now draws to that side of the ranks which was obnoxious to danger, in pity of whom the Tarentines fearing to hurt their own men, spared all the enemy. These things were done at Tarentum this year. At Rome C. Fabricius Luscinus, who in his Consulship had egregiously overcome the Samnites, and Lucanians entered the Capital in Triumph. Q. Marcius not many daies after obtained the same honour, being returned out of Etruria with prosperous success. The reason why, the Etrurian war not as yet being finished, he was called out of his Province at such a time of year (for Fabricius triumph'd the third of the Nones of March) is not recorded, I conceive he was recall'd by the Senate, who being troubled with expectation of Pyrhus, did from every quarter gather together what strength they could. The Proletarii, the sixth and last rank of Citizens, who of old were privileg'd from going to war, were now list'd, and being not able by reason of their poverty to provide themselves with arms, they were furnished by the publick, for at this time war being on every side commenced, it was necessary the Commonwealt should be defended by many Armies. These men of office, while the Legions were otherwise employ'd, to guard the City with watch and ward, being dispos'd in several stations upon the walls, and in the Market-place. Neither by all these contrivances could the imminent calamities have been averted, but that the fortune of a City ordain'd to Rule did in these most dangerous times produce men of so great Excellency, as I know not whether ever the could boast of better: Men, not so eminent for their Riches or Extraction, as truly emobled by their Virtue and contempt of wealth. This Age had its Curii, Fabricii, Connacii, men of no great Ancestors or Possessions, but of most ample fame, which they obtained by their upright example, exact skill in Marshal affairs, and an answerable innocence of Manners; who were every where helpful to their Country, which had now need of Champions, which were able not only to resist the sword of the enemy, but to scorn his gold, having to deal with a King who was potent in both. In the mean time Pyrhus, not waiting for the spring, coming with with two and twenty thousand foot, three thousand horse, twenty Elephants, and a considerable band of slingers and archers, was in the midst of his Voyage to toss'd with a Tempest, that he narrowly escap'd being call away. For the Navy being disper'd, and most of the ships distressed, when the Admirall was in danger, Pyrhus leapt into the sea, and with very great pains at length hardly swam to shoare: But the strength and spirit of his minde did much helpe the weakness of his Body, together with the diligence of the Messapians, on whose shoare he was cast, who with all offices of humanity did foment and cherish him: with their assistance likewise, some few ships, which had escap'd the violence of the storme, being brought into the Haven, there were gathered together some few horse, with two Elephants, and under two thousand footmen, with this force he march'd to Tarentum, being met by Cineas who came forth with his souldiers to conduct him thither, and being entertained with much joy he took his rest for some daies; In which space having observed the Manners of the City to be so order'd, that unless they were amended, there was no possibility of protecting it, but that rather the Patrons themselves would likewise be undone by it, he took no open notice at the present. But a while after, his disper'd ships meeting together, when he had strength sufficient, he shut up their wrestling places, and Porches, where the idle youth use to spend whole daies in walking and fooling; he forbade their Banquets and Drinking-matches, and reduced their solemn Games from Intemperancy to a just Moderity.

After this he made a very strict Leavy of their young men, commanding his Prefers to choose out those of the larger size, he would make them valiant; Mixing these among his own Companies, lest being apart they should prove seditious, he trains them up with the same hardnes and severity of Discipline, threatening pain of Death on those who should fly from their Colours. Those who were not in armes he compell'd to be most part of the day in the Market-place; by which strange usage the Citizens borne and bred up in shameful Luxury were grievously perplexed, calling it a slavery to be thus serv'd against their wills, choosing rather to perish with idleness and Lust. The offence was aggravated by the Insolence of some of the King's Guard who choosing Quarters at their own pleasure, possess'd them against the will of their Landlords, using much license towards their Wives and Children. Wherefore many being wearied out, forsook the City, and settled themselves in the Country, till at length that likewise was forbidden, the Ports being shut, and guards appointed. Then indeed the Tarentines perceiv'd that in stead of a Companion they had got a Master, and what onely Comfort was left them, when they had any handsom occasion of meeting, they bewailed their Condition with indignation and Complaints, and that more freely, when besides their other Passion, they were heated with Wine, accus'd for having spoken dishonourably of their King at their Banquets; But one Man's simple and ingenuous Confession freed them all from Punishment, for saies he, We said these words indeed, and should have said worse but that we wanted Wine; whereat Pyrhus smiling, dismiss'd them, being willing the fault should be imputed to the wine rather than to the men; But not considering either in the Minds or manners of the City, what men he observed to be of greatest Note for Authority or Counsell amongst them, he either found or made some Cause arise to send them to his Son Proculus (who being then fifteen yeares of Age he had left Victrix in his Realm) others by secret Ambush he cut off, and some to make them suspected to the People, he did with much feigning humanity embrace, as if he held them among his dearest Friends. Of this number was Aristarchus a principal Man much beloved of the Citizens, and of great repute for his Eloquence. Pyrhus perceiving him to be very Popular, upon a certain emergent Occasion commands him to saile into Epirus. Aristarchus (knowing it was present Death to disobey the King; and that to obey him was, though not so sudden, yet of as certain ill Consequence) taking ship, after he had sail'd a little way, steer'd his course to Rome, where being received into credit, he inform'd the Senate of many Affairs of great Concernment: While Pyrhus thus busied himselfe at Tarentum, the Romans were no less careful in making Leavies for the warre, they had rais'd Money, and sent Fabricius to their Confederate Cities, either by his Authority or Grace to restrain them from Innovation in State. Those who were most suspected were kept in awe by Garrisons conveniently placed amongst them. For the strength of so Warlike a King, had very much mov'd the humours of the Italians who were either desirous of Change, or provoked with the perswasion of Injuries receiv'd; which made the Romans the more diligent to provide for their own safety by a timely suppressing all Occasions of sedition. About this Time an Accident befell the Prænestine Nobles very remarkable, for they being brought to Rome late in the Evening were for Custody's sake lock't up in the Publick Treasury, whereby at length they understood the Deceit of an Oracle, which they did make use of to stirre up their Countrymen to Rebellion, often averring, it was Decree'd by the Fates, That the Roman Treasury should be possess'd by the Prænestines. The Fathers being already much perplexed, had further Intelligence that Fabricius was detain'd by their Confederate and Compagnons as a Pledge to secure the safe return of their hostages from Rome, and that Embassadors were sent to incite the Etrurians, the Umbres and the Gauls against the People of Rome; whereat they were infinitely troubled as at a fact in it selfe horrid, so of ill Example, lest in such a Dangerous time the Roman faith and honesty should be call'd in question, and held suspected by all the Italians. In the utmost part of the Italian shoate over against Sicilie is seated the City of Rhegium, (by a Grecian name so called) very wealthy and flourishing in those days: The Citizens thereof judging by the Arrival of Pyrrhus that a great and terrible warre would ensue, and frighted likewise with the Carthaginian Navy floating up and down in those seas, not trusting in their own strength, thought fit to send for a Guard from Rome. The Romans sent them Four thousand souldiers (which being leaved out of the Colonies of Campania, were call'd the Campanian Legion) under the Conduct of Decius Fabellius their Colonel; These at their first coming were very faithfull, and very diligent in defending the City. At length seeing no warre approach neer them, and being by degrees debauch'd with idleness and imitation of the Greek Customs, they began to compare the Advantage they had now in their hands with the hard and laborious life they had hitherto led; and with much Covetousness and Envy did frequently discourse in all their meetings and quarters of the convenient situation of the City, and the happiness of the Inhabitants. Decius was well pleased with this, who being himself grown as Licentious, had long ago conceived an inward desire of seizing upon the City. The design was favour'd by occasion of the present warre, which so wholly took up the Romans that they had no Leisure to mind the affaires of Rhegium; Besides on the opposite shore were the Mamertines, an Example of the like successfull villany, and ready no doubt to defend the like Treachery in others, especially being tyed with the Relation of the same Common Country. For they likewise were of Campania, and of late years going to warre amongst the Auxiliaries of Agathocles, and being entertained by the Messenians as Friends, having slain and cast out the Citizens, possess'd the place themselves: sharing likewise among themselves their houses, wives and Estates. They called to mind also the Campanians of old, who by the like wicked art got Capua from the Tuscans. When they had now agreed upon the Business, there was nothing left to be consulted on, but only the Manner, how safely to execute their Design, left in so populous a Cite, the lesser number should be surrounded and slain by the greater. Decius counterfeited Letters as wrote from the Rhegians to Pyrrhus, to betray the Roman Garrison to him, these Letters as if they were intercepted, are read to the souldiers in private, Decius bitterly complaining of the Perfidiousness of the Rhegians; and some souldiers being suborned to cry out, It was time to provide for their own safety by the sword, and turn that Destruction which was destin'd to them, upon the heads of the Authors; and as the business was set, a Messenger comes in with newses, That Pyrrhus his Navy was seen by the shore, and secret discourses were had between him and the Rhegians. The souldiers now beside their former Covetousness, were much incited with the Treachery of the Enemy, and fear of Danger; It is therefore by Common Consent resolv'd upon, That as the Townsmen shall be oppress'd unwarlike and unprepared, that having slain the Men, all the Publick and Private wealth of the City shall be distributed to the Legion. Behold now an unworthy and horrid fact; Decius having invited some of the Prime men to Supper, against the holy Rites of Hospitality, takes away their Lives, others were every where slain in their own houses; the greater part of the Rhegians being thus murdered, the rest were banished their Country, even by those whom of late they had entertain'd under the Name of Friends and Companions, for preservation of themselves and their Country. Execution being done, there is now a new face of Publick affaires; the houses and Estates of the poore wretches like the Plunder of an Enemy, is divided amongst the Thieves; and while the Blood is yet fresh and warme, the Matrons and Virgins are forced to Marry the murderers of their husbands and Parents; and the Cruel Perfidious Legion arrogates to it selfe the Title and Rights of the City of Rhegium. But it hath pleas'd God well to provide for Mankind, that such rare examples of high Mischief should prove likewise as manifest Examples of Vengeance and Divine Justice; Let us should only by consideration of the success be animated to the like Villany, and not by the Issue and event be deterr'd from evil doing. So that no true Felicity attends the Wicked, neither can there be a greater Madnes then for any man to perswade himself that he can grow happy by doing Mischief: For suppose there were no Punishment after Death, which all wise men acknowledg to be the greatest. (for the folly of ordinary men is so great they will scarce believe what is before their eyes, much less be moved with the terror of things unseen and as far off.) yet let all things as to outward success prosperously, nevertheless the Confidence of offences committed doth by secret wounds continually lacerate and torment the minde: the Name of the Living, and the memory of the Dead is had in perpetual hatred and Detestation among men: and what is by ill means gotten, and with care and labour preserved is most commonly to their great grief snatched away again, neither God nor men suffering Wickedness to go long unpunished. It will not be amiss briefly to relate the punishment of Decius Fabellius, and his mad Accomplishes as in these days it befall, for their final destruction after great variety of troublesome Chances, was deferred to the Tenth year, as shall in fit time be declared. These Rascals did not long enjoy Comfort or Tranquility amongst themselves. The feare of the Romans and Pyrrhus they did indeed avoid, as by reason of the present Coniuncture of Affaires, so by holding strict society with the Mamertines, and resolving to Offend neither Party: For 'twas thought safest in their first beginnings to abstain from warre at the present, while their New City which had so violent and sudden an Original, should have time to strengthen, compact and knit it selfe well together: they saw that without Danger they could not molest the King, and were in hopes the more readily to obtain Pardon from the

the Romans, if they bore not arms against them. The first cause of disension, as is usual among Thieves, arose from an unequal division of the Plunder. Decius in the sedition was calt out and berook himself to Messana, the souldiers at Rhegium chose M. Cestus his Secretary for their Commander, and Decius carrying with him a great bank of money, was honour'd with the same dignity by the Mamertines, though his fortune was neither prosperous nor of continuance. For it hapned, that being troubled with sore eyes, he caused some Eminent Physician to be sought out for him; the Divine Vengeance hereby overtaking the wicked man with most sharp and bitter punishments: A Physician was therefore brought unto him, who prov'd to be by birth a Rhegian, but because he had lived so long at Messana, his original was not only unknown to Decius, (who would never have trusted himself to the mercy of a Rhegian) but likewise to most of the inhabitants of the City.

He being mindfull of his Country and resolving now to be revenged for its Calamities, perswaded Decius that the remedie he brought, was indeed strong in Operation, but of quick and most certaine efficacy: So applying the medicine which he had temper'd with the Juice of Cantharides, and giving order it should not be removed till he returned to the Patient, without delay he takerit ship, and flyeth from Messana. Decius being along time sufficiently tormented with incredible paines, seeing his Physician came not at him commanded the Medicament to be removed, which being washed off, he perceived himself to be stark blind. So that being now a blind Exul, infamous and dispis'd, he is referred to judgement, as if he were bound in Chaines, by a wonderfull Method of Divine Vengeance, in that he received this Plague from one to whom he had trusted his health, even as he himselfe had by Cruelty and treachery circumvented those whom he ought to have protected. 'Tis fit such Examples as these should be recorded in History and transmitted to posterity, for the Benefit of mankind which is never sufficiently convinced how farre these Cunning practises are different from wisdom and right reason; so that neglecting the Rules of Virtue, Honesty, and Fidelity, they doe for love of false and onely seeming good things by foul and villanous lusts involve themselves in true Evils.

OW at Rome, part of their forces being kept at home for guard of the City, and for a reserve against the uncertain chances of war, the Armies and Provinces were committed to the charge of the new Consuls. P. Lævius Lavinus was design'd against the Tarentines and Pyrrhus, and T. Coruncianus sent to finish the Etrurian War. Lavinus, thinking it would much avail as to his own reputation, so to the Terror of the enemies to provoke them first; and that it was profitable to the Commonwealth, to avert the fear and inconveniences of War, as far as might be, from the Roman Territories; leading his Army into Lucania, did there fortifie a Castle in a convenient place, furnishing it with a strong Garrison, both to retard the proceedings of Pyrrhus, and to keep the Lucanians in awe, whose treachery was feared, lest they should dare to revolt to the enemy. Pyrrhus having intelligence of the Roman Consul's approach, though his forces were not yet assembled together, judging it both dishonourable and hurtful now in the beginning of the War to manifest any token of Fear, with what strength he had at present, did forthwith march out to meet him. But that he might find some colourable pretence to draw out the business and gain time, he sent a Messenger with Letters of these Contents: Pyrrhus the King wishes Health to Lævius, I understand that thou art come forth forth with thine army against the Tarentines, but leaving it for a while, come thou unto me with a small Retinue, and I, taking cognizance of the quarrel, will compel even those who are unwilling, to yield one to the other in what is equal and right. To this Lavinus answer'd, We neither accept of thee as an Arbitrator of our Controversie, nor fear thee as an Enemy. But thou seemest to do very absurdly in assuming to thyself the Judgment of other mens Causes, who art thyself guilty of a Crime, and hast not as yet received due punishment for enring Italy without our consent. Know then that I come no less against thee than the Tarentines, to try our Right and Title with a just army, by the Judgment of Mats the Author and Founder of our Nation. And without delay moving his Ensignes, he sits down between the Cities of Pandofa and Heraclea, in a Champaign ground, being divided from the Enemies Camp by the River Sirinus.

It is reported that Pyrrhus, walking down to the River side to view the Roman campe, when he had well and diligently consider'd it, said to one of his friends, Megacles by name, These Barbarians have martial'd their Army after no barbarous manner, but wee shall see try what metal they are of. Then having plac'd strong guards upon the banks, to hinder their Passage through the Fordes, he resolv'd to expect the coming of his Companions, not onely for the Reason of War, hoping the Romans in an enemies Country would quickly be in want of necessary accommodations, but as much regarding the spirit and confidence of Lavinus; whose admiration was by a new Testimonie encreas'd with him, in that he had freely without punishment dismissed those spies, which were sent to view his Campe, telling them moreover, That he had another Army bigger than this. In the mean time the Campe being no more, there were many Pickereerings and light skirmishes which tended nothing to the main chance. Almost fifty dayes being now spent in these light skirmishes, the Consul being moved with the same reasons to hasten the fight, as Pyrrhus was to defer it, assembling his Souldiers together, gave them to understand his Intentions and encourag'd them against the fear of a new enemy, extenuating, as much as might be, the fame of Pyrrhus, and the Terror of the Elephants; at length preparing himself for all assays, he resolveth either to fight the enemy by Consent, or to compel him to Battell. Therefore seeing Pyrrhus still continue in his resolution, he sendeth out beforehand all his horse, as if to forrage the Country, himself with his Legions in Battell Array, expecting all the tumult and noise on the other side of the River should give them warning. The horse fetching a compais far from the Camps, cross'd the River where no Guard was, and immediately advance to the enemies stations on that side the River: The Epicroti terrified with their sudden approach, betook themselves to their Camp. Pyrrhus understanding the enemy was so near, marcheth in all haste to the River with his whole body of horse, consisting of three thousand, hoping the Romans in their passage through a blind Ford, striving with the stream and unevenss of the ground, and breaking their orders, might there be vanquish'd. But the Roman horse interposing themselves, Pyrrhus riding at the head of his Troops, conspicuous in his shining armor, of singular strength of Body and Resolution of mind, he managed the fight every way correspondent to his Fame and Reputation. He so exactly order'd the whole Battell with his Counsel and Directions, as if he were free from all other labour; yet, as occasion serv'd, he would charge and fight in person, as if to him belong'd only the Office of a Private Souldier, and that the care of the General issue were another mans business. In the mean time one Leontius a Macedonian, having obeyed a certain enemy, who neglecting all others, intended himself only against the King, as he flew up and down the field, directing his horse to whatsoever quarter he spied him in, gave Pyrrhus notice of it, who answer'd, Noman can avoid the Fate of Mortals, but neither this Italian, nor any other, shall grapple with me without his reward, and due punishment. He had scarce spoken the words, when Oplacus (so was the man named, a Captain of one of the Frentan Troops) wounded the Kings horse with his Spear, Leontius likewise wounding his, whereupon the Kings friends round besetting him killed Oplacus, stoutly fighting for himself, and delivered the King. But this accident did much daunt the Kings party, as believing him to be slain: Wherefore to confirm his Souldiers, as likewise to decline dangers intended against him, he changed his Armour and weapons with Megacles, and leaving him in the Fight, went himself to order and lead up the Regiments. The Roman Legions were now come up, and the Battell a long time fiercely continued with so doubtful success, that 'tis reported Fortune seven times changed, sometimes the Romans sometimes the Epicroti turning their backs.

But the death of Megacles had like to have reduc'd Pyrrhus his affairs even to a most desperate condition, who being in the Kings armour was assaulted by every valiant Enemy who affected the Glory of slaying the King: And at length an Horseman, Dexter by name, having kill'd him, and taking off his Helmet and Gorget, with loud crys carried them to the Consul, thereby ingenerating a believe in both the Armies of the Kings Death. Hereupon the Gracians were full of Terror and Consternation, and no doubt had immediately quitted the Field, but that Pyrrhus altho' as might be, uncovering his head rode up and down, with a loud voyce witness'ing, That he was a live, and present amongst them, hereby taking away as much Confidence from the Romans, as feare and Despaire from his owne Souldiers. Lavinus perceiving the Time come, wherein to trie the utmost Remedy, gaveth the Signe to his Horsemen whom he had plac'd in Ambush, to fall upon the backe of the enemy. But Pyrrhus against this this Troupe commanded his Elephants to be led, which he had likewise reserved for the last Terror to the enemy. This one Contrivance dash'd all the Romans hopes, and gave the Issue of the Battaille clearly on Pyrrhus his side. For the men themselves being all onfisted at the vast bulk of their bodies, and the terrible shew of armed Warriors on their backs thought they had rather seen some strange and formidable Monster, then the shape of any Creature by Nature produced; and as for the horse, they being frightened with the sight, smell and noise of beasts they had never before seen, did forthwith, confounding their ranks, flee every one what way was most open; and either shaking off their riders, or against their wills forcing them to flight, they ran upon their own battell, and filled all things with fear and tumult. The Restors of the Elephants following the pursuit, many of those that fled were wounded from those who stood in the Towers upon the Elephants, and more were kill'd and trodden under foot by the beasts themselves. The Consul making use of his best skill, did as yet keep his main battell together, till, by the command of Pyrrhus, the Thessalian wing being sent amongst them, did rout and scatter them, not being able to resist. And no question but in the place they were hemm'd in, they had every man been slain or taken prisoner, but that, besides the Culm of Pyrrhus, who, thought it not General like too severely to press upon those who fled, left by despair of safety they should be provoked to make more sharp resistance, the evening likewise being far spent compell'd them to relinquish the pursuit. Fortune likewise favour'd the remnant of the unfortunate Army, in that an Elephant being wounded turned back and with its braying confounded the rest. This putting a Remora to the enemy, gave liberty to those that fled to cross the River into Apulia, where they sheltered the selves in a fenced City against the present danger. I find that in this fight there were fourteen thousand eight hundred and seventy foot of the Romans and their friends slain, with two hundred and fourscore horsemen; there were taken in all eight hundred and twenty Colours. Whereby I wonder the more why some Authors, who undertake exactly to relate this encounter, deny that any notice was taken how many were wanting on the Kings side; whereas Dionysius writeth, that Lavinus lost little lesse then fifteen thousand, and that on the Victor's side thirteen thousand fell. But Hieronimus Cardianus, an impartial writer of those times, affirms, That of the Roman army there fell but seven thousand, and of the Kings army under four thousand. But this is by all agreed on, that the Victory call'd Pyrrhus the very Flower both of his Captains and Souldiers, and that he was heard Orosius to say, He was no less Conquer'd then Conqueror in that Battell. And when he offer'd the spoils and gifts to Jupiter of Tarentus, he confess'd as much, inscribing that sentence in the Title; and when his friend complain'd, he repli'd, Of a truth, if I obtain such another Victory, I shall return into Epirus without e're a Souldier. I have likewise an Author that the King himself received a grievous wound in this fight, but because others report no such thing, and that I often see the circumstances of several battels confounded, I dare not in the general silence of so many and those more accurate Authors, give credit to one single one.

That it was fought with great animosity and valour, this one argument is sufficient, That when Pyrrhus next day view'd the slain corps (which for the reputation of his Humanity and Clemency he caused to be buried) he finding that all the Romans died with honourable wounds, having their faces turn'd to the enemy, he cry'd out, How rarely were it for me to gain the Empire of the whole world, if I had but Roman Souldiers. Neither did he defer with any complement and large promises to court those who were in his power, to receive pay under him, and not being able to persuade them, he did, nevertheless treat them with great humanity and clemency, freeing them from chains and whatever other reproach usually attends the fortune of prisoners. But the Romans thus batter'd by the late fight were terrified with another misfortune, though not of so great loss, yet which caus'd more fear and Religious horror. For it was imputed to the manifest anger of the gods, that their men who were sent forth for forrage and relief, were overtaken by a sudden and most violent Tempest, wherein four and thirty were amidst the stupendious noise of the Heavens, struck dead by Thunderbolts, and two and twenty smitten and left half dead, their Cattel also by the same storm were most of them slain or made of no use.

Pyrrhus in the mean time having taken the empty and forsaken Camp of the Romans, made quick use of his victory, waiting all the Neighbour Countries, and turning many people from the Roman friendship. The Lucanians and Samnites then come in to him, whom lightly chiding, That they had not assisted him in the battell, he nevertheless gave them part of the spoils; therein much rejoicing and exulting, That by his own strength, with no other aid but that of the Tarentines, he had slain so many of the Romans. Pyrrhus being thus intent in reaping the fruit of his Victory, Lavinus on the other side curing his wounded, and recollecting his disperd men, had gathered together a force no way contemptible, and the Senate (though many imputed the losse only to the Consul's default, and Fabius said, It seem'd to him, that the Romans were not beaten by the Epicroti, but Lavinus by Pyrrhus) decreed a recruit and supply to be sent him. When the Cryer proclaimed, That they who would serve their Country in the place of them who were slain, should give in their names, they listed themselves so fast, that presently they completed the number of two Legions.

The Consul recruited with these forces, follow'd the steps of Pyrrhus, vexing his Army with what inconveniences he could. And understanding the Kings Resolution to seize upon Capua, leading his Army thither in haste, he prevented him, and preparing all things for Defence, he deterr'd him from assaulting the City. Pyrrhus turning his Course to Naples, and there likewise being frustrated of his Expectation, forthwith by long journeys marcheth toward Rome into Latine high way, and now having pass'd through Ardea, and the Hernician Territories, taking in Fregella by the way, he was come to Praeneste within Twenty miles of the City; But the Magistrates there, alfoon as they understood of the Overthrow, had by Order of the Senate armed their choice young men: and the Fortune of the Roman People had in this the time of their Necessity, provided them another very strong help and succour; For the other Consul Tib. Coruncanius encountering the Etrurians with better success, had tied the whole Nation to new Covenants, and being called back by the Senate to the Defence of his Country, having no other Enemy to distrust him, came home with his Victorious Army. Pyrrhus having in vain attempted to draw the Etrurians again into Arms, and considering that, besides a City secure with its own guards, he had two Consuls with their Armies, one on the Front, the other on his Rear, returned back into Campania; where meeting Levinus with greater forces then before his Overthrow, he said, He had to deal with a Lernæan Hydra, whose heads being lately brack off, spring up again in a greater Number; yet continuing in his former Victory, he drew out his Army and martial'd it as resolving to fight, and that he might discover the Chief faults of his souldiers, and likewise terrifie the Enemy, he caus'd his men to shout and the Elephants to be provoked to bray. But the Romans returned a farre greater and more terrible shout, whereby conjuncting the Spirits of each, he judg'd it fit to abstain from fight at the Present, and complaining of ill omen in the Entralles of sacrifices, he drew back his Army first into his Camp, and afterward with much plunder and a great Troop of Captives, to Tarrentum.

The Romans (who in their hardest times had remitted nothing of their Constancy, but as to the main Issue of the warre always spake high, as conceiving ample hopes) thinking this a most fitt time to give rewards and Encouragement to Virtue, decreed a Triumph to L. Aemilius Barbula for those exploits performed in his Consulship. He triumphed A.D. the fourth of the Ides of July, over the Tarentines, Samnites, and Salentines who were Auxiliaries of the Tarentines. But P. Valerius was order'd to draw the Remains of his Conquer'd Army into the Saune field, there to fortifie his Camp, and cause them to winter in their huts; About the same time the Senate disputing whether it were fit to redeem the Captives, resolv'd affirmatively; that which chiefly perswaded them, was I believe the Horsemen's Case, for they had stoutly maintained the fight during the absence of the Elephants, at whose approach the horse without any fault of the Riders yielded them up to Death, and to Bonds; upon this Errand were sent Embassadors of Principall Dignity, P. Cornelius Dolabella famous for his Delolation of Sena in Gallia, C. Fabricius Licinus, and Q. Aemilius Tappus, who two years since were Colleagues in the Consulship: Pyrrhus by Nature was Endow'd with humanity, the inseparable Companion of great Spirits, and that he did encrease by his Ambition, according to the Vulgar Error, esteeming all Virtues the servants to Domination, to which only being intemperate given, he did direct all his Counsells for the attaining it; And though he were not inferior to any Commander of that Age in Boldness of mind and the Arts of Warre, yet was he wont to try all meanes before he came to Blows; he would sollicite the mind of his Enemy as he saw most opportune with Fears, or Desires, or Pleasure, or Mercy, or with equality and benefit of Conditions. Therefore understanding Embassadors were coming from Rome, and judging so many Consular men were not sent but upon some Grand Affaires; he was in good hopes they would treat of Compounding a Peace. Therefore that their access might be the safer and the more honourable, he sent Lyco (by nation a Molossian) even to the borders of the Tarentine Territories, to meet them with a Guard. Himselfe on Horseback with rich Caparisons met them without the Gates, and having magnificently brought them in, he entertain'd them with all Respect, liberality and plenty that might be.

They preminding somewhat tending to Moderation of the mind, as how great the Inconsistency of Fortune is, how sudden the Changes of Warre, and that future Consequences cannot be foreseen, deliver their Message. That they came to receive their Captives, whether he would assist them at a Certain price to be redeemed, or to be exchanged for Tarantines and others. Pyrrhus whose Custom it was, not to transact any thing of moment without advice of his friends, convened them now together; and Milo's Opinion was, That he should detain the Captives, make use of the fortune, and not cease the Warre till he had thoroughly subdued the Romans; Cinas his Counsell was very different, for, speaking first of the Confrancy of the Senate and People of Rome, which they had often shown even in the hardest times to be invincible; he added moreover, As for other Enemies 'tis likely we may hate their manners or contemne their Armes, but with this Nation, O King, 'tis better making Friendship then Warre, and 'tis convenient not only to return the Captives, but freely to dismiss them without Ranfome: Neither is any delay to be made, but that you send back the Embassadors with Presents, to conclude Peace upon equal Terms: For this I take to be the time, wherein with honour and Credit you may accomplish a Business (in my judgement) very necessary. For now your affairs having succeeded prosperously, you shall both more easily than I can obtain what you desire, and likewise seem for no other Cause but the innate Greatness and Goodness of your mind, to offer Peace unto those whom you might by force have reduced into Slavery. And scarce be it from I see, but that Thy Desires should prosper as they have begun: Yet We are not Men, and if Fortune change her side, neither will it be so easy a matter to Obtain Peace, neither can it with so much honour be treated on. When the rest are baffled in the same Opinion, the King himselfe likewise assenting, commanded the Roman King-embassadours to be called, to whom he spake in this Manner: Towr Errand, Romans, seemeth to me very unworthy, for having no Consideration of intring into Friendship with me, you require back the Prisoners of Warre, whom being restor'd, you are ready presently to make use of against me. If therefore you will intend your Minds on better Counsell, beneficiall to both Parties, and make a League and Society with me, I will restore all your Citizens and Companions in Armes without price or Ransom; otherwise if you continue hostility, I shall think it no wise part, to strengthen your Hatred against me with the hands of so many Valiant men. Neither is Money so scarce With me as to need any from the Romans whom it would better become, if we were Friends, to be enriched by my bounty. Withall he commanded gifts of good value to be given the Embassadors, with promise he would bestow more and of greater Price. These things were spoken and acted openly in the Presence of all the Embassadors. But with C. Fabricius he had afterward a longer and more serious discourse. Neither shall I think it unfit to relate what I find in good Authors. When therefore they had speech together in secret without witness, among other things 'tis reported the King said thus: My desire is to have all the Romans my Friends, but especially your selfe, whom I esteem above all others, as most eminent in Civill and Military virtues, only one Thing I am troubled to find wanting in you, that having but slender substance you are not able to maintain that Port and Splendour which justly attends Great men, as their Due; But I will not suffer you any longer to be sensible of this Injury, and despite of Fortune, I will freely bestow so large a summe of Gold and Silver, as you shall easily exceed the Revenues of the Richest. For I am perswaded it belongs to my Place and Fortune, to relieve the hard Wants of Worthy men, who have endeavour'd more to obtaine Glory then Wealth: Truly I think it to be a faire and honourable Work, and that there cannot be, either a more illustrious monument of Kingly Magnificence, or a more precious and Acceptable Offering unto the Gods: so that I shall rather think you do me a Courtesie, then receive one at my hands, if you will suffer your selfe to be relieved by my Plenty. Neither truly would I urge this to you if on my side only the Bounty should seem Glorious, on your side the Acceptance dishonourable. But now seeing I tempt you not to Treason or the commission of any such misbecoming your Grave Manners, what Reason is there why you should with a resolute and obdurate mind refuse a small Gift, with a free and Friendly intent offered? For I desire nothing of you, but what may, nay of duty ought to be done by the best of Men, and most tender of their Country's Good, that you would perswade the Senate to forsake their wilful stubbornness, and recall their mindes to Equity and milder Counsells, giving them to understand the Truth, that neither can the Warre be continued without your great Loss and Danger, neither can I (having promised help to the Tarentines, and proved Victor in the first Battell) without manifest breach of faith, and diminution of mine Honour relinquish it. Neither indeed do I delight in fighting with you whom I judge far more worthy my Friendship then my Hatred, and had much rather returne home into mine owne Kingdom, where many buisnesses in the interim arise, which require my presence. And for this I will give you what assurance you shall desire, whereby you may be satisfied concerning my Intentions, and resolve the Doubts of others, if any shall think it not safe to trust to Kings, by reason of the fault of some, who standing to their Agreements and Covenants so long onely as it seemeth for their Profit, when they perceive any benefit to be gain'd by Change, have chosen rather to break their Faith then lose an Advantage. And when the Peace shall be concluded, there is nothing will please me better, or be more commodious to us Both, then that you would bear me company into Epirus, where you shall have the Principal place among my Subjects, be my Lieutenant in Warre, and Partner of all my Fortunes. For I esteem no Possession more precious then that of a Valiant and Faithfull Friend, and certainly the splendour of a Kingly Fortune, and the Majesty of Royall affaires will become your great Mind. These things if we shall in Common conferre, mutually helping one the other, we shall without any difficulty attain to the greatest Happinesse that man is capable of or can imagine.

When the King had thus made an end of speaking, after a little distance Fabritius answer'd, Concerning my Fortune, if any could be observ'd either in my military or Civil employments, it is needfull for me to discouſe ſeeing you have already truſted the Relation of others concerning it. Neither is neceſſary to declare my poverty, that, being the matter of a little ground and a ſmall Cottage, I maintain my ſelf neither by uſury nor the ſweat of ſervants, but by the labour and exerciſe of my owne Body, ſeeing this alſo you have truly learn't by the diſcouſe of others. But if, either on your owne accord, or following the Opinion of others, you judge me, by reaſon of my poverty, to be in worſe condition then any other Roman, you are wonderfully deceived. For deſpiſing Riches, embracing Vertue, and doing my duty, I was never ſenſible of any miſery; neither in private or publick buſineſſe did I ever repine at my Fortune. For what Reaſon have I to ſpeake ill of fortune, unleſſe I ſhould impute it as a crime to her, that I enjoy all those things which to great and high spirits are most defireable, not only with the Rich, but many times before them? I am dignified with the greatest honours our country affordeth. The heaviest wars are committed to my Charge, I am entrusted with the care of our most holy Devotions, I am call'd into the Senate, my opinion is asked concerning the most weighty affairs, I am commended and cheerfully imitated by many; neither am I of less esteem than the most potent man in the City, I seem unto others an example and pattern of attaining Virtue and Glory; to all this bestowing no cost either of mine own or others. For in other places, where particular mens wealth is great, and the publick stock but small, the Magistrates sustain the dignity and splendour of their office by their own expence: In our City the custome is much different, no private mans fortune being on any side burthened. All this great and glorious pomp, wherewith our Citizens, who are chosen to the administration of grand affairs, are so magnificently fet forth, is of publick allowance; which order maketh all men equal, so that the poorest man shall want nothing for the maintaining either the publick or his own grace, neither shall the richest in any thing abound. Wherefore seeing, though I am the poorest of all, yet I do in no good thing yield to the richest of all; why should I complain of Fortune? should I desire to be equal with Kings, who may board up vast sums and heaps of gold? But hitherto I have spoken in reference to my life in Publick, even in private also my indigence is so far from being a burden or inconvenience to me, that contrariwise, as often as I compare my self with the rich ones, my condition seemeth incomparably more happy, and I reckon my self among those few who have attained to as much Felicity as this life admits of, in which regard I mightily rejoice and give thanks to my Poverty. For it seeming to me idle and foolish to pursue after things superfluous, and that my little ground being rightly till'd and manured yieldeth all necessities; I know not to what end I should be solicitous of greater Riches. My Meat hunger makes sweet to me, and thirst my Drink; after labour my sleep is easie and quiet; my garments, if they defend me from cold, are of proof sufficient; and my household stuff, according as it is apt and fit for those uses it was ordained to, so it very well pleath me. So that herein also I should be injurious to accuse Fortune, that it hath not allowed me larger substance then nature desires, which hath neither ingenerated in me a covetousness of what is too much, nor a dexterity of scraping it together. Wherefore with this poverty I judge my self more wealthy then the richest men, yea, then thy self also, for I have so much that I desire no more, whereas unless you thought your self poor notwithstanding your possession of Epirus, and all other your Territories, why came you over into Italy? But Riches you may object, gives one a fair opportunity of doing good to mankind, and that in your poverty can be bountiful to no body. Truly this troubleth me no more then that in other things also I do not abound: That the gods have not endowed me with knowledge superexcellent, and the Art of Prophecy, and many other the like things, whereby I might benefit those who in these kinds want help. But if I freely communicate to my friends and fellow-Citizens those things which are in my power, and suffer every one in common to participate of what may any way please them, I shall think my self free from that crime of being useless or unprofitable to mankind. Neither would I have you esteem those things small and contemptible, because others seem greater in your eyes, and therefore you are ready to buy men with large bribes. But, if for supplying the necessities of the poor, Riches were altogether to be desired, and that in this respect the possession of moneys were to be reckon'd as a part of Felicity, as you Kings seem to be persuaded; which, think you, were the better way of purchasing wealth, that I should now with disgrace receive it at your hands, or that I should, when it was in my power, have long ago gather'd it upon most honest accounts? For my prosperous management of Publick affairs, hath given me fair opportunities of growing Rich; as often at other times, so especially when four years since, being Consul, and sent with an army against the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians I overcame those large and fertile Territories waiting and spoiling, when being conqueror in many Battels, I took by force and demolish'd wealthy Cities, whereupon the Soldiers being largely rewarded, and all debts paid with the Commonwealth had contracted with private men for carrying on the War, there was yet so much remaining that I carried into the Publick Treasury four hundred Talents. Now after I have forn'd to acquire just and honest Riches by those spoils which were in my hands, and by the example of Valerius Publicola (and others who have advanced the Roman State) have preferred Glory before money, shall I receive gifts of thee, and embrace shameful and dangerous opportunity of growing Rich, having neglected a fair and honourable means? And truly, that wealth I could freely, with pleasure, and good confidence have expended in just and honest uses, which what I receive of you I cannot do: For that money is rather to be accounted lent then below'd which proceeds from another's bounty; and however it be given and received under the specious pretence of hospitality, friendship or good will, 'tis burthenome to an Ingenious and high Spirit till it be restored. And what do you think will be the issue of this business when it is known (as conceal'd it cannot be) if the Censours, who with ample authority exercise the superinspection of Manners amongst us, shall (according to that power wherewith they are invested to enquire into the Lives of the Citizens, and punish those who deviate from the Institutions of our Fathers) publicly summon me to give an account of the reasons, why I received any Gifts from thee?

Many

Many report that Pyrrhus, resolving at any rate to winne a man of such Excellent vertue, did yet more earnestly tempt his Constancy, and after other magnificent promises, making a professor of half his Kingdom could not therewith move him, but that till he perswaded to deny the Accomplishment of the Kings desires, For, saies he, I am an evil man, why doe you court me? If good, why would you corrupt me? adding moreover, That this business would prove neither pleasing nor profitable to Pyrrhus if it should succeed, for if he should make use of his liberty, 'twould be hateful both to the King and his Friends, as for his Justice and Abstinence, if the Epitars once had experience of them, they would forsake the King and apply themselves wholly to him. These things, and what hereafter I shall add, being by various Authors related, I thought neither inconvenient nor unprofitable to collect and declare, that the mind and sense of those men may be known, who supported the Roman State in most difficult times, and improv'd it to that incomparable height of Glory and Empire it attain'd to: and that by a clear example it may be apprehended, what Virtues and Manners ought to be practis'd by those men, who would become objects of Admiration, and transmit to their posterity a more flourishing Commonwealth then they received from their Ancestours. These things being spoken and heard on both sides, the King at present contented himself, but on the morrow, causing Fabricius to be lent for, he prepared an Elephant before hand to frighten him, who standing at their backs behind the hangings, as they were discouraging, the hangings being on a sudden withdrawn, at the Masters command laid his snout on Fabricius his head, making a most horrid noise; but he, being a man of a settled spirit, gravely turning himself about, smil'd, saying, Neither yesterday did your gold entice me, nor to day your beast terrifie me. Afterwards being let at supper, when he heard Cinatus discouraging of the Grecian Philosophers of the Sell of Epicurus, that they esteemed Pleasure the greatest good, and the cares of the Commonwealth the chiefest hinderance of Felicity: That the gods in their opinion led such a life free from the care of humane affairs, free from all afflictions either of anger against the wicked, or favour to the good, giving themselves over wholly to idleness and pleasure: Fabricius thereupon is said to cry out, The gods grant that Pyrrhus and the Samnites would practise this wisdom while they wage War with the people of Rome. These were the manners of those times, this was the Emulation of great men, to excel not in wealth or Luxury, but in Virtue, in Counsel, in Patience, in the Love of their Country. Neither were these sudden Motions and fits, or speeches premeditated out of hypocrisy for the present occasion, but they did confirm the faith of their words by the constant Tenour of their Lives, whereby they are rather to be admired then imitated by our Age. The same Fabricius when all his silver plate consisted of one Sale-celler and a little dish, which yet was sustained by an horning foot, the Samnite Embassadors presenting him with a gift of money and very rich household stuff, set his hands to his ears, thence to his eyes, nose, mouth, throat, and at length to his belly, saying, As long as I can command these, nothing shall be wanting to me, carry ye back your money to those who stand in need of it.

After the same manner he spent his whole life, inasmuch as in all his Patrimony there was not sufficient whereby to raise Portions for his Daughters; (an Honourable poverty 1) so that the Senate caused money for that purpose to be disbursed out of the Publick Treasury, being ashamed to let those Virgins pass without Dowry, whose Father was not ashamed to leave so. The same virtue and continence was found in other Princes of the Senate; among the rest Q. Fabius who had to often been in Chief command, and having once borne the Censurship denied to be made Censur againe, saying, It was not for the good of the Commonwealth, that the same men should often be chosen Censur; he died with the same Testimony both of his poverty, and the peoples Love; for after his Death they below'd so much money that his son Q. Gurgus did below a dose of flesh upon the people, & likewise made a publick Feast. Curius out of the same gallantry of mind refus'd the gifts of the Sabines as Fabricius did the Samnites: Emilius Papus, who was in most offices Colleague with Fabricius, also Tib. Cornicius, and many other men of great note, by reason of their likenes in manners, lived together in great love and friendship: So that the Poet seems to me to have conceived in his mind the Idea of those differences with this Nation, and immediately rebored two hundred of the Captives without Redemtion, and gave leave likewise to all the rest to go to Rome and visit their friends at the Feast of Saturn now approaching, relying only on the word of Fabricius, who promised, That when the Holy-days were past they should return, unless peace were in the mean time concluded.

And such was the Gravity of the Senate, and the fidelity of every single Person, that at a Day by the Fathers appointed, they every man redelivered themselves up to Pyrrhus, having in vain urged their Country-mens obdurate minds to Articles of Peace. For the Crafty King, thinking this to be a nick of time for his purpose, while the Romans being mollified with the sight of their dearest friends, and desirous of retaining them, might happily be the more ready to lay down all thoughts of hatred and hostility, resolved now to send an Embassage to Rome to Treat of Peace on those Conditions he had propounded to Fabricius in Person. He desired, That the Tarentines might be comprehended in the League, That the other Gracians inhabiting Italy might continue free, living according to their own Laws: That whatsoever the Appian

Romans had taken away from the Samnites, Apulians, Lucanians and Brutians might be restored; and in Livy, the Romans should receive their Captives without Ransom. Cincas of whom mention hath formerly been made, was at that time with Pyrrhus, a man as of great knowledge in Civil affairs, so of very honest principles, and who had by exercise improved his natural wit to a marvellous eloquence: For these his qualities he was very dear to the King, who often acknowledged, He had won more Cities by the Eloquence of Cincas, than by his own Arms. This man being sent Ambassador to Rome, with much cunning delay'd making his address to the Senate, till he had in Pyrrhus his name distributed many gifts in the houses of the principal men. Being then brought into the Court, when he had in many words, extolled the virtue of Pyrrhus, and his inclination towards the Romans, he discoursed of the Equity of the conditions he brought, inasmuch that great part of the Senate were moved to accept them: because besides other conveniences, he promised, if they would delist molesting his friends, he would furnish them with aid sufficient for the Conquest of all the rest of Italy. But, because the Consultation lasted many days (the Fathers being very solicitous in a business of so great consequence) and thereby a suspicion and rumor was spread, that peace would be concluded, Appian Claudius, who by reason of his Age and blindness, had of a long time been absent from the Senate, caused himself now to be carried thither in his Litter, where he no sooner appeared, but his sons and sons in law with all Reverence and Duty receiving him, conducted him to a place becoming his Dignity. Every one being silent both at the novelty of the thing, and with the respect they bore his person, and expecting for what cause, after so long absence and retirement, he should now come into the Senate: he beginning his discourse with the affliction of his sickness, said, 'His Blindness' had indeed hitherto been very grievous to him, but now 'he was not only delighted in it, lest he should behold those things which were doing, but was 'sorry that his ears also were not deaf, that he might not hear things so fordid and unworthy the name of the Romans. For what is become of your noble minds? whether are your 'spirits fallen? Ye were wont to be of opinion, when ye heard the Fame of Alexander the 'Macedonian renowned as of an invincible King, that his glory was more to be imputed to his 'Fortune than his Virtue; that if the Fates had allotted him a Roman War, both the event, and likewise his esteem amongst men would have proved far different. But now, behold how 'ye are degenerated from that your Magnanimity; ye once thought ye were able to conquer the Macedonians, and now ye stand in fear of Molossians and Chaonians, the perpetual prey 'of the Macedonians. Ye once contemned Alexander, and now are frighted by Pyrrhus, not the servant of Alexander, but his servants servant, who flying from his old enemies rather than seeking new, is come over into Italy with a resolution, should it please the gods, to obtain the Empire of Rome, with those forces wherewith he was not able to keep and defend his 'little share of Macedonia. Unless therefore we lend him back well beaten, laden with great 'misfortune, assure your selves, any other Party, deservedly slighting and scorning our Power, will greedily venture into Italy, as to a prey ready prepared to their hands. For what can 'be thought of us, but that we are a cowardly slothful people, if Pyrrhus, being received into 'friendship, shall carry back a Reward for that Disgrace he hath done us, in as much as by his means it is come to pass that the Romans are become a Laughing-stock to the Tarentines and 'Samnites?

This was the main scope of Appian's Oration, which did so inflame the minds of all the Senators, that, following him the Author of a severe Sentence, they with one consent decreed, That the War should be prosecuted, that Cincas should the same day depart the City, that Pyrrhus should be given to understand, That neither he should be admitted into the City, (for that also was desired) neither would they so much as treat of friendship and society, till he had quitted Italy. A like sad decree by Appian his motion was made concerning the Captives, That they should not be led in War against Pyrrhus, neither should they any where be joyed in the same company, but that being sent to several Garrisons, they should, as a note of infamy, change their pay, but that being sent to several Garrisons, they should, as a note of infamy, change their manner of fighting, that they who before served on horse-back, should now be listed among the foot, and they who were of the Legions, should now serve in light armature; That no man should recover his former order, till he had brought in the spoil of two enemies. 'This reported, when the Ambassadors returned with this sharp answer, the King alonist'd at the wonderful constancy of the Romans, asked, What they thought of the City and of the Senate? and that Cincas answer'd, The City seemed to be a Temple of the gods, and the Senate an Assembly of Kings.

After these Transactions, some think, Fabricius was sent an Embassy to the King: but they are easily convinc'd of Error as by the Testimony of other Authors, so by a right Consideration of the Series of Affairs. There being now no hopes of peace, they converted all their thoughts to War, and busied themselves on both sides all winter in making diligent preparations. These I take to be the Times wherein Pyrrhus is reported, (for the avoiding the Dangers of Shipwreck, and a more convenient passage of the Italian and Epirot Succours one to the other) have had thoughts of making Bridges between Hydrunt, where Italy gets farthest into the sea, and Apollonia, a Town situate on the adverse shore, some fifty miles distant: For that is the Breadth of the Sea in those places between the Grecian and Italian shores. M. Terevins Varro is said afterward to have made the like Attempt, when, being Cn. Megnius his Lieutenant tenant in the war against the Pirates, he guarded the Sicilian and Ionian seas with his Navy. In the midst of these doings Tib. Coruncanius the Consul Triumphed A. D. of the Calends of February. This year was a remarkable Cenfourship in that a Lustration of the army was then first made by one of a Plebeian Rank. There were cessed two hundred seventy eight thousand, two hundred twenty two Citizens. About these times it was that Q. Fabius Maximus was wont to be chosen Prince of the Senate; and by conjecture we gather, his son Q. Gurgus was Censor at that Time. Cn. Domitius certainly was, for he lustrated the Army, and his name is famous for enlarging the Privileges of the People. Pyrrhus in the beginning of the spring, calling together the Forces of his Confederates, marched into Apulia, where he took many Towns, some by Force, some by Composition: Against whom the two new Consuls P. Scipius Saverrius, and P. Decius Mus went forth with two Armies pitching Camp against Camp, near Asculum a City of Apulia, of the same name with that City of the Picentes. No doubt was made of Fighting, but they were many days hindered as by a deep Torrent running between them, so by mutual fear on each side. The Romans were troubled with remembrance of the former Battell wherein Pyrrhus was victorious: The Epirots were daunted at the Roman obstinacy, but chiefly at the name of the other Consul, so fatal to the Enemies Legions: For it was given out that P. Decius alter the Example of his Father and Grandfather would purchase the Victory with his Death; and the issue of those Battells wherein they died, did make the expectation of the Decian Devotion to be terrible to all men.

Pyrrhus thinking it a matter not to be neglected, assembling his souldiers together, thus instructed them. That the Event of Battels was not in the Power either of the Goddes 'Earth, or of the Infernal Deities, who were invoked by that Charm, that they ought not to believe the Gods to be so unjust as to alter the fates of Armies, and below conquests for one mad-man's fake; that victories are not obtained by juggling tricks, and superstition, but by fighting onely; as appears by the Testimony of the Romans themselves, who come not into the field with troops of Priests and Prophets, but with Legions of armed souldiers to oppose the Enemy: But because the ignorant are commonly more terrified with these superstitious delusions, then with true causes of fear, he shewed that this fear might be prevented, by shewing the Habit wherein the former Decii had Devoted themselves, and warning the souldiers if they met any Man in the like accoutrement not to assault him with any weapon, but to take him alive. He caused likewise a Message to be sent to Decius, That he should forbear playing the fool amongst armed men, neither should his Plot take Effect, that if he came alive into his hands he should perhaps endure more torments than he was willing. 'Twas answer'd by the Consuls, They had Confidence enough in their Armes, neither had any need of so desperate a Design, which they might be assured of, they gave him his Choice, whether he would come over the River interjacent, or Expell the Romans on his side the water; that they would willingly withdraw their forces to give him a safe passage over, or, if he would retire, they would bring over their men, that on each side encountering with their strength entire, demonstration might be made, that they repos'd all their hopes of victory in their men, and their Courage, and in no other thing: Pyrrhus was affamed of betraying any kind of fear or Doubt; he accepted therefore of the latter Condition and gave the Enemy Liberty of fording the River. The Terror of the Elephants was not now so great to the Romans, as being accustomed to see them, so having had Experience that their snouts might easily be cut off, as one was in the last fight at one blow by C. Minucius the foremost Pkeman of the Fourth Legion. But now they bethought themselves of safer guards and Defences; They caused horses cloathed with Iron plates to draw Chariots, which were likewise full stuck with spears fastned in Iron sockets; in the Chariots were placed souldiers who with darts or fire should avenge the fury of the Elephants. The Legions with this furniture having passed the River, Pyrrhus in a singular and Excellent manner martial'd his Army, according to his Custom wherein he was thought to exceed all Commanders of his Time. Observing therefore the Nature of the place, which by reason of the Ruggedness of the Ground, and the multitude of Officers thereabouts growing, would well admit of a foot Army onely; he placed his horse and Elephants in the Reserve. The Right wing he strengthened with his own souldiers and the Samnite Auxiliaries, The Brutians Lucanians and Sallentinis he placed in the midst, the Tarentines, whose virtue he least confided in, he order'd in the middle. The Consul's main body consisted of their Legions, some of the light Armature being conveniently intermixt; and with the like Discretion they distinguished the Orders of their Reserves. The horse were distributed into the Wings, being no hindrance to the Foot fight, and yet upon occasion pfer'd, ready for Action. The Armies being equal, not only in Courage but in number (for they were forty thousand strong on both sides) disputed the business with as much heat and animosity as could be expected, and the Victory inclining to neither side, the night broke off the Fight. The next Morning Pyrrhus when he had guarded the most difficult places, forced the Romans to defend into a more even and open ground; there he had some use of his Elephants, which being suddenly brought in to that part of the Battell where the Chariots were prepared against them, they frighted the horse (even as it hapned in the last fight) and caused them to fly; but to the Foot they did little harme. The Report of this Fight is much different from that of the former, for some Authors affirm, The Romans had the upper hand, their Victory being occasion'd by an accident, for the Apulians (who were by the Kings Order sent against those who came to surprise the Carriages) by their departure seeming to fly, by a mean error and false fear caus'd all the Kings forces to quit the field and fly indifferently. The number of the slain is likewise exprest, That on Pyrrhus his side twenty thousand, on the Romans side five thousand and were wanting, that the King with a dart shot through his arm was grievously wounded, and that in vain endeavouring to stay the flight of his men, was by his Life-guard brought out of the field one of the last, that on his side three and fifty Colours were left, on the Romans eleven, and that Fabricius the other Consuls Lieutenant was likewise wounded. But contrariwise, others say, This Battle had the like event with the former, though the Romans by reason of the vicinity of their Camps sustained not so much loss, but that they did successfully fly, and left six thousand men; that Pyrrhus left three thousand five hundred and five, as it is in the Kings Chronicles registered, by the Testimony of Hieronimus.

And not only variety but Repugnancy of Authors moves me rather to incline to those who report the event of this Battle to have been doubtful: for 'tis ordinary after an equal encounter for each part to attribute the victory to themselves, which by the negligence or Impudence of others is committed to writing, doing very ill to deliver to Posterity are partially related. Wherefore their history seems more probable who affirms, That there was but one Fight near Asculum, and that, after an hot dispute and much blood-shed, the Sun being now set, the Kings wound and the loss of the Baggage did with much ado break off the fight: That then both Armies founded a Retreat, when on both sides there were slain about fifteen thousand; and that this was the time when Pyrrhus answer'd out who congratulated his victory, If the Romans are thus to be vanquish'd we are none our selves. And indeed the sequel confirms this Opinion, for Pyrrhus retired to Tarentum, and the Consuls, making no pursuit after the enemy, distributed their forces into winter quarters in Apulia, whereas the time of year gave them leave, and Reasons of War might well have perswaded them, to have prosecuted so glorious a victory. Moreover I find not that these Consuls made any Triumph, and many think that P. Decius in this Battle devoted himself, who dying as did his Father and Grandfather, yielded himself the Third sacrifice, without intermission out of the same family, for the good of the Commonwealth. Which as I had no thoughts to gain-fay, 'So should I not have related in the general silence of all History, but that a grave Author M. Tullius Cicero in his books of Philology more than once maketh mention of it. The fight at Asculum thus ended, the rest of the year was quiet and free from all warlike Expeditions, only the whole time spent in Consultation and preparations. Pyrrhus, having lost most of his old forces, friends, and Commanders, that Navy into Epirus with order for a supply of Men and money for next spring. But before that Navy could be set forth, new hopes arising alter'd the Kings Councils: Pyrrhus had sometime the possession of Macedonia, wresting it out of the hands of Demetrius, and again lost it by the Power of Lysimachus; Now while Pyrrhus waged war in Italy, Ptolemaus Ceraninus being slain by the Gauls, there seem'd a new way open into Macedonia, being destitute of a Prince and the state of affairs in Confusion. This Reason perswaded him not to leave Epirus naked of soldiers, left it should be obnoxious to the injuries of the Gauls who now oppress'd the Neighbour nation Macedonia. But Pyrrhus did not as then flee his Course homeward, being upon other Occasions (as shall be related) call'd into Sicily. The winter being past over in these Cares the New Consuls came to the Army C. Fabricius Lucinus, and Q. Aemilius Papus (who before had born a Consulship together) which Pyrrhus understanding drew forth his forces, intending to observe the Marches and Councils of his enemy. Their Camps being not far distant, there happen'd an Accident very remarkable, and by most men related much after the same manner: One Timochares an Ambracian, who held a good honourable place in the Kings favour, secretly came to Fabricius, and promised him, if he would give him an answerable reward, to poison the King; which he thought was easy for him to accomplish by his sons, who were Cup-bearers to the King. Fabricius, no way delighted with the Treason, inform'd the Senate of it. The Senate, not discovering the Treason of Timochares, who had (by what means soever) intended the Roman profit, sent Embassadors to Pyrrhus, who should only in general warn him, That he should look well about him, and take heed of what means service he made use of, and enquire into their faithfulness and honesty. Thus Valerius Antius relates the business. But Claudius Quadrigarius in stead of Timochares make Nicetas the undertaker of this Poisoning, and that notice was given not by the Senate but by the Consuls, reciting also the Letter of the Consuls, wherein they discover Nicetas his design. That they are unwilling to fight by craft, or with money, and wish the King safe from Treason, hoping he will become an Insuperable Ornament to their Victory and Triumph.

Some Report it was the Kings Physician who treated with Fabricius either in person or by Letter, and that upon his discovery, he was hang'd. As there may be doubt in these Circumstances, so no question they are deceiv'd who say that Curius sent back the Physician to the King. This said that Pyrrhus at this time wondering at the Experience of so great Virtue in Enemies, cry'd out, This is that Fabricius, who can with no less difficulty swerve from the Rules of Justice and Honesty, than the Sun be turned out of his Course. He did immediately, lest he should be Overcome with Kindness, return the Romans all the prisoners he had, and sent Cineas again to to obtain peace and friendship. It seem'd dishonourable to receive a gift from the enemy, where-by they might be thought to have abhorred wickedness more for gain than for the love of Virtue, they therefore sent back an equal number of Tarentines and Samnites that their captives might not be received gratis. This public abstinence was to their greater Credit seconded by the virtue and resolution of private persons, when the gifts of Pyrrhus (which Cineas in Great Number and those very precious had Carried to Rome for both sexes) were refused not only by the Men but by the women. For when upon the refusal of some, he profer'd them to others, and others again, there was not so much as one man or woman to be found so mean or covetous as to open a door for the Receipt of a Kings gift. The former answer was now again returned to the Embassadors, That until Pyrrhus had quitted Italy, they would esteem him an Enemy to the people of Rome. While Pyrrhus was much perplexed at these passages, not knowing how to prosecute the War with any cheerfulness, nor willing to depart Italy with any loss of Reputation, the Sicilian affairs did seem to help him, the management whereof (after long and doubtful deliberation) he resolv'd to undertake. For so he thought the Roman war might with credit be declined, and the command of a most Rich Island obtained, he had also an earnest desire of being revenged on the Carthaginians, as being first provoked by them. For they suspecting the Kings designs, had a little before hand sent Mago with a Navy of an hundred and twenty ships, saying, The Romans ought by Foreign aid to be assisted against a foreign enemy. And though the Romans used not their alliance, making answer, That they were not wont to undertake any War but what could be managed by their own force; Yet now this fourth time was the League renewed between the two Commonwealths.

To the former Articles it was added, That whether the Romans or Carthaginians made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be specially excepted, that they might assist one the other, which sever of them were provok'd to War; And, that when either had need of the others help, the Carthaginians should provide ships, each party pay their own soldiers, the Carthaginians aid the Romans by sea, but not be compell'd against their wills out of their ships. Which being agreed upon, Mago went to Pyrrhus under pretence of treating of peace, but indeed to discover the Kings Councils, whom the Carthaginians had under stood to be invited into Sicily: And they offer'd their Navy to the Romans not so much out of any good will or care of their safety, but further to involve Pyrrhus in his Italian War, lest he should spoil their successes in Sicily which flourish'd so prosperously. They had then also guarded the passage into Sicily with a numerous fleet, pretending the siege of Rhegium, but indeed relolving to hinder Pyrrhus from transmitting his Army. For these causes did he wholly apply his mind to the Sicilian affairs, which fill'd him with great hope, as by the state of things, so by the frequent Embassies which came one after another out of the Island, affirm'd, That he was desir'd by the prayers of all men, as the only remedy of their calamities wherewith they were more deeply afflicted than the most miserable Nation under the heavens. For after the death of Agathocles, more lamentable then undervenc'd, one Mene, born at Aegesta, a City of Sicily, who had poison'd the King, endeavouring to usurp the government, was by Hicetas the Pretor expelled the City, and fled to the Carthaginian forces: Hence arose an heavy war and unfortunate to the Syracusans, by which never the less Hicetas in particular strengthened himself, and turning his forces against Phinias of Agrigentum, he held the Island long time in trouble, till by the boldness of one Thenio he was deprived of his Domination which he had held for nine years. Thenio endeavouring to retain the Sovereignty, was resisted by Syssistratus a Syracusan Nobleman. These two along time contell'd, Thenio possessing Naxos, an Island which is part of Syracuse, Syssistratus exercising the Tyranny in the other parts of the City. When at length by these discords they saw nothing but destruction likely to ensue, with one consent they decreed to send for Pyrrhus, who being the son in law of Agathocles, and next in succession, as having a son by Lanassa, was thought fittest to bear rule, as being able by his courage and his forces to settle their affairs. Moreover, the principal men of Agrigentum and Leontium, offering the Government of their Cities, and consequently of the whole Island, unanimously intreated him, To come into Sicily as soon as may be, to succour them with his presence, being wearied with labouring under the heavy burden of a Barbarous slavery. For the Carthaginians having walled their grounds, had besieg'd the City of Syracuse, both by sea and land, with a Navy of an hundred ships, and an Army of fifty thousand men. Pyrrhus therefore without delay sendeth Cineas before (whose wisdom and faith he much trusted to) to agree upon Conditions and Articles of friendship with the Sicilian Cities. At his departure he comforted his Italian confederates, promising, That if they were oppress'd by the Romans he would in speed come out of the neighbour Island much increased with new forces. But when he was about to leave a Garrison in Tarentum, they taking it in ill part, desired, He would either perform his promised assistance on these conditions he was call'd in, or that at least he would leave their City free. They could obtain neither, Pyrrhus returning no other answer, but commanding them, To carry his leisure. The Eptor King being thus employ'd, the Consuls had the easier war against their other enemies. I find they had about this time good success against the Etrurians, Lucanians, Brutians and Samnites. It appears there was no great matter done against the Etrurians, in that there was no Triumph made for that war, neither was the whole nation, but few Cities engaged, who re-issu'd against the Romans those arms they had so lately laid down, being solicited by the Samnites, who found themselves left naked by the departure of Pyrrhus. other nations as the war was more heavy, so was the Victory more illustrious over them. C. Fabricius the Consul (his Colleague, as is imagined, being gone into Etruria, inasmuch as upon the Epirots departure one Consul's Army was thought sufficient) overcame the Lucanians, Brutians, Tarentines and Samnites: Some Cities, among which were Heraclea, he drew into Covenants, and over those people he Triumphed before the Ides of December.

An assembly of the people being held, New Consuls were chosen for the year ensuing, P. Cornelius Rufinus again, and C. Junius Brutus again. Other Nobles were Candidates with Rufinus, but by Fabricius his favour he was chosen. Wherein Fabricius considering the times, prefer'd the publick safety before private quarrels; For by reason of their difference in Manners there was Enmity between these two, Fabricius being of proove against Money was guided only by his care of the common good; Rufinus more greedy of wealth than ordinary, many times order'd his counsels and actions to his private gain. But being otherwise Industrious and a good commander, Fabricius judg'd him to be prefer'd before his Competitors who were far inferior to him in Marshal affaires. 'Tis reported, when Rufinus gave him thanks, That being at enmity with him he had helped him to the Consulship, especially when so great a War was on foot, he answer'd, 'Twas not much to be wonder'd, if he had rather be pillag'd, then sold to the enemy. For there was great War remaining in Italy, and Pyrrhus finding all things goe according to his desire in Sicily (whether he now was gone) 'twas reasonably fear'd he would quickly return a more formidable enemy by the Access of the strength of so Noble an Island.

WHILE these things were doing in Italy, Pyrrhus having shipp'd his Army and Elephants, sail'd from the Tarentine Port into Sicily, after he had continued two years and four months in Italy. Being conducted by Thenio, who met him with his Navy, he was received by the Sicilians with wonderful cheerfulness, freely delivering up into his hands their Towns, their Forces, their Money and their Ships. Being thus in a short time possessor of the dominion of the Græcian Cities, he did also by force of arms extort from the Carthaginians all whatsoever they held, excepting only the City of Lilybæum, which the Carthaginians being helped by its convenient situation, defended against all his assaults. Whence justly conceiving great and vast hopes in his mind, he resolv'd, leaving his eldest son the Patrimony of his Father, to settle the other two, the one King of Italy, the other King of Sicily. Both the reputation and virtues of this King were indeed at that time very great; and the Sicilians having for many years sustained both foreign and civil wars, and a plague worse then both, the tyranny of usurpers, seem'd willing with joy to entertain any indifferent Prince over them. But when, a little after, he proceeded to raise moneys against their wills, and put to death some of their Nobles, he contracted much hatred, which was encreas'd by the covetousness and arrogance of his Officers, whose vices did every where as much wrong him as his own; therefore next to the first and principal care Kings ought to have, of being themselves Egregiously good, 'tis for their honour and safety to make a choice of virtuous Favourites, seeing private men are blamed only for their own faults, but other mens crimes are imputed to Princes. But these things things hapned afterwards. Now at Present, while their Zeal was hot, he was with the highest Honour and magnificence received, first by Tyndarion Prince of the Taurominitans (for in that part of the Island he landed) then by the People of Catana, and to pass'd with his foot-Army to Syracuse: His fleet he commanded to be brought about not far from the shore, ready prepared for fight, as thinking the Carthaginians would not suffer him to approach the City without hazard of a Battell. But it hapned, that a little before Thirty of the Carthaginian ships were upon other Employment gone from the Navy, which because they were not return'd the Admirall refused to venture on the Fight with the Rest. Wherefore Entering without Resistance, Thenio and Pisistratus yielding Possession, he took into his hands the Publick Treasure, an hundred and twenty Covered ships, Twenty open ones, their Weapons, Engines, and all other Furniture for Warre.

In the Interim came Embassadours from the Leontines, whose Prince Heracleidas offer'd the City and all his Forces. Four thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse. Neither were other Cities flower in their submission, but came in driven as it were by a Torrent of Fortune. Pyrrhus treating them all with much Humanity, and gaining their Good wills, sent every one back to his own City, entertaining now more Ample Hopes in his mind, intending if affaires proceed so favourably to pass over into Africa. Things went not so well with his Confederates in Italy, for Milo, who was left at Tarentum with part of the Army, was not able to protect them from the hostility of the Romans, now in the absence of the King and his main strength. But as yet it was well for them that the Romans deferring a while the Tarentine warre, both the Consuls converted their forces against Samnium. The Samnites (seeing their Fields burnt, their Cattles surprized, the whole burthen of the Warre to fall on them, and that they were forsaken by their Friends) being inferior both in strength and Courage, forsaking their Townes and Villages, betook themselves to the high and craggy Mountaines, carrying with them their Wives and Children, and what things of most value they could in such a Tumult and feare convey away. Among the Romans besides the Emulation of their Commanders, there was arisen great Negligence and Carelessness (the Inseparable Companion of Prosperity) caused by their own Constant good success, and their Enemies Fear. Hereby they suffered some Loss and more Disgrace; for their souldiers confidently creeping up craggy and difficult passages were beaten back and destroy'd by the Samnites, who had posses'd themselves of advantageous places; many were slain, being overwhelmed with stones and Darts, or tumbled down the Precipices; others having no convenience either of retreating or fighting were taken alive. This Accident caus'd the Commanders to divide their Forces, for each laying the blame of the Misfortune upon his Colleague, boasted he could have managed the business with better success if he had been alone. C. Junius with his Legions remained in Samnium, P. Cornelius drew out his forces against the Lucanians and Brutians, where, carrying about the Terror of his Armies, waiting the Grounds and burning the Villages, he had occasion offer'd of greater Attempts. In the utmost parts of the Italian shore, towards the East and the Jonian sea, where the promontory of Lacinium stretcheth forth it selfe, is seated Croton of old very famous, and now also considerable for it's Wealth. Through the midst of it in those dayes ran the River Acarnus, on each side whereof the Multitude of Buildings were encompass'd with a wall of Twelve miles circumference. This City the Consul not daring to beleaguer, had thoughts of obtaining by Treachery, for he was put in hopes by many of the Roman faction there, that if he would timely advance his forces to the walls of it, being now destitute of foreign Aide, he might easily take it by the help and assistance of those who were weary of Pyrrhus his Domination. But it hapned about that time that either out of fear of the Enemies Neighbourhood, or suspicion of Treason, which is seldom long hid, the Crotonians had procur'd aid from Milo: Nichomachus came to them with a strong band of Lucanians, who issuing out upon the Consul (not aware of any thing, but confidently coming up to the walls without fear of Danger) beat him back with the laughter and wounding of many of his Men. Rufinus desiring by Council to remedy that loss he had by his Rashness sustain'd, on set purpose encreaseth the Rumour of his Overthrow, and that he might seem stricken with the greater fear pretends to desert from his Enterprize, commanding the Baggage to be pack'd up as for a sudden Departure; This News was quickly blaz'd about the City (as from a Camp fireer must needs be) and besides a probable cause of the business, their Credulity was help'd forward by their desire to have it so; when on a sudden (their minds being already thus inclin'd) a certain Captive (being thereunto suborned by the Consull, in hope of Liberty and further Reward) comes into the City, as if in this hasty departure of the Romans he had taken opportunity to Escape; He informs them that Cornelius Rufinus, having not strength enough to force Croton, was gone to Locri, being invited by some who promised to betray it to him. By and by comes another who confirming the former news, added moreover, That the Romans were now on their March. And withall they discover his Knifenes and Troopes moving that way which leadeth to Locri. Nichomachus being deluded by this Wile, marcheth swiftly with his forces the nearest way to Locri, intending likewise to defend it, which when Rufinus by secret Messengers understood, he turneth back presently to Croton, as upon better advice, for with better success then before. His diligence was made prosperous, not only by the security of his Enemies, but by the favour of Fortune also, for a thick mist refused to furround him, so that he was almost within the walls with his Victorious army before the Crotonians understood he was returned. The joy of this victory, of its self ample enough, was abundantly encreased by other as glorious successes; Fortune seldom observing a mean on either hand. For Nicomachus perceiving himself to have fallen into a remediable Error, not knowing what to do, as he returned to Tarentus, was met by Rufinus, lost great part of his men, and very hardly escaped himself with the Rest; When not being content to defend one City he lost two. For the Locrians likewise being animated with this success, having slain the garrison Pyræus left among them, with the governor of it, whose oppression they could no longer endure, betook themselves to the friendship of the Romans. Notwithstanding this Proceess of affairs, the Samnites and other nations were not so far dejected, but that still they resolved to endure the worst that Fortune could bring upon them, encouraged, beside their own innate obduracy, with their Hops of Pyræus's Return, hearing the news of his victories in Sicily. For Pyræus (that we may relate his actions out of Italy also, which were performed in those times and places having influence upon, and being joined with the Roman affairs) having felled things at Syracuse and Leontium, went about the same time with his Army to Agigestum, meeting Messengers by the way with News, that the Carthaginian Garrison was thrust out of the City, and that the Agigintines yielded themselves and all they had into his protection; which accordingly at his coming they did. For Sofistratus (who had delivered up Syracuse to him) together with the City, presented him with eight thousand foot, proper young men, and eight hundred horse, a force nothing inferior to the Epirots Pyræus brought with him. Thirty other Cities, which Sofistratus had the command of, did by his means submit themselves to the Kings discretion.

These things thus transacted, he sent to Syracuse for all sorts of weapons and engines, which were of use in the siege of Cities. For now his design was to assault the Cities under the Carthaginian Jurisdiction, having an army of thirty thousand, besides fifteen hundred horse, and the Elephants he brought over into Sicily. The first he took was Heraclea, where was a Punick garrison, then Acona. After which the Selinuntians, Halicæans, and Ægeliens following his fortune forsook the Carthaginian party, giving an Example to many other Townes in the same quarter of doing the like. The Erycinæ, confiding in the number of their Auxiliaries and strength of the place, he was resolved with all his power to assault, having therefore order'd his men, himself armed, coming up toward the walls, Vowed a Vow to Hercules, if that day he should manifest himself to the Græcians a Warriour worthy of the Race he came of and the office he bore. After the sign was given, and that the defendants, with a cloud of arrows being driven from their Stations, gave way to the placing ladders upon the walls, the King himself first of all men entered into a most noble fight against all opposers, tumbling some down with his shield, slaying others with his sword, and terrifying all with the greatness of his Courage and strength; neither was this fight more glorious to him, then in every consideration prosperous; for without receiving any wound, with great honour he gained the City at that one storm, his souldiers being no less animated by his Example then fearful of his danger, for both which reasons they fought with the greater contention. He then did sacrifice to Hercules according to his vow, and for many days exhibited Plays and Shows of several kinds in great Magnificence and Pompe. In this year I find there was a Triumph at Rome over the Lucanians and Brutians before the Nones of January. But I wonder to find it ascribed to C. Iunius, seeing Rufinus his Province was amongst them, and that he took two famous Cities, and that other Authors stile him a Triumphant Man.

Rome being not very secure, considering the progress of Pyræus his affairs, was otherwise much terrified with Prodigies and Pestilence; The most horrid Omen was, that the statue of Jupiter Capitolinus being smitten with Thunder, the head thereof was broken off and carried quite away, neither could it be found but by the art and care of the South-seyers. The Plague likewise committed great slaughter amongst them, taking away man and beast by a common Murrain; but was most formidable in Aborsions, for there was no young ones almost of man or beast which came forth safe and entire, in so much as it was believed the anger of the Gods would consume all living creatures. Which Affliction made the other Consoliship of Q. Fabius Maximus Gurgæ very famous, wherein he had C. Genucius Clepsina for his Colleague. And yet they left not off their war against the Samnites and Lucanians; and two certain arguments there are that they made great slaughter of their enemies, for the same year Q. Fabius the Consul Triumphed over the Samnites, Lucanians and Brutians in the Quintinals; and those people sent Letters to Pyræus and Embassadors, declaring, They were miserably undone without speedy help; that they could no longer sustain the power of the Romans, but must of necessity prevent the miseries of yielding up themselves. This thing much inclined Pyræus to depart the Island and transport his forces again into Italy, seeing also his affairs now to be more difficult in Sicily, by reason the affections of men grew cold; and, by the consideration of some injuries received, were turned into hatred against him.

Which his resolution, and the series of ensuing affairs, that they may the better be understood, I have thought good more at large to relate his Actions at the present. When therefore he had possessed himself of Eryx, and placed a Garrison in it, he marched to the City of the Æginæ which is of a very convenient situation, near the Haven of Panormus, and well fenced with works; there being received with the good will of the Citizens, he removed his

Camp

Camp to Panormus in self, which received its name from the fair and ample haven which leadeth to it: This he took by force, and having likewise taken a place called Ephræ, seated in a pleasant mountain, but upon hard passages, between Panormus and Eryx, he had now the possession of all the Carthaginian Province, excepting only Lilybæum. This City was lately built by the Carthaginians, as an habitation for the Mætanians, whose town Dionysius the Tyrant had in the Punick War demolished. Wherefore the Carthaginians, seeing that of all their dominions in Sicily, their hopes were confin'd to this only place, resolv'd with their utmost strength to defend it against the preparations they understood Pyræus made for the siege of it. Wherefore bringing in thither a considerable strength of Souldiers, with plentiful provision, as likewise ammunition of all sorts (which they had opportunity enough to do, having the command of the seas) they diligently adhibited all care possible to fence it on every side: Especially where it lay open to the land they erected many Forts and Towers, encompassed with large ditches: Their work was the sooner finished, in regard the town being for the most part of it built upon the Rocks of the sea, needed no artificial Bulwarks in those places. Now, though they made great preparations for the War, and had hired many forces, as from other Countries, to join Ziayllo; yet they sent Embassadors, promising, If they could obtain peace upon equal conditions, to assist him with money and ships. Pyræus would hear no mention of money, desisting only to retain those Cities he had taken, seeming willing to allow them the possession of Lilybæum. But the Kings friends, and the Sicilian Princes enforming him, That so long as the Carthaginians held Lilybæum, (as a ladder ready prepared whereby to scale all the rest of Sicily) the Island would never be void of the fear of them; caused him to return answer, That there was but this one condition of peace he would agree to, to wit, That they should clearly quit Sicily, and suffer the sea to be the bounds of either's dominions. The hopes of peace being thus broken off, he dreweth his forces forthwith toward the City, and Marshalling his army not far from the walls, in such order as those who were tired might (by turns) be relieved by fresh men, he began the assault. But the Lilybæans having a sufficient number of souldiers to defend them, and being provided of Engines and Ammunition kept the City safe. For the Carthaginians had brought in so many Catapults and Scorpions that the whole compass of the walls was not able to receive them.

When therefore a shower of all sorts of weapons and darts overwhelmed the Kings Men, slaying many and wounding more, they desisted from their Enterprize. Pyræus likewise set himself to work to make Engines of Battery, beside those he brought from Syracuse, and digging Mines under ground, he attempted all arts belonging to a siege: But the Carthaginians stoutly resisting, when he had for almost two months wearied himself in vain, and saw that the besieged having free egress and regress at sea, the City could not be taken, he broke up his siege and employ'd his forces other where. For some Greek Cities, besides other heavy oppression, being compelled to pay tribute, implored his assistance against the Mæmetines, living upon the sea coast. Pyræus therefore leading his Army in halt, when he had taken and slain some Mæmetines he found gathering Taxes in those places, Encountering their main body proved Conquerour, and took by force and demolish'd many of their Garrison. And hitherto the King by his illustrious performances had obtained great Power and Honour, having beside his other Vertues, with his singular Humanity not only won, but deserved the Love and Affections of the Cities: But this so great Felicity, which one would think so firmly grounded, was in a moment destroy'd, as by that Levity of Mind which was never wanting in this people, and by the Intemperance of his friends, so chiefly by the Kings own fault. Who, being in adversity irreprehensibly good, was puffed up with pride in his prosperity, in which Condition Mens minds are indeed generally found to be weak. When therefore, as we have said, he esteemed a Fleet necessary for the accomplishment of his undertaking, and that though he had many ships, yet they were not well furnish'd with Sea-men, he very much offended the City with a strict Press of Sea-men; being now on a sudden changed, and from his former gentleness proceeding to proud commands, threats and extreme punishments; these things nevertheless were tolerated, as having the pretence of publick good. But, when they saw those very men to be slain, by whose good will and assistance chiefly he had obtained Sicily, many people, not by degrees, or interposing delays, but on the sudden changing their minds, revolted from his friendship, and applied themselves (as for every one was most opportune) some to the Carthaginians, some to the Mæmetines. So that cruelty, which when it is alone is always grievous, doth then become utterly intolerable, when being exercised against the well-deserving, it contracteth (beside the hatred properly due to it self) the detestation of an unthankful and perfidious mind. He seemeth to have brought himself to this necessity of governing by violence, being too much over-ruled by the naughty Affections and counsels of his own men, for unto them (being no whit better) did he bestow the riches which were sequestered from the friends and kinsmen of Agathocles. The chief Magistracies of Cities he committed to his Pensioners and Captains, not according to the statutes and customs of the Cities, nor for the due time prescribed, but in what manner, and for as long as he pleased. Law suits, and controversies, and the whole administration of publick businesses he assumed to himself, referring many to his Familiars and Favourites, who were hateful for their avarice and luxury, a like intent upon gaining and spending money by wickedness, who being greedy to satisfy their own lust, make no distinction between Allevium (for that was the name of it in those days) are Mountainous and Woody places, which by degrees stretching themselves into somewhat more even ground, at length end in a very fair and open plain which is called by the name of the Taurasine Fields.

Now Pyrrhus beginning his journey from the Lower grounds up to the hills and woods, when his lights failed, was wildered for want of knowledge in the wayes, in so much that (the day breaking) he was discovered from the Roman camp. The Romans being moved at the unexpected approach of the enemy, yet, (because there was no doubt made but fight they must, and their sacrifices now proving more favourable) with the Consul's conduct cheerfully issued, and falling upon the foremost of the enemy, (who were far from the Main body, and not in very good order) drove them backward, killing no small number of men, and taking some Elephants which the enemy left behind. This success encouraged Curius, to follow his Fortune and defend into the open field in Battel-array prepared to fight. Neither did the Epirots make any delay. The encounter was very fierce and furious on both sides, but the Romans having had the upper hand in the late skirmish, were much fuller of Courage and hopes. The Epirots giving back, Pyrrhus now again fought Refuge from his Elephants, and thereby (one of his own wings flying) he forced one of the Romans Wings to retire, even to their Reserve. There had the Consul placed a strong force (resolving upon this occasion to engage himself) which he commanded, being now fresh, to renew the fight, and beat back the Elephants. Former experience had taught them an averse and ready way to oppose these beasts, that they were sooner diverted by fire than the sword: Against them therefore were provided Iron instruments involved in much Pitch and Tar, which, being set on fire, were darted upon the backs and Towers of the Elephants, and whether they light on the skin of the beasts, or on the wood of the Towers, they stuck fast by reason of their hooked sharp points. These instruments and divers sorts of darts, being flung from the upper ground, drove the Elephants into fury, partly by terror, partly by the pain of their wounds, so that their masters not being able to govern them, they rushed back upon their own battel, filling it with fear and slaughter. The beginning of this Rout is reported to be by a young Elephant, which being wounded in his head, sent forth a querulous noise, at which known voice the Dam was first startled, and the increasing tumult, at length the rest were all in confusion and turned into flight. Very remarkable was this fight, both for the number of the slain and the fruit of the victory. For Pyrrhus being hereby utterly overthrown, neither did the rest of Italy long hold out, neither, after Italy, was any other Nation and King able to stand against them. 'Tis said the King in that Battel had thrice the number of the Romans, even fourscore thousand foot, and six thousand horse, of these they who report the most say, six and thirty thousand were slain, they who report the least, say six and twenty thousand; thirteen hundred were taken prisoners, and eight Elephants. Pyrrhus with a few horsemen escaped to Tarentum. The Camp of Pyrrhus being taken, as it caused admiration, so was it of great use to the Romans. For they heretofore, as other people, ordered their Camp scattering by companies in the manner of Cottages: Pyrrhus is held to be the first who rightly measuring and dividing spaces, contained the whole Army within one Trench; and by his example the Romans being assisted, and adding what they thought convenient, attained to that most perfect manner of pitching their Camps which afterwards they used.

This year was very famous, not only for their happy war abroad, but by reason also of Domestic affairs, and the notable severity of their City Discipline. Q. Fabricius Luscinus, and Q. Emilius Papus, being Consens together, took away from many the Publick horses, and passed by many in calling the Senate. But most remarkable was Cornelius Rufinus his note of Infamy, who having been twice Consul and twice Dictator, was ejected the Senate by the Consuls, and this reason given of his Punishment, That they found in his house the weight of ten pounds in plate to serve at meals: And in this Condition not only himself but his Family for a long time remained, whereof not any one attained to the highest honours, before Sylla the Dictator.

Such was the Parimony of this City in those days, and afterward so great the extravagancy; that it was by the Fathers condemned as an argument of intolerable Luxury, what their children would shortly esteem but a base and contemptible piece of household stuffe. Every mans estate being ceased and valued, the Army was purged by sacrifices; there were ceased two hundred seventy one thousand, two hundred twenty four Citizens. Both Consuls entered the Capitoll in triumph, first Curius, whose triumph was the more illustrious, as for the fame of his Exploits, and great joy of his victory, so did it exceed in Pomp and splendour. For heretofore their triumphs being over poor People their neighbours, were set out only with broken armes and Gallick waggons, nor any spoils led but flocks and herds of Cattel. But now there was a worthy show both for the variety of Nations which were led Captive before the Chariot, and for the Beauty and Magnificence of the spoils. Epirots, Theffalians, Macedonians, Apulians, Lucanians, Brutians were led Bound, there were carried Painted Tables, the works of choice and rare Artificers, Gold, Purple, with other beyond Italy raretie, and the instrument of the Tarentine Luxury. But the most wonderful and joyful spectacle were the Elephants with their four Towers on their backs, (for the rest were dead of their wounds) This was the first time they were ever seen at Rome; the common people called them Luca-Bulls, giving them their name from the creature they were hitherto best acquainted with, and their deno-denomination from the place they first saw them in; within few days after was the other Consul's Triumph nothing so gallant, though his performances were not to be despised; he had overthrown the Samnites and Lucanians, and taken many Townes, but in comparison of Curius his Glory the Esteem of these things were not so high. Among the rest who had Rewards bestowed on them for their Courage, he gave to Sev. Cornelius Merenda a Crown of Gold out of the spoils, because by his help chiefly a Certain Town of the Samnites was taken. While the Romans thus enjoy'd the comfort of their Victories, the Enemy was in a far different posture. They had been long weary of Pyrrhus his Domination, but now after this unhappy fight, their minds were so filled with fear and Indignation that they could take no Rest.

The King having been a long time averse from the Roman Warre, now utterly despairing of the Conquest, thought of nothing more then how to get safely and honourably out of Italy. But keeping his Council to himselfe, he encouraged his Associates, That they should not be cast down by one unlucky Overthrow, that they had not received so much loss by the last fight, as by the former they had caused to the Romans, who notwithstanding could not be persuaded to Peace upon equal Conditions; That now they should imitate the Roman Constancy, and reserve themselves for better fortune and all would yet go well; That there is yet strength sufficient left, whereby to maintain a long Warre; That in Greece he had many Potent Friends, from whom he might certainly expect succour. Neither were these things incredible, For he had already, especially by Ptolemy (who was then King of Macedon) been manfully assisted, he being then in great Estimation both among Greeks and Barbarians, being much honour'd by the Etolians (even a most powerful Nation) as also by the Macedonians and the Kings of Thyrrum, having obliged some by Courties, others by Fear. Yet all his boasting was more with intent, to retain his Confederates (now ready to revolt) in Fidelity, till the seas were open for his Returne, then to continue the Warre in Italy, or that he put any Trust in Foreign Aid. Sending nevertheless his Embassadors to the Kings of Asia and Macedonia, of some he craved moneys, of others Men, of Antigonus (who was then King of Macedon) he craved both. With these hopes keeping his associates firme to him (having in the mean time underhand provided all things for his Departure) his Embassadors now returned from Antigonus. Assembling therefore his own and the Italian Princes, he read unto them not those Letters which now he received, but others which came before from Antigonus, promising plentiful Assistance suddenly to be sent; By this Craft having deluded both his own Associates, as also the Romans who garison'd near him, the night following without any hindrance he joyed safe, and made the Ceranean Mountains a Promontory of Epirus. But that he might seem not dishonourably to have relinquished the war, and ingenerate a beliefe of his Return after he had accomplished the Design he was call'd aside for, he left behind him Mitho to defend the Castle of Tarentum, and that he might not only by hope of Reward, but by fear of the like Punishment, continue faithfull, he gave him a seat whose cover was made of Nicias his skin, whom he had put to death for his Treason against him. Leaving therefore with him a garriſon of souldiers, with the Rest (to wit eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse) he returned into his Kingdom, having been six years absent. At Rome not knowing but that Pyrrhus would renew the warre, they did at their Assembly choose M. Curius Consul again, because he only having had good success against the King, was thought like to carry on the warre with greatest Authority, and best fortune, of the Patricians Sev. Cornelius Merenda was chosen, being promoted by his late purchased honour, and the Commendation of his Countrey men, under whose command he was last year; These being made Consul, converted the heat of the warre against the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, who defending themselves rather by the Difficulty of Places then by Armes, gave no occasion of any Memorable action like the former. Neither was Curius his Glory hereby diminished; every one still judging, that that Valiant K. Pyrrhus fled not so much for the overthrow sustain'd, as fearing such a Captain as Curius now again coming forth against him. To him therefore was attributed the Glory of having chased Pyrrhus out of Italy, and finishing the Warre. In that year which followed Curius his Third Consulship, there came Embassadors from the Alexandrine Kings with gifts to Rome, and in the Consulship of C. Dors and C. Claudius Canina, Ptolemy Philadelphus hearing of Pyrrhus his flight, sent to congratulate with the Romans, and to desire to be Esteemed their Friend and Associate. The Romans thought it very honourable that their Friendship was sought by Kings so Potent and farre distant, therefore courteously receiving and enterprising the Embassadors, they agreed to enter League with Ptolemy; for the Confirmation whereof, and to return the like Kind office to the Kings, they sent Embassadors to him chosen out of their Principal Men, of the Consulars Q. Fabius Gerges, and with him C. Fabius Pictor, and Numerius Fabius Pictor, and Q. Ogulnius. These being gone, the Consuls had good success against the Italian People, who fill out of Necessity and Despaire kept up their Armes. The Triumph which Claudius Canina made in the Quirinali over the Lucanians, Samnites and Brutians, is an Argument, that his Actions were of the greater Consequence: But the Joy of all this Prosperity was somewhat diminish'd by Sexsilia a Vestall Virgin, who against the Rules of her Order being found guilty of Incest, was thought to provoke the Anger of the Gods.

But appealing the gods by Sacrifices and Ceremonies, they turned the punishment on the head of the delinquent, and buried her alive at the Colline Gate. While the same men were Consuls there were Colonies planted, Cula among the Volscians, and in Lucania Paffum, which the Greeks call Pofidonia; this City the Lucanians had taken from the Sybarites, and from them it lately came under the jurisdiction of the Romans. The memory of the year following is more notable, as putting an end not only to the war of the Samnites and others, but of the Tarentines also. L. Papirius Cursor, and S. Carvilius the second time Consuls, having Lucania, Samnium, with the Brutians and Apulians for their Provinces, did by their wisdom and worthy deeds fulfil the expectation of all men, for indeed this pair of Consuls was on purpose chosen in hope of finishing the War this year. The Samnites being conquered by Carvilius the seventy first year after the war first began, did now with greater faithfulness receive the conditions of Peace imposed on them. Lu. Papirius with great slaughter having overcome the Brutians and Lucanians, compelled them to sue for peace. But (as it happens in one main war against many neighbouring People, the confines of whose Territories were interchangeably mixed) Papirius had to do also with the Samnites, Carvilius with the Brutians and Lucanians, and both of them with the Tarentines. Neither were the forces only of the Tarentines roused and put to flight, but their City also recovered into obedience. Which business ought to be the more punctually related, because, besides the Victory of a most famous City, it comprehendeth the death of Pyrrhus, the subtility of the Carthaginians, and the first beginning of emulation between them and the Romans.

Pyrrhus, when two years since he failed from Italy, left a Garrison in the Castle of Tarentum, thereby to beget hopes of his return, which afterward being the more confidently expected by reason of his success in Macedonia, did strengthen the minds of the Italians against their present losses. For being a man of a fierce stirring spirit, not able long to rest, he had made war upon Antigonus, because he sent him no assistance into Italy, and overcoming him in a set battle, had almost driven him out of his Kingdom. Whence the Romans were in perpetual fear lest he should return into Italy with a more numerous Army, and renew the war more heavily then before. But his unexpected death did suddenly cut off both his hopes and fears of all men. For being insatiably desirous of encreasing his power, under pretence of relieving Cleomenis in his Kingdom of Sparta (being then at odds with Arcus) he entred Peloponnesus with a purpose to keep it in his own hands; and though he did in vain assault their City, yet he afflicted the Lacedaemonians with great calamities: In Argos, in the mean time, there being two Factions, Aristippus the head of the one called in Antigonus, Aristias Patron of the other invited Pyrrhus to his relief and for the pulling down his adversary. For Antigonus was also come into Peloponnesus to assist the Lacedaemonians against the common enemy. In the same night at divers Ports were both the Kings forces admitted into the City by the Argives. Pyrrhus understanding his men were hand put to it, entred the City himself, and beholding a Braze Statue of a Wolf and a Bull as fighting, was presently possessed with an opinion of his approaching death. For he was informed by an antient Oracle, That that place would prove fatal to him where he should see a Wolf and a Bull fighting; he was therefore resolved to draw back his forces and retreat out of the City. But the Elephants and soldiers coming in his succour, meeting Helennus the son of Pyrrhus, quite stopped up the passage, so that some striving to go out, some to come in, the enemy likewise fore pressing upon those who gave back, the Argives, Macedonians, Epirots and Lacedaemonians who came along with Arcus, some Elephants also, all crowding and being crowded one by another in narrow streets, caused great fear and tumult amongst them.

Pyrrhus in the midst of all, every where endeavouring to protect his own, and beat back the enemy (giving advice, crying out with his voice and lifting up his hand) was by a certain young man of Argos lightly wounded with a spear. This young man's mother a poor old woman (sitting among others upon the house top to behold the fight) when she saw Pyrrhus in fury and violence setting upon him who wounded him, being astonished at her son's danger, suddenly snatched up a Tile, and with both her hands flung it down on the Kings head. So miserable and void of honour was Pyrrhus's death, then whom that Age brought not forth any man more worthy, either for Courage of Mind, Soundness in Counsel or Skill in Marshal affairs, besides many other endowments both of Soul and Body. But by his Ambition he destroyed the fruit of all his Labours, and defaced the Ornaments of his Virtue; he would have been much more happy if contented with his own fortune; and certainly the most potent Prince living had he used as much Wisdom and Circumspection in keeping what he got, as did Valour and Industry in the acquiring.

This news, being brought into Italy, did diversely, according to their several Affections, cause joy in some Cities, and sorrow in others. Other People who were at their own disposal, bought their Peace of the Romans upon what terms they could. But the Garrison of the Epirots, and Milo governor of the Castle restrained the Tarentines from using their Liberty. Between whom, by degrees from lighter injuries and Reproaches, at length brake out open Enmity; so that the Tarentines being on each hand pressed with great Difficulties, having the Romans their Enemies without the walls, and the Epirots within, sent Embassadors to crave succour from Carthage. The Carthaginians, who possessed great part of Sicily and wished the Coast-Towns of Italy rather in their own hands than the Romans, readily came with a mighty Navy, pretending only to call out Milo, but relolving, if they gained Tarentum, to maintain it against the Romans. When therefore L. Papirius the Consul was also come, Tarentum was shut up on all sides, the Romans beleaguering that part of the City and Castle by land, the Carthaginians besieging the same Castle by sea. The Romans, in this state of affairs, being no less solicitous lest the Carthaginians should take the Castle then that themselves should loose it, subtilly attempting all means of victory, treated with Milo by Convenient Messengers, That if by his means they obtained Tarentum, they would suffer himself, with all his Men, safely to depart with bag and baggage. Milo, sending nothing at present more convenient for him, deals with the Tarentines. That joining Counsels together they might deliberate on their Common safety: and at length persuades them To send himself Embassador to Papirius, diligently to conclude on Articles for all their Benefits. As they had willingly hereunto assented out of weariness of Cares and dangers: Milo accordingly, being gone to the Consul, with whom he had secretly contrived his Designe, brings back pretty faire conditions, and a most certain hope of making an agreement not to be repented of. The Credulous Tarentines hereupon with much security and confidence lay aside all care and Circumspection, giving Milo opportunity of delivering not only the Castle, but also the City it selfe up to the Romans. The Carthaginians no whit contented with this Event, nevertheless pretending, Themselves friends to the Romans, and that the only cause of their coming was to Expel Milo, hoisted sails and returned. Some Authors affirm that the Romans forwarned the Carthaginians, That if they intermeddled in the Tarentine affairs, they would make a breach of the League, and that they not only lighted this admonition, but sent Auxiliaries to stand in Battel against them; upon which account chiefly the War brake forth between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily; though the Carthaginians, willing to cover their fault by Perjury, took Oath, That they did nothing with evil or deceitful intent. As I will not deny but that some such passage might happen between the Generals, or that the people commonly discuse so, while the Romans brooked not the others presence, and the Carthaginian endeavoured to keep close their design; so I think there afterwards arose more probable causes of that War, in that it brake not out on the sudden. And that it was occasioned chiefly upon the Mamertines account, while the League was entire between the Romans and Carthaginians.

The Consuls returning home, were received with the joy and salutes of all, and triumphed in great Pompe, with much Goodwill of the People. In the mean time Q. Fabius Gurges, and the others who were sent to Alexandria, relate in Senate the Result of their Embassy, That they were received and Entertained with all kind of Hospitality and Benevolence, that great and Magnificent gifts were sent to them at their first arrival, but much greater at their departure, that they thought it to become the Roman dignity and abstinence, modestly to refuse the first, that the other, which were by all means to be received, they had, before they did any other business, added to the publick Treasury; that at Alexandria, when being invited to publick feasts, they had Crowns of Gold sent them according to custom, they did for luck's sake receive them, but in the night time put them upon the King's Statues. The Senate wonderfully rejoicing, both at the Success of their Journey, and the Gravity of the Embassadors, giving them thanks, That they had by their Continence rendered the Roman Manners venerable to Foreign Nations, commanded the gifts they had conveyed into the Treasury to be restored them. The people likewise decreed the like, saying, The Commonwealth would be excellently well managed if the base means of growing rich by Publick employments were taken away: And the Quæstors, according to command, willingly restoring the money, the Embassadors worthy of the reward of their Abstinence, did with as much credit receive the Egyptian gifts as they had refused them. Q. Fabius, who was prime man in the Embassy, was, I believe, in this consideration also preferred before so many Egregious men, and chosen Prince of the Senate by M. Curius and L. Papirius the Censors, being now, by reason of the Nobility of his Family, his Fathers Merits, two Consulships, and as many Triumphs, inferior to none in Honour. The same men being Consuls, M. C. Curius the Censor was at coast, out of the enemies spoils, to bring the water of the River Anien to Rome: So much scornful to encrease his private wealth by them, that being on a time by some ill-willers taxed of having perverted the publick money, producing a piece of wood which he was wont to use in sacrifice, took Oath, That of all the enemies plunder, he never brought nothing else into his house. He was a man indeed of high defects, as for the greatness of his Exploits, so for his many Illustrious examples in other Virtues; as we shall by the by manifest, by relating some of his Actions and Sayings. For I count it not unworthy or unbeseeming the Office of an Historian, to recount those things whereby those who are hereafter to undertake the management of publick affairs may be no less instructed to the attaining Felicity by Virtue, then by Military counsels and performances. In the Sabine War (when there was such plenty of spoils that Fabius the writer of the History, thinketh the Romans then to have had the first taste of Riches) Curius, claiming nothing of so rich a victory, but the conscience and fame of it, continued in his former poverty and hardiness of life.

For when the Grounds of the Enemy were appropriated to the Common wealth, he distributed to every private Person but forty Acres by the Man: And the Senate allotting him a greater portion, he being contented with the same Measure he had meted to others, said, He was no good Citizen who would not be satisfied with as much as others were. This was afterward the Carian Cottage among the Sabines, where when the Samnites (being lately overcome) found him frying of Carrots, and presented him with a vast summe of Gold, I had rather, sayes he, eat these out of my Earthen platters, and rule over those who are rich in gold. Near this place Cato the Elder having a Farm, went often thither, and contemplating in his mind the poore Tenement and Little Ground, which so Eminent a Man after three Triumphs, tilled with his own hands, together with the Temperance and abstinence of his Life, did thereby provoke himself, out of the Emulation of his vertue, to the like Confrancy and simplicity of Manners. And truly there needed such men to lay the foundations of a future Empire so firm, as it might bear the weight of the superstructure, and not only resist the forms of the Enemy from a broad, but scarcely and with much adoe be ruined by its own inbred Vices.

BOOK V.

THE most potent enemy of Rome being now after many battels vanquished, and peace settled throughout all Italy, The Senators entred into Consultation how to make a good use of their Victories. They concluded to fine all Nations who had born Arms against them; the loss of part of their Territories, taking a more severe revenge of the Tarentines, by how much the more wantonly and intemperately they had offended; they were therefore commanded to resign up all their Arms and Ships, their Walls were demolished, a Tribute imposed upon the City, and nothing granted them but Peace and Liberty. There was now nothing of an old score more to be intended, then to punish the Treachery of that Legion, which circumventing the Rhegians by craft, had now for ten years possessed their City. They foreseeing that the Roman affairs proceeding so prosperously, their wickedness would not passe unrevenge, had very diligently taken care for whatsoever belonged to strengthen the City, and provided all things for their own defence, being very conscious that what is obtained by cunning and violence, cannot but by the fame arts be maintained. Besides their own innate Fierceness, they much confided in the friendship of the Mamertines, and were puffed up with their success against the Carthaginians and Pyrhus, whereby they had sufficiently made experiment of the strength of their City, and the courage of their own minds, having quickly repulsed the enemies from the siege. They forced therefore to such an height of Rebellion, that daring to take Proton, which was by some betrayed to them, they flew the Roman Garrison and demolished the City. Wherefore L. Genucius the Consul, who was that year Collegue with C. Quinctilius, had commission to execute vengeance upon them, and the Rebels being confined within the Walls, the City was besieged. But while they strongly resisted with their own and the Mamertine forces, the Consul having sustained some inconveniences, and become in want of necessary provisions, was assisted with Corn and men by Hiero, who was at that time Prince of Syracusa. For he, being offended with the Mamertines did likewise hate their associates of Rhegium; he was likewise moved by the encrease of the Roman power, to prebudge them to future benefits, as occasion should serve.

The City being at length forced to yield, the Mamertines were by the Consul dismissed upon certaine Covenants, the Runaways and thieves, many whereof had fled thither as to a sanctu-ry, were put to death: The Legionary souldiers were carried to Rome that the Senate might passe Judgement upon them. Herein was shewed a notable Example of publick severity, for the Senate decreed, first, They should all be secured in prison, and afterward, be led to Execution: And when M. Fulvius Flaccus, Tribune of the People interceded for them, declaring, They ought not to take away the Lives of so many Citizens, contrary to the Law and Customs of their Forefathers. The Senators perishing in their Resolution neglected the clamours of the Tribune, and Justice was accordingly executed upon the guilty. But left by so severe an act they might contract an odium, and the sorrow of the vulgar people be aggravated if such a multitude should at one time be put to death, they did every day execute fifty, first scourging, then beheading them. Moreover it was ordered that neither their Bodies should be buried, nor any Mourning made for their Death. Decius Fabellus (who had lived unto that day, after the Loss of his sight, that he might die with the more griefe) took away his own life in prison. Following the greatest number of Anhours I have reported the whole Legion, even foure thousand men, to have been beheaded in the Market-place at Rome; but I think it more probable what is related by Polybius, That but three hundred of that Legion came alive into the Romans power; that the rest, at the taking of the City, desperately fighting, chose rather to be slain, as well knowing that after such heinous villainies, nothing could be expected upon surrender, but more torments and a cruel ignominious death. The City of Rhegium with all its former Rights, Laws, and Liberties was restored to the ancient inhabitants, as many as could any where be found or enquired out.

This act of Justice did much increase the Reputation of the City of Rome, and thereby was gained no lesse Love from all the Italians and neighbouring People, then their armes had caused fear. In the Consulship of C. Genucius, and Cn. Cornelius there was war with the Sarmines, a people of Umbria, inhabiting the Apennine Mountains: By what reason provoked, or in what hopes trusting, they now opposed the Formidable power of the Romans (those writings which are remaining making no mention) I am not able to Divine; Likewise the whole Proceedings of the war are utterly lost, and of the memory of these things, nothing else is come to our knowledge, but that Cn. Cornelius Triumphed over the Sarmines. 'Tis reported there was a most sharp winter in these Consul time, in so much that the Sap being chill'd Trees withered, That Tiber was covered over with deep Ice, and that the Cattel perished for want of Fodder; so great and vehement was the coldness of the air, that monstrous hills of snow lay unmeltd in the Market place for forty dayes together. The thing being unusual in that Climat, and by many look'd upon as a Prodige, perplexed mens minds with wonderful terror, their fear being not long after much encreased, when Q. Ogulnius Gallus and C. Fabius Pictor being Consuls, many strange unheard of sights were seen, and many more reported. At Rome the Temple of Salus with part of the walls was smitten with thunder and lightning; three Wolves before day brought a carcass half eaten into the City, and being themselves feared by the noise of men, left it in the market-place torn into pieces limb from limb.

At Fo-mi the walls were laid to be often struck and cast down with thunderbolts; and news was brought that in the Calenian fields, the earth opened, and fire suddenly brake out, which flaming for three whole daies together, burnt five acres of ground to ashes, in so much that not only all the fruits on that place were blasted, but even the Trees died at the very Roots. These things caused more feare then misery at Rome. No great matter ensued, but that a War was made against the Picentians, which being the next year finished, added likewise that province to the Roman Jurisdictions. Now in the City began the Coining silver, (their wealth being encreased by their victories) whereas before Brasse only was used in all Exchanges; but then pennies and half pennies were made of silver, which went for ten, and five pounds of brasse; there were likewise lesser pieces which being esteemed at two pound and an halfe of brasse, were from their value called, Seleretier. It was called, Amona, because it was coined in the Temple of Juno, to whom that Name was given, by reason she did Movere, that is, admonish the Romans when in the War of Pyrhus and the Tarentines they Consulted about their wants, That money would not be wanting to those, who observed Justice and prosecuted wars. The Consuls C. Gallus and C. Fabius went forth to apprehend Lutius the Samnite, who having been Hostage at Rome had privily escaped, and now possessing a certain Cattle, committed Plunder and Pillage round about, stirring up the minds of his Countrymen to Rebellion, when they were scarce well composed by the late peace.

But he with the forces he had gather'd (being for the most part unarmed) could not long resist: The greatest difficulty and danger was in the Province of the Carcines (a part of Samnium near the Frentanes) where the Romans assaulted a well fenced place, the Receiptacle of Lollius his spoils, and from great hopes falling into as great fear, did at length obtain the Victory. Some of the Garrison upon condition of Pardon, let the Romans into the walls in a bright Moon-thiny night, and the Townsmen mustering themselves together upon the tumult, when they first began to fight a great drift of snow fell and took away their sight: This accident was a great help to the Carcines against the Romans, who were ignorant of the Passages, in so much that they were in very great danger, and now ready to give back and retreat (which in the dark could not have been done without much loss) when on a sudden the snow ceased and the Moon shone out again, and then being freed from blind fear, they did by their courage make way to hopes, in others fear.

For they who by violence and injury to their neighbours enlarged their own power, feared the Romans would prove an hindrance to their proceedings, the others contrarywise looking on them as a Succour, vent to them from heaven against the Oppression of their adversaries. The Apollonians were the first, who sending Embassadors to Rome craved their friendship; their Citie is feated threefore furlongs from the sea, being built by the Corinthians and Corycraens, having a very commodious haven, where the neerest passage is from Bundusum into Greece. The Illyrians and Macedonians are adjacent to them, so that against strong and Covetous neighbours they had much ado to preserve their own liberty. The message was wonderful welcome and with much Humanity received by the Romans, not so much for the wealth of the Citie which was but small, as for Future hopes in that they thought a way laid open and occasion given them of greater designs hereafter: Insomuch that very severe punishment was inflicted on certain noble young men who upon a quarrel arising had stricken the Embassadors. Scipio Fabius was not protected either by the Dignity of his office, for he was then Adile or the greatness of his Extraction, but was delivered up to the Apollonians for his offence. Cn. Aprenius who was likewise Adile, was given up for the same crime, the Senate decreed, they should by

In this fight I suppose Decius Mus to have had the Command; for he might happily have been Fabius his Lieutenant, and after his death be chief in managing the War till a successor was sent. And hence I conjecture it comes to passe that some negligent Historians have ascribed to Decius Mus both the beginning and finishing of this War. *Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. Blasio and C. Marcius were created Censors that year, and this last having before born the same Capitolina Office, was from this his Magistracy called Conservator. The moderation of this Marcius was very remarkable, who being invested with Power which he fought not after, assembled the people together, and in a grave speech did them, That they had twice intrusted that Office to the same man, whereas their forefathers did in this very confederation limit the time of it, because the power was too Great. Hereupon a Law was made, That the same man should not be made Censor the second time. The same year the number of the Questors was encreased; in former times there were but four, two for the City, and two to assist the Consuls abroad in the Wars. But after-

Tacitus 11.12.6 ward their Taxes and Customs encreasing with the Commonwealth, there was a necessity of doubling the number. Appian Claudius who in the time of his Magistracy was surnamed Candax, and M. Fulvius were Consuls the year ensuing, which was very memorable, in that then first began the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Sicily. Then first brake out Hostilities between two most potent Cities, which after many years, after many bloody overthrows given and received, could not at length be ended without the utter ruine and destruction of one of them.

But, before we enter upon the History of the War, it will be necessary to relate something of former times concerning Carthage; for in the ensuing Narrative many things will occur, hard to be understood and judged of, unless both the Original and encrease of that City be first known.

BOOK VI.

THAT Carthage was built by the Tyrians of Phœnicia (besides the constant agreement of old Histories) the perpetual friendship of those Cities while they flourished, as also the manifest likeness both of their Language and Manners doth clearly testify. 'Tis reported that Elisa (who was likewise called Dido) the daughter of Agnor the son of Belus, flying out of her Country (by reason of the hatred she bore to her brother Pigmalion for the unjust slaughter of her husband Sichæus) entred that Creek of Africa, and possessed that Peninsula where Carthage was afterward built; her small beginnings promising little hopes of so great power and wealth as afterwards was obtained: For 'tis believed Dido purchased no more ground then might be compassed with the hide of a Bull or Ox, which being cut out into very slender thongs contained a larger space, then the feller did imagine, and it was sufficient whereon to Erect a Cattle, which from thence is thought to be called Byssa. Afterward seeing (many placing their habitation near them for Traffick sake) they began to look like a City, and that the Africans were willing to entertain among them men so rich and very gentle and quiet, they hearkened to the counsel sent from Utica (which was also a Colonie of the Tyrians) which advised them, After their example to build a City. So it was agreed, That the Africans should afford them ground, and that the Phœnicians in recompence thereof should pay a yearly Tribute.

The work being finished, Dido gave it a name in her own Language, Carthadas; the Greeks called it Carthada, and the Romans by an error in Pronunciation, Carthago. This City having Loving Neighbours, an Indulgent people, and what was above all, a Wife Queen, did in a short time wonderfully increase. These things seeme to have been acted some seventy years before the foundation of Rome; for about so ancient a Circumstance Authors do not very well agree. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable. But as Elisa her life was notable for variety of Chances, so was her death very remarkable.

Pile of wood to be erected before her intended marriage, whereon to sacrifice to the Infernal gods in behalf of her husband Sichæus; And after many Sacrifices offered, she did at length ascend the pile, and killed her self with a sword brought with her, her love to her Husband and Subjects exceeding the care of her own health. The Carthaginians returned her what honour they could, and while the Commonwealth flourished, worshipped her as a Goddess, raising a Temple in the place where the lived, calling her Dido, which in their language signifies a Virago.

When after her death no man was thought worthy to succeed her in the Kingdom, the City began to be governed by the Mixed Power of Nobles and Commons. The Name of Kings still remained, but they were like the Lacedæmonian Kings; but that the honour was not to any Certain families annexed, but conferred on any Prime Man who exceeded others in Virtue and Riches. These had the management of Wars abroad (wherefore the Romans called them Pretours and Dictators, comparing their power with the usage of their own Commonwealth) at home they were Princes of all publick Consultations, with their advice the affairs of the City were ordered: Things of higher concernment were referred to the people, their sentence decided all controversie between the Kings and Senators: They also had authority to alter the Laws made by the Kings and Council, if they seemed contrary to the good of the Publick, which any man had Liberty to question. Which too great power of the Commons, being augmented to an intolerable height, by flattering Parasites and Orators, did in after time infinitely wound and obstruct the Carthaginian affairs. Moreover in the Senate there were thirty of the more Antient appointed as a supreme Council, and these had greatest authority with all Men. There was likewise a Superintendant of Manners, invested with the same power as the Roman Censors, to maintain publick Decency and Discipline. In process of time, after many victories, their greatness being encreased, they chose a greater Number of Commanders for the War: Among which Mago, the most Egregious both in courage and fortune, having left behind him two sonnes well educated and instructed in the art of Warre, and they also to their more numerous offspring, as it were by hand, delivering the same skill and knowledge, it was thought fit by some means to curb the too great power of that Family; to this purpose an hundred men were constituted to passe sentence upon the Generals themselves: Their power was very formidable, as for the largeness of their Commission, so for the continuance, which was during life, whereas even the Kings now, were not so long a time but yearly created, whom at home they commonly called Suffetes, that is to say, Judges, much like to the Roman Consul. But when the Centumvirs or hundred men behaved themselves with much insolence, Hanniball by a Law reduced them into Order, it being decreed, That the Judges should yearly be chosen, and that no man should continue in office two yeares together. Their gods and holy Rites they brought most from Tyrras, some they did afterwards add. Juno they chiefly adored, and Aesculapius not a little, in whose honour they erected a Magnificent Temple in the City, Apollo's house was likewise very rich, covered with plate of Gold, wherein was a famous statue which after the Ruine of Carthage was carried to Rome and placed in the great Shew-place called Circus Maximus. But to Hercules at Tyrras they every year sent a ship, with great care well trimmed, with the Tithes of their yearly fruits, and spoiles gotten in War.

From the same Founders also they derived another most horrid Rite, to offer an humane sacrifice once a year to Saturne, whom they called Belus; the Relicks of which Barbarous Cruelty could not be quite abolished by the Destruction of the City. The other Manners and Customes of the City were more civilized by their conveniency of Commerce and Traffick, to which being by nature, and Education from their Forefathers much addicted, they did apply all their studies and Counsels. Hence by an unavoidable mischief the Love of Riches corrupted their Courts of Justice, made Vertue a servant to money, inflamed the Peoples minds with Covetousness, and infected them with a sordid custom of Cheating and Lying, forcing the Commonwealth wholly to give it self up to these arts. Inomuch as it came to passe that as little Faith was had in Carthaginian Contracts and Covenants, so the chiefest part of the publick Treach consisted in ships, their Infantry the main support and pillar of all Empires, was had in no Request, their Horfe in very little: As often as they waged War by Land, they made use of Mercenaries, who had no true Love to the Commonwealth, whose faith was to be bought with money, their discord troublefome, and their conspiracies pernicious. Which error was so Capital, that before the utter destruction of the City, no other enemy but those did ever bring them so near to final ruine.

Neither did a lesser crop of misery spring from this, That their Magistrates and Publick Officers did by mutual connivance exercise Extortion and Purloin the state without punishment; so that 'tis the lesse to be wondered, that a war arising between these two Cities, the Romans proved conquerors, when as the Senators in all hard times added their wealth to the publick flock, and the Carthaginians made a gain of the Commonwealth. But these vices grew up together with the City, so that at first being weak and little they were prey well born withal, afterward for a while the greatness of their Empire, and the singular virtue of their Commanders made them the lesse sensible, by whose means chiefly, I find, was both obtained and established the happiness that ever attended Carthage. Their first beginning in Arms was against the Africans, requiring Tribute for the ground the City was built on; neither could they extort that right out of their hands but by many battels: hereby they enlarged their Empire, and the best planted part of Africa was reduced into subjection to them. Their command of the seas gave them

Justinus 19. 1
Justin. 19. 1

Interpretation, with grief and sickness cast down, when the next day among other horses he eyed that his son rode upon in the Field. conjecturing thereby his death, he resolutely pulling the cloaths and plasters off his wounds made way to his own death. The Mamertines, understanding their overthrow, grew full of despair, and were now ready to present their humble supplication to the Conquerors, when an unexpected accident prevented them. It happened that at the same time Hannibal, the Carthaginian Pretor, was in the Liparian Islands, which are adjacent to Sicily. He having intelligence of Hiere's Victory, fearing lest (the Mamertines being utterly vanquished) the Syraculan power would grow too great for the Carthaginians, came suddenly over under pretence of congratulating with Hiere for his Victory; and hindering him from directly marching to Messana, did himself make first entrance, and when the Mamertines were now ready to yield, did not only possess them with hopes of retaining their liberty, but left a strong Garrison of his own soldiers amongst them. Hiere understanding himself by this craft deluded, & being not sufficiently prepared for a siege, made now more difficult, returned to Syracuse, where being received by all with very great joy, he was by a universal acclamation saluted King, which Title he afterward retained with the consent both of the Citizens and others of the Island without.

When Hiere was retreated, the Mamertines having a little space of refusing confidence, began to deliberate upon their present condition, but were divided into two Factions, some thought it not to be disputed, 'But that they should commit themselves to the protection of the Carthaginians, which as for many other reasons it was convenient, so having admitted their Garrison, 'twas little less than necessary. On the other side 'twas said, 'The Carthaginians were no less enemies to the Mamertines than Hiere, that without doubt their purpose of defending the City was not out of good will, but desire of Dominion; That of a long time they had aspired to the Empire of Sicily, neither were cast down from their bold hopes by loss of Armies and Navies, no not by wars in Africa, and fear of their own state at home; That therefore without exception they must prove Vassals if they commit themselves to those who have so strong a Navy, and possess the greatest part of Sicily itself. That 'tis therefore no way expedient to desire aid from the Carthaginians, a covetous, unfaithful people, who will lay heavier burdens upon them than they could fear from the Syraculans. If the Punick Garrison came only with intent to preserve the City from Hiere, they may now upon fair terms be dismissed having done the work: But if they have some other clandestine design, it behooveth them with the greater care to prevent the danger of their deceitful friendship. That they should rather implore assistance from the Romans, as a people invincible, of unquestionable faith and sincerity, who will have neither occasion nor opportunity of keeping Messana under their jurisdiction, as having not a foot of ground in Sicily nor any use of sea affairs, and consequently taking no care therein. That they would be abundantly content to keep Italy secure from Hiere and the Carthaginians, having made Messana strong as an obstacle to their further proceedings. That therefore they should continue to rely upon the Roman faith rather than any other Nation; that indeed they could neither with honesty or any convenience change their former counsels, having already sent Embassadors and obtained hope of succour and relief. For the Mamertines before their last battle with Hiere, beginning then to distrust in their own strength had craved assistance of the Romans as their Kinsmen. And the people being persuaded by the Consuls who were desirous of employment in the Wars, had decreed that aid should be sent to them; but the Senate out of shame to be counted authors of the business, did defer it. For they who had lately so severely punished their own Legion for the wicked surprize of Rhegium, if they should now assist the Mamertines, who had by the like treachery obtained the mastery of Messana, they saw they should clearly loose the reputation of their Justice and Fidelity, which by their former act they had acquired. But now having heard of the Mamertines overthrow, and not doubting but if they were forsaken by the Romans, they would apply themselves to the Carthaginians, with one consent they ordained to send them relief. For in the Senate many had before inclined to this opinion, as foreseeing that otherwise Messana quickly, and not long after all Sicily would come under the Carthaginian power, which if it were once come to passe, they should be forced to fight with the Carthaginians for their own possessions in Italy.

For this danger would prove unavoidable, as well by reason of the insatiable desire of Rule in those who are potent, as by the convenient situation of the places. For Italy, proceeding in a long tract between the two seas from the Ligurians and Venetians, to the Brutians, is there divided from Sicily by a very narrow Channel. For there is no doubt made but that these Regions in old times were a continent, afterward divided by the sea, whether the grounds being low were easily overflowed, or whether some earthquake or strength of the Tides cut off the Islands. From hence many think that Town to be called Rhegium, because thence which are broken, are by some such word nominated in the Greek Tongue. 'Tis therefore very credible that the first inhabitants of Sicily came out of Italy, as may be conjectured by the very name. For the Opici are said to have built a Citie on the adverse shore over against Italy, which because it was situate in a Creek of the sea bearing the figure of a Sythe, they called it, I believe, Sicilia, which the Grecians afterward coming, called Zancle, both those words in the several Languages signifying a Sythe. From thence, as often it happens, the name was derived to the whole Island, Which was by many called both Zancle and Sicilia.

This

This Island far excelleth all others in the Mediterranean Sea, both in extent of ground, and fruitfulness of Soile, yielding abundance of Oyl and Wine and Corn of the best, adorned with many, and those very great Cities, even to wonder, and if you consider the Commodities of the Havens, and situation of the whole Island, there is scarce to be found in the world a place more fit for the chief seat of an Empire: For, being near adjacent to Italy, on the contrary part it looketh toward Africa, on another side lyeth Sardinia, and on each it hath Peloponnesus divided from Græcia by the Ionian sea: On every hand the voyage is short, and the passage easy for ships whether bound outward or homeward. And truly, though other reasons were alleged, yet the only cause of the War between the Carthaginians and Romans, was, without doubt, the great desire each of them had to be Masters of this Island. The Romans found fault, That the Carthaginians contrary to the league had assisted the Tarentines; the Carthaginians on the other side charged them, for having entered into Confederacy with Hiere against them. But to so great a power were now both these Cities advanced, that it could not be avoided, but that at some time or other for some cause they must needs find occasion to fall out. For as Trees planted at no great distance, for a while do not much hinder one the other, but being grown to some bignesse beare one the other of Juice and nourishment from the earth, and at full growth entrepinding both root and branches mutually destroy one the other: So rising Empires cannot long be at Amity and friendship, but, swallowing up what is interjacent between each others Dominions, desire to try the superiority between themselves, neither being able to put a limit to their own ambition, or to enlarge their Territories without removing all Opponents.

To these causes may be added the great power the Community had in each City, together with their earnest desire of undertaking the War. In Carthage the vulgar sort did much prevail, and now in the increase of their City, growing rich by many Commodities, were willing for gains sake to have war upon war. The condition of the Roman people was not much different, for having in the former wars sustained damage in their estates, they hoped by the riches of Sicily to recompense themselves, and therefore, according to that power they had lately extorted from the Senate, did approve and confirm their sentence who periwaded the war. Herby Appian the Consul being commissioned (whereas otherwise the major part of the Senate had assented, overpowring the votes of those who stood to old Rules) without delay sendeth Claudius a Tribune of soldiers beforehand with some few ships, to observe an opportunity, and if any were offered, to waste over into Sicily. When he was come to Rhegium, not daring to hazard his ships because he saw the seas obstructed with a greater fleet of Carthaginians, he entered into a Fishermen's vessel and crossed over to Messana; there disquitting with the Mamertines as the present occasion required, being not able to overcome the contradiction of the Carthaginians, he returned without having done his business. But awhile after understanding there was a dissention at Messana, some pleading against the Roman assistance, the greater part bearing ill will to the Carthaginian Garrison, he again crossed the sea, and among other things to the present purpose told them, His coming was only to set the City at liberty, which when he had effected he would immediately return. The Carthaginians answered, The Romans need not trouble themselves for the liberty of a City which was under their jurisdiction, the Carthaginians had already sent of their good will to declare that the Mamertines should not be compelled to be subject to the Syraculans: That therefore he might depart, or else give some other reason of his being at Messana. Claudius denied, The City was free so long as a Foreign Garrison continued therein contrary to their pleasure.

To this when no man returned any answer, the Carthaginians out of pride, the Mamertines for fear holding their peace, he cunningly and readily proceeded, 'Tis plain, saith he, by this your general silence, that the Carthaginians cause is unjust, and that the Mamertines are desirous of liberty, otherwise neither would the one forbear to justify their own Right, and the others, if they consented with the Carthaginians, having no cause to dissemble, would freely and openly speak their minds. At this there arising a kind of a noise in the assembly, many praising his speech as true, and indeed agreeing with their inward thoughts; he (thinking he had, for the present, sufficiently moved the Mamertines and tried the disposition of their minds) went back to Rhegium. And not long after, having made ready his ships, he attempted to passe over, but being much inferior to the Carthaginian Commanders, both in number of vessels, and skill in sea affairs, and being beaten back by the violence of the Waves, in a sudden storm arising, he returned to his port, having lost some ships, and hardly saving the Rest. But being nothing terrified with this misadventure, he new trimmed his ships, resolving upon a better opportunity once more to make tryal of Fortune: When behold messengers came from Hanno (Governour of the Mamertine Garrison, and Guardian of the seas) bringing with them all the ships and men which the Carthaginians had taken in the former fray: Hanno's design herein was to call the blame of the breach of Covenants upon the Romans, he therefore also complained, That they had by force attempted to sail in those seas which were in the possession of the Carthaginians, and furthermore perwaded them to have a great care of preserving peace and maintaining the league.

But hearing that Claudius would not admit of any conditions unless they would withdraw their forces out of Messana, and that again he endeavoured to cross the sea, he vaunted, That he would not suffer the Romans so much as to wash their hands in that sea. Nevertheless he could not

When therefore they were come out of their works, the fortune of the fight changed with the place, and a great number of them were slain, some fled into the Camp, others as they had convenience into the Cities round about; neither durst they any more stir out of their Polybian Camp as long as Claudius was at Mellana. The Consul, considering the nature of the place Zonaras and difficulty of its situation, thought it no wisdom to make a second assault, and feeling his time time to be spent in visit therabouts, leaving a strong Garrison at Messana. Invaded the Territories of the Syracusans and their Confederates; and having without opposition wasted the Grounds, he conceived such Confidence, that he marched up with his army even to Syracuse itself. Where the Battle was very doubtful, and at one time the Consul was in great danger, and had certainly been surrounded and taken, had he not suddenly bethought himself and sent to Hiero, to treat on Conditions of peace. Hiero likewise sent a friend of his to consult about the business, and the discourse being on purpose drawn out in length, the Consul had time to bring his men into a place of greater security: The Syracusans likewise following the same example, had many treaties of peace with the Romans, and indeed an agreement had been made, but that Hiero was unwilling to be the author thereof. In these affairs the greater part of the year was spent; then the Consul returned to Messana, where leaving home forces to protect the Mamertines, with the rest of his men he crossed over to Rhegium: From thence he went to Rome to his Triumph which he made, over the Carthaginians and Hiero King of Sicily, with great joy of the People as being the first over a Foreign Nation. This was the first of the Romans designs by sea, and such was the success of their undertakings in Sicily. But these things and the actions of following times are much corrupted by the ambition of writers, the chiefe whereof, Philinus Agrigentinus, and Fabius Pictor, the one thriving to advance the Carthaginians Glory, the other the Romans, they both neglect their duty, and the truth of History: Whose Levity Polybins deservedly reprehends. For if even in private causes it be held an accused Crime to circumvent any one by false Testimony, the author of an history is certainly to be esteemed more foully perfidious if he corrupt the acts of Princes and Commonwealths with falsehood: He ought to value truth more then any earthly Commodity or his own life, and the less deserve pardon in that he cannot allow to so much as any faire pretence for his Lyes, for if he durst not for some causes freely speak all he knew, he might certainly without danger have held his Tongue. While Claudius in Sicily vanquished Hiero and the Carthaginians, M. Fulvius the other Consul bringeth the Volturnian siege to an Issue, having to deal with men who by despair were hardened and made valiant against all violence, he at length tameth them by famine. Upon delivery of the City, he died with exquisite torments put to death thus unthankful and insolent crew of Libertines; the City it self he demolished, the other Volturnians who had not put off the faith of servants, and reverence toward their masters, he distributed into several feats round about.

This war was likewise thought worthy of a Triumph, which the Consul made in the Calends of November, as over the Volscians. While the same Consuls were in office a Lustration was performed by the Censors, Cn. Cornelius and C. Marcus, and there were registered the names of two hundred ninety two thousand, two hundred twenty and four Citizens: a very great and almost incredible number to one who shall consider how many were lost in the wars, which hardly ever ceased since the foundation of the City; and how many were also swallowed up by the Pestilence and Malignant diseases as raging as the war it self. But indeed the Commonwealth was made invincible and not to be overcome by any calamity or slaughter whatsoever, by the wise advice of Romulus (which was constantly observed by posterity) in daily admitting new people into their City, inasmuch that neither all the losses received by Pyrrhus, nor their many shipwrecks in the first Punic war, nor the fights of Thraimenes and Cannae in the second, were able to much afflict it, but that still the did rise more cheerful, free and valiant out of all her troubles.

But in Greece the Lacedæmonians who were also very famous for their Discipline and Valour in war, not at any whit inferior to the Romans, because they forbade strangers to conhabit with them, were not long able to uphold their Dominion, nor long after to maintain their Freedom when in the Leuctrian battel they lost not much more then a thousand men, their Empire presently fell to the ground; and at Salamis with the losse of not quite six thousand, their Liberty was taken away. But the Achæans, inhabitants of the fame Peloponnesus, admitting feyny neighbours into equal priviledges with themselves, did constitute a very fair and flourishing Commonwealth, and likely to have continued, had not some few of them, to their own and their Countries destruction, madly provoked the Romans, whose power then was grown formidable to all people. Such divers events are necessarily consequent to divers institutions: For as in nature it is agreeable, that those bodies who are to a competent measure fully refreshed with wholemeat food, should be stronger and longer lived then those who content with their own natural ingenic moisture despise all nourishment from without: so it stands to reason, that those Cities should better flourish, who admit into themselves and make their own what in any other place they find to be excellent, then those, who by a foolish arrogance, despising whatsoever growth not in their own soil, deprive themselves of many good assistants in obtaining and preserving their power and sovereignty.

This year gave a beginning to a cruel custom, which afterward was frequently and most intemperately usurped. That the blood of man should become a public spectacle of pleasure, being profusely shed for the sake of any mean and wanton spectator. The authors of this barbarous custom were M. and D. Junius Brutus, who by a strange kind of piety, intending to honour the Ashes of their dead father, did with great favour of the Citizens exhibit a Fencing-Shew. But this injury to mankind was most severely revenged by a Pestilence, which all this and the next year did furiously rage. Concerning which when they had consulted the books of the Sybils, 'twas found the anger of the gods was the cause thereof. There arising therefore a suspicion that their Religious affairs were not rightly handled, the Priests by diligent observation and inquisition, found that many Chapells and Temples were converted into the use of private men, and that Capparonia, a Vestal Nun, was guilty of Incest; she prevented her doom by hanging her self, but he who had corrupted her, together with those servants who were privy to the fact, were executed according to Law. The holy places were redeemed out of the hands of private hands to their wonted use. So having cleared the City in matters of Religion, the Fathers applied their minds again to the care of the Commonwealth; and because Envidia being appeased, there was no commotion in Italy, they ordered both the new Consuls to be sent into Sicily with their Legions: the Consuls were M. Valerius Maximus the eldest son of Marcus, who in the time of his office was called Messalla, and M. Officius Crassus, C. F. M. N. These having safely transported their forces were attended with the same good fortune. For when after their taking the City of the Adranates by storm they had laid siege unto Cantupria, there came Embassadors to them from the Alacines, offering to deliver up their town, and their

In all these affairs they were much assisted by the Sicilians, who lately had made friendship with them, of whom together with the Romans there were an hundred thousand. They brought provisions as far as Erebus, from whence (it being not far off) the Romans fetched it to their Campe. Whereby they had very great plenty of all Necessaries. At this stay the siege continued for almost five months, neither much prevailing over the other (for they attempted nothing but light skirmishes) till at length the Cartaginians began to leave the work off. For a great number of men, little left than fifty thousand warriors, having been so long shut up in one town, had spent almost all their corn, and saw no likelihood of procuring more, the Romans guarding all the passages, so that they were much afflicted both with their present misery.

Hannö, though he saw a necessity of fighting contrary to his expectation, stoutly entering into battle, maintained it doubtful till the day was almost spent. But the Romans, having on purpose well refreshed their bodies and prepared them to fight, were not so much troubled with heat, thirst and Labour as were the Carthaginians, who, before the battle, being weary with fasting and standing all day, the longer they fought, were the less able to resist by reason of the weakness of their Bodies. At length the Mercenary souldiers who stood in the front were no longer able to endure the brunt, and did not only give back themselves, but falling in disorderly upon the Elephants and other Regiments behind, routed the whole battel and caused them to fly before the enemy who so hotly charged them. Things were managed with the same successe in the other place, for Hannibal, issuing out to fight, was beaten back with the greater losse, and forced into the City again. The Carthaginian Camp was taken, three Elephants wounded, thirty slain, eleven came alive into the Romans hands: The men had the same fortune, for of so great an Army very few escaped with safety. Left them, were afflicted with very great terror and despair: When Hannibal following the best counsel his ill fortune had left him, observing that the Romans, what with weariness of their late fight, and joy of their Victory, kept not their guards so strickt as heretofore, about the third watch of the night went out of the Town with his Mercenaries; and having crossed the Trenches filled up with boats stuffed with draw (which he had beforehand prepared for this purpose) he was a good way on his journey before the Romans, at break of day perceiving what was in hand, surpris'd part of the hindmost Troops; Hannibal with the rest betook himself into places of security. The Agrigentines seeing themselves forsaken by the Carthaginians, either out of anger, or to curry favour with the Conqueror, slew many of those who remained in the City. The Town was not therefore saved from destruction, above five and twenty thousand Free-men were sold into slavery.

In this manner was Agrigentum taken, in the seventh month after it had been first besieged, to the great profit and glory of the Romans, but with the expence of much blood, for of the Consul's Army and his Auxiliaries, there perished by several means above thirty thousand during this siege, for which cause, and by reason winter now approaching, nothing of moment could be undertaken, they returned to Messana. These Commanders going to Rome in hope of Triumph, the next year L. Valerius, M. F. M. N. Flaccus, and T. Otacilius, C. F. M. N. of Crassus being made Consuls went into Sicily. The Carthaginians having set forth a great Navy as to the plunder and wasting of Italy, thought thereby to divert the Consuls from the care of Sicily, but they having sufficient guard upon the coasts to repel the invaders, did nevertheless Sicily, where they received many towns which yielded themselves to their prospects over into Sicily, being terrified by the late example of the Agrigentine overthrow. The Carthaginians in the mean time made no resistance, for besides their late ill success they were vexed with the sedition of their Mercenaries, the Gauls being chief in the Mutiny for want of many months pay; for the punishment of whom, Hanno devised this stratagem, first soothing them with fair speeches he desired them, At present for a while to be quiet, telling them, He was in certain hopes of suddenly surprizing a very rich Town, by the plunder whereof the Gauls should be sufficiently satisfied, both for their pay, as also for the forbearance of it. Having by this means at present appeased them, and moreover received thanks, he takes a convenient time to treat with his Treasurer, (who was most faithful to him) That he would, as a Runegado, sit over to Otacilius the Consul, under pretence of having procured his Accounts, and inform him, That next night he might circumvent four thousand Gauls, who would come to Entella to take it with the help of some Traitors within.

The Consul though he gave not much Credit to a Runegado, yet thinking it a business not to be neglected, did send a Choice Brigade of soldiers upon the design, the Gauls came accordingly as they had been deceived by Hanno, and the Romans suddenly arising out of ambush to receive them, there was between them a very fierce and cruel fight, wherein every one of the Gauls were slain and because they died not unrevenged, Hanno was doubly pleased, both that he was rid of his insolent Mutineers, and that he had cunningly punished them to the no little loss of the enemy. At Rome, in the mean time, Minucius the Pretor propounded in the Senate, the bringing of the water of the River Anio to the City, which work M. Curius the Consul had designed out of the enemies spoils, but several impediments arising, the business for nine years deferred, was now again consulted about; and two men appointed as supervisors, Curius and Fulvius Flaccus, but Curius dying within five days, the Glory of finishing the work was attributed to Fulvius alone. About the same time Hamilcar came from Carthage into Sicily as succour to Hanno: For the Carthaginians, when Hanno returned after his overthrow, received him with Ignominy, fined him in his six thousand pieces of Gold and removed him from his Government. Some Authors being deceived by the likeness of Names, have delivered, that this Amilcar was Father of Hannibal, but the Father of Hannibal came into War against the Romans; but not rightly, for Hamilcar the Father of Hannibal came into Sicily with command, being but a young man, at the latter end of this War, but his great fame prevailed, that the acts of another less known Amilcar were ascribed to Amilcar Barca the most Noble and Egregious of that Name. Hamilcar therefore the successor of Hanno leading the Romans far stronger than himself in their land army, durst not assault any In-Land Cities, nor descend out of the Mountains and difficult places into the Campagna: but having a strong Navy whereby he was doubtless Master of the seas, made diligent use of those his Forces, and, having sent Hannibal again to plunder the Coasts of Italy, himself failing about the Sicilian shore, easily recovered many Port Townes which had joyned themselves with the Romans. Whereby it came to passe, that the Romans easily taking and defending the In-land places, the Carthaginians the Maritime, the Fears and hopes were on both sides very equal, and it was hard to Judge to which of these two Nations the Victory of the whole War would incline.

BOOK

BOOK VII.

OUR years were now expired since the Carthaginian war began, neither had the Romans any cause to complain either of their own courage or fortune; for they were Victors in every battle, both over Carthaginians and Syraculans as often as they durst encounter: They had taken many rich Cities by storm, and others upon Articles submitted themselves, but as long as they waged war in an Island, they could not at their pleasure send provision and recruits when need required. And the Carthaginian ships with free and unexpected arrival being themselves secure, did not only molest and vex the Sicilian Cities upon the shore, but likewise wasted the coasts of Italy, both to the loss of the Roman Empire, and likewise to their disgrace; whereas the African shore was clear and free from the enemies invasion. The Senate therefore and people of Rome diligently consulting upon the matter, did resolve to prepare a Fleet, and fight the Carthaginians not only by land, as hitherto they had done, but to try their fortune at sea also. This was the very first serious thought the Romans had concerning sea affairs, which they accomplished with as much Courage and good Fortune, as they had conceived it with Wisdom and Resolution: Inomuch as the Empire of the whole world might well be judged due to the Romans, who being willing by sea to encounter a people most skillful in sea affairs, wanted neither Boldness to attempt it, nor Diligence to manage it, nor Constancy effectually to perform it. For the Romans to that day being so utterly ignorant of sea affairs, that there was not a man amongst them who ever had seen one, neither any one Man of War of their own, or any Carpenter who knew how to build one, yet having with great confidence undertaken the design, they did in a very short time both learn to sail and venture to fight and overcome those people who for many ages had had experience in sea affairs.

The care of building the ships was committed to Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. N. Scipio Aſina, Orosius. and C. Duilius, who had newly entered the Consulship. They had one Carthaginian ship of five Oars, which Claudius took with his foot army (at what time he was studying to passe into Sicily) while in heat of fight it came too near the shore and was grounded upon the sands in a shallow place. The Consuls ordered the whole Navy to be built after that Pattern, and so diligently prosecuted the work, that in threecore days after the timber was felled, they had threecore ships standing at Anchor. But the Consuls hastened their expedition no less by their wit, then by their Industry. For, (being neither willing to hazard to fight with men unskilful at the oar, nor yet to freighten the time allotted them for action in training up and exercising men on purpose) they contrived a device, which though it may at first seem ridiculous, yet in the use and event proved exceeding Commendable. That, while the ships were in building, their Men should sit on shore and there be taught their office how to Rowe. For being placed in the same order as they were to observe in the ships, and a Boatswaine being set in the midst of them, they were commanded, at his word given, to move their Oars, and again to forbear, even as if they were sailing.

By this exercising themselves in fancy only they were so improved, that when the ships were ready, after a few days real paines-taking, the Consuls were willing to trust themselves and

and the safety of all their Legions to their care. When lots were cast for the Provinces, the Land Army fell to C. Duilius, the Fleet to Cn. Cornelius; who, taking along with him fifteen ships, sailed before hand to Misfana, to make preparation for the coming of the Fleet, which he ordered suddenly to follow him: but before it came, he fell into the hands of the Enemy, which came to pass by the cunning of Zoodis, Hannibal's Vice-Admiral, and his own Credulity, giving credit to some Liparans, who were suborned by the Enemy, to put him in hopes of taking the City of Lipara by Treachery. There being circumvented by the Carthaginian ships, he nevertheless resolved to encounter them, and seek his safety by fighting: but that Bodas by another fraud, trained him and his Colonels into his own ship, under pretence of Treating on Conditions of Peace. They were no sooner come but clapt up in chains, the others being hereby terrified did without blows yield themselves up. Bodas gaining all the Vessels, took the Prisoners to Carthage. Soon after the Carthaginian Commander committed the like fault to his greater shame, in that the fresh example of the Consul's incognitancy did not learn him to be more circumspect. He had understood that the Roman Navy sailing by the Italian shore, was putting forth to sea, and that they could not now be farre off. Desiring therefore, as near as might be, to observe it, that he might accurately know the number of their ships, their swiftness, and in what fashion and plight their new made Vessels were in, he sailed forward with fifty ships, not foreseeing any danger, his ships being confusedly mixed without any order, as when they ride in Harbour or any safe place: At the turning therefore of a certain Promontory, suddenly falling into the Roman Fleet, which came prepared and sailing in good order; he was vanquished before he could prepare himself to fight, and having lost the greater part of his Navy, himself likewise being in great danger, he very hardly escaped with the rest. The Victorious Navy, understanding Cornelius his misshap, sent Messengers to C. Duilius to give him notice of their approach, and prepared themselves for fight, having intelligence that the other Carthaginian ships were not farre off. There while they diligently considered the inconvenience of their own Vessels, that they were rudely made, and farre inferior to the Carthaginians in swiftness, it came into the mind of a certain ingenious man to invent an Engine, whereby to lay hold and keep fast the Enemies ships; which Engine they afterward called a Raven, or Crow; the fashion of it was this. There was a straight round piece of Timber, four ells long, some nine inches Diameter, having at the end thereof a pulley or windlass, to which, being fixed on the foredeck, there was fitted a bridge, six ells broad, and four feet long, made of planks fastned together with iron nails. In this Engine there was left a long hole whereby it might be fitted to the piece of Timber, by the space of four ells, even the whole length of the Timber. The other part of the bridge or ladder, which was not inferted in the Timber, being of two ells long, was so fastned by hinges, that it might be pulled up, or let fall; to the end of the bridge was affixed a strong sharp piece of iron, with a ring at it's head, whereto a rope being tied, through the pulley of the timber, it might be drawn down into the Foredeck; Then as they lifted, by the Rope they could draw it up, or let it fall down, with its sharp piece of iron laying hold on and keeping fast whatsoever it fell upon. In the mean time the Consul C. Duilius, committing his foot Army to the Charge of his Colonels, came to the Navy, and understanding that the Enemies spoiled the Region of Mylæ, sailed with his whole fleet to that shore.

The Carthaginians were glad of this, assuredly promising themselves victory over Inland-men, altogether unskillfull in sea affairs; whereby they became an example, That no Enemy whatsoever ought to be despised, as to cause one to remit ordinary discipline, and grow secure. Hannibal the Admirall, who had conveyed his Forces out of Aggrigentum, was in a Vessell of seven oares on a side, which formerly belonged to King Pyrrhus, the other ships followed him: not as to a fight, in any distinct order, but, as every one thought fit, making hast to their despicable Enemy. But when approaching nearer, they saw the Engines hanging at the foredecks of the Roman ships, wondering at the novelty of the business, they paused a while, at length the most Courageous men laughing at the rude invention of an unskillfull Enemy, the foremost ships with all the violence that might be flew upon them. Then the Crows being let down into what ships soever they light, so pierced the planks thereof that they held them fast against their wills. The Roman souldiers, if the ships were fastned side to side, did on every part leap in and assault the Enemy; if they were joynd only in the foredecks, they went two by two over the bridge annexed to the timber, with so much the more facility, because on each side of the bridge a little fence knee high, made their passage safer, and their footing more secure: They who went foremost, holding their bucklers before, defended their faces from the Enemies darts, those who followed held their shields down to the little fence, so guarding their sides, and entering the Enemies ships; so that the fight was not performed with the Beakes of ships, but with swords and hands, like to a set Barrell. The Romans therefore excelling in strength and Courage, had an easy victory over men lightly armed, and trusting more in the nimbleness of their ships, then in their hands; They quickly forced thirty Carthaginian ships, among which the Admirall's frigate was taken, but Hannibal leaping out of his ship, when it was now taken, into a Cock-boat escaped Captivity, and sending a truly friend in post-haste to Carthage, to prevent the News of his Overthrow, did thereby cunningly decline that Capital punishment which otherwise had attended him. His friend entering the Senate, as if all things had been well, well, asked their Advice, whether they thought it fit that the Roman Navy should be fought withal? and every one unannimously agreeing, That there was no scruple to be made, and that the business should not be deferred; he told them, 'Tis already done, and we are beaten; whereupon, no body daring to accuse the Fact, wherof every one in his own Person would have been Author, Hannibal escaped the sentence of Death, but was deprived of his Admirallship. The rest of the Carthaginian ships, (for the greater part was left) after the Flight of the Admirall, were very much troubled and doubtful in Council what to do; they were ashamed to fly having received no harm, the Enemy not so much as prefling upon them; on the other side to set upon the Roman ships, they were afraid, by reason of their Engines; At length falling round about, and finding on every side the foredecks of the ships opposed against them, with those formidable Engines, having used all the art they could, they despairing of the victory went their way.

'Tis reported that fourteen Carthaginian ships were sunk in that fight, one and thirty taken, with seven thousand men, three thousand having been slain. With this success did C. Duilius fight with the Carthaginians near the Liparans Islands, where the Romans got much prey, but much more ample Glory and Renown. The Conflict taking charge again of his Land Army, Marched to Segesta, and delivered it from danger, it having been brought even to the utmost extremity by the Carthaginians; after that he took Macella by storme, Hannibal never daring to encounter with him: and so having confirmed the minds of the Affiliated Cities, Summer being past, he returned to Rome: After his departure the Carthaginian affairs began again to prosper. For first the Romans after seven months continuance were faine to raise their liege of Antisthratus, having lost many men before it. When afterward a Diffension arose between the Romans and their Auxiliaries, and that the Affiliates encamped themselves apart between Paropus and Therma: Hannibal thought fit to make use of this their madnes, and falling on them unawares flew four thousand of them; and it wanted little but that the whole Roman Army had likewise been involved in the same overthrow.

Then again many Townes were taken by Hannibal, some by force, some by Treachery: which though it was no good newes at Rome, yet the loss was counted small in respect of their Navall Victory. For the Roman courage having already approved it self invincible by Land, they had great cause to rejoice, that by this Fight they had gained reputation of strength by sea also. Whereupon wonderfully encouraging themselves as to the whole Warre, they judged the Author of this their New Glory worthy also of new Honour, Duilius therefore was the first who ever made a Navall Triumph, which was on the Intercalary Calends over the Sicilians and the Carthaginian Navy. They likewise bore with him, when, not content with this Honour: he did without all precedent assume another to himselfe, that returning from supper, a light Torch was carried before him while the Minstrells Sang; A Beaked Pillar likewise was by decree of the Senate erected in the Market-place, of white Parian Marble, which is yet to be seen (but many of the Letters worn out with Age) containing the Number of ships taken and drowned, the Summ and Weight of the Money taken. There were taken of Gold three thousand seven hundred pieces, of silver above an hundred thousand, of heavy Bras seven score hundred thousand pounds. The Triumph being accomplished, Duilius called an Assembly, wherein L. Cornelius, L. J. Cn. N. Scipio and C. Aquilius M. F. C. N. were chosen Consuls. The Senate ordered their Provinces to be Sicily, and Sardinia. The Admirall had permission, if he thought it for the Publick good, to touch upon Nardania and Corfica. This Charge happening to L. Cornelius, having prepared his ships he sailed away.

This was the first Roman expedition into Sardinia and Corfica; the Islands are so near adjoining that they seem but one and the same, yet much unlike, as in the temper of the Air and Soil, foine the Dispositions of the inhabitants. Sardinia as bearing the shape of a mans footing, was by the Ancients called Ichnusa and Sandalotis, afterwards 'tis said, That Sardus the son of Hercules of Lybia much frequenting the Island, gave it the name it is now known by. Old Fables affirm that the Grecians came into those places with Ariftea, and after the Trojan war the Trojans. For extent of ground and fruitfulness of soil, it yieldeth not much to the biggest and best Islands of those seas. It breeds excellent catel, very fruitful it is of the best Corn, rich in Metals, especially Silver. But the air is not so wholesome, inofum as foreign Nations commended not so much its Fertility as they dispraised its Pefilient air; for in Summer it is sickly, especially in the most fruitful places. It produceth likewise an Herb, much like the Bee Flower, of very violent Poyson, being eaten it distracteth the mind, and forcibly attracting the Nerves distordeth the lips as in laughter: the juice of it is mortal, unless after vomiting you drink good food of milk and honeyed water: the present force of the disease is so remedied, the other incommodities thereof are cured by the same means as other Convulsions of the Nerves.

Likewise there is a very little creature called Salpuga, a kind of Pismire, which is deadly to those who unawares sit upon it, it is so much the more dangerous, because hardly to be seen or taken notice of by those who are ignorant of its nature. The Sardinians being a Nation mixed of divers sorts of Barbarians, when they are left to their own liberty, chuse rather to live by robbery and plunder, then by husbandry: They are armed with a Target and short Sword, but Brest-plates they few together the out skins of their Rams, which they call Mufmone, beating not wooll as others, but in stead thereof hair like Goats. Their chiefest City is Carali, looking towards Africa and from thence built, with a very fair Haven. Coscia is not to be compared with Sardinia either for largeness of Territorie, or for Riches, yet is thought to be the third in bigness of all those Islands. The inhabitants derive the name from one Corla a woman, out of whose Head a Bull crossed over into this Island from Liguria; the Greeks called it Cyrnus. It is Mountainous and Rugged, in many places almost impassible; and the people like to the earth are very rough, without ordinary civility, as untractable as the wild beasts. When they are taken prisoners they hardly grow gentle, but either out of Impatience of labour and servitude kill themselves, or by their contumacy and stubbornness are troublesome to their masters.

The Island is plentiful in Honey, but it is of a bitter taste, much like the flower of Box, which tree in great number groweth there; yet it is very wholesome, and many think they Coriscans to be therefore long-lived, because they ordinarily use that Honey. Their Towns are not very populous, yet there is above thirty of them, the principal whereof are Aleria a Colony of the Phocians, and Nicaea of the Etrurians. The Air is here very troublesome, and therefore the fairs rough. The Carthaginians therefore had long wars with these nations, and obtained the dominion of both Islands, except places inaccessible. But because wild and rude men were easier to be vanquished then tamed, they brought themselves of many means whereby to keep them under, they likewise corrupted all the fruits of the Island, and under pain of death prohibited the Natives to sow or plant any such thing, that they might be forced to fetch all necessities from Africa, till at length grown somewhat more gentle they learned with patience to bear the yoke.

To these Islands at this time did Cn. Cornelius bear his course, and first in Coscia stormed the City Aleria, after which without much labour or danger he took the rest. From thence as he sailed towards Sardinia, he met the enemies Fleet, which he presently put to flight before they came to grapple. After this he went to Olbia, where seeing many Carthaginian ships in the Haven, and thinking himself not strong enough in foot to storm a City so well situated, and defended by a great multitude, for the present he omitted the business, and sailed home for a recruit of men.

About the same time a servile Commotion, in the Citie, which was in the beginning happily suppressed, did both afflict the Commonwealth with great fear, and likewise secure it. Many out of the new conquered Nations, were pressed for sea service, whereof there were then four thousand in Rome, most of them Samnites; these men abhorring the sea, did secretly become their own Condition and so far exasperated one another that they were resolved to burn the Citie and plunder it: They had already drawn in above three thousand accomplices into the conspiracy, which daily gathered more strength, when Erinus Potellius, Commander of the Auxiliaries, did by his wisdom prevent all danger. For he feigning himself engaged in the same faction, was made privie to all their Contrivances, he was acquainted with the number of them, nay, with the nation, and name of every particular person in the conspiracy; he knew the place and the time where and when they intended to act any thing. He now wanted nothing to the accomplishment of his own private design, but only to discover theirs to the Senate, but thither he could not find no opportunitie of going, because the Samnites would never suffer him to walk alone; at length having devised this trick, he perswaded them, That when the Senate next met, they should come by bands into the market-place, and complain that they were cheated in the Measure of their Corn, that then they should have occasion offered of executing their Purplot, or at least understand of what mind and opinion the Fathers will be in upon such sudden motions and stirrs. And to gaine the more Credit in the business, he went along with them, manifesting himself not only a Companion in the Tumult, but the Author and Ringleader of it. Whereupon being called into the Senate he discovered to them the danger of the secret Plot and cause of his own dissimulation. The Fathers, taking no notice of what they knew, sent Messengers with good words to pacifie the Rout, and command them home, assuring them with all, That the Senate would take order for Redress of their Grievance, and that every one should enjoy his Right. The Conspirators, thinking their Designs was still kept close, went their way: The night following every Master bound his servants, whom according to Potellius his Information, he knew guilty of the treason, the Samnites also were most of them seized upon their Quarters. Either the care of this or some other business, or fickleness was an hindrance to C. Florus, that he did not goe into it so fast as ordinary, whereby Hamilcar after his last Victorie had time much to encrease the Carthaginian Power there. For having taken Camarina and Enna by Treachery, he fortified Drépanus, where was a very fair Haven, and enlarged it in forme of a Town, bringing the Erycinnes thither to Dwell, whose Citie, left it should be servicable to the Romans he totally demolished, excepting the Temple of Venus. After this he reduced many other places under his power either by deceit or by force, and was in a likelihood of conquering all Sicilie, but that Florus, for this reason not daring in winter to forsake the Island, tarried to oppresse him. The other Consul had an Easier Task with the Sardinians and Carthaginians at Olbia; whether being returned with encrease of strength, he found Hanno there, who after the removal of Hannibal was made Admiral. The batel waxing vehemently hot, Hanno courageously fighting, seeing his own party worsted, rushed in to the thickest of the Enemies and was there slain: After which the Town yielded it self. The Consul much graced the fame of his Victory by his singular humanity toward the Enemy. For he took care to have the Body of Hanno to be conveyed out of his Cabbin to Burial, and made a large Funeral for him, laying aside hatred after Death, and rightly judging that virtue is to be honoured even in an enemy. Then not suffering the Terror of his late Victorie to grow stale and be forgotten, he took many other Cities of Sardinia, furthering his Courage with Counsells and stratagems. For he used in the night time to land some choice bands not far off those townes he meant to assault, who conveniently placing themselves in Ambush lay quiet, till the Consul coming to the walls and giving an Alarm, had under pretence of Flight drawn the Townsmen a good way out of their works, then they in Ambush hastily arising took the Citie void of Defendants: By this wile he obtained many places, and so prosecuted his Atchevements, that the Carthaginian armies had no abiding place either in Sardinia or Coscia. For which cause, at his Return, there was no doubt made, but a most ample Triumph decreed him, which he made over the Carthaginians, Sardinia and Coscia the fifth of the Ides of March, having brought great store of plunder out of those Islands and many thousands of Captives. But in Sicily C. Florus besieged Mysistratus, which was attempted in vain, neither could it be gained till the new Consul A. Attilius A.F.C.N. came thither; For to him was allotted Sicily for his Province, the Navy was committed to his Colleague C. Sulpicius Q. F. Q. N. Pauculus. They understanding that Panormus was the Carthaginians winter Quarter, marched thither with all their Forces, and, ordering their Men, presented Battel to the Enemy but no man coming out against them, they went thence to Hippana, which Citie in their journey they formed and presently maltreated. Thence Attilius marched to Mysistratus, which being stoutly defended, at length the Garrison soldiers, being wearied with the cries and Lamentations of women and Children, forsook it. The Carthaginians went out in the night time, at break of day the Townsmen opened the Gates. But the Romans bearing too much in mind the Inconmodities they had endured in the siege thereof, slew every one they met without distinction of age or sex, till A. Attilius the Consul caused proclamation to be made, That both Plunkers and Prisoners should belong to those who took them. Then at length Comedownes overcame Cruelty, and the rest of the Citizens were saved and made Captive: The Citie was plundered and demolished. The Army being thence led towards Camarina, fell into the great danger, for want of knowledge in the Country. For the Carthaginian General meeting them had first possessed the higher places, and as it were besieged the Romans rashly entered into a disadvantageous vallie, every one thought they saw before their Eyes the very picture of the Chacidon overthrow, but the wisdom and Valour of M. Calpurnius Flamma a Colonel in the army, in their utmost point of despair did relieve them. For he following the Example of P. Decius, who being a Colonel in Saminum had done the like, taking three hundred soldiers along with him, went up to possess a certaine Hillock, not out of hope to escape, but both he and his soldiers being animated with the Love of honour, and desire of saving the whole army. 'Tis said when he had brought them thither, he thus spake unto them, Let us die, fellow Soldiers, and by our death deliver the Romans now round besiged. And so it came to passe, for while the enemy converted themselves wholly upon these men, they being relieved to die, did so long maintain a sharp fight with the greater number, that the Consul had time to explicate himself out of that unhappy place. The Carthaginians having slain those who did indeed on purpose offer up themselves (putting no hope in their ambush which was now discovered), departed. The fortune of Calpurnius was next to a Miracle, for he being found among the heaps of his own and the enemies dead bodies, was the only man had breath left in him; and being carried Orosius 4.8 away and diligently fomented (among many wounds having not one mortal) he recovered, and afterward did great and faithful service to the Commonwealth, and proved of great terror to the enemy. If he had among the Grecians performed such a deed of Valor, they would not have known how to have bestowed rewards, or have decreed Monuments enough to his Honor: M. Caro apud Agellium. Plinie 22.6. Frontinus. Agellius: he was in, made his error an argument of shame, and his danger of watchfulness and circumspection. Therefore with the greater courage and care he proceeds to the assault of the City, and being not able to prevail against it without Engines of battery, he borrowed some of Hiero. With them he brake down the walls, and reduced Camarina into his power, the Citizens for the most part he sold for slaves. Thence he marched to Enna, and had that by treachery delivered to him, the Garrison soldiers were part of them slain by the Romans after they were entered, the rest fled away and becooke themselves to places possessed by their own party. Sittana was obtained not by craft but courage, the defendants being driven back and the City stormed. Some smaller Towns in that part of Sicily made no delay, but forthwith sent messengers with promise of submission. The Consul placing Garrisons in all places convenient, marched into the Agrieginus Territories, and by treachery had the Cattle Camicus delivered to him. Florus 22. Where-

Whereupon the Garrison of Erbesus being disheartened, forsook the Town. So Erbesus came again into the Romans hands. The Consul Encouraged with this success, and thinking that many of the Liparæans favoured him, advanced with his Army to their City. But there he had not the like Fortune. For Hamilius having intelligence of the Romans Design, privately entered Lipara, and diligently expected the time of Action. The Romans being ignorant of this, boldly and unawily coming up to the walls, were by a sudden fall of the Carthaginians beaten back. Many were wounded in that Conflict, and no small number slain. In the mean time C. Sulpicius the Consul had many encounters with the Enemy in Sardinia, and all prosperous. And his mind was so erected, that he made bold to sail toward Africa.

The Carthaginians by no means enduring any such Attempt, once more made Hannibal Admirall, who since his flight out of Sicily had continued at Carthage, along with him they sent their best Sea Commanders, with Order, To chase the Enemies Navy from their Country. He puts to Sea with a resolution to fight, but a Tempest prevented the Encounter, which being very violent on both Navies, drove them against their wills into more calme places: Both Admiralls turned into Sardinian Ports. There lying at Anchor, Sulpicius places to draw the Carthaginians out to sea, suborned some, under pretence of Runnagates, to persuade Hannibal, that the Romans were again sailing to Africa. He being deluded by this Craft, suddenly setting sail, before he was aware, met with the Consul who in a convenient place waited for him: Many Carthaginian ships were sunk, before they knew what they were about, the Consul's stratagem being much favour'd, by a Mist opportunely arising: At length understanding what was the matter, the other ships went some back into the Haven, others drove themselves on shore, where the men landing themselves, most of the Vessels were taken empty: Hannibal despairing to recover the Port, betook himself to the Swiftness, where, in a sedition, being apprehended by the Carthaginians, who had fled out of the same fight, he was by them Crucified, saying, that his Folly and Rashness was the cause of their Overthrow. But this Victory of the Romans was an occasion of some loss to them afterwards. For being freed from fear of the Carthaginian Navy, while they boldly and securely waited the Grounds, they were suddenly routed by an unexpected incursion of Sardinians and Carthaginians, one Hanno being Commander. C. Duilius was this year Censor, and built the Temple of Janus Pro-consul over the Carthaginians, the fourth of the Nones of October, the other of C. Sulpicius the Consul over the Carthaginians and Sardinians, the third of the Nones. When C. Attilius, M. F. M. N. Regulus, and Cn. Cornelius, L. F. Cn. N. Blasio again were Consuls, the Senate ordered Sacrifices to be made for avoiding the Omen of some Prodiges. In the Alban Mount, and other places, and in the City it selfe many stones fell as Haile: 'Twas thought fit to Solemnize the Lutine Festival, and in order to that, a Dictator was created, Q. Ogulnius, L. F. A. N. Gallus. The Master of Horse was M. Latorius, M. F. M. N. Tiberianus, C. Attilius, the Admirall having failed to Tyndarides in Sicily, when he espied the Carthaginian Navy passing by, out of order, suddenly resolved to set upon it; and commanding the other ships to follow, hastily sets forward with ten, which were Ready, and with all speed both of sail and Oare endeavours to overtake the Carthaginians, still before him. Hamilius, a very considerable Commander, was in that Fleet, who seeing but few ships near him, others scarce yet out of the Haven, the greater part still at Anchor, steering back, circumvented Attilius and his ships with his whole Navy, nine of them he sunk presently, not able to maintain fight with so great a Number. The Admirals Frigate being better manned, and the Mariners encouraged by the presence of the Consul, brake out from amongst them by main strength and saved it selfe. For the other Roman Vessels were now come up, by whose help the Fortune of the Battell was changed. Eight of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, ten with all their men taken; the rest retired to the Liparæan Islands. These things were done at Sea. The Land Forces were not so quick at their Work, having in vain assaulted the City Lipara. But with all hostility they spoiled the open Fields; the same Calamity also attended the Land Melitus, not farre distant. For their Exploits C. Atilius the Consul made a Naval Triumph over the Carthaginians of Sicily the fourteenth of the Calends of February. The Romans were then in a very joyfull state and Condition, being Victorious not only at Land, but at sea also; And did now begin to Consul not only of the Conquest of Sicily and the Neighbouring Islands, which they thought sure enough their own, but of invading Africa also, and bring the Terror of the War to the Gates of Carthage it selfe.

BOOK VIII.

Afterwards L. Manlius, A. F. P. N. commonly called Longus, did enter upon the Consulship, and L. Cadius, Q. F. Q. N. after whose death, M. Atilius, M. F. L. N. Regulus, who had been sometimes Consul, succeeded in his Office. Then only in this year Africa, which hitherto had been free from any miseries by an Enemy, began to be sensible of a war, when the Romans had made an invasion therein, after they had in a great Sea fight gained the Victory over the Carthaginians fleet; which exploits, as they were achieved, we shall in this Book set forth, and both the one and the other fortune of that same Regulus, and his end not suitable to the gallantry of the man: The year before when the Carthaginians, C. Attilius being Consul, did so strive to get the best in a Sea-conflict, that when they had lost many ships, they first gave over fighting, yet because they had sunk some certain of the Roman Vessels, they would not take themselves to have been of lesser reputation. On the other part, the Romans did judge that event as an undoubted Victory. So it was that the vast multitude on both sides did bend their mindes with greatest emulation to the study of Sea-Affaires. And therefore the Consuls being charged to remove the warre into Africa, when they were come to the Coast of Sicily on the right hand beyond Pachinus, to take in the Foot Forces, they having also some Forts near the Hill Ennomus, they failed forward. And about the same time Hamilius General of the Carthaginians, and Hanno the Admirall, being Commanders of a Fleet of three hundred and sixty ships, having passed by Lilybaeum in Carthage, and then Heraclea Aminas, in that bay they consult of calling Anchor, observing the motions of the Romans, and if they durst bend towards Africa, they were in a posture to stop their course; which when the Consuls were informed of, they with good advice make all things ready for either chance, that they might not be to seek for Counsell, whether they were to engage in a Sea-conflict, or draw some whither for safety: therefore committing the ships to some of the stoutest Souldiers, they make four Squadrons, as so many parts of the whole fleet; the choicest men they set in the first Squadron, the two next Squadrons they place in their order, in the Reare-guard they put their chiefest men for strength, the Triarii, these forces they dispose of in such array, that each ship did carry 300 rowers, and six score Souldiers. So the Muster-Roll in the whole Navy did amount to an hundred and forty thousand men.

The Carthaginians did somewhat exceed thit number, leading more souldiers than an hundred and fifty thousand. And indeed the Consuls did scarce esteem of any other sort of souldiers in comparison of their own. There was so much the more consulting, when it did appear, they must needs fight in the deep Ocean; where the swiftness of the ships, and the skill of the Pilots are of much advantage, to the fit ordering the front of the battell aray against that danger; finally they consider of placing the whole Fleet Aray. They set two Gallies wherein the Consuls themselves were carried, very even in the Van, to both those Gallies they joyn on this side the first Squadron, on that side the second in a long continued row; the ships being placed in such manner, that the fore gallies of them all were turned outwards, and the Gallies did move almost joyned together, the ships next to those did keep from each other more apart, and so consequently the space left between the opposite ships did grow wider according to their being set in order. So when the form of the Van in manner of a wedge was shaped, with small distance between the first ships, and with great spaces between the last, then did they cable the third Squadron to advance, which bearing that open space between the two first ships, did meet by their order, exhibit a triangular form of the whole array; behind this, at the third Squadrons back, the long boats were drawn by a Barge with Cables to pull with, reaching to the ships of the Triarii souldiers. The Triarii the souldiers fet in the Rear-ward, did so inviron the former, the ships being stretched out into a half circle, that from each Wing they did appear; So the whole body with a deep hollow front, the hindmost parts being firmly solid, did resemble the snout of a ship, not less able to receive a violent assault, then fit to give one.

But the Carthaginian Captains having intelligence by their Scouts of the approach of the Roman fleet, when they considered, the passage to their City was not difficult, the common force were nothing manly, the bordering Neighbours inconstant, and very prone to follow their fidelity, they conclude to go out to meet them: being resolved first to try all that might be, rather then they would suffer, that the Roman Vessels should have a safe Voyage into Africa. Therefore they betake them to ships, encouraging their men in short, That they would undertake the fight with minds firmly set, and cheerfull, well remembering they were to fight, not only touching things present, but in reference to all things, which each one held precious at home; and with their own good hope, and that of their fellow Seamen, they launch forth out of the Harbour; nor was the Romans fleet far distant, therefore not far from Hecale they give the shock against each other with equal Routings. The Carthaginian Captains did so provide, that Hanno should charge on the Right Wing, (but it was he that had been unfortunate at Agrienum) Hamilcar should be Commander over the rest, And they also divide their ships into four Squadrons, having observed the array which the Romans had made use of; Of these, that which was the left Wing of the whole array being crooked like a bow, did make towards the shore, the rest were extended in their plain order, and turned upon the first Squadron of the Enemies ships. Hereupon the Right Wing in which there were very swift Vessels with snouts and five oares in a feat, Hanno did stretch it out all he could towards the main Ocean, being ready to surround the Enemy, if the skirmish should begin at any other part. And the Consuls not staying long did venture themselves with their two Squadrons into the midst of the Carthaginian ships; Hamilcar that he might break the array of the Romans did charge his souldiers, when the Conflict began, they should presently take their flight, which being done, and the Romans eagerly pursuing them, the Carthaginians indeed had no hurt by their flying, in regard their ships were swift; but the array of the Romans, as Hamilcar wished, and had foreseen, was rent asunder, when yet the Triarii, and the third Squadron did keep their places, which, when he saw it performed, he suddenly gives a sign out of his own ship, that their fore-cables being run'd, they should encounter those that did pursue them: the fight was doubtfull, the Carthaginians excelling in swiftness, and in skill for Navigation. The Romans being farre transcendent in the stoutness of their souldiers. Therefore so long as the fight rather of the ships, then of the men, did last, the Carthaginians had the better clearly: But when they began to fight hand to hand, the ships being fastned close with grappling irons, then the Victory did certainly incline towards the Roman party: When the souldier full of confidence through his hand-strokes, and fighting before the Consuls, did strive to approve his valour to them with a more notable endeavour: while the skirmish was so managed in that part, Hanno with the Right Wing, which hitherto he kept unmoved, made a fierce assault, being carried by the tide amongst the ships of the Triarii, and did create them much trouble some work, when they were brought to great distress. At the same time almost, the Left Wing also of the Carthaginians, the first posture being changed, and with a front made even, does assail with dangerous breaks the third Squadron of the Romans, which drew their long boats by a Barge. The Romans having slipped their Cables, did prepare themselves for resistance; Here also they shew much Gallantry: So in three places, there do happen even just so many Sea-fights, far distant from each other.

When they had fought so hard, the Victory long enough inclining to either side, at last it changed, as needs it must, where there is fierce bickering in sundry places at once, with equal force and vehemency, that the selfe-same part which is first routed, should cause the whole Victory. For when Hamilcar was utterly unable any longer to withstand the Violence of his Enemies, his single flight did immediately disperse even the whole fleet of the Carthaginian. For L. Manlius one of the Consuls, being very much busied about bringing together the ships that were taken, and chaining them to his own, M. Regulus flying the fight to begin afresh in another place, he made haste to relieve his own side, taking to him the ships of the second Squadron, all that escaped out of the former fight safe and unshattered; The Triarii did soon perceive that relief, and recollecting their Spirits, which had even failed them in extremity of Danger, they began to oppose their Enemies with great undauntedness. Hanno, when he saw that both those before him made stout resistance, and that himselfe was so over-charged on the Rear with fresh supplies, hosing up sail he did his best to avoid his approaching overthrow. And when L. Man- thus amidst these tryalls beheld the third Squadron of the Romans to be enforced towards land by the Carthaginians Left Wing, he steer'd that way, and M. Regulus overtook him unawares, who had even now set the long boats and the Triarii out of harmes reach. So the state of things is soon quite changed, and they are surrounded very close, who but just before had hemmed the Romans in. Whom indeed being strangely encompassed, and in a manner straightly besieged, they might ere this have utterly destroyed, unless not daring to go near them for fear of the iron raven-beaks they were wont to grapple with, they gave the Consuls time enough, that themselves being safe they might even secure their own side, and the Carthaginians, that were environ'd by a sudden surprisall, had leisure to take, as with a net, fifty ships, and all that were therein, so the other few stealing away by the very shore side did make their escape.

This Sea-conflict as well in regard of various ill accidents, and the eagerness of the encounter, as also for the number of ships lost on both sides, was of fair remark. Of the Carthaginian ships sixty and three were taken, above thirty were sunk. The Conquering Romans lost four and twenty by reason of foul weather, but not one of them did fall into the hands of the Enemy.

When this victory was over, returning to Messana they allotted certaine daies to mend their ships, and refresh their men, and to take in store of new provision. Amongst which Hamilcar when he would not yield by any means, the Romans should go to Africa, but wanted strength to stop their march, he betook himself to stratagems, and fought, by sending Hanno to them to sue for peace, to prolong the time, till the arrivall of the forces which he lookt the Carthaginians would send him. Hanno when he made his addresse to the Consuls, and heard the exclamations of the people, that the same decree ought to pass against him, which five years before the Carthaginians had design'd against Cornelius Afrina then Consul, he shifted off the threatened mischief with a subtil answer, Verily if ye shall do so (saies he) ye shall not be better at all then the very Africans; and presently the Consuls well relented what he said, commanding those to be silent that had voted him to chains, and there was a voice heard well beeming the gravity of the Roman flock; O Hanno, the faithfull dealing of our City does grieve from that fear. It was in vain to move for peace because the Carthaginian did not deal sincerely, and the Consuls did rather aim at Victory then at Peace. Therefore they had no mind to defer any longer their intended voyage to Africa; Neither did the Carthaginian Commanders crosse the design, though they engaged to each other, not to endure the enemy should march without disturbance, but to incite him from sundry quarters, and to bar his passage. But Hanno making halt to fortify Carthage beforehand, Hamilcar not daring to attempt ought, carries at Hecale. The Romans ships made a safe voyage free both from enemies and from tempests. And there wanted not some that did strangely abominate any travelling far by sea, and the enemies coast, and the very name of Africa. Mammius, an Officer among the souldiers, did first begin to speak ill of government, but Regulus was so incensed against him, that he threatened him that scourges and the axe should be his lot, unless he would submit. So at length the Consul was obeyed, and the nearer and the greater fear did expel the dread of travelling by sea. The Promontory is called Hermium which from the bosome of Carthage does stretch very far into the Sicilian sea. That coast was first found out by the Roman ships, then after a little stay while the whole fleet came up together, the Consuls having passed by the coast of Africa, they arrived at the Citie Clupea. Here the souldiers are exposed to hazard, and when the ships were put into harbor, there was a Trench drawn round for the more security. The Citie because it refused to surrender, was besieged, and presently through the timorousness of the Citizens it being either yielded or deserted (for 'tis reported either way) it was reduced to the obedience of the Romans.

But the Carthaginians though they did endure things truly harsh, and very strange, yet they rejoiced at their weal, that they fared somewhat better then they expected: for when they heard what issue the Sea-fight had, they were sore afraid, least presently the conquering forces would have been drawn even against Carthage it self. Therefore re-assuming some courage after their former fright, they were fully bent to make what strength they could to defend their City and the Suburbs thereof. Mean while the Consuls having sent messengers to Rome which would acquaint the Senators what exploits had been achieved already, and should beseech their advice touching new attempts, they make Clupea a Garrison, that they might make use of that seat of war. And having set a guard to defend the City and field adjoining, they march into a great way forward with all their other forces, they utterly waste a very fruitful Country, which from the dayes of Agathocles had not seen the sword of an enemy; they destroy many goodly Villages, they force away whole droves of cattel, moreover they lead away by force above twenty thousand men, no man daring to gainsay; they also take many Towns by storm or by surrender, wherein they apprehend several Revolters, and set free many Roman Captives, that were taken in the late wars, amongst whom I believe even Cn. Cornelius to have been, that was chosen Consul again after two years were expired. While things are thus acted, they that were sent to Rome by the Consuls, return with Orders from the Senate. One of them was commanded to quarter in Africa, with such considerable forces as they held needful to be kept there. The other was requited to bring back the rest of the fleet, and the residue of the army to Rome. So Winter now drawing near, M. Regulus continued there with almost fifteen thousand foot, five hundred horsemen, and with forty ships, which remained of the Fleet being richly laden with Captives, and other booty L. Manlius having safely passed by the Coasts of Sicily, he carried back to Rome. I find he led along with him to Rome twenty seven thousand Captives, and the Navall Triumph over the Carthaginians was ordain'd for him. Afterwards Ser. Fulvius, M. F. M. N. Patinus the more noble, and M. Aemilius, M. F. L. N. Pat. were made Consuls.

The Government of Sicily and the Command of the Fleet are committed to the charge of those two: They were not minded to call back Regulus from amidst his Victories, while he went on prosperously in Africa; and he was ordered by the Proconsul to manage the War there. That decree of the Senate no one did worse resent, than he himself, for whose honour it was made. Therefore in his Letters to the Senate he made that his grievance, and set it as the main ground of his suit, that another might succeed him in his Office, upon the death of his Bailiff (he undertook to manure a piece of ground of seven Acres, which his Master had in Papinia) having gained an opportunity, he thence delivered up his Commission, and left his charge; wherefore he must needs depart, least in his absence, when his ground lay untill'd, his wife and children should want bread. And the Senate did ordain, that M. Regulus his ground should be dress'd at the Publick charge, that what damage he had sustain'd should be made good, and fair provision should be made for his wife and children. Such good orders were then us'd!

But when I read of or relate these things and the like, I cannot chafe but recollect with my self, which is the more lasting recompence for virtue, a reward by Coin, or by commendation, by pounds, or by praise. M. Regulus his renowne does endure many ages after his death; the wealth of others hath perishing with their Masters, and oftentimes before them: In the mean season the Carthaginians having chosen two Generalls at home, Adrubal, Hanno's sonne, and Hasdr, they sent also for Hamilcar their third Commander in chief to come out of Sicily. Who with five thousand Foot, and five hundred Horse came in all haste from Heraclea to Carthage. These having call'd a Councell do decree, that the Army should not be kept within Walls, as the manner heretofore had been, neither should the Roman souldiers be permitted to do what they list'd without any punishment. So when they were encouraged to wage War, the Army was drawn out.

In the mean time M. Regulus did march to all places near adjoining, through which the River Bagrada does slide, subduing all before him, not far from which the Romans that held certain Castles, were smitten with a sudden perillence, and lost many, and were fore amazed. A water-Serpent of huge bigness did fall upon the souldiers, and they being much affrighted and resisting all in vain, the Serpent did swallow down many of them with his wide yawning jaws, others he bru'd to pieces with his furious windings, and with the strokes of his tail, some again he poyson'd to death with the blasting of his pestiferous breath, and he made so much ado for M. Regulus, that with all his forces he must fight with the Serpent for the possession of the River, which when it was done with the loss of many souldiers, and the Dragon could neither be overcome, nor wounded, he with his extream hard crueltie easily repelling, what ever darts they did throw at him, they must make use of Engines, and without great Guns and Mortar-pieces, like a well fenced Tower, the Enemy is not to be overthrow'n: After several hurlings that were made in vain, a great stone being cast, did break his back-bone all to shivers, and did dissolve the vigorous violence of the formidable Monster. And the buffiness was effected with so much difficulty, and with so great terror to Horse and Foot, that the souldiers did averre they had rather oppose Carthage it selfe, than such another Monster. And the Camp could stay there no longer, but must thin the infected waters, and all the Country round about, which was blasted with the contagious stink of his lying there. This was some shame to the pride of men, which are wont to think very fondly, that they can Conquer all things. Truly when M. Regulus was Generall, that had been Conquerour by Sea and Land, one single Serpent when he was alive, did hold the whole Roman Army in plet, and being killed, he made the Army draw off. And therefore the Proconsul did hold it no immodesty to send the spoils even of this very Enemy to Rome, and to acknowledge with a publick Monument the greatness of his own fear, and his rejoicing at the victory.

For he took order the skin of the beast should be taken off and carried to Rome, which is reported to have been an hundred and twenty foot long, and being hang'd up in a certain Temple to have lasted even till the Wars at Numantia. When the Camp was remov'd from Bagrada, the Consul commanded the Army towards the City Adis, all Towns and Castles being won and demolish'd that lay in their road.

But to Adis, which was hard to take, there was a certain way of laying siege by the help of warlike engines. To the crossing of which, when the Carthaginian Captains did speedily make haste they laye down on a certain hill, but full of wood and full of other impediments that was very near the Roman Camp. M. Regulus having well considered the nature of the place, and what manner of enemies he had to deal with, when he saw their foot were not comparable to his, but that they put much confidence in their Elephants and horsemen, but such forces being very formidable in open fields by the inequality of the places would not be come at, and would be made very useless; he wisely taking some advantage by the folly of his enemies, before they could perceive and correct their error, determines to fall upon them in their own Tents. Wherefore fore encouraging his souldiers, and diligently observing what reason did suggest, he goes out of his Camp before the dawning of the day, and does cause his army to advance towards the hill directly opposite, where the Carthaginians had pitch'd their Tents. First of all, the audacious confidence of the Romans did even amaze the Carthaginians, which being far less in number did set upon such a vast army even in their own trenches, from a low place, and of great disadvantage. Then they were in the greater confusion even in this respect, because the horsemen and Elephants, from which they did hope for most assistance, were not only of no advantage, but did extremely hinder and disturb them, and the very time did augment their trembling, that the Romans did set upon them unawares, and most of them, as yet, being fast asleep, therefore many of them are put to the sword even in their beds, the others stragling in their amazed flight, and not knowing where to hide themselves, were taken by parties set on purpose to way-lay them.

Nevertheless the Carthaginians Mercenary souldiers, the Spaniards and the French, being instantly in a good posture, and fighting Courageously on the other side of their bulwark it was doubtful a great while which would get the upper hand. The former hope even now being put to the run, the whole Roman army had been overthrow'n, if the horse from another quarter that were commanded to wheele about had not in the very nick of time charged the enemy on the reare that were pursuing those which fled. Then they also which a little before had deserted their station might now be rallied up and encouraged to fight afresh. So the enemy being set upon on both sides, when he had for a long time with much gallantry made resistance, he was constrained to cry quarter. When the Carthaginians saw what was done, immediately they fling themselves out of their Scences, and fall to running with all the speed they could make, and indeed the Elephants and the horsemen when once they came into plains they could retreat well enough and safely too. The Conquerors having pursued the infantry somewhat far, they turn back at length to throw down their fortifications. In this Battle there were seventeen thousand of the Carthaginians that were slain, five thousand are reported to be taken prisoners, and eighteen Elephants. The success of this battle did purchase the Romans much friendship not only from all the Countries round about, but even from people that were most remote. And in few dayes about fourscore walled towns vowed fidelity to the Romans. Whereas upon the Carthaginians that were greatly straitned before, and which was built twelve miles from Carthage, least it suffer what ever they did there to be kept secret from the enemy, then being a fair prospect both to the very City it selfe, and to the sea hard by.

And the terrible dread of their war with the Romans did not only dance round the Carthaginians, but the Numidians also, out of an old grudge being flirred up by a fresh opportunity, took up arms, and by spoiling and firing the Carthaginian towns, brought more terror and misery upon them, than the Romans did. And the Boores from all parts flying for refuge to the City, did cause not only a huge dread, but also a great dearth, when such a multitude of people did devour a world of provision, and the avarice of the owners did conceal the plenty as yet in store, who gaping greedily for gain by that Common Calamity were full of hope the price of victuals would raise daily according to the decrease of their most necessary food. Whereupon it followed, the Embassy of Marcus Regulus was hearken'd to with greater heed, who aiming at the honor of finishing the war, and fearing lest some one that might succeed him with a new commission from Rome should prevent him, he moves the Carthaginians to Conditions for peace. To that purpose some of the prime Senators are sent unto him; but when they saw strange harsh conditions offer'd, and their business at a stand, they took their leave of M. Regulus, who was verily perswaded he had Victory by the hand. Sicily forsooth, and all Sardinia were commanded to yield, to send freely home what Romans they had taken, to ransom their own men, to bear the whole charge of the war, and to pay besides a pension by the year. They had other impositions, full as burthenome as these. That they should be confederates with the Romans for offence and defence; that they should fly but one great ship; But the Romans they should assist with fifty galleys well appointed as oft as they should be required. The Embassadors being transported with wonder at such Articles, and that Regulus might grant his vanquish'd suppliants more milde conditions, he made this answer, Men must either conquer or crutch to those that subdue them. By the return of which words the Carthaginians were much incensed, though they had often made suite for peace, yet they are fully bent, rather to endure the worst that could happen than to embrace those Conditions, which they held no other than the bondage and servitude of their Citie.

In that state of affairs certain ships which were sent to waite some souldiers into Greece, did return when they had gathered up no small body of Mercenary souldiers; Among these there was one Xanthippus, by race a Lacedaemonian, who did couple the noble exercise of warfare with the discipline of his Country, wherein he had been well trained up from his youth. He sufficiently understanding what feats had been done already, and having insight enough into the other furniture of the Carthaginian forces, of the Elephants and Horsemen, he made bold to speak a proud word openly, that the Carthaginians were not subdued by the Romans, but by themselves, by the weakness of their Commanders, that knew not the duty of their places. In that state of affairs certain ships which were sent to waite some souldiers into Greece, did return when they had gathered up no small body of Mercenary souldiers; Among these there was one Xanthippus, by race a Lacedaemonian, who did couple the noble exercise of warfare with the discipline of his Country, wherein he had been well trained up from his youth. He sufficiently understanding what feats had been done already, and having insight enough into the other furniture of the Carthaginian forces, of the Elephants and Horsemen, he made bold to speak a proud word openly, that the Carthaginians were not subdued by the Romans, but by themselves, by the weakness of their Commanders, that knew not the duty of their places. This humor being soon dispeird, when Xanthippus was call'd before the Magistrates, he does produce such such evident reasons of that his judgement, that scarce ought to be more manifest; he shews them that in all their expeditions, in making their Fort, in joining Battell, it was their manner still to pick out places utterly unfit, if they would listen to his advice, he does assure them not onely of safety, but also of Victory. When severall of the Chief Citizens do approve of his judgement, and the very Commanders also themselves, and with besteming modestly preferring the welfare of their Country before his single opinion, they agree and ordain that the guidance of his Army should be committed to a foreigner; Xanthippus having undertook his charge, dayly drawing his souldiers out of the City, he does accustom the field Forces to observe and change their ranks, and intantly to do what they are commanded; and the confidence of better success does fill the souldiers with admiration of him, the whole City being cherished even in desperation, is raised up to expect joyfull things to come. When the Commanders behold this Universal Cheerfulness, they also taking heart thereby, resolve to give the Enemy another charge, and encouraging their souldiers, as opportunely did require, they march out against the Romans, even with almost twelve thousand Foot, with four hundred horse, and well nigh as many Elephants; that thing alone did perplex the Romans, that they saw the Carthaginians make their incursions through the plain fields, having changed their first design, avoiding all steep and craggy places: But being puffed up with pride through their constant felicity, they let at nought the souldiers that were wont to vanquish, and Graculus their Leader. And Regulus was not corrupted with that flattering poyson of fortune waiting on him. When he well considered that he had routed the Sea Forces of the Carthaginians, and the foot Souldiers too, that he had taken almost two hundred Townes, two hundred thousand men, and that Carthage being fore distressed, might be enforced to surrender, he denied them peace when they sued for it on reasonable termes, and wrote to Rome, that the very Gates of Carthage which he had begun did tremble at him. So also moderation hath often deferred great Spirits in prosperity, then constancy in adversity: But the Carthaginians having pitched their tents in a plain field, M. Regulus whose chief strength was in his infantry and thither he could not be followed but over Mountainous and steep difficult places, thinking it all one to his Valour where he fought, he was not afraid to trust himself in the Camp, even to the greater vanishing of his confidence, passing over the river that was in the midst, and distant from the Enemy even two hundred thousand paces. Xanthippus perceiving the indifference of the Roman Leader, did avouch this would be the very time, wherein he would performe what he had promised the Carthaginians, for he had got the Romans even tired with long Marching, where his heart could wish them; he nothing doubted the Victory would be certainly his own; the time also did seem most commodious for the fight, because the day now drawing towards the evening, the Africans knowing well all places thereabout, if they should be overcome, they might make their escape the better in the night, or if they should conquer, the night would not hinder the pursuit of the Victory. Therefore the Carthaginians consulting what was to be done, Xanthippus calling for the help of Gods and Men, that they might not lose such a singular opportunity, he did earnestly persuade his men to undertake the Battell, so much the easier, because the souldiers themselves crying out to Xanthippus, they did of their own accord with unfeigned cheerfulness desire to encounter with the Enemy, therefore the charge of the main affair is granted to the Spartan, he draws out the Army, and does exercise them after this manner. A four square body of 8000 Carthaginians, which were the prime Chosen men of all their foot, was set for a reserve; before this body, a convenient space being left between, the Elephants are set in order, being drawn up as broad as that square body, on either Wing the Horse are placed, behind them on the Right Wing, stands the main body of hired souldiers. The Army being led in such array, he commanded the skirmishers, that having thrown their darts, they should stand in open order for the advantage of their own side, and when their main body should joyn with the Enemy, they should violently break out again from the Wings, and should on a sudden furiously flanke the Romans, when they were charging the opposite reserve. On the contrary part Regulus having well drawn up his Army, when he saw the Elephants in the Front of the Carthaginians, he soon takes advice, he brings his souldiers lightly armed to the Van, he sets the well Compact foot Companies in the Reserve, the Horse are drawn up in the Wings, the Army is firme in respect of depth, but much narrower then before; so that the chief danger being feared from the Enemies Elephants and Horsemen, they did indeed take a right course against the Elephants, but being in an open and Champain Country, there was room sufficient for the Horse to surround, the whole Army being so close compacted. The Fight was began by the Elephants, which Xanthippus commanded to be led against the opposite Regiments, and the Romans making a great shout, set forward to meet them. The Horse were likewise engaged in both Wings; but there the Romans being much inferior in Number, and not able to resist the Enemies charge, fled away. But the Foot which were of the Left Wing, (whether it were to avoid the Elephants, or that thereby they thought the more easily to obtain the Victory) charged the Mercenaries, and putting them to flight, purified them to their very Camp. The rest of the foot had an harder task against the Elephants, by whose vast bodies their ranks were disordered, themselves trodden under foot, and whole Companies like a falling house, struck down to the ground, yet the very thickness of the Battell hindered them from breaking through; till at last they were distressed on all parts, for the Flanks and Rear were galled by the Horse, the foremost who made a shift to break through the Elephants, were slain by the Enemy

Enemy standing yet Entire, and the light armed men flying in upon them. There was no less execution done in the Flight, the Elephants and Numidian Horse pursuing them in an open plain place. Regulus with almost five hundred souldiers was taken alive by the Enemy; of the whole Army there escaped but about two thousand (who had charged and put to flight the Mercenaries) who beyond all Hope, by their halt, got safe into Clupes; of the Romans and their Associates were slain about thirty thousand. Of the Carthaginians there were not many wanting beside eight hundred of the Mercenaries, who had fought against the Left Wing of the Enemy. When the Army returned to Carthage after so great a Victory, carrying the Roman General Prisoner, a multitude of Citizens came out to meet them, others standing in the streets, or in their houses, beheld the spectacle with wonderfull Pleasure, which they durst lately scarce hope for; their minds being not capable to believe so great an Happiness attending them: For being of late so near despair, giving not onely their Country, but very City for lost, they durst scarce believe to great a Change, though they saw it with their eyes. But they took most special notice of the Generals, every ones eye and thought being settled on them, looking sometimes on Xanthippus, sometimes on Regulus, Extolling the greatness of their own Commander, by the Elimination they had of the other. He must of necessity be a gallant Man who hath overcome so great a General, so fortunate a Warrior, a proud Conquerour, an implacable Enemy, the Terror and Plague of Carthage, now of a sudden bereaved of a numerous Army, having lost his ancient Fame and Liberty together. Their Admiration was increased by the habit and Garbe of the Man, who under a small body, and none of the best looks, carried a large and a virtuous mind. For this Exploit Xanthippus had much glory, and withall as much envy, to avoid which he used as much art in finishing the Warre, for whereas he might justly expect an everlasting reward of his good service at Carthage, yet he resolved to leave those doubtful hopes and fall of Treachery, and return home, before other mens affections, or his own fortune were altered. For this is for the most part the disposition of men, that openly they profess the love of their Country, but really study their own private good; as long as their City being in safety, they can obtain and quietly enjoy Honour and Riches, they pretend mighty love to their Country: But where there is danger left they should bestow the same benefits on others for their egregious merits, they had rather want a man who doeth good to the Common-wealth, than have him in the least way hinder their private commodity: As long as they think themselves able to equal others, their envy is hidden and more remis, but when they see themselves farre exceeded, and that Honour duly given to others which they desired for themselves, then what they were not able by virtue to obtain, they seek it by Calumnies and Criminations. So that the best men have ordinarily most Enemies and are most subject to Treachery; But a Native of the Country hath some remedy against this Evil in his Friends and kindred: A stranger being void of all help and assistance increaseth the Malice of degenerate mindes by his being easy to be hurt, in that he is more exposed to Treasons, and may without any great labour or danger be offended, affronted and undone. That Xanthippus apprehended and considered these things, the sequel doth evidently demonstrate, 'Tis reported he was drowned by some sent after him from the Carthaginians, who after so great a benefit received, hated the Author of it, who being once dead, they thought it would quickly be forgot that their Country was preserved by a Foreigner.

Others deny Xanthippus thus to have perished, yet confess the Treachery of the Carthaginians, who at his Departure allotted him an old ship, full of Leakes, fairly pitched over as if it had been found, but that he discovering the Cheat, went aboard on another ship and escaped the danger. About the same time they committed another fact of no less Treachery, but much danger. About the time that they perished thereby. The Mercenaries in somewhat a more cruel, by reason of the number that perished together. The Mercenaries were put into tumultuous manner claiming a Reward of their pains taken, and happy Valour, were put into some other place they should have their Desire: But the Captains of the ships who had such private Order, landed them and left them in a Barren Land, where being destitute of all help from man, without food, without ships, having famine on one side, and the Sea on the other, they pined away and perished; a fowl and horrid kind of Death. Others referre this Fact to former times, when there was warre between the Syracusans and Carthaginians, and that the Island was thereupon called Offshore, or the Bonie Land, it lieth in the main Sea beyond Lipara Westward. And if thus they served their do nothing disagree with the Carthaginians usual Cruelty. And if thus they served their Friends and Associates, it is no wonder, they were more then ordinarily severe against their Enemies. Other Prisoners indeed were somewhat well used, for they likewise had many Cives. But against M. Regulus Captives at Rome, for whom they intended to make an Exchange. But against him all manner of they could neither cover nor moderate their Anger, but vexed and afflicted him all manner of ways; they allowed him food which was neither pleasant to the Palate, nor strengthening to the body, but which with much ado was a slight nourishment served to produce his Miserable life. But more grievous were the Contumelies and Reproaches daily heaped upon him, amongst the rest, they would frequently on a sudden introduce an Elephant, to fright him with the noise and ugly shape of it, not suffering him to rest neither in Mind or body, and being thus miserably handled, and brought low, they cast him into the common Gaole.

When these things were heard at Rome, the City was filled not only with great grief but with fear also; for they mistrusted least the Carthaginians, provoked with the sense of their own calamities, and encouraged by this victory, should recompense them in the like kind, and dare to come even to the walls of Rome to inflict on them the same mischiefs themselves had suffered. The Senate therefore commanded the Consuls, To strengthen Italy as diligently as might be with sufficient Garrisons, themselves with a vast Navy to sail into Sicily, and thence if they thought fit into Africa, to divert the Carthaginians from any expedition into Italy. But the Carthaginians in the first place made it their care to reduce those Cities which the Romans had possessed, to punish those Africans who had revolted from them, and by strength of arms to vanquish those who persisted in rebellion. Clepea was indeed by the Romans stoutly defended, but in Numidia, and over the other Africans (though their war was great) their victory was easy.

In the mean time, understanding that a great Fleet was preparing in Italy, they left the siege of Orica which they had commenced, trimmed up the old ships, built new ones, and audaciously endeavour'd to prevent the Romans from landing on the shore. The Consuls used such incredible diligence, that by the beginning of Summer they had three hundred and fifty ships ready fitted and laden, with which sailing to Sicily, when they found all things safe there, and no danger, but that they were full of expectations and fears, they left Garrisons where most need was, and with the rest of their army landed towards Africa. But being by a tempest forced upon Calura (an Island between Africa and Sicily, near the Promontory of Lilybæum) they waited the grounds there, took a City of the same name, and plac'd a Garrison in it. Then they set forward to the Promontory of Hermæum, which being in the mid-way between Carthage and Clepea, shutteth in one side of the Carthaginian Gulf. At this place the Carthaginian Navy met them, and a very sharp fight was enter'd on both sides, when help came to the Romans from Clepea, which totally inclin'd the victory, being before doubtful. An hundred and four of the Carthaginian ships were sunk, thirty taken, and fifteen thousand soldiers lost; on the Roman side eleven hundred men were lost, and nine ships. The fleet then sail'd to Orica, where they landed their men, and pitched their Camp near the City. The Carthaginians likewise brought their forces thither under the conduct of Hanno, where in a land fight they were overcome with the loss of above nine thousand men. There were some Noble men taken prisoners, whom the Consuls reserved whereby to redeem M. Regulus and others who were in the like condition. They then consulted on present affairs, and conceived great hopes they might keep Africa in possession: Nevertheless the country round about being plunder'd and spoiled, they, fearing a famine, thought fit to return into Sicily, together with those Romans who had defended Clepea. They carried away very vast and rich spoils, which had been laid up in Clepea in the time of Regulus's prosperity, and much increased by late victories. They had a safe Voyage into Sicily, and sufficiently fortunate had been the Consuls if they would have set a bounds to their happiness. But because in their return to Italy they thought by the by to take some Port towns of Sicily, not regarding the ship-masters counsel (who advised them, Not to sail in such dangerous and rough seas against the coast of Africa, nor Orica and the Dry Star were rising) they suffered such shipwreck by tempest as hath hardly been heard of, of three hundred and four ships, scarce four score, having cast out all their lading, were saved; much about the same number of horse-boats and other sorts of vessels were lost, inasmuch as the whole shore even from the coast of Canaria (where the storm began) to Pachynus, was filled with the Corps of dead men, and bodies, and pieces of broken ships. In this their hard distress the humanity of King Hiero was no small comfort to them, who bountifully entertain'd them, furnishing them with cloaths and victuals, and tackling for their ships, and conducted them safe to Messana. But the Carthaginians made no delay to take advantage of this their misfortune, they presently regained the Island and City of Calura; and forthwith crossing over into Sicily besieged Agrygentum under the command of Carthago, and no relief coming, they took it and demolished it: A great multitude of persons were here slain and taken prisoners, the others, who escap'd through the midlands into the territories of Syracuse, plac'd themselves in a Village near the Temple of Jupiter Olympus. Neither were they out of hopes of recovering the whole Island, but that the Romans ally'd as confirm'd and strengthen'd themselves against present fears, hearing what diligence was used in preparing a new Navy; for the Consuls were to intent upon the work, that with wonderful speed, in the space of three months, an hundred and twenty ships were built. With these Cn. Cornelius L. F. Cn. Scipio Africanus, and A. Atilius A. F. Cn. Calpurnius being Consuls again, having made a new levy of Rout soldiers, were commended with the first opportunity to set to sea. This Cn. Cornelius was a great example of the Inconstancy of Fortune, and of Patience in Adversity; for having seven years ago, when he was Consul, been circumvented by the craft of the Carthaginians, and suffer'd captivity, imprisonment and chains, and whatsoever misery is incident to mankind, he now resum'd not only the other Ornaments of his degree, but likewise the Consular Dignity with so much the more joy, by how much the sadder misfortune he had been before bereav'd of them.

The Consuls having arriv'd at Messana, and joyn'd to themselves what ships they found there, being chiefly the Relicks of the last shipwreck, sail'd with two hundred and fifty ships to

to the mouth of the River Himera, and took by treachery the Town of Cephaladium, some eighteen miles distant upon the same shore: From Lepanum (for thither they had steer'd their course) they departed without effecting their purpose, being not able to take it on the sudden, and Carthago having sent thither supplies in case of a siege. Being not thereby discourag'd from farther attempts, they happily accomplished another design of greater moment. They directed their course to Panormus, the principal City of the Carthaginian jurisdiction, and possessing the Haven, sat down under the very Walls, and the Panormitans refusing to yield, they encompass'd the City with a Ditch and Bulwark. The nature of the ground favour'd their intencments, yielding plenty of materials and wood for their works, which being finish'd, they began the assault, and battered down with their Engines a Tower by the sea side, and the soldiers entering by the breach, with great slaughter of the enemy, took the outward City, which was call'd New Panormus; the old City did not long hold out, for a great number flying thence out of the new City, bringing along with them more terror than provisions, they were dejected with consideration of their present danger, and fearing sudden scarcity, sent messengers to the Consuls with proposals to yield up all but their bodies; the Consuls knowing the wants of the beleag'd, accepted not the conditions unless they would redeem themselves at a certain price. Every head was valued at two Mine, fourteen thousand persons were ransom'd, the rest, being thirteen thousand were sold together with the plunder. This Victory was very glorious, of great and sudden concernment, for hereupon many Towns on that coast, some also far distant, call'd out the Carthaginian Garrisons and submitted themselves to the Romans. The Jetines began, and their example was followed by the Soluntines, Petrinæ, Tyndartians and others. Affairs being thus transacted, and a Garrison left at Panormus, the Consul return'd to Messana and so to Rome. The Carthaginians lying in wait for them at their return, surpris'd some ships of Burthen with many in them.

At Rome there was two Naval Triumphs made immediately one after another, by the former year Consuls (whose command was prorogued) over the Coſſutians and Carthaginians; Serv. Fulvius triumphed the thirteenth of the Calends of February, and M. Atilius the day after. The five hundred year after the foundation of the City a fruitless expedition was made into Africa. Cn. Servilius Cn. F. Cn. Capio, and Cn. Sempronius Ti. F. Ti. N. Bleſus 500 being Consuls, cross'd over into Sicily, where having in vain attempt'd Lilybæum, they directed their course to Africa with two hundred and three score ships; and sailing along the coast and sometimes landing, they took many Towns and got great plunder. They effected nothing of greater moment, being hindred of entering into the most convenient Towns by the Carthaginians who every where met them with very good courage, having recovered whatsoever M. Regulus had possess'd, and punish'd the revoltors. For Hamilcar, having ranged through Numidia and Mauritania, had reduced and quitted all that tract, imposing a fine of a thousand Talents of silver, and twenty thousand Oxen, and punishing the prime men who were thought to favour the Romans, three thousand whereof were crucifix'd. But the enemies encounter was not so formidable to the Romans as their own ignorance in the places, and their dangers in the sea; for failing to Meninx, an Island of the Lophagi, near unto the lesser Syrtis, they struck upon shallow places, the Tide going out, and were detain'd till the ships being emptied of their burthens, were by the Tide coming in again relieved from extreme danger. Having therefore escap'd to great a distresse, and fearing those dangerous places, without delay they sail'd away as if they fled, not that no less a calamity attend'd them then what they had avoid'd. To Panormus indeed they return'd very safe, but in their Voyage to Italy, as they sail'd about the Promontory of Pulcinurus, which reacheth out into the sea from the Lucanian Mountains, a terrible storm arising sunk above three score great ships, together with many horse-boats and vessels of Burthen. The City being exceedingly griev'd at the loss, as if the very winds and water deny'd the Romans the Sovereignty of the sea, the Senate decreed that their Navy should consist but of three score ships, for the guard of Italy and transportation of provisions to their Army in Sicily. Nevertheless this misfortune hindred not one of the Consuls C. Sempronius from his Triumph over the Carthaginians on the Calends of April, ten days after C. Cornelius Proconsul had made the like Triumph. There were Censors that year created at Rome, but L. Posthumius L. F. L. N. Argilus (who was likewise then Pretor) dying in his Office, the other Censor D. Junius D. F. D. N. Pera did also lay down his Office.

The next Summer C. Aurelius L. F. Cn. Cotta, and P. Servilius C. F. Cn. N. Geminus being Consuls, cross'd over into Sicily, and amongst other Towns took Himera (upon the River Himera) but void of Inhabitants, whom in the night time the Carthaginians had carry'd away. Yet it was a great advantage to have the possession of so considerable a place, and hereby the Romans wip'd away that disgrace they had heretofore receiv'd at this City, for they had failed of their expectation of taking this City (named likewise Therma) by the covetousness of their soldiers. [For a certain Captive within the City, to whom was committed the custody of one of the Gates, that he might thereby recover his liberty, did upon an appointed night give admittance to the Roman Soldiers, who were sent to take possession of the City. When the chief of them were enter'd, they desiring to ingross the richest spoils unto themselves, gave the order, To have the Gates shut again and no more men to be let in. Whereupon the Thermitas receiving an Alarme took arms, and the Romans by reason of their small number not able to resist

refist, and having no relief from their Friends, whom they had shut out, were rewarded according to their Folly, being very man of them slain.] Himera being thus reduced into the Roman Power, C. Aurelius the Consul thinketh of besieging Lipara, which had been so often vainly attempted, And in order thereunto gathereth together the choicest souldiers they had in all Sicily, and borrowing ships of Hieraportus transporteth them into the Liparaean Island. From whence having occasion to return to Messana, to consult the Entrails of Sacrifices, he deputed his Lieutenant in the siege his Kinsman P. Aurelius Pseudula (some say Q. Cassius a Colonel) with order, diligently to defend the Works, but otherwise not to fight at all: But he, not observing the Consuls advice, and thinking it would much redound to his Credit, to take Lipara in his absence, made an Assault upon the City, and that to his Cost; for, not being able to Master it, he lost many men, and by a fallly out of the Town had one of his Forts set on fire, having also much ado to defend his Camp. But upon the return of Aurelius, Fortune wheeling about, there was a very great slaughter made at the taking of the City, after which he proceeded to the punishment of the Colonel, whom he commanded to be beaten with stripes, and take pay among the common souldiers; a very remarkable severity, whereof he made some other proofes in the time of his Consulship. When Lipara was taken, an Immunity was granted to the Posterity of Timasibius (once Governour of these places) that they should for ever be free from all Taxes and Tribute; wherein the Romans manifested the constancy of their Thankfulness, not to be outworn by time; because when the Pirates of Lipara had taken a Golden Cup, which they had sent to Apollis of Delphos, Timasibius called both it, and the Embassadors who conveyed it, to be safely conducted into Greece, and the Men back again to Rome.

The Romans afterward besieging Ereba a very strong Castle, with forty thousand foot, and a thousand Horse, were neither able to take it, neither durst they fight with the Carthaginians: For since the misfortune of M. Regulus, the Romans stood so much in fear of the Elephants that they always avoided Battell. Oftentimes within the Territories of Lilybaeum, and often in the Selinuntian fields, they have stood in Battell-array about halfe a mile from the Enemy, yet durst neither venture according to their wonted Courage, to begin the Charge, or defend into plain and open ground, but still kept themselves in craggy and difficult places. The Carthaginians hereupon erecting their Spirits, (seeing they now had Confidence in their land Army, and knew the Romans had had greater losses by tempests at Sea, then themselves by unluckie fights, especially having intelligence of the Senates Resolution to set out no more Navies) conceived hopes of recovering Sicily, if they did but send good store of land and sea-forces thither. But their main impediment was want of Money, the late continuall Warres having exhausted their Old store, and consumed their new raised Taxes. They sent therefore Embassadors to Ptolemy King of Egypt, to borrow two thousand Talents of Money. The King being loath to offend either them, or the Romans (being both in League with him) offered himself as a Mediator of Peace between them: But notwithstanding all opportunities he denied the Carthaginians Request, saying, He would willingly help a Friend against an Enemy, but thought it not fit to assist one Friend against another. About the same time at Rome Tib. Coruncanius was the first of the Plebeians who was created Chief Priest. The same year also Censors were created, because the Duties of that Office could not last year be performed, one of the Censors dying, and the other laying down his Commission, M. Valerius M.F. M.N. Maximus Messalla, and P. Sempronius P.F. P.N. Sulpus made the seven and thirtieth Lustration. Two hundred ninety-seven thousand, seven hundred ninety seven Citizens were rated. This was a sad and severe Censurship, for in taking a view of the Senate, Thirteen were degraded, four hundred young Knights had their horses taken away, and made common stipendiarie souldiers. This came to pass by the Complaint of C. Aurelius the Consul, who informed the Censors, That in Sicily, when need required, being commanded to their Duty, they had refused to obey. The Consul, not content with this Revenge for their contempt of Discipline, prevailed likewise with the Senate to keep back their Pay. And truly as times then went, the consideration of his severity and strictness of Discipline, as well as his exploits performed, was occasion of his Triumph made over the Carthaginians and Sicilians upon the Ides of April. The next year was fuller of Threats, then action: For great preparations being made on both sides, and each standing in some fear of the other, the whole summer passed away without any considerable thing done. L. Caecilius L.F. C.N. Metellus, and C. Furius C.F. C.N. Pacilius, being Consuls, transporting their Legions over into Sicily, neither themselves much provoked the Enemy, or were provoked by them, though Ardubal a new Carthaginian General was lately come thither with two hundred ships, an hundred and forty Elephants, and twenty thousand Horse and Foot. This business caused the Senate to enter into Consultation of preparing another Navy; for the Publick Treasures began to be exhausted by protracting the Warre, and since the Misfortune of M. Regulus, the Legions degenerated from their wonted Valour, and though all things should succeed prosperously at Land, yet 'twas manifest, the Carthaginians could not be kept off Sicily, so long as they had the sovereignty of the Seas. Refusing therefore their former resolutions, they began to put confidence again in their ships, and with all care to trimme the old, and build new ones. In the mean time L. Metellus being left at Panormus, C. Furius returned to Rome, to the chusing of the new Consul, who were C. Atilius M.F. M.N. Regulus, and and L. Manlius A.F. P.N. Vulso, to these was committed the charge of preparing the Navy 503 and men for the ships; L. Metellus was continued in his Command, with Commission to manage 504 the War in Sicily as Proconsul.

Ardubal understanding that one of the Romans Generals was absent with half their forces, and computing with himself, that though the Armies had long stood in Battell-array one against the other, the Romans had out of fear declined fight, being now no longer able to bear the complaints of his own souldiers who accused him of cowardize, he drew all his forces out of Lilybaeum, and after a long and difficult march through the Selinuntian Territories, he invaded those of Panormus and there pitched his Camp. It fortuned, that the Proconsul, with the remainder of the Roman strength was then at Panormus to guard their Associates, now harvest grew on, in reaping and carrying in their grain. He, having intelligence that some of the enemies spies lay secretly at Panormus, commanded every man in the City to meet together in an Assembly, then giving order they should examine one another, and question those who were least known, What they were, or what business they had at Panormus, found out the spies and seized on them. By them he understood the enemies designs, and observing there was more rashness then good counsel in their expedition, pretended great fear, and kept himself within the walls of the City, that he might increase their foolish confidence. Whereupon Ardubal growing bolder, advanced his forces, spoiling and burning all the corn in the fields, and marching up even to the walls of the City. The Proconsul regarded neither the loss sustained nor the disgrace thence redounding, foreseeing that if he did a little longer forbear, the Carthaginians would sufficiently satisfy him for both with good life. Above all, he thought good to expect till they crossed the River Orethrus, which runneth on the South side of the Town, and then he had contrived a sure and sudden Victory. To effect this, as all other things were ordered to figure his fear, so he placed but few souldiers upon the walls, desiring that the enemy should not understand either the courage or number of his men. This counsel succeeded according to his expectation, both the enemy by his confidence and fortune by a sudden chance furthering the design: For Ardubal Forded the River with his Foot, Horse and Elephants, and planted his Camp close under the walls of the City, with so much contempt of the enemies Cowardize, that he pitched his Tents without any works of defence about them, thinking there was no need of ditch or bulwark.

Thither the Suters and Merchants bringing great plenty of Corne and Wine, the Mercenaries drank stoutly, and elevating their voices according to their several dialects, in much noise and confusion gave good notice of their present temper, that they were not very sober. Then did the Proconsul think the fittest time to send those his men who were ready armed to provoke the enemy to fight, and it succeeded so happily, that still sending out by degrees fresh supplies, Ardubal's whole Army at length came out of the Camp. L. Caecilius the Proconsul placeth part of the light armed men before the Trench, giving order, If the Elephants approached to sling their darts at them, and if they found themselves sore pressed to retire into the Trench, and thence come out again to a fresh charge. The mean Artificers and common rout he commanded to carry darts and weapons, and sling them over the wall that the light armed men should not want plenty of them. Himself with his companies completely armed, stood in Rank and File within the gate over against the enemies right Wing. They who were already engaged sometimes being overpowered in number retreated in good order, sometimes being assisted by supplies from the Town did maintain the fight. When the Rectors of the Elephants desiring in emulation to seem Authors of the Victory as well as Ardubal, and advancing with their beasts, beat back those who opposed them, and rashly pressing upon them (as they retired toward the City) came up even to the Trench. But then a shower of Arrows flying from the walls, and fresh light armed men assaulting them with Spears and Darts, the Elephants being wounded began to rage, and balking themselves which way sooner armed and pained them, turned upon their own men, trampled under foot, routed and disorder'd whole companies of armed men.

Whereupon the Proconsul crying, This is the time of the long look for Victory, issued out, and being fresh and in good rank had an easie victory over the confused multitude of the enemy; there was a great slaughter made both in the field and in the pursuit, their calamity being increased by a sudden chance which one would have thought of advantage to them: For about the same time the Carthaginian Navy appearing at shore, the whole multitude trembling and blind with fear, promiscuously ran thither as to the only refuge, in which hardly burly mauls were trodden under feet by the Elephants; many venturing to swim, and many too hastily scaling the ships and tumbling down perished in the sea. Neither before this time nor after it, amongst all their prosperous exploits, had the Romans any Victory more glorious; whereby the Romans resumed their former confidence and courage, and the enemy was so disheartened with fear, that they cast off not only all hopes but all thoughts of a land Army so long as that War lasted.

Twenty thousand Carthaginians are said to be slain, six and twenty Elephants were presently taken, and afterward all the rest. For the Proconsul thinking it hard for his ignorant men to catch the beasts being loose and enraged, commanded a Cryer by Proclamation to promise, Liberty and safety to any prisoner by whose means the Elephants should be taken; hereby laying first hold on those who were most gentle and familiar, by their help they easily brought in the rest. L. Metellus sent them all to Rome, having invented a pretty way for their transportation, for his ships not being fit for the purpose, he gathered and bound together many Hog-heads, fastening a Rafter between every two that they should neither dash together nor yet part one from the other, then planking them over, spreading earth and dirt upon them, and erecting walls on each side in the form of Rables, the Elephants otherwise very fearful of sailing by water, entered them and were safely conveyed to Rhegium.

Adruball from this overthrow escaped to Lilybæum, but being condemned at Carthage while he was absent, and afterward upon his return apprehended, he was accordingly executed. The Carthaginians now considering their Armies were routed, their Elephants taken, all Sicily lost except Lilybæum and Drepanum, that the Romans having again set out a Navy, were very potent both at land and sea, began to think of Peace, willing to accept of it on any tolerable conditions. Whereupon they remembered M. Regulus and the conditions he once propounded to them, and persuaded themselves that by his means they might prevail either for peace or at least for what they next desired, an exchange of prisoners; nothing doubting but that for his own sake he would effectually interpose himself in such a business: For what man can be imagined so obstinate as not to free himself from the miseries of a Gaule, and desire to see his dearest relations, and enjoy his Liberty, Country, Dignities and Honours? M. Regulus had a wife and children at Rome, friends and kindred in the Senate and public offices, a Cousin German now Consul, he is both much beloved by the Senate and people of Rome for his former victories, and pined for his afflictions; if therefore he beareth any good will to himself, or findeth any respect from his friends, no man certainly will be more earnest in prosecuting, or is more likely by favour to effect such a design. He accepted the employment, not out of any hope or desire to do himself good, as afterward appeared, but that he might in person the more effectually move the Senate to have a care of the Commonwealth. So being joined with the Carthaginian Embassadors, when he was come to the City, he would not enter the Gates though much entreated by the Romans, alleging, The Customs of his Country to give Audience to the Embassadors of an enemy without the City. The Senate being accordingly assembled, he amongst the Carthaginian Embassadors delivered his Message, That himself also being by the War a servant to the Carthaginians, had command from his Masters to propound chiefly, That the war may be concluded upon what terms should seem fit to both parties, or that at least an exchange of prisoners would be granted. The Embassadors presently withdrawing, he likewise accompanied them; neither, though he was earnestly solicited, would he be present in the Senate at the debate of the business till the Carthaginians assented to it. Then sitting silent till his opinion was required, he thus expressed himself. *Conscript Fathers, I am still a Roman: my Body indeed, as Fortune would have it, is in the power of the enemies, but my Soul, not subject to Fortune, is still the same. Following therefore the reason of my Soul, which is my own, rather than the inclinations of my Body, which is another's, my advice is, You would neither exchange prisoners nor conclude a peace. For to restore the Captives, while the war continueth is disadvantageous: They have no Commanders in hold but my self who am an old man, you have many, and those young, amongst which are some no way to be despised. And to finish the war, unless upon very ample terms, or without a complete universal Victory, as it becometh not your Wisdom, so it is pernicious to the Commonwealth. I know you meet with many difficulties in managing the war, for no great affairs can be transacted without great pains and cost: But if you rightly consider the state of Carthage, you will find all things tending to victory to be much the better on your part. We were indeed once overcome in a great Battle, whether it were my fault or fortunes; but we have so often routed their Armies, that the confidence they had assumed upon my overthrow is now, by the Victory at Panormus, pressed down to the utmost despair. They have lost all Sicily, except one or two Cities, and in the other Lands their condition is naught. You have a Navy which they dare not encounter, so that in that part of the war we are also superiours. And the losses we have sustained by Tempest hath bereaved you of so much strength as it hath taught you Circumpection. The want of money perhaps is equal on both sides; but the Italians are more obedient to you than are the Africans to the Carthaginians, whom as they never truly loved, so have they of late learnt to hate more perfectly. For not being provoked by any such injury they revolted freely to me, but now since their former malice have walked their Grounds, plundered their Cattel, exacted their Monies and slain their Nobles, what do you think they can more desire, than that a new Army would come from hence into Africa? But that your Leavies of men are easy and large, that your Soldiers are valiant, of the same Language, the same Mind, the same Manners, Religion, City and Kindred, I take to be so great an advantage, that if in all things else we were exceeded, this one only thing would be sufficient to balance the war, and make the Victory doubtful on the enemies side, for what help is there in a company of Mercenaries against such a force? and if there were any, the Carthaginians have bereaved themselves of it by their cruelty, and they have made it now as difficult to hire Strangers, as it was before to govern them. Xanthippus to whom Carthage is indebted for its preservation, having been so ingrately and treacherously used, is sufficient warning to others how they lend their assistance to such a people who know not how to recompence the greatest desert but by the greatest injuries. Nay, the very common and meanest*

Bar-

Barbarians, a Brutish and slavish sort of men, will be deterred by Cædides to often exercised upon their Fellowes, who have been sometimes murdered by hangmen, or their fellow Soldiers, sometimes exposed into barren and uninhabited Islands, receiving instead of the pay they have fought for, most inhumane punishments, and horrible deaths. And this Conscript Fathers is my Opinion, that neither Peace is to be made with Carthage, nor yet an exchange of Prisoners granted.

This Council displeased not the Senate, if it could have been executed with the safety of him who gave it; but the more he neglected himself for the Common good, the more they pitied him, and manifestly inclined upon any terms whatsoever to restore so Gallant and Generous a Person to his Country. And voices were given out, that Spring he was now so happily returned from foreign Captivity, he might lawfully return into the City, or be detained there. The High Priest likewise affirmed, that he might stay, without incurring the guilt of Perjury. But he to the Amazement of the Senate it self, with a fierce Spirit, and severe Countenance, proceeded, saying, Why do ye not resolve this doubt? follow my Advice and regard not me. Ye in vain attempt that which will be neither pleasing to your selves, nor profitable to the Country, nor honest in me. For suppose, for a while we would be willing and joyful to see me amongst you, when once the short spurt of this affection is vanished, the Benefits of my Return will make me more odious to you, than my absence made me desirable. For my part I am resolved not to live in that City, where after an African Slavery, I cannot maintain the dignity of an honest Citizen, and if I should desire it, my fidelity would hinder it, the remembrance of my sacred Oath would hinder it, and my Reverence of the Gods, by the Invocation of whom I assured the Carthaginians of my return. And should I forswear my self, I fear that Revenge would be taken not only on me, but on your selves, and the whole Roman People also. The Gods, believe me, are no vain things, and will not without Punishment be affronted by the Perjuries and Contempts of Man. If any one be of opinion that in Religion I may be absolved, that the books of the Augurs mention expiations of such crimes, and that Attorneys might be made by Ceremonies and Sacrifices for Perjury and Treason, I would have him understand the Majesty of the Gods is more severe, then being offended by Perjury, to be appeased by any Inventions of Men, neither is it agreeable to Reason, that a Guilt contracted by the sins of man, should be washed away with the blood of Beasts. As for my self, I am not ignorant that great and exquisite torments are prepared for me at Carthage. But to deceive a trait, I think to be worse then all of them, for this would indeed hurt me, as for the Torments they hurt only something about me. Think not that man miserable who is able to endure misery. Slavery, Reproach, Contempt, Grief, Hunger and Watching, I never yet esteemed evil, but now by a long custom they have left off to be troublesome to me. That they are tolerable, I have learnt by suffering them; and if once they be intended to that degree, as not to be born by Man, Death will quickly free me not only from them, but from all other Calamities. Nothing therefore is to be feared for him who feareth not Death, which is easy at any time to obtain, and cruelly I had inflicted it on my self, but that I thought it the part of a man rather to overcome sorrow then to avoid it. I have spoken these few and confused words, that ye may understand, I am not to be persuaded from my Opinion, and withall that you should not bewail me as an unfortunate and miserable Man: My Resolution is easy and constant: 'Tis my care to return to Carthage, what I shall there suffer I leave to the Gods.

'Tis reported that the more effectually to move them he affirmed, that before he was dismissed from Carthage, they had given him a gentle Poison, which by slow degrees feeding on his vital spirits, should consume him after the exchange was made. Wonderful was the constancy of this Man, who, rather then twere from the Rule of Honesty, did with more earnestness pursue Commodities, Torments and Death, then others avoid them; a true and profitable Lesson to Posterity. That those men only are prepared to endure any Torments, and are constant in their honest resolutions, who have a sense of their own nobility, and think themselves borne not onely for this world. For certainly M. Regulus would not willingly have undergone so great miseries, if he had not thought that after Death there are great Rewards for the Virtuous, and great punishment for evil men. The Senate therefore having made a Decree according to the opinion of M. Regulus, he with a settled countenance followed his Sullen and angry Masters, by whom it appeared that they would cruelly revenge the indignity of their repulse upon his Person, informed as many were moved to detain him against his will. Moreover his Wife *Marcia, and his Children making lamentable complaints, the Consuls said, If he carried they would not deliver him up, neither would they hinder his going. So he refusing to discourse with his Wife, and avoiding the Embraces and kisses of his little Children, was carried back to Carthage, where with cruel torments he was put to death. For cutting off his Eyelids, they kept him awhile in a dark place, then in the heat of the sunshine they suddenly brought him out, and forced him to look up into the sky, at length they put him into a Wooden chest (right over against the Sun) full of nails on the inside, and so narrow that he was forced always to stand upright; if at any time Val Maximus, he learnt on one side to ease his weary body, he was pricked and goared with the nails, and so in torment and continual watching yielded up the Ghost.*

This was the end of M. Atilius Regulus, much more glorious then his Life, though long led with very smallest with too great severity; himself in matters of, the greatest moment miserably failing, even to madness. For he followed the former Consul, coule which he had so sharply condemned in damning up the Haven, and (what argued greater folly) he rashly and inconsiderately assaulting Drepanus lost a very gallant Fleet, no less by his own indiscretion than by the valour of Adherball. He persuaded himself and his soldiers, that the enemy not having intelligence of what supplies were come from Rome, might be unawares surprised at Drepanus; not believing that the Romans had either courage or strength sufficient to provoke them at sea. So that making choice of two hundred and twenty of the best ships with the stoutest Rowers, and most valiant men out of the Legions (for they offered themselves freely as to a flour business and certain prey, Drepanus being not above fifteen miles from Lilybaeum) he privately left sail about the third Watch, and had in the night time a prosperous Voyage, not being seen by the enemy. But at day break the ships being discovered not far from Drepanus, gave an Alarm to Adherball, because such a fight was there unusual, inasmuch as no doubt was made but that it was the enemy who approached; the Carthaginians were forced either presently to encounter and enter fight, or to suffer themselves to be surrounded and besieged by the enemy; this latter they resolved against, because, as it would have involved them in much trouble and danger, so it would have been imputed as a crime upon their miscarriage. Adherball therefore on a sudden called together his Sea-men, and by a Crier summoning the Mercenaries to an Assembly, in a short but very pithy speech admonished them what hopes there were of victory if they would readily and cheerfully take Arms, and what danger of a siege was imminent if they declined battle. When every man with one consent had agreed to follow his counsel, Adherball commending their obedience, forthwith gives order that they should take ship, and observing what course the Admiral steered (wherein himself failed) to follow it. Whereupon he before the rest sailed toward the main fleet, going out of the Haven just under the Rocks hanging over it at the same time when the Roman ships entered on the other side. P. Clodius finding the enemy at the white dismayed, or declining fight, as he had hoped, but stoutly prepared to defend themselves, was much troubled, and retreated back with his ships to encounter the enemy in the open seas. But his were in no good order, but as chanced they had outfailed one another, some were entered the Haven, others were making toward it, and some were just in the mouth of it. Whereupon it came to pass, that while they all endeavour'd to make a sudden return, they dashed one against another, and struck their Oars together, till being got out of the Haven as well as they could, because they wanted time, they ranged themselves in Battel-array just under the shore.

The Consul, who had failed in the Rere before, now changing his Station, came before all and placed himself in the left Wing; but the Carthaginians failing by the enemies left Wing with five Beaked ships, tacked about facing the Romans, and had the open sea on his back, other ships as they came he commanded to place themselves at a convenient distance, and when all were order'd according to his mind he fetch forward against the enemy. And now sign of Battel being given from both the Admirals they fiercely encounter on all sides, at first with equal hopes, but afterward to the Carthaginians better fortune. For though they had the lesser number of ships, to wit, but ninety armed; in other respects they did exceed, for their ships were better and their water-men more skilful; they had likewise made choice of a most convenient place of fight, for as often as they were hard put to it they had free egress into the open sea, where they could easily by their swiftness avoid the enemy, or if he long pursued them, return and encompass him. But the Romans being so near the shore had not the like convenience, they could neither fall into the main nor with safety well retire, but as often as the enemy pressed upon them, they either stuck in the sands or endangered themselves upon the shore. Being therefore unable to break through the enemy by force and charge him in the Rere, by reason of the slowness of their ships and unskilfulness of the Rowers, and being cooped up in a narrow place not able from the Stern to help their fellows who were in danger, they were beaten to the Carthaginians little loss.

To these difficulties was added another cause of despair from their Religion, and they thought themselves worsted by the anger of the gods, because the Consul undertook to fight contrary to the indication of the Birds, adding likewise a fear to his neglect; for because the Chickens did not eat, he commanded them to be sung into the sea, that they might drink though they would not feed. This occurrence made the soldiers more slack and faint-hearted, fighting, as they thought, with the ill will of the gods. But the author of all this calamity, when he saw lost every thing else, he wanted neither wit nor boldness to preserve himself; for when he saw his ships in such numbers sunk and taken, he slipped away between the shore and the enemy with thirty ships which stood next him. And that he might safely arrive to his Army at Lilybaeum, being to sail by some of the Carthaginians Guards, he adorned his ships in token of Victory. The Carthaginians therefore imagining the Consul had been victorious, and that his other ships would suddenly follow, suffered him safely to pass by, being themselves much terrified and dejected. The enemy took all the ships the Consul left behind, even ninety and three, together with the Soldiers and Rowers, except only those who striking upon the shore, cast themselves on land and fled. But in the fight a great number were sunk; for Clodius brought above two hundred from Lilybaeum. This great victory cost the Carthaginians very little, for they lost not a man, much less a ship, and very few are said to be wounded; of the Romans eight thousand men were slain, and twenty thousand taken.

About the same time likewise the Carthaginians took some ships laden with Corn from Pachynus, and carried them to Drepanus, and carrying provisions into Lilybaeum from the Territories of Drepanus, did plentifully relieve the besieged with accommodation of all sorts. Neither here did this year's fortune make a stop, but afflicted the Romans with another great calamity, whereby they lost not only the present possession of the seas, but all hopes of regaining it. For the other Consul L. Junius coming out of Italy with many ships of burthen, laden with Corn for the Army, and fifty beaked ships arrived at Messana, where he met with a great number of other Vessels, from the Army, and other parts of Sicily. Joining himself with these, he made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty long ships, almost eight hundred ships of burthen, and saileth to Syracuse. Being arrived thither, he sendeth the Quintus before with part of the Navy to Lilybaeum; himself remaineth at Syracuse, expecting those others from Messana, who were not able to overtake him, and taking in grain which his Midland friends brought down to the sea side. In the mean time Adherball having sent the Roman ships and Captives to Carthago (Fortune and Glory putting him forward to action) delivered thirty ships more to Carthago, who had brought seventy, with as many ships of Burthen from Africa, and sent him to drive out the Roman ships from the Haven of Lilybaeum, or to fire or sink them. He at break of the day entering the Haven with great Terror, some ships he boarded, and others he fired; in the mean time Himilco Governour of the City, made a sally with the Mercenaries upon those Romans who went to defend the ships, which caused great fear in the Camp. In fine Carthago having destroyed not very many, carried away five, and directed his Course to Horacae. Lying there in wait to obstruct the Romans Voyage to Lilybaeum, he heareth news of a considerable Navy of all kinds of ships sailing by.

He therefore joining other Commanders with himself, made up a Navy of an hundred and twenty good ships, confiding in which strength, and animated by former success, he presently maketh out of the Haven to meet the Enemy. By the shore of Agus the Navys came in sight one of the other, but the Roman Quæstors fearing a disadvantageous encounter, diverted their course to Phintades, a Town in League with the Romans; at Phintades there is no Haven, only the rocks running out into the sea afford a pretty safe riding for ships. Here the Romans landing, prepared themselves for the Enemies coming, having brought English of offence out of the Town, and placed them on the shore for safeguard of the ships. The Carthaginians at first resolved to have besieged the Enemy, thinking that out of fear they would have fled into the Town, and have left their ships for a Prey. But when the Romans stood stoutly to their own defence, and that they found the fight full of danger, likewise not much trusting in a place somewhat inconvenient for the ships they desired; and having taken a few Vessels laden with provision they sailed to the River Halycus, not far distant, there they healed their wounded men, observing the motion of the Enemy. Other Writers following, I believe, Philinus, affirm, that the Romans sustained greater loss; that the Quæstors being daunted at the first sight of the Enemy, in their flight to Phintades left behind their ships of Burthen, and all other Vessels but men of Warre, that in the fight fifty round Vessels, and therefore long ships were sunk, and thirteen Triplis and Quadrifid that then were made unfit for service.

Not long after the Carthaginians still abiding at the River Halycus, L. Junius the Consul, having done his business at Syracuse, sailing toward Lilybaeum, about the Promontory of Pachynus, was discovered by some of Carthago's ships, who thereupon with all speed makes out to meet him (being ignorant of all passages at Phintades) that he might fight him as far from Quæstor's Navy as might be, lest they should come in for his succour. The Consul seeing the Enemy make up toward him, not daring to fight, nor being able to avoid them, drives his ships into a rough and troublesome creek, near Camerina, a greater fear overcoming this lesser, lest his whole Army should fall into the Enemies Power. Carthago not daring to venture into the same place, takes up his station at a certain Promontory, from whence he might equally intend himself against either Navy. A while after, when the Winds blew high, the Carthaginian shipmasters (skilful in such Affairs) foreseeing a tempest, persuaded Carthago to forsake that station, and flee to Pachynus, and so the Carthaginians, but not without great pains, avoided the force of the Tempest. But both the Roman Navys utterly perished upon the Rocks, inasmuch that of the whole shipwrack there remained not a piece of board of any use, excepting only two ships, wherein the Consul with the small remainder of his men arrived at Lilybaeum. All the ships of provision were lost, and above an hundred long ships; but part of the Armie was saved, leaping into the sea and swimming to shore. The Senate, who had lately called home P. Clodius the Consul, for his miscarriage in Sicily, hearing also of Junius his misfortune, gave over all confidence in the seas, resolving nevertheless with all their strength and Council to prosecute the Warre by land. They thought good to continue the siege of Lilybaeum; appointing certain men to take care of conveying necessary accommodations in good season, to the Army there. Though the Carthaginians were Malters at sea, yet they were encouraged, in that at land they were superior, and that almost all Sicily was either under their power, or in League with them: But they were not pleased with their Consuls this year, neither did they think that things would succeed prosperously under the Consuls command, because they had profaned the Rites of Religion; for 'tis said that L. Junius did likewise set aside neglecting the Indication of the Birds. They fled therefore to a new and unusual Refuge, and created a Dictator to go into Sicily, whereas, before this time, never any one being empowered, had led an Army out of Italy. The Insolence of P. Clodius the Consul was then very notable, and almost incredible; For being commanded by the Senate to nominate a Dictator, he named M. Claudius Glycias, who was either his Scribe, or one of his Sergeants; as if he had not sufficiently offended his Countrey, by what losses he had brought upon it, unless he had likewise abused the Majesty of the Empire with such a scoffe. Whereupon the whole Senate being justly incensed against him, he was forced to resign up his Office, and was referred to the censure of the People. What Authors Cicero had read, report he was condemned, but others have observed, that when no Question was to be made but that the People would condemn him, he escaped by a sudden chance, a storm then arising which dispersed the Assembly; And it seeming hereby that the Gods interposed themselves, they thought not fit to ordain any more meeting for the purpose. But Glycias being forced to disclaim his Office, in that the City was affrighted to see a man of mean rank to be in Supreme Dignity, was nevertheless admitted to all spectacles after this time in a Noble Man's Robes. In his room A. Attilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus was nominated Dictator, who made L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus Master of the Horse, he who had Triumphed over the Carthaginians. These two went indeed into Sicily, but performed no very memorable action there.

In the mean time L. Junius, much troubled at his cross fortune, and desirous to wipe away the blot of his shipwracke, by some noble Exploit, watching all opportunities of Action, did at length find a way to take Eryx, by the Treachery of some within it, whom he had corrupted by gifts and promises. Eryx is the highest Hill in Sicily except Mount Etna, situate between Panormus and Drepanum, in that part of the Island which lieth towards Italy, being more craggy toward Drepanum. In the top thereof there is a Plaine whereon standeth the Temple of Venus, therefore called Erycina, the Richest in all Sicily, just under the Top of the Mount, in the midst of the Assent, is a City of the same name, very hard to be approached upon, the way to which with much difficulty is overcome by long and narrow passages from the foot of the Hill; L. Junius therefore well understanding the nature of the place, appointeth a strong guard both upon the Ridge of the Mountain, and likewise in the narrow passages below, being very safe himselfe, and having the advantage with much ease to repulse the Enemy. He also encompassed Erycinallus with a wall, and strengthened it with a Garrison of eight hundred men. But Carthalo landing his men there in the night time, stormed that Castle, and took and killed part of the Garrison soldiers, others escaped to Eryx.

The other passages concerning L. Junius are very doubtfully reported by Historians, some affirm he was taken by Carthalo at Erycinallus; Others, that he killed himselfe fearing to be condemned for the loss of his Navy. There is no less uncertainty whether the Secular sports were celebrated this year, or fourteen years after, when P. Cornelius Lentulus, and C. Licinius Varus were Consuls. I think it more probable, they were celebrated this year, the fear conceived from their late overthrow, and hope of better fortune, inviting them thereunto, if their Religion were diligently performed. This was a very fruitful year, inasmuch as twelve pound of oile was sold for an Assis. In the mean time the Dictatorship being expired, or Attilius having resigned it up, C. Aurelius L. F. C. N. Cotta, and P. Servilius Q. F. C. N. Geminus were chosen Consuls. The Consuls were prettie successful in Sicily, yet obtained no great Victory, nor reaped any great profit for the Common-wealth. They kept in the Carthaginians of Lilybaeum and Drepanum, that they could make no large Excursions, nor so often as they had done, and took their Garrisons which were remote from the sea. Carthalo having made many attempts against them in vain, resolved at length to waste the Italian Coasts, that thereby he might divert the Consuls from Sicily; or if they refused to come back to succour their Country, depopulate their grounds, and take Cities. But fortune did not herein favour his designs. For the Prætor being sent out with the City-forges for defence of the Countrey, compelled him to return to Sicily without effecting his purpose.

Where when the Mercenaries mutinied for want of Pay, he exposed many of them in barren Islands, and sent others to receive their Punishment at Carthage. The rest being incensed hereby, began manifestly to revolt, so that a new warre was feared from them: But Hamilecar who succeeded Carthalo, coming in season, set upon them in the night time, slew some, and drowned others, the remainder submitting themselves, and begging pardon he received into Grace. This is that Hamilecar surnamed Barrac, one of the best Commanders Carthage ever bred, and indeed without compare, but that Hanniball was his son. From this time the Warre began to be more difficult on the Romans side; For having suddenly appealed the Mercenaries, he failed to Italy, and in very great compals spoiled the Lærian and Bruttian Territories.

But the Romans having found the faith of Hiero King of Syracuse very constant toward them, and his merits great, freely remitted unto him that yearly Tribute they had in the former League compounded for, and made a perpetual band of friendship and society with him. In the interim Hamilecar being returned out of Italy landed in the Panormitan Grounds, and pitched his Camp between Panormus and Eryx, in a place by nature very strong, it is called Epirite, an Hill craggy and full of cliffs on all sides, exalting it self from the circumjacent Region to a very very great height; The top of it is not sharp, but continueth a plain of above an hundred furlongs, of a very profitable soil for the feeding of Cattel and bearing of Fruits, being open to the winds from sea, and void of all harmful and venomous creatures. Therein is a certain Hillock which supplieth the place of a Tower, from whence may be viewed all the grounds round about. Near it is a very convenient Haven for those that sail from Drepanum and Lilybaeum to Italy, with store of fresh water. There are three ways of ascending this Mount, two from the Land, one from the Sea, but all very difficult and full of obstructions. Here did Hamilecar plant his Camp with much confidence having no confederate City near him, and being in the midst of his enemies: But trusting in the strength of the place and his own courage and skill in Marshal affairs, he found the Romans worth enough, and very well settled the Carthaginian affairs, which now began to succeed well at home also. For another Carthaginian General, Hanno, who had a great estimation of Hamilecar's Virtue, to obtain honour, and employ the Army without the Commonwealth's cost out of the enemies Country, invaded a port of Lybia about Hæmatampylus, and having obtained the City, sent three thousand Hostages to Carthage; yet they did some play of their prosperity. For L. Caelius L. F. C. N. Metellus being the second time Consul, and Num. Fabius M. F. M. N. Butto being his Colleague, a Navy was built at the charge of private men, which waited the Coast of Africa. For though the Senate had again resolved against sending out of a Navy, yet at the Citizens request they gave leave to have one prepared, upon this condition, That they should safely restore those ships which were built at the publick Charge, reserving the prey to themselves; so that a Fleet was set out very considerable, which brought much terror and damage to the Coasts of Africa and assaulting Kings; Hippo, none of the meanest Cities, they fired the ships of Hippo and many buildings. In their return finding the mouth of the Haven chained up, by art and counsel they devised a way to explicate themselves out of present danger, for sailing with all the force they could, when they came near the Chain, all the men retired to the Stern, and for the Fore-Deck being lightened easily waded over the Chain; then suddenly running to the Fore-Decks and depressing them, the Stern likewise slid over, and they had free liberty of sailing, having delivered themselves from imminent danger.

After this escape, they fought with the Carthaginian Navy, and prevailed against them. The Roman Consuls divided their forces, L. Metellus besieged Lilybaeum, and Num. Fabius, Drepanum. Not far from Drepanum, toward the South, lieth an Island, or rather a Rock, which the Grecians call Pellus, we Columbaria, which the Consul formed in the night time, and flew the Carthaginian Garrison there. Hamilecar, who came to defend Drepanum, made no delay, but at break of day set forth to recover the place again, which the Consul observing, being not able to relieve his own men, with his whole strength assaulted Drepanum, whereby drawing Hamilecar from his design, he kept the land in possession, and afterward made much advantage of it in besieging Drepanum, for he dammed up the sea, and joyed it to the Continent; and because the Walls of the City were weakest on that side, he there began his assaults. But the encounters between Hamilecar, and these, and the Consuls of the following years, Polybius thinks impossible to be described because they were so many, and judgeth it unfit, lest it might give an occasion of the like. For Hamilecar, having his Camp at Epirite for almost three years together, had almost daily encounters with the Romans, especially when their Camp being before Panormus was scarce five furlongs distant from the enemy. For neither did they refrain from skirmishing, having their Armies so near; Neither did they ever come to the trial of a main battel having many hinderances, especially because their forces being equal and their Camps alike strong, they were likewise on each side protected by the vicinity of their Camp, to which the party worsted might quickly retire. Hence it came to pass that as in sight some were always slain, so when the battel declined they had a safe refuge to their Works. But while Drepanum was besieged, the Carthaginians Fleet infested not only the Sicilian but the Italian shores; and Hamilecar plundering as far as he could, wasted the Italian territories even to Cuma. Many of the Romans Citizens being fallen into the Carthaginians power by their incuriosities, and the Sicilian fights, the Roman Commanders agreed with the Carthaginians for an exchange of Prisoners, which party received any overplus back, was to give two pound and an half of silver for an head, and the Carthaginians receiving more then the Romans paid down the money accordingly.

I find two Colonies planted in Italy this year, one at Æstum the other at Alifum. There was likewise a Lustration made at Rome (being the eighth and thirtieth) by A. Attilius A. F. C. N. Calatinus, and A. Manlius T. F. T. N. Atticus being Consors; and there were rated two hundred fifty one thousand, two hundred twenty two, whereas in the former Lustration there were found little less then three hundred thousand; so great a number of Citizens were consumed by War and Shipwracks. Nevertheless the Sicilian army was duly recruited, the supply being by the Consuls M. Otavius C. F. M. N. Crassus (the second time Consul) and M. Fabius C. F. M. N. Licinus. These had a very busy and difficult warfare, but not being able to dispossesse Hamilecar of his strong holds, they performed nothing memorable. Which happened likewise to the succeeding Consuls for the same reason, as likewise because new Generals Zonaras, (being on the sudden every year elected against an old experienced Commander) spent more time in making their preparations, chusing their ground, and insinuating themselves with the soldiery.

narrower bounds. The Romans (as hath been already declared) had planted a Garrison above the City Eryx upon the Top of the Mountaine, another below at the foot of the Hill. The natural strength and situation of the place, with the helpe of these guards, seemed sufficient to secure that City from fear of any surpris. But the boldness and Valour of Hamilear, making any thing possible, which he list to undertake, in a very short time reduced it into his Power. For he in the night time, setting forward with his forces, and without noisefcandling thirty furlongs up the Hill, himself marching in the head of the party, surprised the Romans unawares, and having slain great part of those he found in the Towne, he sent the rest to Drepanum. From this time the face of things was very strange, and the warfare very hard and severe, for Hamilear being now in the midst of two of the Enemies Garrisons, was himself besieged by them below while he besieged those above; both the Romans and the Carthaginians undergoing incredible paynes and danger, did for almost two years next infuene performe the office of most Valiant fouldiers; For the Camps being so neare there passed not a day, nay scarce an hour without alarms and skirmishes, neither party all this while fainting or yielded, neither did Victory or overthrow part them; but still they continued equal and unvanquished, desigining in the mean time to prosecute the Warre at Sea also.

This year a Colonie was planted at Brundisium, in the Salentine Territories, twenty yeares after that Countrey was subdued by the Romans. About this time T. Cornicianus, who was the first High Priest of the Plebeians, died in a great old age, and in his place succeeded L. Caelius Metellus. The next Consuls were C. Fundanius C. F. Q. N. Fundulus, and C. Sulpicius C. F. Ser. N. Gallus. By them the war with Hamilear was managed in the same manner, and with the same fortune as before, only the Mercenary Gauls, and others who kept Garrison in Eryx, being discontented for want of Pay, and other injuries, endeavour'd to betray the City to the Romans, but not being able to effect it, they revolted to the Consuls, and these were the first Forreigners the Romans ever entertained into society of Armes. Notwithstanding this access of strength, they were not able by their Land-forces to finish the War, chiefly by reason of Hamilears virtue, who could neither be circumvented by craft, nor vanquished by Force.

Once more therefore they consulted about setting forth another Navy to Sea; For by no other means could the Carthaginians be kept from Sicily, unless they were mastered by Sea. And they were much encouraged in their resolution, by reason of their former success, when the Navy was set forth at the cost of private men: But money was wanting, the Treasury being long ago exhausted with the charge of a continuall War. Then did the Noble Roman Spirit seasonably relieve the wants of the Common-wealth; so generous were the Senators, that in a time of publick danger they scorned to spare their private purses, out of which on the sudden more money was raised then the building of a Navy required. Those who were rich did every man undertake to build a Quinqueme, setting it forth completely manned and armed; others according to their estates joyned two or three together in the same design, upon this condition, that when the Common-wealth was restored to a better Condition, every man's money should be paid back again. By this means two hundred ships of five Oares on a side were made ready, according to the pattern of that Gally they had taken from Hannibal Rhodius. Great was now the expectation of all men, for being put to their last refuge, they resolved with this Navy of Necessity to hazard the Fortune of the whole War. While these things were in doing, C. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Catulus, and A. Posthumus A. F. L. N. Albinus entered the Consulship. A. Posthumus was then Priest of Mars, and therefore when he desired to call lots for his Province, L. Metellus the High Priest would not suffer him, pronouncing it unlawful for a Priest to depart from the place of his Office, and leave the Ceremonies unperformed, which was likewise allowed of, and agreed upon by succeeding Generations. The Senate likewise at the same time shewed a like Example of defending their Countrey's Religion, for they forbade C. Lutatius the Consul to ask counsel at Preseste, and manage the Affairs of the Common-wealth by direction of outlandish Auguries. Then intending their minds upon the War (because both the Consuls could not be spared with safety of their Religion, and one seemed not sufficient to bear the whole burthen) they ordained one of the Prætors (this being the first year wherein they began to create two) to accompany C. Lutatius, and it fell to the Lot of Q. Valerius Falto. These gathering together all the Publick and private ships to the number of three hundred, with Ferry-boats, and other Vessells to the number of seven hundred, as soon as Winter was over, sailed to Sicily, whether being come, they find both the Liphetan and Drepanitan Havens open for them; For the Enemy not expecting any Navy from Italy, were returned to Africa with all their ships. The Consul animated with this prosperous beginning, being by nature full of spirit, hating Idleness, and desirous of Action, besieged Drepanum, raising Workes against it; in the mean time not omitting to train up his Sea-fouldiers, daily exercising them (as foreseeing sudden use of them in fight) inasmuch as they who were utterly ignorant of Maritime Affaires and chances, seemed sufficiently prepared for any Encounter.

The City of Drepanum being fiercely assaulted both by Sea and land, and now reduced even to the utmost danger, part of their Wall being battered to the ground; It chanced that the Consuls

Confult Valiantly fighting in the head of his men, received a deep wound in his thigh; whereupon his Souldiers troubled at his fall, and running in to him, missed the opportunity of taking the place, when it was even almost in their hands: Before the Confall had recovered the use of his foot, news was brought of a great Carthaginian Navy approaching, to the number of six hundred ships, stored with provision for their Army, with a very great strength of souldiers, and abundance of Armes and Money. Hanno, a Carthaginian Noble Man, was Commander in Chief, his chiefe care was to get safe to Eryx, ease his ships of their burden, and so manning them with stout Souldiers from Hamilear, to return and fight the Roman Navy. His design was well contrived, but prevented by the wisdom and circumspection of C. Lutatius the Consul, who knew it would be of great moment to the Victory, to encounter the Carthaginians while their ships were heavy laden, and encumbered with the burthen of their own provisions. Therefore upon the Ides of March, filling his ships with choice souldiers, he saileth to the Islands Ægates, over against Lilybæum, where he discovereth Hanno coming from Hieronefus; then encouraging his Sea-men and fouldiers he appointeth next day for the fight: But at break of day he began to doubt, because the wind was arisen favourable to the Carthaginians, and contrary to himselfe. Weighing then the Reasons on both sides, he thought it safer to fight with the winds, and Hanno while he was alone, and had his ships laden, then suffer him to pass by to unlade his ships, and bring back into battell the flower of their foot Army, and also Hamilear himselfe, who at that time was very formidable. Observing therefore the Enemies ships as they passed by with full sail, he setteth forth out of the Haven, and to encourage his men, cauteh himselfe to be carried into the Admirall-Gally, having not recovered the use of his limbe: signe of battell being given on both sides, Q. Valerius performed the Office of General, by reason of C. Lutatius his infirmity, not suffering to supply the place. The fight lasted not long before it plainly appeared on which side the Victory inclined; for the Roman ships being light and nimble, did they were likewise in every thing else superiours, being taught by experience to avoid and amend whatsoever heretofore they had found inconvenient, and harmful; Their ships were built after the best fashion, they had carefully laid aside all lumber which was of no use in fight, their Rowers were lusty, and well trained up, and they had a very considerable strength of Legionaries; All these were very great advantages toward the Victory. On the other side, the Carthaginian ships were heavy with burden, their Rowers newly leaved, and their men negligent, as being in security; for they had hoped the Romans would no more have tried their fortune at Sea. Therefore, as it must needs be, where the difference is so great, the Victory was not long in obtaining, the Carthaginians lost an hundred and twenty ships, seventy whereof were taken, with all the men, to the number of ten thousand, the rest upon an happy change of wind in the time of fight, escaped to Hieronefus. This was that famous battell at the Islands Ægates, as it is chiefly described by Polybius.

For other writers affirm, that seventy three ships were taken, an hundred and twenty five sunk, two and thirty thousand men taken prisoners, and thirteen thousand slain, the Prizes taken were very great, not only in Provision and Armes, but in gold and silver also. Of the Roman Navy twelve ships were lost. It is reported that from the beginning of the fight, a fiery meteor was seen in the aire, threatening as it were the Carthaginian Navy with it's point directed against it, prefiguring the event which presently ensued. Hanno, with the rest of the ships which escaped out of the Fight, except those which fled to Lilybæum, returning to Carthage, was put to death for this his Misfortune. C. Lutatius the Consul went to the Army before Lilybæum, where, while his wound was in curing, he spent his time in taking an account of the ships, and Captives, and ordering how they should be dismissed. Thence he went to Eryx, where he fought Hamilear with good success, having slain two thousand Carthaginians. The Carthaginians at home understanding what a great Overthrow they had received, yet found that their spirits were great, yet found that they wanted strength and means, to renew and carry on the War. For they were not able, so long as the Romans were Masters at Sea, to supply their Army at Eryx with necessary accommodations; and, if that Army miscarried, they knew not where to raise any more fouldiers, or find a General they durst confide in. Being by this Necessity driven into despair, they sent to Hamilear, empowering him with full Comission to do what he himselfe should think it or convenient for the Republick: He having hitherto performed the Office of an excellent General, did now no less behave himselfe as a good Citizen. For having duly and seriously considered all arguments on both sides, when he found there was no other means but Peace, whereby to preserve the Common-wealth; he sent Embassadors to the Consul to treat with him thereabout. The mention of Peace was not welcome to the Consul, for being now shortly to lay down his Office, he could not by any means hope for the obtaining of a greater Glory, then that of having finished the War; and to transmit that to his successor which was in his own power to accomplish, and most properly belonged to him, he thought both unseasonable and unadvised: He was the more forward, as being very well conscious of the wants of the Common-wealth, and that he thought it fit his Countrey, after so many yeares continuall labour, should enjoy some rest. Wherefore after a long dispute of Articles on both sides, it was agreed, that the Carthaginians should totally depart Sicily, that they should not wage war against Hiero, and the Syracusans; or any of their Associates, that they should forthwith without ransom restore all Captives, and deliver up all Ransomed, that they should in the space of twenty years, by equal portions, pay two thousand two hundred Eubœan Talents of pure silver: That the confederates of each party might live secure and unmolested; That neither party should exercise any command, or make any public building, or raise any soldiers within the other's jurisdiction, nor admit the others associates into friendship and confederacy. 'Twas added, that these Articles were firmly concluded, if the people of Rome would agree thereto.

But it could by no means be obtained (though the Consul earnestly insisted upon it) that the soldiers within Eryx should resign up their Arms; Hamilcar protesting, That he would rather sacrifice himself and his country to destruction, than yield to such a disgrace: Nevertheless he consented, That every man at his departure thence should pay eighteen pence. Hereupon messengers were sent both by the Consul and the Carthaginians to inform the Senate and People of the Conditions agreed upon. The people did not allow of the peace, but sent ten Delegates to take an exact account of all circumstances, who being returned, they heightened the Conditions, That the Carthaginians should presently lay down a thousand Talents, and within ten years after pay two thousand two hundred, that they should clearly quit not only Sicily, but all other Islands between that and Italy, that they should not fall in a long ship either into Italy or any of the Romans Islands, nor hire any Soldier from thence.

The Carthaginians, so they might have peace, refused nothing; Hamilcar, before the Articles were sworn unto, laid down his Command and went to Lilybæum, and from thence to Carthage, having approved himself, without comparison, the most excellent of all their Generals in that War, both in Courage and in Counsel. After this manner was managed and finished the first Carthaginian War, which lasted for four and twenty years with various chances and great losses, but to the greater damage of them who at last proved Victors. For they who have made a particular Account, report about five hundred Carthaginian ships to have been lost, and seven hundred of the Romans, which is a great argument of the Romans Constancy and Resolution, that, not regarding to many losses by fight, or shipwracks sustained, they did yet with patience bear and overcome the power of their Enemy, the frowns of Fortune, the tedious labour and pains, and the poverty of their Treasury.

After this the Government of C. Lutatius the Consul was prorogued, that he might settle affairs in Sicily; thither likewise was sent his brother one of the new Consuls, Q. Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cerco, whose Colleague was A. Manlius T. F. T. N. These did by their wisdom order the Province, and settled all things in peace and quiet, desisting all controversies and taking away all causes of quarrels and tumults, which after to great motions and alterations were unavoidably remaining. They disarmed all the Sicilians who adhered to Hamilcar, as likewise the Gauls who had revolted from him, furthermore the Gauls were commanded to depart out of the Roman Empire, because, besides other offences, when they were in the Garrison on the top of Mount Eryx, they plundered the Temple of Venus. The Sicilian Cities according to their several abilities were forced to pay Tribute and Custom; and it was made a Province, whither a Pretor was sent to command and govern yearly.

In the mean time Embassadors came from Carthage to intreat, They might redeem their Captives, and by Order from the Senate they were all restored without Ransome, as many as were in Public custody; they who were prisoners to private men were redeemed at a certain rate, the greater part whereof was by command of the Senate paid out of the Treasury. But unlucky accidents at home did much diminish the joy of the Roman people. The River Tiber did this year flow higher than ordinary, and filled all the lower parts of the City with large Pools of Water. Many buildings were by the first force thereof washed to the ground, and others, having their foundation rotted (for the foundation continued many days) after the fall of the water, did much decay.

After this there happened a greater calamity by Fire, which suddenly beginning in the night time, and running through many streets of the City, destroyed an incredible multitude of houses and men; and, not content with private harms, consumed all the buildings in the whole Circumference of the Forum. At length it seized upon the Temple of Vesta; but then L. Cassilius the Chief Priest, seeing the Holy things and secret Pledges of the Roman Empire to be in danger, behaved himself worthy of his Office, for he leaped into the midst of the fire without any care of himself, so he might but rescue the Holy things which the Virgins had forsaken and left behind them, which accordingly he performed. Himself having his Arm half burnt and his Eye-sight spoiled, beside the comfort he received from his good act, was eminently rewarded by the people of Rome, who Decreed, That as often as he went to the Senate he should be carried in a Chariot, which from the Foundation of the City was never granted to any man before.

In the mean time Q. Lutatius the Consul, with his brother Catulus and Q. Valerius the Propretor, having settled affairs in Sicily returned home to the City and made each of them them their Triumph; C. Lutatius Catulus on the fourth of the Nones of October, and Q. Valerius on the day before the Nones of the same month. There was a memorable strife between these two concerning the Triumph of Valerius; for Lutatius his Triumph being without dispute agreed upon, Q. Valerius contending that his pains and labour were equal in the Victory desired the like honour as he had undergone the like care and danger. Catulus on the other side alleged, That the lesser authority should not be equalized with the greater in the distribution of honours.

The question being hotly argued, Q. Valerius challenged Catulus to stand to arbitration, Whether or no the Carthaginian Navy were not overcome by his conduct? Catulus refused not to answer him; whereupon Atilius Calatinus was chosen Arbitrator, who asked Valerius, Whether the Consul's authority or the Pretors ought to have prevailed in case they had differed in their consultation about fighting? and in case their Auguries had been different whether of the two ought to have been followed? To which when Valerius answered, That in both cases the Consul's authority ought to have prevailed above the Pretor's; Calatinus not expecting till Catulus spoke, passed sentence on his side. But Q. Valerius, though he was cast by the judgment of the Arbitrator, did yet obtain liberty to Triumph, his virtue and courage having been very famous in that War. This year C. Aurelius Cotta, and M. Fabius Buteo being Censors, made the nine and thirtieth Lustration. There were numbered two hundred and three thousand Citizens; two Tribes being superadded, the one called Velina the other Quirina, the number of Tribes was made up five and twenty, and so continued. Sicily being now wholly subdued, as much as belonged to the Carthaginians, and peace with them concluded, all things seemed not only quiet but very safe and secure; when behold a sudden war, arising from whence it was least feared, did for a few days astonish all Italy both with the terror and fear of an intestine broil, as likewise with wonder at the speedy dispatch and issue of it.

The Falisci, I know not upon what account, grew so mad as to rise up in arms against the Romans; but the Consuls being sent with the Legions quelled them within six days, and reduced them to subjection. In the former battle, for 'tis reported two were fought, the Victory was doubtful, for their foot prevailed though their horse were routed. But in the latter the victory being on the Romans side complete, caused the Falisci to humble themselves and beg peace, having lost fifteen thousand men: upon their yielding they were fined with the loss of their arms, horse, household stuff, servants and half their Territories. Their City in whose strength they confided was translated from a craggy difficult place into plain open ground. The people of Rome were meditating a more severe revenge, out of anger against a City which had so often rebelled, but restraining their wrath by the advice of Papyrius (who had written the form of submission by the Consul's own command) That the Falisci submitted not to the Power but the Faith of the Romans: And so much did the sacred name of Publick Faith prevail with them all, that they adjudged the conquered party to no severer punishment than was agreed upon. This war gave occasion to have this year ended with the Triumphs of the Consuls; Q. Lutatius Triumphed on the Calends of March over the Falisci, A. Manlius the fourth of the Nones of March.

Faßli Capitoli 417. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus and C. Licinius P. F. P. N. The Masters of the Revells were M. Aemilius M. F. M. N. Sabinus. In the mean time the Boian Princes, confiding in the multitude of Auxiliaries they had from beyond the Alps, sent to the Consuls demanding, That Ariminum with its Territories, which without doubt of right belonged to the Gauls, should be restored them, otherwise a terrible and Desultory War would ensue. The Consuls, having not drawn their forces together, durst not hazard those few they had in the fortune of a Battel, neither could they consent unto the Gauls their demand, they answered therefore, They should send Embassadors to the Senate, to signify their minds. The Gauls accepted of the condition, and a truce was concluded on for some days, while the Embassadors could go and return again. The Ambassadors at Rome received a denial from the Senate, and greater preparations were made for this War, whereof there was afterward no use, inasmuch as Fortune without the expence of Roman blood put an end to it? While the Embassadors returned, the Boians fought a set Battel with their Transalpine Auxiliaries, upon this Occasion; The Auxiliaries without the knowledge of the Boian people, had marched as far as Ariminum, whence a suspicion arose, that their main Errand was to possess that Territory themselves; the Boians therefore were so enraged, that having slain their Kings Ates and Galatus as Traitors, they endeavoured by force to expell these strangers out of their Land, whereupon a Battel was fought with much slaughter, and both sides being thereby much weakened, the Transalpines returned home, the Boians bought their Peace of the Romans with part of their Grounds. This war being so quickly dispatched, the Consuls went into Liguria: where P. Lentulus, having in a set Battel Overthrown the Enemy, led his Army through the whole Region, taking Castles, some by forme, some by composition. C. Licinius intending to sail over into Corfica, not having boats enough to transport his whole Army, sent M. Claudius Glycias before, with a Party; who, being vainly arrogant, when he saw that the Corficans were terrified at his coming, without any respect to the Consul by whose direction he was sent, or consideration of his own office and duty, made a league with them, upon certain Conditions, in his own Name; thinking thereby to attain unto himselfe the Glory of having reduced that Island. But the Consul following with the Residue of the Army, forbore not to prosecute them with armes (notwithstanding they alledged in their own behalfe the Claudian Peace) till he brought them into subjection. The Senate to clear the Commonwealth from the Imputation of Breach of Faith, ordered Glycias the Author of that dishonourable peace, to be delivered up into the hands of the Corficans; and they refusing to take him, he was put to death in the Common Gaole. This year were Censurs L. Cornelius L. F. T. N. Lentulus Caudinus & Lutatius C. F. C. N. Cereus, who made no Lustration because C. Cereus died in his Censourship. For all Claudius was delivered up to the Corficans, and then executed as a Malefactor, yet the Barbarians could not by any means be persuaded, that the Roman war afterward was just against them. Their minds therefore being agrieved with the memory hereof were easily tempted to break out in armes, in imitation of their neighbour Island Sardinia. For the Carthaginians by secret promises had incited the Sardinians to Rebellion, who readily entertained the motion, as not too much hating their old Masters, nor loving their new ones.

This news being brought to Rome, filled the City both with fear and indignation, not that they much regarded Sardinia, but because they perceived the Carthaginian war would break out again; which because they believed the sooner it was begun would prove the easier, (The Carthaginians having not well recovered themselves since the last war) they resolved to prepare themselves, and commence it as soon as might be. The Carthaginians, willing at that time to endure any thing rather than a Roman war, were hereupon so terrified, that having once and again sent Embassadors in vaine, they did at length fend ten of their Prime Nobility, most humbly entreating, That they might enjoy the Peace they had obtained. Nevertheless they could not receive any mild Answer, till Hanno the youngest among the Embassadors, but of an undaunted mind, and a free tongue, replied, If you are promptly determined to deny us that Peace which we have bought, not for a year or two, but for ever, at least restore us our price we gave you, Sicily and Sardinia: In private contracts 'tis no honest man's part, when the bargain is made void, to receive his Commodities back, and not return the money laid down for them. Then the Romans, being ashamed to seem the Authors of an unjust war, dismissed the Embassadors with a better Answer. So one of this years Consuls C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bullus (now the second time Consul) remained in Italy, the other, T. Manlius T. F. T. N. went according to his lot into Sardinia. He, in many places encountering the Enemy with good success, appeased the whole Island, subdued the Sardinians, and triumphed over them the sixth of the Ides of March.

These things being accomplished, and the Roman Armes laid down, as having no Enemy, the Temple of Janus was shut, an unusual sight in Rome, and not seen, after the days of Numa, for the space of about four hundred and forty years. In which respect I account the City of Rome very unhappy, that being perpetually employ'd in great and difficult labours, could never obtain the fruits thereof. For, whereas no wife man wagheth war but to procure Peace, this City after so many and great warres happily finished, sometimes could not obtain: but never could long keep Peace. For even then new Rumours of War, after a few monthes, were heard of

of, which bereaved them of the sweetness of that Peace, which they had scarce well tasted of. The Sardinians, who had lately been subdued, shake off the yoke, and the Corficans brake out in Rebellion, and the Ligurians raised Tumults, even in Italy it selfe. Therefore L. Pomponius A. F. A. N. Albinus and Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. C. N. Maximus being Consuls had order to leave new Armies, which being disposed of in three bodies to prevent the enemies from helping one the other, L. Pomponius assailed the Ligurians, Sp. Carvilius the Corficans, and P. Cornelius was designed for Sardinia. This Island being of a very unwholsome aire afflicted his Army with the Plague and other diseases, whereby many mortals with the Pretor also himselfe perished. Hereupon the Sardinians grew bold and high, but were soon quelled after the arrival of Sp. Carvilius in a great set battel; the Corficans were likewise subdued by him. For which exploits it was decreed he should Triumph, as he did on the Calends of April. In Liguria likewise affairs succeeded well by the management of the other Consul with his Army. At Rome Tullia one of the Vestal Virgins being condemned of Incest which she had basely committed with a slave, flew her self with her own hands. After this C. Atilius A. F. A. N. Bullus A. Pomponius A. F. L. N. Albinus being Censors, made the fortieth Lustration. 'Tis probable the number of Citizens was this year lesse then heretofore (though I find not the number recorded) because the Censor, in order to the encrease of Citizens, compelled every man to swear, That he would marry for the Procreation of children. This year Cn. Nevius a Campanian who had received pay in the Carthaginian war, did first add Fables to his Scenes. In the mean time the Ligurians and Sardinians again rebelling, were allotted Provinces to the new Consuls. Q. Fabius Q. F. Q. N. Maximus Verrucosus managed the Ligurian War, M. Pomponius M. F. M. N. Marbo the Sardinian; whereas it was reported, That the Carthaginians were the cause of this commotion by private messengers stirring up the Barbarians to Rebellion: There were Embassadors sent to Carthage with very harsh instructions, To require the tribute due, to command them to abstain from all Islands under the Roman jurisdiction, adding threats of war unless they performed what was required at their hands.

The Carthaginians had now since their former calamities gathered strength and courage chiefly by the industry of Hamilcar, who did not only reduce those who had revolted in Africa, Velestum, but had further extended the Empire: They had likewise by his conduct acquired great Dominions in Spain. Wherefore they answered the Embassadors roughly enough to all particulars; but when they, according to their instructions, propounded to the Carthaginians a Spear and a Caduceus, offering them their choice of which they pleased, they answered, That they would choose neither, but would accept of which favour the Legates should think fit to leave behind. Henceforward a cruel hatred began to burn between these two people, but neither party being willing as yet to commence the war, they continued in a shew of friendship, rather because they did not fight, then that the peace was firm.

Both the Consuls, returning to Rome and declaring what they had done, obtained leave to Triumph. Q. Fabius had slain many Ligurians in battel, and had compelled the rest to contain themselves upon the Alps, and made the skirts of Italy secure from their plundrings. He triumphed over the Ligurians on the Calends of February. Upon the Ides of March afterwards M. Pomponius triumphed over the Sardinians, whom he had overcome. Nevertheless the Sardinians did not abstain from War, but being by their losses rather incensed then broken, they renewed the Rebellion with much greater strength. Therefore both the Consuls, M. Anilius M. F. M. N. Lepidus and M. Publius L. F. L. N. Mallius were sent into Sardinia: they gathered together great store of plunder and spoil in that Island, which when they carried over with them into Corfica they utterly loſt, the Islanders there taking it from them. At home likewise there were very vehement tumults at this time, for C. Flaminius Tribune of the people propounding an Agrarian Law, That the Picene and Gallic grounds which belonged to the Senones, should be equally divided amongst the people. The Senate opposed it, and not being able to persuade the Tribune by entreaties or threats, at length gave order to the Magistrates to raise an Army for defence of the Commonwealth; Flaminius could not yet be drawn from his resolution, obſtinate against all force, and inexorably by intreaties. His father likewise admonished him, To submit himself to the will of the Senate, and not be esteemed an author of sedition. But him, To submit himself in his design, called an Assembly, intending to recite the Law. But then his father Flaminius in grief and anger came to the Pulpit, and taking his son by the hand pulled him away.

A wonderful Example was there shewn with what Piety and Reverence all men held esteem of the power of a Father: For he who had condemned the indignation and cruel threats of the whole Senate, now in the heat of war, in the view of all the Roman people, to whom the Constitution of Law would have been most acceptable, suffered himself by the hand of one the only old man to be drawn down from the higher place. The Modesty of the Assembly in this business is not to be forgotten, who though they saw all their hopes frustrated by the Tribune's departure, did not by the least murmur signify their discontent at his fathers action. But the Law was by this means rather deferred then avoided. C. Carvilius the other Tribune assailing his Colleague, this as it caused corruption of manners amongst the Commons, so it gave being to that most grievous Gallic war which brake out the eighth year after the division of the grounds.

and other Illyrians who had revolted to the Romans, then Tentis began utterly to despair and thought of buying her peace upon any conditions whatsoever. At the beginning of the Spring therefore the sent Embassadors to Rome, excusing what was past as being done by the Command of Agro whose Acts it was necessary for her to maintain. The Romans granted peace, not to her, who had no proper power of admitting affairs, neither had deserved any favour at her hands, but to Pinnus the son of Agro, on these conditions, That he should duly pay what tribute was imposed on him, that he should quit all Illyrium, some few places excepted, that he should not sail beyond Lissus with above two Boats, and those unarmed. By this peace Coryceus, Pharus, Assa, Dyrachium and the Afintanes became wholly the Romans; what else was under Agro his jurisdiction being left to Pinnus. Tentis either for shame or by the command of the Romans left off the Government of the Realm, which Demetrius undertook under the name of Protector.

Thus being ended the Illyrian Quarrel, and the Limits of the Roman Empire extended even to Greece, the Commonwealth on the other hand was perplexed, for the Gauls were ready to rise up in Arms, and the Carthaginians power did mightily increase in Spain, which could not be established without great danger to the Romans. Haderbal the Son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar, having revenged the death of his Father-in-law, did, partly by Arms, but more frequently by his Wisdom and Eloquence, wherein he excelled, reduce many Nations to the Carthaginian subjection; and built another Carthage called the New, in a Gulf of the sea by a most commodious Haven. But the Gallick affairs being of nearest concernment, hindered for the present their designs against the Carthaginians: They endeavoured therefore to stop the proceedings of the Gauls by leagues and Covenants; They sent likewise Embassadors to Carthage and to Haderbal, warning them, To contain themselves beyond the River Iberus, and permit the Sequanians to enjoy their liberty, and live according to their own Law. These things happened in the year when Sp. Carvilius Sp. F. Cn. N. C. Maximus and Q. Fabius Q. N. Maximus were again Consuls. About the same time L. Pothumius Proconful who wintered in Illyrium, sent Embassadors from Coryceus to the Ætolians and Achiæns, declaring what he had done, For what causes the war was undertaken, with what success managed, and upon what conditions finished. They were kindly entertained, forasmuch as those Nations and all other the Grecians did vehemently hate the Illyrians by reason of the continual Piracies exercised by them under Agro and Tentis.

The Senate hearing this, did allow of what the Proconful had done, and moreover decreed another Embassy in the name of the Commonwealth, to the Corinthians and Athenians, declaring, That the people of Rome gave assistance toward them, and their equity toward all men. Hereby the Romans purchased great good will amongst those people, and the Corinthians forthwith decreed this honour to the people of Rome, That they should be Partners in the Illyrian Games, which was one of the four greatest Solemnities in Greece. They were chiefly moved hereunto because the Romans had set at liberty, as Apollonia and other Grecian Cities, to Coryceus likewise, which was a Colony of the Corinthians; the Athenians also embraced the Roman Society, and decreed, They should have the liberty of the City of Athens, and of the Eleusinian Mysteries. In the mean time Cn. Fulvius Proconful made a Naval Triumph over the Illyrians on the Calends of Septuaginta, and beheaded the Illyrian Nobles whom he led in Triumph. This was the first Triumph over the Illyrians.

The next year P. Valerius L. F. M. N. Flaccus, and M. Atilius M. F. M. N. Regulus being Consuls, the number of Pretors was doubled, and they thought fit to create four that they might lead some with command into Sicily and Sardinia. Amongst these M. Valerius was Pretor of Sardinia and Corsica, C. Flaminius of Sicily. At this time there was very great fear of a Gallick war, for 'twas reported that the Boians and Insubrians consulted not only one with the other, but with the Transalpine people, and had hired a great strength of Mercenaries of the Gætule people of Gallia. They used therefore not only ordinary remedies against this evil, but such as a severe Judge would by no means excuse, but that the love of one Country makes some things pardonable which in themselves are horrid. For when besides other prodigies they were terrified with) they found in the Sybils books, That the Gauls and Grecians should one day possess the City of Rome; That they might by craft avert the threats of the Prediction, by the advice of the Priests, they buried alive two Gauls, of each sex one, and likewise two Grecians a man and a woman, in the Beef-marlet, that so they possessing part of the City, might seem to have fulfilled the Prophecy. This was done when M. Valerius M. F. M. N. A. Julia and L. Apustius L. F. C. N. Fulvo were Consuls. This year, amongst other no considerable occurrences, was most of it spent in making preparation for the Gallick War. There was raised a most incredible number both of horse and foot, toward this war all Italy in general joining with the Romans. Q. Fabius the Illyrian, who was present at the translation of these affairs, reports, There were in arms eight hundred thousand men. That the number of the Romans and Campanians amounted to the number of two hundred forty eight thousand and two hundred footmen, and six and twenty thousand and six hundred horsemen. All the other multitude were Italians. The Ætolians also and Cenomanians afforded the Romans the help of twenty thousand men, who by frequent alarms and incursions might compel the neighbouring Boians to tarry to the defence of their own Country, and not join themselves with the other forces of the

the Enemy, because they refused to hearken to Terms of Peace which the Romans propounded. For the Ætolians and Cenomanians being persuaded to renew friendship with Rome, the Insubrians Arduus and Boians persisted in Hostility; nevertheless their strength was not great, their Kings not daring to lead out all their armed men: but being forced to leave some at home to defend their Countries, with the rest (to wit, fifty thousand Foot, and twenty thousand Horse) they began their march through Etruria towards Rome.

In the mean time L. Atilius, Q. F. Cn. N. Papir, & C. Atilius M. F. M. N. had Sardinia and Ariminum, with the adjoining Gauls for their Provinces. For the Sardinians being aggrieved at the perpetual presence of a Prætor, with his Wives and signs of Authority, did again move Tumults; but C. Atilius the Consul from quæsted them without any great difficulty. L. Atilius had more to do with the Gauls, having broken through without any difficulty to Rome. The Prætor of Etruria being not able to hinder their passage, overtook them at a stratagem whereby to entice the Romans out to battle. In the dead of the night they marched with all their Foot to Fasula, leaving the Horse behind with instruction at break of day only to show themselves to the Enemy, and presently betake themselves to the Foot Army, where should be reception for them in a convenient Camp, from whence likewise they would on the sudden charge the Romans unwares.

The Romans were hereby deceived, and perished the horse as if they had fled, and about Fasula were received by the Enemy, fresh and ready prepared, being themselves weary and void of Council, as in an occurrence not foreseen by them. Their only course was either by flight to defend themselves, or to sell their bloods at a dear rate. But the Gauls exceeding in number, besides other advantages, flew of the Romans six thousand upon the place, and put the rest to flight. The Gauls endeavouring to take a fenced place upon an hill, (whither the greater part of them which fled had betaken themselves) finding their strength to fail with their last night's march, the dayes fight, raised to cure and refresh their bodies, leaving a party of horse to besiege the hill, not doubting to reduce it into their power the next day, either by force or composition. In this very nick of time came L. Atilius, rather to be wilhed for, then upon any reasonable ground expected. For upon the first news of the Gauls setting forward, he was sent to Ariminum, to defend the Coasts upon the Adriatick shore; but hearing their intention was to march to Rome, he marched by very great journeys from Ariminum; and by good luck came to this very place, and pitched his Camp not farre distant from the Enemy. The Gauls seeing fire in the night time from that part, judging, as was true, that the Roman Army was come, sent out some of their men armed, that they might the easier pass the Enemies Guards. The Consul by them understanding the state of Affairs, without any long deliberation, which the time would not permit, at break of day set forward with his horse to the hill, giving order to the Tribunes to follow him with the Legions. The Gauls likewise were informed by the sentinels that the Romans were come, and entered into council concerning the present affairs. King Anapostus advised, that they should not encounter the Enemy, now their soldiers were laden with rich spoils, but to return home, and lay aside their plunder, and then, if occasion were given of fighting, to return empty and nimble. Every one approving the council, they departed before night, taking their journey through Etruria by the sea side. L. Atilius having taken in those who fled to the hill, and having intelligence of the Enemies march, would not fight him in a set battell, but resolved to follow them, laying hold of what opportunity time should afford.

In this conjuncture of Affairs fortune once more dispensed an unexpected accident. The other Consul C. Atilius arriving at Pisa from Sardinia, and there landing his Army, marched toward Rome, along the very lane Etrurian thore where the Gauls were returning. Near Tellamus a Port of Etruria, the Scouts of each Army first met one the other, and the Consul, by some Prisoners who were brought to him, understanding of the Gauls march, and his Colleagues following them, wondered at so unusual a chance, and being confident of Victory, having the Enemy cooped up between two Consular Armies, gave order to the Colonells, To array the Army, as well as the ground would permit, and lead their Regiments in a square body, and a slow march. Himself, observing a piece of high ground, opportunely overlooking the way the Gauls must of necessity pass, set forward with a party of horse to prepossesse it. For he made what halt he could to fight the Enemy, being assured, if he were any thing worked, to be relieved by his Colleague, if his undertaking succeeded, to carry away the chief Glory of the Victory. The Gauls seeing a troop of Enemies in the higher grounds, conjecturing it was a party of horse, sent round about in the night time by Atilius, sent out likewise some of their own horse, with the assistance of some light armed men, to open the passage. But being informed that the other Consul was come, he was forced to array and marshal his foot, with their faces each way toward the Enemy, having in the middle their backs joined one to the other. For they saw C. Atilius before them, and well knew that L. Atilius followed them behind. Against L. Atilius they placed the Transalpine Mercenaries, in the front (whom from their weapons are denominated Gætules) behind these, for a reserve, were the Insubrians. Against Atilius were opposed the Tauriscians and Boians. The Waggon and Carts were placed as a rampire Liv. 16. 6. 4. about each Wing: all their plunder, with a sufficient guard, was laid aside upon a neighbouring hill, Polyb. 11.

hill. The fight was now begun at that hill which C. Attilius had possessed, whereby L. Amilius conjectured that his Colleague was there, of whose journey he knew nothing certain, only he heard that he was arrived at Pila. Taking Council therefore on a sudden he commanded some of his own horse to ride to the plate of fight: Thence the horse on both sides had a very hot encounter, wherein C. Attilius the Consul was slain, and his head carried to the Gallick Kings: At length the Romans fighting with all might and main, kept the place, and repulsed the enemy. The Horse-fight being thus managed, the Foot charged each the other. There was to be seen a very terrible encounter, as for the number & strength of both parties, so for the strange ordering of the Battle, for the Gauls being included between two Roman Armies turned their faces on each side to battle; it being very doubtful whether this posture were a greater advantage to them, in that (having to deal with two enemies) they kept their Rear secure, and were of necessity compelled to stand to it having no way to flee; or that it were a greater disadvantage to be hemmed in by two Consular Armies. But the Romans were partly terrified with the very aspect of the men who stood in the front, with stern countenances and vast bodies; partly encouraged not only with the sweetness of praise, but of plunder also; for among the former ranks of the Gauls there was not a man, but glistered with golden bracelets and aine strings.

The fight being begun, the light armed men made a great slaughter of the Enemy, especially where the Gatzatz stood, who in a barbarous ostentation had hung away their garments and fought naked in the front. For the Gallick shields being long and narrow, not able to cover the whole body, they stood like so many marks exposed to the Roman darts: and they fell without revenge, being not able to strike the enemy, not to come to meet with light armed men. Wherefore growing desperate some running rashly upon the enemy were killed with darts before they could come to hand-to-hand, others by degrees retiring backward disordered their own Battle. The Gatzatz being thus vanquished by the light-armed men, the complete armed did on every side charge the Boians, Insubrians, and Tauricans and slew a great number, nevertheless the enemy stood with resolute minds, being in nothing inferior but in their weapons; for neither did their shields defend their bodies, neither did their swords much offend the Romans, for being made only to hack, and hew they had no good points: they were likewise made crooked at the first blow, and unfit for a second, unless they be straightened againe by your foot on the ground. The Romans having already the better, were assured of the victory by the returne of the horse, who, having put the Gallick horse to flight, riding down the hill made an impression upon the flank of the enemy, so much the more terrible as coming from the higher ground. After this manner Polybius describeth the Battle of the Gauls in Britannia, from whence others with little reason do differ. For who can easily believe, that the Gauls were compelled by a tempest to fly in the night time fearing the anger of the Gods? And that C. Attilius setting upon their Rear was slain? That afterward, each party for some dayes kept within their defences, L. Amilius fought happily with them, neither are they any more to be credited, who relate this battle as fought, not on the sea Coasts, but, in the Aretine Territories. There is no question made but that forty thousand Gauls were then slain, little lesse than ten thousand taken, with Celsus one of their Kings: the other King Anserius who was of greater reputation for power and courage, escaping with a small company, in his flight cut the throats of all his kindred and his own also. There was great plunder found, which the Consul caused to be returned to those from whom it was at first taken, every master owning his own goods. Then marching with his own Army and that of Attilius, through Liguria into the Boians Country he gave it in plunder to his soldiers as a reward of their pains taken, and they in a few dayes being sufficiently laden with spoils, he returned to Rome, to the greater joy of all, because the war was formidable. Scarce any man's Triumph was ever so much celebrated with acclamations of the people, being otherwise of itself very gallant and memorable for the glory of his noble performances, so for the number of the Captives and the worth of the spoils. There were many military Ensignes, and abundance of gold Chains and Bracelets, the ornaments of valiant men amongst the Gauls. But all men eyes were chiefly intended upon Trismegistus and the other Gallick Princes, whom Amilius by way of scorn led girt and armed into the Capitol, as if thereby he took care they should fulfil the vow they had made, Never to smother their girdles in Belli, till they had ascended the Capitol. L. Amilius made this Triumph over the Gauls on the third of the Nones of March. This year was made the one and fortieth Lustration by the Censors, Q. Claudius Sp. F. C. N. Censor and M. Junius D. F. B. N. Praetor. The fear of the Gallick war was over, but the desire of revenge remained, and both the next years Consuls had Gallia for their Province; the Consuls were T. Manlius T. F. T. N. Tergestinus and Q. Fulvius M. F. Q. N. Flaccus again. The people cheerfully decreed their Armies and whatsoever accommodation belonged to the Commencing or prosecuting a War. For it was hoped, that after so great a victory, they might easily drive away the Gauls from about the Po; if they minded their business. The Consuls being gone with their Armies presently terrified the Boians into submission; their expedition afterwards was not so quick, by reason of the Penitence and so many shows which fell. Others affirm, That these Consuls crossed the Po, and in a set battle overcame the Insubrians, that they flew before and twenty thousand and took five thousand. But I rather follow the authority of Polybius in these points.

In the mean time because the Consuls being in a far Country, and were hindered either by action, or by showers, so that they could not return to the general Assembly: L. Caecilius L. F. Fasti Capiti, C. Fabius M. F. Buto, by the Assembly, and Flamininus C. F. N. and P. Furius Sp. F. M. Philus were made Consuls. These as I think were the first Romans, who making an invasion into the Insubrians Country, crossed the Po with their Army, where the River Pada falls into the Po.

This boldness cost them much labour and some blood; for in their passes over the River, and while they pitched their Camps, the enemy fiercely falling in upon them slew a considerable number. The Romans trouble and care upon this News, was mightily increased by many Prophecies related, as that in the Picennian Territories, a River ran blood, that in Etruria the sky was seen to burn, that at Arminium in the night time light appeared, and three Moons were seen at the same time Caria was shaken with an Earthquake, and the Rhodian Colossus fell down, these things were not thought to concern the Romans at all: Concerning the other Prophecies, the Augurs being asked their advice, answered, that the Consuls were not rightly chosen, whereupon letters were sent after them to recall them back to the City. In the mean time the Gauls having made a Truce, had quitted the Insubrians Country, and afterward having raised Auxiliaries in the Country of the Centomani, had again began to infect the grounds lying under the Alps; whereupon the Insubrians enraged with anger, carried into the field the golden ensignes (out of the Temple of Minerva) which were called Immoveable, because it was not lawful to stir them but in the time of Extremest Necessity; and had now met the Romans with an Army of fifty thousand men, ready to enter battle. At this very time came the letters from the Senate. C. Flamininus either guessing at the substance of the letters, or being pre-informed by his friends, perswaded his Colleague, not to open them before battle.

Being resolved to fight, they consulted about their Mercenary Gauls, lest if they were neglected, they might have cause to quarrel; and if admitted to the fight, they might have occasion of doing harm. For they feared their inconstancy, especially fighting against Neighbours and Kinsmen. At last they thought fit to place them on the other side of the River, where the bridges being beaten down, they neither could do any harm to the Romans, nor have opportunity to flee, but to trust in their courage: After a sharp dispute the Romans obtained the Victory, to the greater praise of the Tribunes then the Consuls. For C. Flamininus had ordered the Battle so near the brink of the River, that there was no space left to receive the Troopes in case they had been forced to Retire; which without doubt would have proved the ruine of the whole Army. But the Tribunes having had experience by former battles, that all the Gallick Vow consisteth in the first charge, which is very hot, but short, and if the brunt of it be once borne, there is no more to be feared from them; did divide the spears of the Triarii among the first ranks, that with them they might receive the first onset, and afterward flinging them away, draw their Swords when the fight began; the Gallick Swords were presently blunted, and made crooked at the first stroke upon the spears, and while they were busie in making them straight, the Romans advancing with their drawing Rapiers, took from them the use of their Weapons: For this inconvenience is in the Gallick Swords, that being made only to hack, some time is required in lifting up the hand, and preparing for the strokes, which if it be denied, they are of no use: But the Romans thrusting with the point could do their business in a moment, and so pressing forward to the bodies of the enemies, they did securely thrust them into the face and breasts.

Tis reported that nine thousand Gauls were slain, and double the number taken. After the Victory, they spoiled the grounds round about, and gathered much Plunder. Then at length they thought fit to read the Senates letters, the contents whereof Philus was ready to obey: But C. Flamininus insisted, that this was the envy of some Senators, and not the faith of the Amplices whereof there could be no more certain argument, then the Victory they had obtained; he said also he would not return till either the War was finished, or his Magistracy expired: adding moreover, that he would cause the Romans to leave off the foolish observation of a Augurium, and Jacobite superstition. Nevertheless P. Furius persisting in his resolution, the Army of Flamininus, fearing that after his departure they should not be very safe in the enemies Country, perswaded him to tarry for some few dayes, but he did utterly abstain from all actions; Flamininus taking in the mean time some Castles, as also a City of no small renown among those people. The spoils he gave to his soldiers, to prepare their minds for his defence in that quarrel he knew would arise between him and the Senate. This City indeed was so moved with indignation, that none went out according to the custome to meet the Consuls, and not only Flamininus but for his sake Philus also was denied the honour of Triumph. At length Flamininus by the peoples favour, entered the City triumphing on the fourth of the Ides of March. Many rich spoils were to be seen in that Triumph: Great store of Armes, and chains of gold, out of which Flamininus dedicated a Token of Victory to Jupiter in the Capitulum, and inverting the Gallicks Vow, who had promised out of the Romans spoils to dedicate a Chain to Mars. Afterward the other Consul triumphed over the Gauls, and the Ligurians on the fourth of the Ides of March. The Senates ill will being hereby rather intended then overcome, did Demetrius observing what was done, took as good Counsel as in such a dangerous case could be, for declining the present skirmish, and calling his souldiers together, Pallant men, saith he, it appears that our courage is formidable to the enemy, for, betaking themselves to stratagems, they declare little trust in their force of arms. They have made use of the night season to creep into this Island, of which, if I be not deceived in you, they shall possess no more, then what they can cover with their bodies having payed for it with their lives. Only you, my Country-men of Pharus, and young men of Ilyrium, be mindful of your Country, of your honour, and wake the Romans know, 'twas neither their valour nor our cowardize, which gave them occasion once to Triumph at Rome over the Ilyrians. It was not Fulvius or Publius with all their counsel and strength, but Tentus which conquered Ilyrium by her rashness and impotence of affections. And to omit other things, ye are not ignorant, that at that time their victory had not been so easie, but that Tentus chose to have me rather her enemy then her Protector. But because I firmly trust to you, and the time requires rather deeds then words, I shall say no more. Ye have courage, ye have weapons, ye see the necessity, which is able to make a coward fight, danger is imminent both to your selves, and your City unless by your valour ye repel it. Let us on then and with happy fortune charge these men who are newly crept out of their hiding places: We shall do well enough with those who are landing: if we once overcome these, the others will flee to their ships in greater haste then with their lives.

Having thus for the time encouraged his men, he leads them on to charge those who were possessed of the Hill, and they as diligently ordering themselves sustained his charge, till they, who in the mean time had landed, coming upon his Rear entirely routed his whole body with great slaughter. Some few by flight escaped to the Town, others by blind paths slip away. Demetrius who in certain by-places had boates ready prepared for all adventures getting aboard one of them fled to Philip King of Macedon, by whom being entertained, he did by battery, and Tyrannical advice corrupt the young man's manners, which before were laudable, and likewise was author unto him of the Roman War and many other Calamities. After this fight Pharus was taken, and by the Consul's Command plunder'd and demolished. The Ilyrian Affairs being afterward settled to his own liking the Consul now at the end of Summer returned to Rome to obtaine his Triumph. In the narration of this War I have likewise chosen to follow Polybius, being not ignorant that others attribute the glory of finishing this War to both the Consuls, who having summoned Demetrius to appeare before them, did, upon default, War with him in the Island of Issa by the same arts as I have related, and then taking Pharus by Treachery expelled him out of the Dominions. Concerning whose end likewise they differ from Polybius, who lived nearer these times and these places; but those things as being after this time I shall passe by. But the Romans, for King Pinnus his sake, whose years declar'd him innocent of these designs, did spare the Ilyrians, and renewed the league with him, with addition of some Articles. L. Aemilius made a most glorious Triumph over these people, and I find also that M. Livius Triumphed for this War, but most writers mention it not; 'tis likely, because the performances of L. Paulus, being the more eminent, did obscure the glory of his Colleague.

More notable a while after was the Judgment and condemnation of the fame M. Livius. He and L. Paulus being out of Envy accused, That they had not equally distributed the spoils among the souldiers, but had converted many things to other uses, did undergoe the sentence of the people. L. Paulus hardly escaped, M. Livius was condemned by all the Tribes except only the Macian. Which disgrace and indignity he took so heavily, that departing the City, he avoyded all meetings, till the Commonwealt's occasions recalled him to his former course of life. But these things happened in the Consulship of P. Cornelius Scipio and Tib. Sempronius Longus. But in the same year when M. Livius and Paulus were Consuls, one Archagathus the son of Lyfianus came out of Peloponessus to Rome, who professing Physick was made free of the City, endowed with all the privileges of a Roman, and had a shop bought for him at the Publick charge in the Acilian street. A thing not so much worthy taking notice of, but that then first was the name of the Medicinal faculty heard of and known at Rome; they having to this time preserved their healths by temperance and remedies not bought. In the same Consulship time Colonies were deduced to Placentia and Cremona in the Gallick Territories; Being none of the least causes of anger which moved the Boians and Insubrians to incline to Hannibal, who, now assaulting Saguntum with all might, did by the ruins thereof prepare his way to the Roman Wars. But these and other commotions, which in great number, and with no lesse Terror and violence presently afflicted the Romans, will the better be understood by relating foregoing Circumstances.
